first pupil died in 1620, and his pupil in 1628.

(b) Widow of the earl of Devonshire, father of his first pupil.

(7) Tit. Liv. lib.
xxiv, cap. xxvii

(8) Sil. Italicus,
lib. xiv, pag. m.
589.

(9) Dolendum nobile hoc ingenium eodem quo & magnum Scaligerum infortunio laborasse, quod Ma-thematicis stu-diis serius paulo animum adiecit.
Vita Hobbesi, pag.
40.

(10) Ibid. pag.
39.

In the year 1629, he travelled into France with an English gentleman (a), in quality of his governour, and applied himself to the study of the Mathematics during that journey [D]. In the year 1631, he was invited by the countess of Devonshire (b), to be tutor to her son, who was thirteen years of age, and three years after he travelled with him into France and Italy. During his stay at Paris, he applied himself to the study of Natural Philosophy, and especially to the inquiring into the causes of the sensitive operations of animals. He daily discoursed with Father Merfennus, upon that subject. He was recalled into England in the year 1637, but having foreseen the civil war from the time that he had observed what happened in the first session of the parliament in the year 1640, he sought out an agreeable retreat at Paris, where he might quietly philosophize with Father Merfennus, Gasendus, and some other great men. There he composed his treatise de Cive [E], of which he published only a few copies in the year 1642.

penite ad misericordiam animis, ne interficerentur. Ira deinde ex misericordia orta, quod adeo festinatum ad supplicium, neque locus penitendi aut regressus ad ira reliquus esset. Itaque fremere multitudo (7). The factions did not cease by the intire extirpation of the royal family, they increased from day to day, and in a little time subverted the liberty and sovereignty of the country. They unseasonably exposed Syracuse to the enmity of the Romans, who besieged and subdued it. Silius Italicus very well describes the confusion that city fell into after they had put the tyrant Hieronymus, and all his family, to death. It was a chaos from which the Romans knew how to draw a famous conquest. The discord of the city encouraged them to besiege it.

Savos namque pati fastus, juvenemque cruento
Flagrantem luxu, & miscentem turpia duris,
Haud ultra faciles, quos ira metusque coquebat
Jurati obtruncant, nec jam modus ensibus, addunt
Fœmineam cædem, atque insontum rapta sororum
Corpora prosternunt ferro, nota sævit in armis
Libertas, jactatque jugum: pars Punica castra, Pars Italos & nota volunt: nec turba furentum
Desit, quæ neutro sociari fœdere malit (8).

Impatient of his luxury, and pride,
United in conspiracy, they slay
The cruel tyrant, and avenge their wrongs.

Nor stop'd the bloody vengeance of the sword, till Till, in his fate involv'd, his guiltless sisters fell.
Recover'd liberty now stalks in arms,
And shakes the galling yoke: some would submit
Their city freed to Carthaginian sway;
From Italy a master some require,
And madly some a neutral state demand.

Represent all this never so well, you will never convince those, who are prejudiced against monarchy: they will answer you, that since it's disorders are not to be remedied but by so horrible miseries, you ought to conclude that is a great evil.

[D] He applied to the study of the Mathematics during that journey. It is a misfortune that he applied himself to it so late (9), he was above forty years old when he began that study, which was the reason that he could not perfect himself in it so much as was necessary, not to give a handle to his critics. His fate resembled Scaliger's. For the rest, he knew perfectly well on what account one ought to study Mathematics; which is not to know the properties of angles, numbers, lines, or superficies; but to accustom one's mind to a solid method of reasoning and of proving. Euclid's operam dare cepit, non tam demonstrationum materia allectus, quam perspicuitate, certitudine & individua rationum serie delectatus. Non enim Mathematicas artes admiratus est vir perspicacissimus, ob laterum & angulorum affectiones, aut numerorum, linearum, superficiem, corporumque mutus inter se proportionem (de homogeneis intelligo quantitatibus) subtiliter indicatas; quippe istiusmodi omnia à communi vita remotiora facile animadvertit; licet ad praxin relata usus non adeo contemneret; sed quod methodo ipsi propriâ intellectus ad rerum cognitionem optime duceretur, atque difficulta inveniendi, vera asserendi, falsa redarguendi certissima ratione imbueretur (10). He began to study Euclid, not so much on account of the demonstrations, as of the perspicuity, certainty, and uninterrupted series of the reasoning. For this great man did not admire the Mathematics, because of the subtle investigation of the properties of sides and angles, or of the mutual proportions of numbers, lines, superficies, and bodies (I mean homogeneous quantities); for he easily saw that these things were not necessary for the common uses in life, though when reduced to practice they be of no mean use. But that the understanding was thereby, in a method peculiar to them, led to the knowledge of things, and furnished with the most certain means of discovering difficult truths, of proving what is found to be true, and refuting what is false.

[E] He composed his treatise de Cive at Paris. He printed but a few copies of it at Paris in 1642. He revised it a little after, and enlarged it, as it came out in the Amsterdam edition in 1647. It was Sorbiere who procured that second edition. He did more, for he translated this book into French, and published it in that language (11). Hobbes got many enemies by that work; but he obliged the best judges to own, that the foundations of Politics had never been so well discovered before. I doubt not but he carried many things too far, which is usual with those who write in opposition to a party, against which they have conceived a great aversion. Hobbes was enraged against the principles of the parliamentarians (12), their conduct was the cause of his living out of his own country, and he learned every day in the place of his exile, that their rebellion triumphed over the royal authority. He went into the other extreme, and taught that the authority of kings ought to be absolute, and that in particular the externals of religion, as being the most fruitful cause of civil wars, ought to depend upon their will. Some people are of opinion, that if we consider only the theory, his system is well connected, and very suitable to the ideas that may be formed of a state well secured against commotions. But because the most reasonable notions are subject to a thousand inconveniences, when they come to be reduced into practice, that is, when they are set in opposition to a horrible multitude of passions, which prevail amongst mankind, it was no difficult thing to find many faults in the political system of this author. He might have answered, that the opposite system, even in the theory, includes a necessary principal of confusion and rebellion. However it be, it is said that the love of his country inspired him with the design of that work, and that he intended by it to undeceive his countrymen with respect to the false principles, which produced there an horrible contempt of the royal authority. Grassante interim per Angliam civili bello, Hobbes pro summo in patriam amore, quod bonum & fidelem subditum maxime decuit; populares suos sanioribus quam quæ hæcenus obtinuerant principiis imbueret, exacerbatos hominum animos ad pacis & concordie rationes revocare, & in summa potestatis obsequium adducere præstare annis est. Quare reliquis posthabitis studiis, quantum ipsi suppetiit tempore Politicæ scientiæ impendens, Librum de Cive (cujus pauca duntaxat Exemplaria Parisiis 1642, evulgaverat) revixit; & notis utilibus addauit, in quo subditorum contra summum imperatorem conjuratione, rebellionisque, & immanes illas de principe regnis vitæque exuendo opiniones penitus damnavit: potestati Civili jura ab Ecclesiasticis caliginosorum temporum beneficio præcepta restituit, & diram sectariorum hydra effraenem nempe conscientie libertatem heroico ausu perdomuit (13). While the civil wars raged in England, Hobbes, out of his great love to his country, and as became a good and loyal subject, endeavoured to teach his country-

(11) At Anglerdam 1649.

(12) Tum pro suo in Regem officio atque obsequio, tum pro decumano quo semper in Democraticos odio laboravit, libellum scripsit juris regii asserendi gratia, qui postea in librum de Cive, & tandem in Leviantham excrevit.
Vita Hobbesi,
pag. 45.

(13) Ibid. (2)

(14) Ibid. (2)

(15) Ibid. (2)

(16) Ibid. (2)

(17) Ibid. pag.
45.

(18) Ibid. (2)

1642. He taught Mathematics to the prince of Wales, who was forced to retire into France; and he bestowed all his leisure hours in composing his Leviathan [F], which he caused to be printed in England in 1651, being still at Paris. Though he had given proofs of his faith according to the rites of the church of England [G], yet he was made

“men sounder principles than had as yet obtained among them, to joyn their beated minds into a love of peace and concord, and to inspire them with more submission to the supreme powers. To this end, laying aside all other studies, he employed all his time in the study of politics, he revised his book De Cive (of which he had only printed a few copies at Paris in 1642), and enlarged it with useful notes, and therein for ever depreyed the doctrine of the lawfulness of subjects conspiring and rebelling against their sovereigns, and the monstrous opinions of detroning and executing of princes: restoring to the civil powers those rights of which they had been robbed by Ecclesiastics in the ages of ignorance, and heroically subduing that cruel hydra of the sectaries, I mean the boundless liberty of conscience.” I am persuaded none will be displeased to see here Mr Des Cartes’s judgment concerning this work of Hobbes’s. “I believe, says he

(14) Tom. III. of his Letters, pag. 104, apud Bûllet, Vie de Des Cartes, Tom. II, pag. 174.

(15) He was not mistaken.

(16) See the article GUICCIARDIN, remark [E].

(17) The reason why innocence is not oppressed on many occasions, is the mediocrity I speak of here. See, above, remark [A] of the article EDWARD IV.

POLITICAL ideas fall in practice.

(18) Calestus Galatius Karlbergius, apud Deckerum de Scriptis adefpotis, pag. 318.

politic. The divines of the church of England, who were in France with Charles II, made great out-cries against this work, saying that it contained many impieties, and that the author was not of the royal party (19). Their complaints were heard: Hobbes was ordered to come no more to court; and as he had extremely provoked the Papists, he thought it was not safe for him to be in France, after he had lost the protection of the king of England. “Hoc tanto præsidio orbatus Hobbius, Romanæ Ecclesiæ, Spiritualis Monarchiæ satellitum metu correptus est quorum odium implacabile sese merito incurrisse fenestrat, ob detectas in Leviathane Ecclesiasticorum technas, regni tenebrarum dolos, Pontificis Romani potestatum malis artibus occupatam, quâ in civilis Potestatis jura involando, quâ simplici ac imperitiæ plebeculæ sanctis præfignis illudendo; quare Parisiis se minus tutum judicans, mediâ Hyemis tempestate aufugens, in patriam se contulit” (20). — Hobbes being deprived of this great protection, became afraid of the emissaries of the church of Rome, that spiritual monarchy, whose implacable hate he knew he had incurred, by detecting, in his Leviathan, the frauds of the Ecclesiastics, the deceptions of the kingdom of darkness, the authority of the Pope of Rome, acquired by wicked arts, viz. either by seizing on the rights of the civil powers, or by deceiving the simple and ignorant populace by holy cheats; therefore not thinking himself safe at Paris, he retired from thence in the middle of winter, and came over into England. He translated his Leviathan into Latin, and printed it with an appendix in the year 1668 (21). Ten years after it was printed in Dutch. The summary of this work is this, that without peace there can be no security in a state; and that peace cannot subsist without command, nor command without arms; and that arms are of no use, unless in the hand of a single person; and that the fear of arms cannot induce such persons to peace who are carried to war by an evil more terrible than death, that is, by dissensions about things necessary to salvation. Ejus autem summa hæc fuit, sine Pace, impossibile esse incoluitatem, sine Imperio Pacem, sine Armis Imperium, sine opibus in unam manum collatis nihil valere Arma, neque metu Armorum quicquam ad pacem profici posse in illis, quos ad pugnandum concitat malum morte magis formidandum; nempe dum consensum non sit de iis rebus, quæ ad salutem æternam necessaria creduntur, pacem inter cives non posse esse diuturnam (22). The Leviathan has been much written against, especially in England (23).

[G] He had given proofs of his faith according to the rites of the church of England. Being very sick near Paris, he was visited by Father Mercennus, who had been advised not to let him die out of the pale of the church. That good father sitting near the sick man, after the common preambles of consolation, began a discourse about the power of the Romish church to pardon sins; Father, replied Hobbes, I have long since examined all these things, and it would be uneasy to me to dispute about them at present; you can entertain me in a more agreeable manner. When did you see Mr Gassendus? The good monk easily understood what he meant by that question, and turned his discourse to another subject (24). Dr Cofins (25) a few days after offered to pray with Hobbes, which he agreed to, provided he made use of the prayers of the church of England (26). After prayers he received the sacrament. Cum non amplius cuiquam reliquus est sacrum faciendi locus eo momento se Religionis patrii legibus stabilitæ additissimum ostendit, & precibus juxta Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ ritus præmissis supremum Viaticum recepit (27). Being returned into England in the year 1651, he found the churches in the possession of the rebels, as he said, who had no liturgy, and he was three months without knowing with whom to communicate. Concionantes quidem invenit in Ecclesiis, sed sediciosos: etiam preces extemporarias, & illas audaces, & nunquam blasphemias, Symbolum autem fidei nullum, Decalogum nullum: adeo ut per tres primos menses non invenerit quibuscum in sacris communicare poterit (28). — He found preachers indeed in the churches,

(19) Hobbius tanquam partibus regis minus addictum tum ut novarum impiarumque in religionem opinionum auctorem criminabatur. Vita Hob. pag. 61.

(20) Ibid. pag. 62.

(21) At Amsterdam for J. B. Blaeuw with his other philosophical works, in two volumes, in 4to. He could not get a licence to have his books printed in England. Ibid. pag. 70.

(22) Ib. pag. 450.

(23) The Catalogue of the books printed against the Leviathan, and the other works of Hobbes, are to be found at the end of his Life.

(24) Ib. pag. 200.

(25) He was afterwards bishop of Durham.

(26) Obtulit se illi comprecato rem ad Deum. Cui ille cum gratias reddidisset, ita inquit si precibus præveris juxta ritum Ecclesiæ nostræ. Ibid.

(27) Ib. pag. 590.

(28) Ib. pag. 216.

made odious to the episcopal party, and with such success as to be ordered to appear no more about the king (c). This occasioned his return into England, where considering his great merit, he lived but in an obscure manner with the earl of Devonshire [H]. He drew this advantage from his obscure condition, that he had more leisure to compose his book de Corpore, and some others [I]. He received great marks of esteem from Charles II at the restoration in 1660 [K]. From that time to his death, he applied himself to his studies, and to defend himself against his adversaries, who were very numerous. He retained the use of his understanding till his last sickness [L], though he had lived more than ninety one years. His long life was constantly that of a perfectly honest man; he loved his country, was faithful to his prince, a good friend, charitable, and obliging: notwithstanding all this, he has passed for an Atheist; but they who have written his life, maintain that he had very orthodox opinions about the nature of God [M]. It

* eburcetes, but seditious ones; extemporary prayers also.
* but these irreverent and sometimes blasphemous, no
* creed, no decalogue; so that he was three months with* out knowing with whom to communicate. But at three months end he was carried to a congregation, where the Lord's Supper was celebrated according to the church of England, and he communicated there.
The author of his life makes this a characteristic of his adherence to the episcopal party, and of the sincerity of his Christianity, since no man was then obliged to join with any particular communion. Al- terum hoc signum erat non modo hominis partium Epis-copalium, sed etiam Christiani sinceri; nam illo tempore ad Ecclesiam quancumque legibus aut metu cog-ebatur nemo (29).

[H] He lived in an obscure manner with the earl of Devonshire. Not but that he had powerful friends; but as he had great enemies, all that could be done for him was to hinder his being oppressed. So his condition was the effect of an equilibrium betwixt his friends and enemies (30). He lived the rest of his days with the earl of Devonshire.

[I] He composed his book de Corpore, and some others.
This book came out at London in 1655, intitled Elementorum Philosophiæ sectio prima de corpore. The year following Hobbes published Prælectiones sex ad Professores Savilianos. His book de Homine, sive ele- mentorum Philosophiæ sectio secunda, was printed at London in the year 1658. And his Questions concern- ing Liberty, and Necessity, and Chance, clearly stated and debated between him and Dr Bramhall bishop of London-Derry in 1656 in 4to. He had a dispute upon the same subject with Benjamin Laney, bishop of Ely, which he did not publish till 1676 (31). Dr Wallis, professor of Geometry at Oxford, having published his Elementus Geometriæ Hobbianæ in the year 1655, raised a war which lasted till Hobbes's death, and had been carried on with a great deal of bitterness on both sides.
* Diuturni illius belli Mathematici classicum cecinit,
* quod acerrimo Marte, adhibitis quadra & circino,
* intervolutibus nonnunquam acutissimis convitiis
* telis, utrinque gestum vicennium & amplius perdu* ravit, nec tandem nisi Hobbianæ morte conquievit (32).
* He founded the charge to that long mathematical * war, which was carried on with great vigour with * square and compass, and sometimes with great volleys
* of invectives on both sides, for above twenty years,
* and which only ended by Hobbes's death. Sorbieri hath mentioned this dispute (33).

[K] He received great marks of esteem from Charles II. Hobbes left the country to come to London, as soon as he had notice of the king's arrival. This prince passing in his coach by the house where Hobbes lived, perceived him, and desired him to come to him.
He gave him his hand to kiss, and inquired about his condition and health. Some time after he gave him a particular audience, assured him of his affection, and promised him an easy access to him (34). He caused his picture to be drawn by an excellent Painter, and placed it in his closet (35), and which was a more substantial mark of his affection, he gave him an annual pension of (36) a hundred jacobus's (37).

[L] He retained the use of his understanding till his last sickness. He was not only capable of studying Mathematics, when above eighty six years old, but also of writing very long poems. * Quod autem inter
* rara felicitatis exempla numerandum est, summo in-
* genii vigore & sensibus integris ad obitum usque in * Philosophiæ & Mathesi se assidue exercitavit, & quod
* magis mirum, Poësin exercuit, quâ propriis animi
* conceptibus exprimendis, quâ aliorum transcreu-

* dis (38). — He had the rare good fortune to enjoy * an entire vigour of mind, and the use of all his senses
* till his death, which he employed in the study of * Philosophy and Mathematics, and which is still more * extraordinary in poetry, sometimes composing, at other * times translating. He translated into English verse, some books of the Odyssey in the year 1674, and because that Essay had the approbation of the learned, he published a like version of the Iliads, and the whole Odyssey a little after, with a dissertation upon the excellencies of heroic poetry (39).

[M] The writers of his life maintain that he had very orthodox opinions about the nature of G O D. Of all the moral virtues there were hardly any but religion, that could be a matter of dispute in the person of Hobbes. He was frank (40), civil, and communicative of what he knew (41), a good friend, & a good relation, charitable to the poor (42), a great observer of equity (43), and was not at all sollicitous about gathering wealth (44). This last quality is a favourable prejudice for the goodness of his life. For there is not a more copious source of bad actions than avarice.
So that they who knew Hobbes, had no occasion to ask him whether he esteemed and loved virtue; but one might have been tempted to put this question to him:

Heus age, responde, minimum est quod scire la-boro,

De Jove quid sentis (45)?

But prithee tell me, 'tis a small request,
What sort of thoughts of Jove has you possess'd.

The answer he might have sincerely made, if we believe those who wrote his life, had been this; that there is one G O D who is the origin of all things, but who ought not to be circumscribed in the sphere of our narrow reason (46). He would have added, that he embraced Christianity as it was by law established in England (47), but that he had an aversion to theological disputes; that he chiefly esteemed what tends to the practice of piety and good manners, and that he was used to blame the priests, who corrupted the simplicity of religion, by the mixture of a superstitious worship, or of many vain and profane speculations. Quic- quid autem ad pietatis exercitia, aut bonos mores conserret, plurimi fecit. Sanctius illi, & reverentius visum, de Deo credere quam scire. Sacerdotes interim inculpare solitus est, qui Christianam Religionem absolutam ac simplicem, vel superstitione macularent, vel inanibus interdum profanis speculationibus implicarent (48). They conclude, that persons who accuse him of Atheism, are horrible slanderers, who could alledge no other pretence for doing so than perhaps this, which was, that he had rejected many scholastic doctrines, by which certain attributes are ascribed to G O D, the model of which are taken from our narrow genius. Quare fortiter calumniati sunt, qui ipsum Atheismi reum detulerunt; quod inde forsitan profectum quia Scholasticorum aliorum-que isto de grege morem rejecerat, qui otiosi in Musæis suis sedentes, juxta imbecilem ingenio sui captum, Naturæ Divinæ incomperita offingunt attributa (49). It is certain there is no accusation, that is fallen into greater abuse than that of Atheism. Abundance of narrow souls, or ill-natured people, fix it upon all those, who, in their affirmations on this subject, confine themselves to the great and sublime truths of solid Metaphysics, and the general doctrines of scripture. They would fain oblige them, besides these, to adopt all the particular articles which they are used to recommend over

(29) Ibid.

(30) Stantem inter amicos & inimicos quasi in æquilibrio, secerunt illi ne ob doctrinam opprimeretur, hi ne augeretur. Ibid.
p. 22.

(31) Ib. pag. 99.

(32) Ibid. pag.
64, 65.

(33) Sorbieri
Relation d'Ang-
let. pag. 78.
Dutch Edit.

(34) Vita Hob-
besii, pag. 66.

(35) Ibid. pag.
28, & 103. See Sorbieri, Relation d'Anglet.
pag. 79.

(36) Vita Hob-
besii, pag. 53.

(37) Sorbieri,
Ibid. supra.

(38) Vita Hob-
besii, pag. 98, 99.

(39) Ib. pag. 99.

(40) Ib. pag. 30
& 111.

(41) Ib. pag. 111.

(42) Ib. pag. 108.

(43) Justitia erat cum se entissimus tum tenacissimus
Ibid. pag. 30.

(44) Cum effect
pecunie negitgentissimus. Ib.

(45) Persius,
Sat. II. ver. 174.

(46) Deum ego
novit eumque rerum omnium originem, intra angustias tamen humanae rationis cancellis nullius nos circumscribendum. Vita Hobbesii, pag. 105.

(47) Religionem Christianam quatenus in Ecclesia Anglicana, reflectis superstitio-nis ineptiis regni legibus stabilitis, ex animo amplexus est. Ibid.
pag. 106.

(48) Ibid. pag.
107.

(49) Ibid.

(d) Estote adhuc intra juventutis terminos con- stante (licet ve- rum fateri) nec abstinere fuit, nec pueri vovog. Vita Hobbes, pag. 104.

It has been said also, that he was afraid of apparition and spirits [N]; but they main- tain that this is a fable. They honestly confess, that in his youth he was a little given to wine and women (d); but that nevertheless, he lived a bachelor, that he might not be diverted from his study of Philosophy. He had meditated much more than he had read [O]; and he never cared to collect a great library. He died the fourth of Decem- ber, 1679, at the earl of Devonshire's, after a sickness of six weeks (e).

(e) Taken from his Life, printed in 1682.

over and over to the people. All who dare deviate from that road, are Infidels and Libertines, if you will believe some doctors. It was on this account that Monconys incurred this bad imputation. He disputed sometimes very freely against those who debase the greatness of God, by the conduct which they ascribe to him, and by the weak reasons they alledge; and he was unjustly called a Libertine, tho' he had the sub- limest idea of God that can be imagined. Read what follows: 'that agreeable way which he took sometimes of contradicting some narrow-minded people, who, by their arguments, weaken the truths they would confirm, occasioned these prejudiced persons to take this effect of his openness and candour for a criminal li- cence. But his solid virtue, and sincere piety, were every where conspicuous, and he gave testimonies of it, which you may see in these travels. In his last sickness he confessed to one of his friends, that he had always preserved in his heart a profound sub- mission, and an infinite reverence for the Deity, of whom he had a more exalted idea, than all that men have conceived of him. When he was at A- lexandria, at a time when he seemed to deny nothing to his curiosity, being alone one night, upon one of the terraces, which serve for a roof to the Buildings of the Levant, he found himself suddenly so filled with a sensible knowledge of the Deity, that he spent part of that night with unspeakable consolation, in a con- tinual adoration of the principle of all beings (50).'

(50) Preface to the Voyages of Monconys, pag. 7.

[N] It has been said also that he was afraid of ap- paritions and spirits. His friends call this a fable. Nec minus falso a nonnullis insinulatus est, tanquam solitudinem fugeret, spectra metuens & phantasmata, vana stultorum terribilissima, quæ Philosophiæ suæ lumine dissipaverat (51). — He was as falsely accused by some of being unwilling to be alone, because he was afraid of spectres and apparitions, vain bagbears of fools, which he had chased away by the light of his Philosophy. But it seems they do not deny, that he durst not be alone, they only insinuate, that the reason of it was his fear of being assassinated. If his Philo- sophy freed him from the other fear, and not from this, it did not hinder him from being miserable, and a thought of Horace might be applied to him.

Somnia, terrores magicæ, miracula, sagæ,
Nocturnos lemures, portentaque Teſſala ridet?

(51) Horat. Epist. lib. ii. ver. 208.

Quid te exempta juvat spinis de pluribus una?

To say this by the by, his principles of Philosophy were not proper to rid him from the fear of the apparitions of spirits: for to reason consequentially there are no Philosophers who have less right to reject magic, and sorcery, than those who deny the existence of a God. But you will say Hobbes denied the existence of spirits; say rather, that he believed there are no substances distinct from matter. Now, as that did not hinder him from believing, that there are many substances, which design, and do good or ill to others, he might and ought to believe, that there are beings in the air, or elsewhere, as capable of mischief as the corpuscles which, according to his system, form all our thoughts in our brain. How come these corpuscles to be better acquainted with the means of doing mischief than those other beings? And what reason is there to prove, that these other beings are ignorant of the manner of acting upon our brain, in order to make us see an apparition?

Let us consider the matter in another light. A man would not only be very rash, but also very extravagant, who should pretend to prove that there never was any person that imagined he saw a spectre; and I do not think that the most obstinate and extravagant un- believers have maintained this. All that they say comes to this, that the persons who have thought themselves eye-witnesses of the apparition of spirits, had a disturb- ed imagination. They confess then, that there are cer- tain places in our brain, that, being affected in a cer- tain manner, excite the image of an object which has no real existence out of our selves, and make the man, whose brain is thus modified, believe he sees at two paces distance, a frightful spectre, a hobgoblin, a threatening phantome. The like happens in the heads of the most incredulous, either in their sleep, or in the paroxysms of a violent fever. Will they main- tain after this, that it is impossible for a man awake, and not in a Delirium, to receive in certain places of his brain, an impression almost like that which by the laws of nature is connected with the appearance of a phantome? if they are forced to acknowledge that this is possible, they cannot promise, that a spectre will never appear to them, that is, that they shall never, when awake, believe they see either a man, or a beast, when they are alone in a chamber. Hobbes then might believe, that a certain combination of atoms, agitated in his brain, might expose him to such a vision, though he was persuaded, that neither an angel nor the soul of a dead man was to be concerned in it. He was timorous to the last degree, and consequently he had reason to distrust his imagination, when he was alone in a chamber in the night; for in spite of him, the me- mory of what he had read, and heard concerning ap- paritions would revive, though he was not persuaded of the reality of these things. These images, joined with the timorousness of his temper, might play him an unlucky trick. And it is certain, that a man, as in- credulous as he was, but of greater courage, would be astonished to think he saw one whom he knew to be dead enter into his chamber. These apparitions in dreams are very frequent, whether a man believes the immortality of the soul or not. Supposing they should once happen to an incredulous man awake, as they do frequently in his sleep, we allow that he would be afraid, tho' he had never so much courage. And therefore for a stronger reason we ought to believe, that Hobbes would have been terribly affrighted at it.

[O] He had meditated much more than he had read.]

It is ingenuously confessed in his life, that for a man who lived so long, his reading was inconsiderable. Nay he was used to say, that if he had bestowed as much time on reading, as other men of letters, he should have been as ignorant as they (53). He con- sidered another thing, which induced him to make but a small account of vast libraries; which is, that most books are extracts, and copies of others. Lectio ejus pro tanto ætatis decursu non magna; Authores ver- sabat paucos, sed tamen optimos. Homerus, Virgilius, Thucydides, Euclides, illi in deliciis erant. Ingentem Librorum suppellectilem, quâ superbiunt Bibliothecæ, non magnificat, cum Mortales plerumque pecorum ritu antecedentium insistentes vestigiis, vix extra tri- tas calles, & semitas ab ipsis quorum Tutelæ & Re- gimini subsunt, præstitutas, evagari audeant (54). Ibid. — His reading, for a man of his years, was not great; he was well acquainted with a few, and those the best authors. He was a great admirer of Homer, Virgil, Thucydides, and Euclid. He made no great account of large libraries, observing that men for the most part following one another's steps like sheep, have seldom the courage to go out of the trodden paths and roads, which are prescribed to them by their guides.

(53) Quin & li- sidered another thing, which induced him to make but a small account of vast libraries; which is, that most books are extracts, and copies of others. Lectio ejus pro tanto ætatis decursu non magna; Authores ver- sabat paucos, sed tamen optimos. Homerus, Virgilius, Thucydides, Euclides, illi in deliciis erant. Ingentem Librorum suppellectilem, quâ superbiunt Bibliothecæ, non magnificat, cum Mortales plerumque pecorum ritu antecedentium insistentes vestigiis, vix extra tri-

(54) Ibid.

(a) Hochstratus in Brabant, de- cussus Antwerp and Bergopsum.

HOCHSTRATUS, or HOCHSTRATANUS, (JAMES) took his name from the village where he was born (a). He studied Philosophy at Louvain, and took his master of arts degree there in 1485. He became a Dominican friar, and was made prior of the monastery of Cologne, doctor and professor of Divinity, and in- quisitor in the three ecclesiastical electorates (b). Never was a man more worthy to be honoured

(b) Valer Andri Biblioth. Belg. pag. 472.

honoured with this last employment, for he was amply provided with all the ill qualities that are necessary to inquisitors and informers. He was violent: he accused upon the slightest pretences; he would be both judge and party [A], he produced very unfaithful abstracts (c), and would never own himself a slanderer; he advanced heresies with impunity in the writings, wherein he pretended to confute heretics [B]. He once was

(c) See the remark [A].

THE dispute between Reuchlin and Hochstratus.

(1) Called Johannes Pfefferkornius.

(2) Dilucide & quod dicimus ad oculum ibi ostendit, adversarios pluribus quam triginta quatuor mendacis ad sui contumeliam usus esse. Jo. Henricus Mayus, in Oratone de Vita Reuchlini, fol. D 3, verso.

(3) Majus, ibid. fol. D 4.

(4) Id. ibid. fol. D 4, verso.

(c) Reuchlin. Epist. ad Wimpheingum, apud Majum, Not. in Vitam Reuchlini, pag. 39.

(6) Majus, ibid. fol. D 5.

(7) Causa ad Leonem X. devoluta, qui eam Spiritui Episcopo, Georgio Palatino Duci penitus committit. Id. ibid. verso. In the Bibliothecaque universitatis, Tom. VIII, pag. 601, these words have been understood so, as if they mentioned two men, the bishop of Spire, and the elector Palatine; but the bishop only is meant by them.

(8) Majus, ubi supra.

(9) Majus, ibid.

[A] He would be both judge and party.] This manifestly appeared in the business of Reuchlin. A Jew (1) converted to the Christian religion, had defamed him in a book, intitled Manuale Speculum. Reuchlin justified himself by a book, intitled, Speculum Oculare, in which, he shewed, that his enemies had vented against him above thirty four calumnies (2). Hochstratus, the principal abettor of the converted Jew, interested the divines of Cologne in that affair, and made them draw some extracts from the Speculum Oculare, which were published with artful notes, to defame Reuchlin every where as a favourer of Judaism. Nothing could be more unfaithful than these extracts. Has propositiones . . . ubi vidit Reuchlinus pessime ac non sine crimine falsi ex Oculari Speculo excerptas . . . rogat theologos illos &c. . . Erupit tota Theologorum concio suppetias Christi sacris recens initiato Judæo latura duce Tungro, qui articulos seu propositiones de Judaico favore nimis suspectas ex Speculo Oculari extruxit, adjectis annotationibus & animadversionibus: atque hoc omne non vernacula lingua, qua utrinque hætenus certatum fuit, adornat, sed Latina; eo haud dubie consilio, ut apud exterarum gentes nationesque nomen Capnionis invivum redderet, & cum perversa interpretatione, cum multa dictorum citatione securius falleret (3). Reuchlin answered this work by a Latin apology addressed to the emperor. Hereupon a process in form was entered against him before the elector of Mentz. His great age not permitting him to appear in person, he sent thither a proxy, who offered very just causes of exceptions against our James Hochstratus; but they were not heard. Cum propter senium & imbecillitatem corporis tantum iter tam brevi temporis spacio conficere non posset, mittebat eum curatorem Petrum Staffelmium Nürtingensem, qui ætorem Hochstratum tantquam inimicum sibi intensissimum & merito suspectum recusabat, ob eas causas, quas publice allegabat . . . Tametsi vero nil obtineret Reuchlinus (4). Hochstratus would not suffer himself to be accused (5). Hereupon Reuchlin's proxy sued him by an appeal the court of Rome. Hochstratus however caused the sentence to be passed; and without waiting till the fifteen days, before which it ought not to be promulged, were expired, he ordered all the curates of Mentz to give notice to the people, that all those who had Reuchlin's book, should bring it immediately to the commissioners, on pain of excommunication. Interea Hochstratus quasi jam acturus triumphum omnibus per Moguntiacum sacerdotibus mandat, ut publice populum sub profectionis pena monerent, si qui Oculare Speculum haberent, illud quantocyus eam in rem delatatis traderent (6). Reuchlin appealed to the Pope. Hochstratus did the same. The bishop of Spire, who was commissioned by the Pope to judge of that cause, (7) named judges, who cited the parties. Hochstratus did not appear, and was sentenced for contumacy to pay all the charges; he was forbid, under great penalties, to continue his proceedings, and the accusation of the divines of Cologne was declared null. Hochstratus licet more consueto per intervalla citatus, tamen non comparuit. Causa nihilo secius discutitur & secundum Reuchlinum pronunciator: nullum errorem ab Ecclesia damnatum in libro sæpius commemorato reperiri, nec plus eum favere Judæis, quam religio & jura sinant, injuste ergo ac præter veritatem eum delatum à Colonienfibus esse. Hochstratus autem contumaciæ criminis reus, &c. (8). However, the latter burnt John Reuchlin's book. Hæc dum aguntur Spire, Colonienfes nefario ausu librum Reuchlini dampnant, citra tamen contumeliam ut agebant, & Februario deinde mense anno supra millennium quingentesimum decimo quarto exurunt, approbantibus sacrum Lovaniensium, Erphordenfium, Moguntinæ & Parisiensium Universitatibus (9). While these things are transacting at Spire, they of Cologne, had the boldness to condemn Reuchlin's book, but without reflecting contumely on him as they pretended, and in the month of February 1514, burnt it, which action was approved by the universities of Louvain, Erford, Mentz, and Paris. But I say this only occasionally; the main thing I am to prove is, that this monk would be both judge and party. It is this he is accused of more than once in a poem intitled, Triumphus Doctoris Reuchlini (10).

Accusat Capnionem & judicat idem Acer Hogostratus (11).

Sed neque perditior neque flagitiosior alter In Capniona fuit, tunc, cum tu perditie judex Lectus, & absurdus in litibus arbiter effes Idem accusator. Dic quo vesane pudorem Fert omnem tibi livor edax (12).

Hochstratus would both accuse, and judge, his foe,

Yet against Capnio did'st thou vent thy rage, With unexampled spleen, when chosen judge In contest most absurd, you first accus'd, Then sentence pass'd: say, madman that thou art, Hast malice robb'd thee of all modesty?

[B] He advanced heresies with impunity. In the writings wherein he pretended to confute Heretics.] We might see the catalogue of them, if we had the book with which Agrippa threatened the Jacobins (13). For we see what he represents to the magistrates of Cologne: Unum tamen illorum excipio, Jacobum Hogstratum, tunc Prædicatorum ordinis hæreticorum Magistrum, vulgo & veraciter dictum, qui taliter scripsit contra Lutheranas hereses, ut ipse se proderet hæreticorum omnium pessilentissimum. Sed ne quis vestrum illius olim amicus, aut illius hypocritæ excecatus, vel aliter deceptus, me non favore veritatis, sed aut invidia aut alia offensa illa dicere putet rem ipsam digito monstrabo. Nam in libro suo contra Lutheranos, quem Reverendissimo Cardinali ac Illustri Principi & Episcopo Leodiensi dedicavit, in illius lib. 2. disp. 3. paulo ante finem 1. cap. sic ait: Scimus enim consecratione super debitam materiam ritè facta, Christum esse in Sacramento, non autem quod sub hac vel illa determinata hostia Christus continetur (§ 2). Neque tamen putetis, hunc solum articulum apud illum reperiri hæreticum, sed alii multi: quos cum hic nimis longum, vobisque tædiosum foret referre, enumerabo alibi, in eo scilicet libro, quem de Fratrum Prædicatorum sceleribus (14) — I except one of them, to wit James Hochstratus, who was then commonly and justly stiled master of the preachers of the order of the Heretics, who wrote in such a manner against the Lutheran Heresies, as to show himself the most pestilent of all Heretics. But lest any of you, who are his old friends, or blinded by his hypocrisy, or otherwise ways deceived, should imagine that I say this rather out of envy or revenge, than out of a love to truth. I shall demonstrate it. For in his book against the Lutherans, which he dedicated to the most reverend cardinal and illustrious prince and bishop of Liege; Book 2: Disp. 3. near the end of the first chapter he writes thus. We know that when consecration is rightly performed over a proper matter, CHRIST is in the sacrament, but not that CHRIST is contained under this or that particular host. But do not think that this is the only heretical proposition, that is to be found in his writings, there are many more, which it would be tedious to repeat here, I shall therefore enumerate them elsewhere, I mean in that book, which I have wrote concerning the vices of the preaching friars. See the sequel of these words in the remark [S] of the article AGRIPPA.

[(§ 2) Mr Bayle has not remarked all that is in Agrippa, concerning the Heresies with which he charges his adversaries, particularly Hochstratus. He speaks as follows in the second chapter of his apology, against the divines of Louvain: Jam vero etiam nostro seculum dogmatizarunt Colonienfes Theologi, Aristotelem sic esse præcursores Christi in naturalibus, quemadmodum Joannes Baptista in gratiis. Jacobus Hochstratus

(10) Mr Majus has inserted it in his Notes upon Reuchlin's Life, pag. 483, & seq. The author took the name of Eleutherius Byzænus.

(11) Annot. in Vitam Reuchlini, pag. 485.

(12) Ibid. pag. 493.

(14) Agrippa, Epist. xxvii, lib. viii, Oper. Tome II, pag. 1037, that Letter is dated the 11th of January 1533.

was obliged to make satisfaction to a worthy man whom he had slandered; but to bring him to it, they were forced to make use of a remarkable expedient, which was to take from his convent the privilege of begging [C]. He had not all the advantage he promised to himself in the troubles which he stirred up against Reuchlin; he was obliged to go Rome on account of that process; and notwithstanding the sums of money where-with he provided himself, he had much ado to avoid being condemned [D]. Besides, he

* stratus in suo de invocatione Sanctorum libello, hæreticum pronunciavit ad Scripturam confugere: & alius quidem Theologus palam concionari non erubuit, consuetudinem potius sequendam esse quam Scripturam divinam, adhuc præmonitus Hochstratus Hæreticorum (ut vocant) Magister in opere suo contra Lutheranos, inquit in hæc verba: Scimus enim consecratione super debita materia facta Christum esse Sacramento, non autem quod sub hac vel illa determinata hostia Christus contineatur, quia, ut subdit, hæreticum est fidem infallibilem & infusam ad talia particularia per certitudinem extendere, eademque ratione concludit, credendam esse remissionem peccatorum in generali, neminem autem in particulari sibi esse peccata dimissa. An non est hoc vere magistram Hæreticorum esse? — Now even in our age the divines of Cologne have taught, that Aristotle was the forerunner of CHRIST in natural as John the Baptist was in spiritual things. James Hochstratus, in his book concerning the invocation of saints, has pronounced it heretical to appeal to scripture: and another divine was not ashamed to preach, that custom was rather to be followed than the holy scriptures, moreover the said Hochstraten, master of the Heretics (as he is commonly called) in his book against the Lutherans, has the following words: We know that consecration of fit matter being performed, CHRIST is present in the sacrament, but not that CHRIST is contained under this or that particular host; because, adds he, it is heretical to extend an infallible and infused faith to such particulars, with certainty; and for the same reason concludes, that we are to believe the remission of sins in general, but no particular person ought to believe that his sins in particular are forgiven. Is not this to be really the master of Heretics? REM. CRIT.]

[C] They took from his convent the privilege of begging. It is in Erasmus's letters that we read this curious particular. The count of Nevenar, a lord of extraordinary merit, a learned man, and patron of the learned, was very much touched with the calumnies which James Hochstratus had published against him. He omitted nothing to oblige him to make him reparation; he made use of the most solid reasons, he had recourse to advice, hard words, and menaces; all this was to no purpose; but at last he and his relations forbade all their vassals to give any eggs or cheese to the Jacobins. These believed they were only vain threatenings, and continued their trade of begging in the territories of those gentlemen; but they were repulsed in a terrible manner, so that for a year together they were deprived of the subsistence they used to have from thence. They then obliged Hochstratus to give the count satisfaction, by a solemn recantation, some copies whereof were dispersed abroad. Erasmus, who had one them, found something comical in it; for the monk reciting in express words, the slanders he had published against the count of Nevenar, protested at the same time, that he had always had a very good opinion of him. The reader will be glad to see this in Erasmus's Latin (15). * Hermannus Comes à Nova Aquila indigne tulerat se notatum ab Jacobo Hochstrato Dominicano. Is erat Rabinus, Prior Monasterii quod Colonie sanctæ quàm magnificum est & opulentum. Non potuit hominem compescere, donec illius cognati denuntiarent Dominicanis, ne posthac colligerent caseos in ulla ditione vel Comitibus vel cognatorum illius. Illi rati minas esse inanes, clam tentarunt filito more venire ad ova & caseos. Factus est in illos impetus terribilis. Hoc damno totum annum multati sunt; itaque factum est, ut Jacobus à suis coactus pacis leges acceperit. Habeo illius palinodiam in qua cum recitet verba plena contumeliæ quæ scripserat in comitem, tamen affirmat ac propemodum dejerat, se semper de Comite præclare sensisse (16). Bella palinodia (§ 3) scurrâ quam Theologo dignior. He says in another place, that it is in vain to dispute against the persecutors of polite learning; He principally meant the monks and their favourites; these sort of people, adds he, have inexhaustible resources in their factions, clamours, and tricks: nothing but the fasting and hunger can subdue them (17), and he brings as an instance of this, the count of Nevenar's conduct towards James Hochstratus. * Isti numero, phalanges, syncrético, improbate, clamoribus, adde si libet, fucis ac malis artibus, prorsus invicti sunt: Nec alia re quàm fustibus ac fame domari queunt. Sic vir clarissimus Hermannus à Novagula Comes, adegit * Jacobum Hochstratum ad abjectam & scurrilem palinodiam, cujus exemplar apud me est. Quibus, inquit, prædidi? Non argumentis, non æquis rationibus, non monitis, non minis, non conviciis; nihil enim horum non frustra tentatum fuit: Sed quibus prædidi? Caseis & ovis quorum in ditione Comitibus colligendorum jus illis ademptum fuerat (18). * Erasmus has reason to say, that count Nevenar tried what hard words would do; for what can be more severe than the following words: * Unica, crede mihi, pestis est in Germania Jacobus Hochstratus, quam si restrinxeris, esat πάντα καλώς. Homo præter ingentem suam audaciam insigniter impudens atque temerarius. Omnes interroga, si libet, per Germaniam doctos viros. Omnes læsit, omnibus æque infestus est (19). — I beg your Excellency will believe me, that James Hochstratus is the only plague of Germany, if you silence him all will be well. He is not only bold beyond expression, but remarkably impudent and furious. If your Excellency will enquire of all the learned men in Germany, you will find that he has injured them all, and is equally an enemy to them all. This is what the count of Nevenar represents to Charles V, in an oration, wherein he congratulated him in the name of the students of Germany, on his being elected king of the Romans. He had been exhorting him to give order that the monks should concern themselves only with the rules of their order. Fraterculus quosdam magnis titulis insantes, jube suorum Cœnobiorum curam gerere, jube domi Fratribus suis regendis operam impendere, sacris faciendis invigilare (20).

[[§ 3] Above, citation (9), the Faculty of Theology of Cologne, in their condemnation of a piece of Reuchlin, insert in their judgment the following clause, Citra tamen Autoris contumeliam. — Without pretending, by this judgment, to mark the person of the author with infamy. And here Hochstratus, one of the members of this Faculty, giving satisfaction to the count of Nevenar, whom he had slandered in several libels, declares, that he doth this the more willingly, because he always had a great respect and veneration for the count. According to the principles of these divines of Cologne, and of Hochstratus, his conduct is no more contradictory than theirs. It is founded on an ancient custom established in all the courts of Germany, wherein if the clause Salvo honore, is added to a penalty, of whatever kind that penalty be, it doth not render the sufferer infamous. REM. CRIT.]

[D] He was obliged to go to Rome on account of that process against Reuchlin; and notwithstanding his money he had much ado to avoid being condemned. I have said above (21), that the commissioners of the Pope's subdelegate passed a sentence very disadvantageous to our Dominican. The commissioners, which the Pope appointed to the parties in Rome itself, where Hochstratus was in person, would not have given a less favourable sentence for Reuchlin, had they had time to pronounce a decisive decree; but when they were met to put an end to the affair, they received an order from the Pope to suspend the judgment (22). Each of the judges gave in writing their suffrage with the reasons of it, it is known, that they gave it to the disadvantage of the Dominican, who, to ward off that terrible blow, extorted an order from the Pope for a demurrer, and to leave the suffrages in the secretary's hands (23). This is an authentic example of the immense power of these sort of men: if they cannot gain their cause, if it is too apparently bad to obtain a favourable sentence, they have at least interest enough to avoid condemnation; they obtain all the necessary delays, and they make

(15) Erasmus. Epist. xxix, lib. xix, pag. 841.

(16) This is more expressly described in the thirty first letter of the twenty second book, pag. 1196.

(17) We must not say of these devils, that they only get out, by prayer and fasting: take away prayer; fasting alone will do the business.

(18) Erasmus. Epist. I, lib. xx, pag. 958.

(19) Hermannus Nuenarius dum ann. 1510, in Comitibus Fracfortensibus Carolo Austriaco electo Romanorum Regi, nomine studiorum Germanie adgratulatur, apud Valer. Andream, Bibl. Belg. pag. 413.

(20) Apud eundem Valer. Andr. ibid.

(21) In its remark [A].

(22) The tenor of July, 1516, Not. in Vitam Reuchlini pag. 474.

(23) Major, Notis in Vitam Reuchlini pag. 474, 475.

he ran a great danger of his life in his return [E], for Reuchlin's party began already to make use of violent means. He perhaps deserved that kind of death, which, Paul Jovius says, carried him off; but it is not true, that he had the destiny which that historian mentions [F]: for he did not die with grief to see himself ridiculed in the satires of the world believe, that this is an advantage; for they will never confess, that they have had the worst of it. But yet every body knows, that they are in the wrong. In this affair John Reuchlin's friends thought they had obtained a victory, and they composed many insulting poems (24).

Hochstratus made a journey to Rome with a sumptuous equipage, and provided with large sums of money. 'Huic igitur edito morem gerens Jacobus Romanam contendit, multis magnisque suarum aliarumque Universitatum, Principum item & aliorum summorum virorum commendationibus, pulchro equitatu, & qui rerum gerendarum, ut & olim fuerunt, & nunc quam maxime sunt corrupti hominum mores, nervus est, ingenti pecuniæ vi instructus, qua Capnio's iustam causam, famam fortunamque omnes facile se subversurum, iactavit (25). — Hochstratus obeyed this summons, and went to Rome, well provided with many and great recommendations from his own, and from other universities, and from princes and other great personages, with a handsome equipage, and above all, with what in the present corruption of manners is, and always was, the sinews of business, an immense sum of money, by which he boasted that he would easily ruin Capnio's just cause, fame, and fortune.' He who suspected that this money was designed for the purchase of some voices, knew well enough how matters go at these courts (26). His words are these (27): 'Item Theologitæ, ut etiam comperi, Jacobo Hochstraten proximis diebus mille quingentes aureos per Trapezitas Romam miserunt, non ad victum, qui Monachis tenuis esse debet, nec ad necessarias impensas litis, nam minore summa, ut reor, hæc administraretur. Sed quod vehementer suspicor & illis male vertat, ad faciendas largitiones, pro obtinendis auro suffragiis quæ jure non sperat (28). — The divines likewise, as I am informed, have lately sent James Hochstraten 500 golden crowns, by the Bankers, to Rome, not for his sustenance, for monks ought to live at small expence, not for the necessary expences of his process, for that I believe, may be carried on at a still smaller charge. But I grievously suspect what I hope shall not profit them, that it was sent to buy voices with gold, which he despairs of obtaining by right.' What he adds, is more surprizing. These same divines threatened to make a schism, if Reuchlin was not condemned, and spoke with the utmost contempt of Leo X. 'Nam modo reverendissimum Cardinalem Grimanium (29) ut indoctum cavillantur, modo ut semper suspectum infamant. Præterea audent aperte iactare perversissimi homines, nisi secundum se pronunciatum in urbe fuerit, ab Ecclesia & summo ejus Pontifice se deserturos, & schisma novum suscituros. Alii ad futurum Concilium provocatos se minantur. Alii dicunt, quicquid contra se statuerit Papa, nullius momenti esse, neque pro Papa habendum eum, qui ab se suæque sententia dissentiat. Tam cæca, tam præceptis est arrogantia istorum, ut non pudeat etiam postulare obnoxium sibi Summum Pontificem esse, se palam omnibus Ecclesiam esse dissidentem, sine se in rebus fidei Papam nihil decernere nec posse, nec debere, conclamant. Nihil hercle secius aut honorificentius de summo Pontifice loquuntur, quam de puero sub ferula adhuc vivente, cui nihil nisi ad prædicationem sui nutum integrum sit aut liberum loqui (30). — For sometimes they reproach cardinal Grimani with ignorance, at other times they slander him as one they always suspected. Besides, these seditious men have the boldness openly to boast, that unless this cause is decided in their favour, they will make a schism from the church and its head, and raise a new schism. Others threaten that they will appeal to a general council. Others say, that whatever the Pope decides against them will signify nothing, and that he is not to be acknowledged as Pope, if he differs from their opinions. So blind and furious is their arrogance, that they are not ashamed to pretend that the Pope is inferior to them, and proclaim that the Pope neither can, nor ought to decide any thing in matters of faith without them. And indeed they 'speak of the Pope with no more reverence, than of a school-boy, who is not at liberty either to say or do any thing, but by his master's direction.'

[E] He ran a great danger of his life in his return. If he had not had notice of the ambuscades that the Reuchlinists laid for him in the way from Nuremberg to Cologne, he had infallibly fallen into them; and even after he had intelligence of them, he could not have avoided the snare, had not he been preserved from the danger by the passport he obtained from the marquis of Brandenburg. Mr Majus acknowledges all this. Non tantum honorum ædum, says he (31), sed ingens præterea periculum sibi acceperat, quod vix ac ne vix quidem evasit. Nam cum Roma discedens Noribergam iter scisset, Coloniam inde perireturus, insidiæ ipsi à Reuchlinistis parabantur, quas, si præmonitus non fuisset, certe baud effugisset. Ac ne sic quidem excessisset, evasisset, erupisset, nisi Marchionis Brandenburgensis salvo conductu à persecutoribus tutus fuisset.

[F] It is not true that he had the destiny which Paul Jovius speaks of. He pretends, that the satires published by Reuchlin, against the barbarous stile of the monks, killed James Hochstratus with vexation, and obliged the fraternity of this inquisitor to have recourse in their distress to the court of Rome, to obtain a prohibition of printing and selling these satires. Paul Jovius means the Obscurorum Virorum Epistolæ: He will have Reuchlin to be the author of them, and he gives us an idea of them, which is very disobliging to the monks in general, and to Reuchlin's persecutors in particular. 'Admirabili facietiarum lepore conditæ, quibus ad excitandum risum, cucullatorum Theologorum ineptissimæ, atque ideo ridiculæ Latina lingua scribentium, stylus exprimitur. Ulciscēbatur enim infestam nomini suo turbam, jucundissimo satyræ illudentis genere, quum maligna cucullatorum conspiratione tanquam Judæis parum æquus hostis, ac ex animo planè recutitus impietatis accusaretur (32). — They are full of humour, and by imitating their Latin stile, exposteth the barbarous dialect of the monkish divines. He wrote this elegant satire against them, in revenge of their spiteful rage against him, they having accused him of favouring Judaism.' The way to convict this historian of falsity, is to say, that James Hochstratus survived Leo X and Reuchlin, and therefore it is not true, 1. that the Obscurorum Virorum Epistolæ, having been the cause of that inquisitor's death, his friends and accomplices supplicated Leo X to condemn the book. 2. That Reuchlin, to elude the prohibitions of Leo X, composed a second volume, under another title more satirical than the former. Thus here are two falsehoods of Paul Jovius. 'Hic liber avide comptus & evulgatus adeo graviter calumniatores ejus ordinis percussit, ut conjurationis principes Hochstratus letali dolore sauciatus interierit; & reliqui æstuant a Leone suppliciter impetrarint, ut edito divendi, atque imprimi vetaretur; sed editi majestatem Reuchlinus falso ingenio ludificatus, secundum Epistolæ volumen, tanquam ex titulo minime vetitum, altero quidem auleatius impressibus tradidit, ita ut cucullati misere cum Hydra luctantes, animos in ea lite deponderint (33). — This book was greedily bought, and by its publication, so mortified the malicious slanderers of that tribe, that Hochstraten, the head of the cabal, sickened upon it and died; and the rest, boiling with rage, obtained, by their humble applications to Leo, an order against the sale and impression of it; Reuchlin however eluded the prohibition by an ingenious artifice, giving a second volume to the press more severe than the former, under a name not included in the prohibition. So that the monks having to fight with this Hydra, were entirely defeated.' It will be objected perhaps, that notwithstanding these two chronological faults, it may still be true at bottom, that the letters Obscurorum Virorum, occasioned the death of James Hochstratus. I answer, that it is absolutely false that they had that effect; for they appeared at least ten years before the death of that monk. He died in the year 1527, and I have read in a letter written the sixteenth of August 1517, that Erasmus very much disapproved

(24) Ibid. pag. 478, & seq.

(25) Ibid. pag. 479.

(26) See the article FOULQUES, remark [L].

(27) Hermannus Bolchius Epistolas, in Epist. ad Reuchlinum, apud Majum, ibid. pag. 464.

(28) In the dialogue intitled Hochstratus Ovans, he is brought in speaking thus: Necesse habui vulgarem incedere viam, agere litis commendatilis, pecuniis niti, & largitionibus inmodicis, ut magnæ sunt opes nobis mendicis, atque mendacia struere contra infentem, quæ non insolens, neque imperite confinxit, atque haud difficulter credita sunt Romanensibus. Apud Majum, ibid. pag. 465.

(29) He was the president of the commission.

(30) Idem, Bolchius, apud Majum, ibid.

(31) Annotat in vit. Reuchlini, pag. 477.

(32) Jovius in Epistolis, cap. cxliiii, pag. m.

(33) Id. ibid.

of his adversaries. He was one of the first who wrote against Luther [G], and one of the persecutors of Erasmus [H]. In a word, whoever was an enemy to the scholastic barbarity, could not fail to be exposed to his anger. He died at Cologne in the year 1527 (d). We have several books of his, which for the most part relate to his disputes with Reuchlin and Luther. There was a cutting epitaph made upon him [I].

He did not do much honour to the divines at Paris, in publishing at Cologne, the judgment they passed upon Luther in 1521, upon the subject of the pretended Dionysius the Areopagite [K].

(34) Magnopere mihi displice-bant Epistolæ ob-scuro-rum Viro-
rum. Erasmus, Epist. ad Joann.
Cæsarium, inferia lamentationibus obscuro-rum viro-rum, citante Majo. Not. in Vitam Reuchlin.
pag. 475.

(35) Jacob.
Thomæus in prefatione ad
Pauli Manutii Epistolæ, certa fi-dei exploratum se habere affirmat, Mutenom esse eorum autorem
Id. Majus, ibid.

(36) Majus, in Vita Reuchlini.

(37) Maimbourg, Hist. de Luther.
lib. i. pag. 30,
ad. ann. 1518.
He quotes Luth.
contra Jac.
Hoftra. Tom. I.

(38) Valer.
Andr. Bibl. Belg.
pag. 412.

(39) It is the last of the sixteenth book.

(40) The eighteenth of the twenty sixth book,
pag. 1249.

(41) Erasmus, lib. xiii. lib.
xix, pag. 829.
It is dated in May, 1527.

disapproved of those letters (34). This criticism might be carried further; for it is very probable that they were written by Hutten (35), and not by Reuchlin.

I am less surprized at these faults of Paul Jovius, than to see them inserted as matter of fact in the life of Reuchlin, by Mr Majus, and that he did not perceive that he contradicted himself. He supposes, that after the Speculum oculare was burnt at Cologne, Reuchlin seeing himself attacked by several satires, published the Epistolæ obscuro-rum viro-rum, to revenge himself, which quickly caused James Hochstratus's death. Hic liber adeo grauior calumniatores Colonienses perculit, ut conjurationis caput Hochstratus PAU-LO POST letali dolore confectus sauciatusque interierit (36). He afterwards relates that Reuchlin brought the cause before the Pope, and that James Hochstratus made a voyage to Rome upon it, and had like to have fallen into an ambush of his enemies, as he returned to Cologne.

[G] He was one of the first who wrote against Luther. He went the wrong way to work, if we believe Father Maimbourg, who says, 'that what made Luther's cause still more plausible was this, that James Hochstratus, a Dominican inquisitor, writing against him, exhorted the Pope to treat such a wicked fellow only with fire and sword, that the world might be rid of him as soon as possible (37). I will now set down a passage of Valerius Andreas, which affords me at once a proof of my text, and an occasion for a critical reflexion. "Primos inter in Lutherum calumum frinxit: ob id tum ab hæreticis quos in primis oderat, tum etiam ab aliis vitæ atque ingenii liberioris, ut tunc tempora ferebant, scriptis laceffitus, & nominatim à Joan. Reuchlino five Capnione epistolis quas obscuro-rum viro-rum titulo vulgavit (38). — He was one of the first who wrote against Luther: and on that account was severely handled not only in the writings of the Heretics, whom he mortally hated, but likewise by others of a more liberal genius, and way of living, as times then went, particularly by John Reuchlin or Capnio, in the Epistolæ Obscuro-rum Viro-rum, as he called them.' The war of the monks against Reuchlin, began before Luther attacked the indulgencies, and dropped of itself when Luther raised his standard. Reuchlin continued with the strongest side all his life, and never concerned himself with the Lutheran disputes. It is therefore very false, that he teized Hochstratus with several satirical pieces to punish him for being one of the first that wrote against Luther. The Epistolæ obscuro-rum viro-rum, preceded the birth of the Protestant Reformation. Valerius Andreas is thereby fully convicted of an Anachronism. For the rest, the counsel which James Hochstratus gave to the Pope against Luther, plainly shews the violent temper of the man. Erasmus wrote a letter to him (39) in the year 1519, full of good advice, upon the inexcusable bitterness he had shewn in his writings against Reuchlin. See Erasmus's letters concerning Hochstratus's proceedings with respect to Martin Luther (40).

[H] And one of the persecutors of Erasmus. This we learn from these words (41): 'Aliquot ex hostium numero perierunt: Lovanii Emondanus Carmelita vomitu præfocatus. . . Coloniae perit Jacobus Hoghestratus coryphæus hujus tragediæ, qui tamen in morte dicitur nonnullis verbis prodidisse parum sinceram conscientiam. — Some of the enemies are dead. At Louvain Emond the Carmelite was suffocated by a vomit. . . At Cologne died James Hochstratus, the principal actor in this tragedy, who notwithstanding is said on his death-bed to have spoke some things which argued no very sincere conscience.' In the letter wherein Erasmus, gives so good advice to the inquisitor, he complains of his having been ill used by him, for his opinion upon the dissolubility of marriage (42).

[I] There was a cutting epitaph made upon him. We find it in Paul Jovius: 'Hoftrati autem tumulo, 'says be (43), hoc nobile carmen, Capnionis puer affixit (57).

Hic jacet Hofstratus, viventem ferre patique
Quem potuere mali, non potuere boni.
Crescite ab hoc taxi, crescant aconita sepulchro:
Aulus erat sub eo, qui jacet, omne nefas.

Here Hochstrat lies, whom, breathing vital air,
Shunn'd by the good, the bad alone cou'd bear.
Grow yew, and aconite, upon this tomb,
Which such a wretch incloses in it's womb.

[(57) Reuchlin, as it is well known, died in the year 1523. Now if, as we are told, the author of these verses was actually a servant of Reuchlin when he died, these verses could not be composed on the real death of Hochstratus, which did not happen till 1527. But the truth of the matter is this. About the year 1515 the first volume of the famous Epistolæ obscuro-rum viro-rum appeared in 4to, to the number of forty one only. The second edition likewise in 4to, contains no greater number: but the third also in 4to, which, if we may judge by the character, was published soon after the two others, contains an Appendix of eight epistles, the last of which in the name of Hochstratus, and dated from Rome, contains four Pasquinades in form of epigrams upon himself; the first in four verses, the second and third contain each a distich, and the fourth four verses as the first. Now the pretended epitaph, recited by Paul Jovius, is nothing but the second of these Pasquinades, preceded by the first distich of the fourth.

Some unknown persons, as Hochstratus relates in this epistle, meeting him one day in the streets of Rome, dropt a paper at his feet, he took it up, and found in it several satirical epigrams on his pretended death, and out of this was formed that mentioned by Paul Jovius. So that this epitaph, far from being composed upon, and after the death of Hochstratus, is only an imitation of the following, which Politian composed on the death of the poet Mabile (Marullus) his enemy:

Fleste viator iter, seget * nam putre Mabili
Hac fovea corpus conditur atque animus.

* Fatens

This epitaph of Mabilus, who nevertheless survived Politian, is to be found among his poems; and the account Mr Bayle give of this is, that one may say such bitter things in an epitaph; and find so fruitful a field by turning this way, that many poets have falsely supposed the death of their adversaries, to have the advantage of this common-phrase. This reflexion in the remark [O] of the article POLITIAN, is the true key to this pretended epitaph, Hic jacet Hofstratus, &c. composed, as we see, about ten years before Hochstratus's death, in the height of his process against Reuchlin. REM. CRIT.]

[K] He published at Cologne the judgment of the divines at Paris. . . concerning the pretended Dionysius the Areopagite. It was in the year 1521. You will find this judgment in the second tome of Luther's works, in the Jena edition. You will find also other editions of it, and therefore Father Nourri had no reason to believe, that he first brought it to light by publishing it in his Apparatus ad Bibliothecam maximam veterum Patrum in 1694 (44).

(42) See the Acta Eroditorum, in the second Tome of the Supplements, pag. 737.

HOE (MATTHIAS) a famous Lutheran minister, was born at Vienna, in the year 1580. He was sent so soon to the Protestant colleges (a), that he found himself a Lutheran before he had made reflexion that he was born in the Romish communion. He studied Divinity at Wittemberg; and in the year 1602, he was invited to the court of Saxony, to preach before the Elector. In the year following he was made director of some churches in Voightland; and after having discharged that employment eight years, he was sent to Prague in the year 1611, to be superintendent of the German churches. Two years after he was recalled to the court of Saxony, where he was promoted to the degree of ecclesiastical counsellor, and first preacher to his highness. He enjoyed those posts all the rest of his life, and died the fourth of March, 1645. He was admitted doctor of Divinity at Wittemberg in the year 1604. His marriage, which lasted forty three years, and which gave him six sons and four daughters, made ample amends for all the troubles that could arise from other circumstances in life [A]. He was born a gentleman (b), and he had so warlike a pen, as proved he did not degenerate. He published a great number of books (c), some in Latin; and others in High-Dutch. He was a man who would not hear of the re-union of the Protestant churches [B]: but he was accused of having been bribed to endeavour a re-union of certain princes of the empire with the emperor [C], to the great prejudice of the Protestants. What he has published upon the Revelation, looks like the work of a man of a turbulent spirit [D].

I fancy he was more troubled to see the elector Palatine in possession of the crown of Bohemia, than to see him a fugitive after the battle of Prague; for the letter which he wrote to a nobleman of that country, shews that he did not approve the design of giving this

[A] His marriage . . . made amends for all the troubles that could arise from other circumstances in life.] I have given the most favourable construction to the Latin words of the Sieur Witte; for as they are somewhat obscure, one might think, that he meant, that Hoe's marriage was so happy, as to have less evil than good in it (1). This would be lessening the joys of that marriage; wherefore I chuse the other interpretation, which is, that those advantages being put in the scale with all the evil the husband was exposed to, weighed them down. Thus his dear spouse agreeably comforted him for all the troubles and fatigues he had to go through. He would therefore have had reason to complain, if he had lived a bachelor.

[B] He would not bear of the re-union of the Protestant churches.] Gustavus had a little before he died, called an assembly at Leipsic, of Lutherans and Calvinists, in order to endeavour at an accommodation. His authority caused them to separate like good friends, and with mighty hopes of peace; but they vanished away by his death. Nevertheless, Dury did not desist from the undertaking, and he came to Francfort, where the Protestants were assembled. A most severe letter of Hoe against the Calvinists came hereupon, and did a great deal of mischief. We have all this from Grotius. 'Rex Sueciæ magnus Gustavus . . . non multum ante mortem Lipsiæ conventum instituerat utriusque sententiæ protestantium . . . Effecit sua auctoritate ut amice discederetur cum magna spe restituenda unitatis. Sed tristis exitus tanti Regis salubre hoc cœptum interfecit. Neque tamen defuit ejusdem negotii commendator ex Anglia Duræus, multorum Angliæ antislitem instructus literis, qui francfortum ad Moenum venerat eo ipso tempore, cum ibi conventus Ordinum Protestantium haberetur. Sed rem per se difficilem implicationem etiam reddidit doctoris Hoi ex Aula Saxonica responsum immitte in eos quos Calvinianos vocat (2).' The doctors of the Augsburg Confession, extol to the skies, the vigilance with which he opposed the smallest innovations. They even say, that on this account he exposed himself to great dangers. 'In solis radiis pridem scriptum arbitror quos ille tuendæ fidei gratia pertulerit labores, quibusculum difficultatibus sit conflictatus, quæ subierit pericula, dum quidvis satius censebat, quam ut quicquam in Germania de Evangelicæ Religionis integritate (quam adversarum partium promachi contaminare sunt ausi,) decederet ac minueretur (3).'

[C] He was accused of having been bribed to endeavour a re-union between certain princes of the empire with the emperor.] In the year 1635, the elector of Saxony and the landgrave of Hesse, made a treaty with the emperor at Prague, and engaged themselves in his interests against the crown of Sweden, which was the way to destroy whatever Gustavus had done in Germany for the advantage of the Protestant religion. It is believed that the emperor, by a good sum of money, engaged Dr Hoe to remove all the scruples which might have perplexed the elector of Saxony. Mr Puffendorf, whose words I quote, is my warrant for it. Arguebatur quoque Saxonius Theologus Matthias Hoeus decem uncialium millia à Cæsare accepisse, eximendis Principis sui animo scrupulis, quos alias facile ista pax generare poterat (4).

[D] What he has published upon the Revelation looks like the work of a man of a turbulent spirit.] According to the humour that he was of, it cannot be doubted but his Commentaries upon the Revelation, tended to raise a general war against the church of Rome, that is, to fill Europe with the most dreadful miseries that it could fall under. However it be, the bishop of Meaux reckons him amongst the interpreters of the Revelation, who do nothing but found an alarm for war. The Lutherans, says he (5), were not more moderate than the Calvinists; and the principal minister of the court of Saxony, Matthias Hoe by name, dispersed a book at Francfort intituled, The judgment and total extirpation of the Whore of the Romish Babylon, or the sixth Book of the Commentary upon the Revelation. The book is no less extravagant than the title, and this is what was written in Germany, and in the North. The bishop of Meaux has taken this from a letter of an Arminian minister, I will set down the passage entire, because it contains some other matters, relating to this article. 'I have seen the catalogue of this last fair of Francfort, which contains abundance of polemical books against Popery, amongst others, one with this inscription. Judicium & excidium Meretricis Babylonie Romanæ, seu Commentariorum in Apocalypsin S. Johannis liber sextus, auctore Matthia Hobe Doctore Theologo, Lipsiæ in 4to. This Hoe is the principal minister of the court of Saxony, of noble extraction in Austria, and who for a long time has been suspected to be a secret Papist. I wonder that in such a conjuncture of time and affairs, he thinks fit to write against Popery in so satirical and odious a style, especially since the elector of Saxony has always earnestly endeavoured to preserve the emperor's favour towards his family (6).' Hoe began his work upon the Revelation in the year 1610, and finished it in the year 1640. It contains eight books, which have been reprinted in folio at Leipsic, in 1671. Factious and turbulent men will never be hindered from abusing the obscurity of the Revelation, in order to stir up war. Peace doth not please them; it is war which they wish for, in which they run no hazards, and find a way to make themselves necessary. It is probable, that sovereigns are not displeased to entertain such pragmatical people they look upon them as fit persons to spread confidence among their people, by turning the prophecies, sometimes one way, sometimes another, according to the current of affairs. Such sort of people make themselves feared; and for that reason their masters keep fair with them.

[E] The

(a) Postea orthodoxa id sibi vindicavit Ecclesia, siquidem parentum cura frugis bonæ adolefcens parioris acri, hoc est fidei hauriendæ gratia, ad loca evangelicæ ablegatus. Spizelius, in Templi Honoris, Referat. pag. 165.

(b) Taken from Henning, Witte, Memor. Theol. Renovat. pag. 1014, & seq.

(c) See the catalogue of them, ibid. pag. 1021.

(1) Illius amore & convivio suavitudo totis usibus est nostra tribus & quadraginta annis, ut multo plura haberet de quibus gaudium quam dolorem conciperet.

Hoe, Witte, Memor. Theol. Renovat. pag. 1018.

(2) Grotius, Epist. cccclxv, Part. I, pag. 165.

(3) Spizelius, in Templo Honoris referat. pag. 165, 166. Henning, Witte, ubi supra, pag. 1016.

(4) Puffendorf. Rerum. Suecicar. lib. vii, pag. 223. See the Bibliotheca Universelle, Tome III. pag. 438.

(5) In his Epistolæ editione, pag. 27, of the advertisement, Dutch Edit.

(6) Charles began his work upon the Revelation in the year 1610, and finished it in the year 1640. It contains eight books, which have been reprinted in folio at Leipsic, in 1671. Factious and turbulent men will never be hindered from abusing the obscurity of the Revelation, in order to stir up war. Peace doth not please them; it is war which they wish for, in which they run no hazards, and find a way to make themselves necessary. It is probable, that sovereigns are not displeased to entertain such pragmatical people they look upon them as fit persons to spread confidence among their people, by turning the prophecies, sometimes one way, sometimes another, according to the current of affairs. Such sort of people make themselves feared; and for that reason their masters keep fair with them.

(7) He published them in 1610, and the last was printed in 1640. See Spizelius, ubi supra, pag. 1016.

this kingdom to that elector, and that he looked upon Calvinism as an Antichrist, that was not much better than the Popish Antichrist [E].

(8) Andreas Carolus, Memor. Eccles. pag. 482, ad ann. 1619.

[E] The letter which he wrote . . . shows that he looked on Calvinism as an Antichrist, which was little better than the Popish Antichrist. That letter has been printed. Read this passage of the Memorabilia Ecclesiastica of the XVIIth Century (8). 'Cum in eo essent occupati Bohemæ Proceres, Legatis Moraviæ, Silesiæ & Lusatiæ præsentibus, ut Fridericum quintum, Electorem Palatinum, sacris Calvinianis addictum, in Regem suum eligerent, Matthias Hoe t. r. Concionator Aulicus Dreidentis, Epistolam sub 23. Aug. scriptam ad Joachimum Andream Slikium quæ (postmodum typis excusa) vir celeberrimus fidelissimè monuit, ut quid, præsertim intuitu religionis, Ordines isti facerent, facere saltem deberent, probè perpendant? Inter alia spiritum Calvinisticum appellans Anti-Christum Orientalem atque componens cum Occidentali, ut non multò meliorem, allegante Hornbekio in summa Controversiarum religionis; libro nono de Lutheranis p. m. 699. — When the nobles of Bohemia were deliberating concerning the election of Frederic V, Elector Palatine, a Calvinist, to be their king, the deputies from Moravia, Silesia, and Lusatia, being present, Matthias Hoe, court-preacher to the Elector of Saxony, wrote a letter dated August twenty-fourth, to Joachim Andream Slikius (which was printed afterwards) wherein that famous man faithfully admonished, that the States should carefully weigh what they were about to do, at least what they ought to do, especially as to what concerned religion. And among other things, he called the Calvinistic spirit, the eastern Antichrist, and comparing it with the western, declares it not much better. This letter is quoted by Hoornbeek, in his Summa Controversiarum Religionis. Probably the author I quote had not seen this letter; for he only speaks of it upon the credit of Hoornbeek.

HOELZLIN (a) (JEREMIAH) professor of Greek in the university of Leyden, was born at Nuremberg. He made so great a progress in his classical learning, at Augsburg, that he excelled all his school-fellows, both in the Greek and Latin tongues. After which he studied Philosophy in the university of Altorf. His method of studying it, was not like that of others; he little regarded what was dictated by the professors; as he was a good Grecian, he read the originals, and the ancient interpreters of Aristotle, Themistius, Alexander Aphrodisiensis, Simplicius, and Ammonius. He was not contented with Aristotle alone; he studied Plato likewise, and was a great admirer of the Stoics. After having spent eight years in this sort of study, he was admitted doctor of Philosophy, and applied himself to the Scriptures, and to Hebrew. He was afterwards rector of the college at Amberg, in the Upper Palatinate. The war drove him thence, and obliged him to retire to Bremen, after having lost the best part of his effects. The count of Bentheim designed to make him head of his college of Rhede; but the count died presently after, and then the town of Ham offered our Hoelzlin a like employment. The soldiers of the emperor made such ravages in that country, that he did not care to be exposed to their violences. He therefore sought a safe retreat, and found it in Holland; he retired to Leyden, and there published a translation of the Psalms, which was judged to be exact. The university did him the honour to retain him, when he was invited to Middleburg, and to the Brill [A]. He was thought worthy to appear on a greater stage, and had the Greek professorship given him, which Vossius had just laid down. He undertook the translation of Apollonius Rhodius [B], and notwithstanding his distempers, he accomplished it, and put his last hand to it, six days before he died. He was dropsical, and so weak, that at last he could not hold his pen in his hand, and yet he had this work so much at heart, that he dictated what he thought necessary to be added to it. He died the twenty fifth of January, 1641. He had been married a long time (b), but had no children. His happiness on that account is taken notice of in his funeral sermon, because of the troubles he was exposed to, when the rage of war forced him to leave his own country (c).

(a) He is always called Hoelzlin in his Funeral Orations.

(b) He married the daughter of a minister of Nuremberg.

(c) Taken from his Funeral Oration, spoken by Antony Thyssius.

[A] He was invited to the Brill. He was actually rector of the college of the Brill, if we may believe Vossius, whose words I set down the more willingly, because they have need of correction, since the proper name of our Hoelzlin is there miserably mangled, not without a gross solecism. Vossius had been saying, that Antony Emilius had refused the Greek professorship, which the curators of the university of Leyden had offered him, and then he says: 'Arbitror professionem eam deinceps offerendam Mag. Jeremie Hoelellus quondam correctori Ambergensis Gymnasii Electoralis Collegæ Beckmani: nunc Brillanæ est Scholæ Rector. Vir est moribus simplex, sed trium linguarum & Philosophiæ admodum gnarus (1).'

I am of opinion that this profession ought next to be offered to Jeremie Hoelzlin, formerly rector of the Electoral College at Amberg, and colleague to Beckman. He is now rector of the school at the Brill. He is a man unpolished in his manners, but well versed in Philosophy, and the three learned languages.

[B] He undertook the translation of Apollonius Rhodius. The edition of this poet, with the version and commentary of Hoelzlin, was published in the year 1641, at Leyden ex officina Elzeviriana. Mr Menage speaks very disadvantageously of it (2). First, he relates these words of Mr Baillet, 'We have some ancient Scholia upon Apollonius . . . The new edition which Jeremie Hotzlin hath given of it, is esteemed by some, but others value it no more than many of those which are called Variorum;' and then having answered to what concerns the Scholia, he thus goes on. 'As for Jeremie Hotzlin, he is a wretched writer, he is wholly wrapped up in Hebraisms, he affects old words that are out of date, and invents new ones. I will here observe, by the by, that he speaks of Conradus Riterhusius as of his patron. Conradus Riterhusius sanctissimus ille juris interpres & vindex, idemque patronus olim meus, insigniter pius & constans animus (3). — Conrad Riterhusius that upright interpreter and restorer of the law, and formerly my patron, a man of distinguished piety, and my constant friend. It is at the 115th page. There are at the end of his edition of Apollonius, some notes of Holstenius, which are very judicious.' The Funeral oration tells us, that while Hoelzlin was at Altorf, he had an intimate friendship with Scipio Gentilis, Michael Picardus, Conrad Riterhusius, and Daniel Swenferus, and that they mutually wrote Greek and Latin verses to one another, and that part of them has been published: Cum quibus Græcis Latinisque carminibus certabat, quorum non pauca in lucem venerunt.

(3) It should be amicis.

(1) Vossius, Epist. cxlviii, ad Joann. Meursium, pag. 181, Londini 1693. That letter is dated the 30th of August, 1631.

(2) Anti Baillet, Tom. I, pag. 239, 390.

(a) Taken from Spizelius in Templo Honoris
referato, pag.
328, & seq. & ex
Theatro Frerheri,
pag. 1511, 1512.

HOESCHELIUS (DAVID), born at Augsburg in the fourteenth of April, 1556, was a very learned man. The public is indebted to him for the edition of several Greek authors [A]. He spent all his life in the instruction of youth in St Anne's college, of which at last he was made rector by the magistrates of Augsburg in the year 1593. They also made him library-keeper, and he cannot be sufficiently praised for the pains he took to enrich their library [B]. He was very well acquainted with good manuscripts, and good editions; and he took care that the manuscripts which were bought for the ornament of that library, should not lie buried like a treasure hid under ground, but he published the most curious of them, with notes of his own. He made good scholars, and many referred to Augsburg upon his account (a) [C]. He died there in 1617. I will mention what Scaliger said of him [D]. Mr Huet has not only commended his diligence in finding out old manuscripts, but also his skill in translating (b).

(b) Huetius, de claris Interpeta-bus, pag. 129.
See also Colo-mia, Biblioth.
choicis, pag.
194.

[A] The public is indebted to him for the edition of several Greek authors. He published the eight books of Origen against Celsus, in Greek and Latin, at Augsburg 1605 in Quarto. The wisdom of Jesus, the son of Sirach, or Ecclesiasticus, in Greek and Latin, with notes, at Antwerp, in the year 1604. The Bibliotheca of Photius in Greek, with notes, at Augsburg in the year 1601, in Folio. The History of Procopius, in Greek, with notes, in the same city, in the year 1607, in Folio. These two last books had never been printed. Geographica aliquot excellentissimorum authorum Maritani, Scylacii, Artemidori, Dicæarchi, at Augsburg, in the year 1600. in Quarto. Three or four treatises of Philo. Eclogæ legationum Dexippi Abenientis, Eunapii, P. Patricii, Prisci Sophrisæ, Malchi Philad. Menandri cum excerptorum collatis & libris Diodori Siculi amissis, at Augsburg, 1603, in 8vo. Some treatises of the ancient fathers, &c.

[B] He cannot be sufficiently praised for the pains he took to enrich their library. Spizelius acquaints us with it: his words shew, that Antony Eparchus, bishop of Corfu, had collected excellent manuscripts, which fell into Hoeschelius's hands. 'Cum insuper celebratissimæ Bibliothecæ Augustanæ administratio ipsi esset demandata, omni virum nisu ejus procuravit incrementum, nec ulli parcens labori, libros excultos pariter ac manuscriptos, maxime Græcos, melioris item notæ auctores, ac librorum editiones conquisivit, sicque Bibliothecam Augustanam veluti publicum aliquod Erarium instruxit ad omnium promiscuè indigentiam sublevandam. Et cum rarissimorum Codicum MSS. Græcorum, magno ære ab Antonio Eparcho Episcopo Coreyrensi coemptorum copiam esset consecutus, maximam curam adhibuit, ne thesaurus iste librarius in arcanis Bibliothecæ hujus recessibus veluti in perpetuo quodam custodiretur carcere, sed in publicam etiam lucem magno cum totius Republicæ literariæ bono & commo-
' prodiret (1). Being appointed keeper of the famous library at Augsburg, he spared no pains to encrease it, and to seek out both books and manuscripts, especially of the Greek authors, and in general, all authors and editions of any note. And by that means made it a noble treasury to supply the wants

(1) Spizelius, in Templo Honoris
referato, pag.
330.

(a) He succeeded Tilmanus Hesbuius in the year 1588.
Melch. Adam.
in Vit. Theol.
pag. 622.

HOFFMAN (DANIEL) superintendant and professor at Helmstadt (a), was the head of a theological faction [A], which raised some disturbances towards the end of the XVIth century. He raised some difficulties upon the Formulary of Concord which was to be subscribed; and instead of concurring with Dr John Andreas, for the defence of that Formulary, he made use of captious distinctions. He would not admit the Ubiquity, but only the presence of JESUS CHRIST in many places. That quarrel, which lasted not long, left peoples minds disposed to division [B]. So that afterwards

(1) Micrælius,
Syntagma Histor.
Eccles. lib. iii,
sect. ii, pag. 871.
Edito 1679.

[A] He was head of a theological faction. This was the thirteenth schism that happened in the Lutheran church. 'Decimi tertii schismatis auctores Helms-tadiensis, interque eos præcipuus Hesbuius & Hoffmannus, pessimo exemplo extiterunt. Formulæ enim concordiæ cum subscribendum, & apologia conscientiæ da esset, illi, livore dicam an protervia, pium J. Andreas conatum spernentes, cum Christum exaltatum omnibus rebus ob realem idiomatum communicationem debere dicere præsentem, multipræsentiam ejus saltem defendebant (1). Hesbuius and Hoffman were the heads of the thirteenth schism at Helmstadt. For when the Form of Concord was to be subscribed, and an apology to be composed, whether led by envy or obstinacy, despising the pious idea-

'ours of John Andreas, instead of owning as they 'ought, that CHRIST now exalted, is present 'with all things, because of the real communication of 'the idioms, only maintain his multipresence.' The Jesuit Adam Contzen observes under the year 1584, that Hoffman's antagonist was preacher to Henry Julius, duke of Brunswick (2), and that this prince, in the quality of administrator of the bishopric of Halberstadt, imposed silence on the parties. See also what he says under the year 1592.

[B] That quarrel . . . left peoples minds disposed to division. The first author that I quote in the preceding remark, goes on thus. 'Sed in cineribus suffocata est.

'of the learned in every science. And having got a 'large collection of very rare Greek manuscripts,
'bought at a great price from Antonius Eparchus,
'bishop of Corfu, he took effectual care that this precious
'treasure of learning should not lie hid in the corners
'of this library, as in a kind of perpetual confinement,
'but that it should appear in public to the great ad'vantage of the learned world.' The Catalogue of the Greek manuscripts of that library, composed by Hoeschelius, and published in the year 1595, is a master-piece (2).

[C] He made good scholars, and many referred to Augsburg on his account. I will make use again of Spizelius's words. 'Quam præclare, says he (3),
'quamque feliciter demandatæ sibi functioni satisfecerit,
'plurimi testari possunt viri eruditi qui è variis Ger-
'manicæ, Italiæ, Belgicæ civitatibus Hoeschelii gratia
'Augustam se contulerunt, quibus viri hujus institu-
'tione uti, inque lingua Græca proficere curæ & cordi
'fuit. Vere de illo dici potest quod

(2) See Colomies, Biblioth. choicis,
pag. 194.

(3) Spizelius, in Templo Honoris,
pag. 329, 330.

Mille foro dedit juvenes, his mille ministrum Adjecit numero purpureæque togæ.

'How successfully he performed the duties of his pro'fession, many learned men can testify, who came from 'several cities of Germany, Italy, and Holland, to Aug-
'sburg, that they might be under Hoeschelius's tuition, and 'make progress in the Greek language. It may be 'truly said of him, that thousands came from under his 'tuition who were ornaments to all the three learned 'professions.' Colomies names some travellers, who mightily praised Hoeschelius (4).

[D] I will mention what Scaliger said of him. Hoeschelius a Lutheran, but a learned man: if Velsius did not support him, he had been expelled before now. He is a great pedant, but a good man. Scaliger sent him his Procopius, but he had one more complete from the library of Bavaria. Hoeschelius, in his Procopius, has printed some fragments of my letters, and of those of Casaubon. He is now printing Origen . . . Hoeschelius non est magnus Græcus, sed diligentissimus (5). Hoeschelius is no great critic in the Greek language, but very dili-

(4) Ubi supra;
pag. 195.

(5) In Scaligeri
his secundis, pag.
m. 112.

other matters were disputed with great heat, Hoffman being still head of a party. The question was, amongst other things, what use ought to be made of philosophical principles in Divinity; and it is to be observed, that the professors of Philosophy took that side which was most favourable to the orthodox [C]. Daniel Hoffman and Theodore Beza wrote against one

(3) Micrælius,
ubi supra.

(4) Thomæus,
Præfat. xlii, pag.
244.

(5) Id. ibid.

(6) Id. ibid. pag.
245.

* Confirmant suspicionem, quæ leguntur in velti-bulo dicti Pervigilii:
aperta
enim ibi litis, Helmstadii ab Hoffmanno agitate, mentio.
Facient huc & que leguntur in controversia Cra-meriana Magdeburgensi, nam & huic aliquid offi-nitatis cum Hof-manniana constat intercessisse. —
This suspicion is confirmed by what we read in the preface to the Pervigillum, where he plainly mentions the Hel-mstadian controversy, which was begun by Hoffman.
This is likewise confirmed by what we read in the Cramerian controversy at Magdeburg, for it is plain, that this had some affinity with that of Hoffman.

† Vide ibi Dis-cursum IV, pag.
64, & seq.

‡ Pro defendenda (quod ipsum quo-que legitur in titulo) Philo-sophi ac Theo-logi concordia.

* est controversia, cui utinam fomes novus postea non esset quaestus? Sopita jaceat cum altera illa, qua de resurrectione impiorum quærebatur, an virtute meriti Christi futura sit, necne? ut & cum illa, qua quæ-rebatur, an semper in forma syllogistica disputari de-beat: & cum aliis questionibus vexatis, de philosophie usu & abusu (3). — But this controversy was buried in its own ashes, I wish that new fuel had not afterwards been sought for to it! let it rest forever together with that concerning the resurrection of the wicked, to wit, whether it would be by virtue of the merits of CHRIST? And this whether we ought always to dispute in the syllogistic form?
& with many other questions, which were much tossed concerning the use and abuse of Philosophy.

[C] The professors of Philosophy took that side which is most favourable to orthodoxy. This is the testimony
James Thomæus gives them in one of his prefaces.

* Celebris est, says he, quæ parentum nostrorum memoriâ Julianam concussit Academiam, Hoffmanniana controversia, siniente seculo proximè præterito cæpta, ineunte hoc nostro seculo non sine Philosophorum, qui tum ab ἀπαρτοῦ πατρίσιν stabant, laude sopi-ta. De qua nihil addam, tum quod ob recentiorum memoriam nemini res est ignota. . . . tum maximè, quod in personâ Theologi unus alteriusve inconsiderati, sanctissimæ scientiæ parcendum esse omnino existimo (4). — The famous Hoffmannian controversy, which, in the days of our fathers, shook the Julian academy, arose about the end of the last century, and ended in the beginning of the present, much to the bonour of the professors of Philosophy, who maintained the orthodox side. I shall add no more concerning it, because the affair is so recent that no body is ignorant of it, but especially because I think the sacred science of Theology ought not to suffer on account of the rash-ness of a few divines. He examines in that discourse, whether a thing can be true in Philosophy, and false in Divinity, as some have pretended; and he observes, that amongst those who have ventured to maintain such a paradox, some have been induced to it by an excessive respect for Aristotle, and others by an inordinate hatred to that philosopher. These last were the divines. * Ad Theologos venio, & diverso planè affectu idem dogma defensores. Non enim amore, sed odio Aristotelis, non veneratione, sed designatione Philosophorum, in istam temeritatem, ne quid gravius dicam, præcipitati sunt (5). — I come now to the divines, who defended the same opinion from quite contrary motives. For they fell into that rash step, to say no worse of it, not from their love but from their hatred to Aristotle, not from their veneration, but from their contempt of Philosophers. That the readers may the better understand what was Daniel Hoffman's opinion, I will add another passage of Thomæus. It contains a thing which deserves on its own account to be related (6). * Nisi enim fallor, infelix illud & scandalo plenum certamen, quod nostrâ memoriâ super Quæstione, sine Deo peccati causa per accidens? certatum fuit, & sepultæ Hoffmannianæ controversiæ cineribus aut propullulavit, aut videri statem voluit propullulasse. Non planè abludere à vero quæ dixi, facile opinor perspiciet, qui CL. Viri, Pauli Slevogni Pervigilium de diffidio Theologi & Philosophi in utriusque principii fundato, (hoc enim libello nomen est) pervolutaverit. * Enimverò hic inter primos fuit, qui quæstionem modo dictam in isthoc scripto, quod vicesimus tertius hujus seculi annus produxit in scenam, excitaret, hujusque negativam in Scholis Theologorum, affirmativam inter Philosophos veram esse defendere. Cui anno sta-tim sequente Vir non minori eruditionis laude clarus Andreas Kesslerus discursuum Theologicorum quadri-gam 1. opposuit. — If I am not mistaken that unfortunate controversy, which lately gave so much of fence about the question, Whether GOD be the accidental cause of sin? arose or would seem to have arisen from the ashes of the Hoffmannian controversy.
That I am not entirely mistaken in judging so, I believe any body may perceive who will read the Pervigilium de diffidio Theologi & Philosophi in utriusque princi-piis fundato, of the learned Paulus Slevognus. For he was one of the first who revived that question in that book which appeared in the year 1623, and therein maintained that the negative of it was true in Theology, and the affirmative true in Philosophy. It was answered the year following by the no less learned Andreas Kesslerus in his Quadriga Discursuum Theologicorum. Thomæus is in the right to say, it was a very scandalous thing to see people maintain, that it is true in Philosophy, that GOD is the author of sin by accident, but that it is not true in Divinity. And he is in the right to approve of Casmannus, who said that such a division of truth gives a handle to maintain the most impious errors (7); for indeed nothing is more proper to introduce Scepticism, because by such sort of reasoning, we reduce truth to the condition of corporal qualities.

From the same body appearing little or big, according as we see it with glasses, or without, we have reason to conclude, that we are ignorant whether it be great or small, absolutely speaking, and that the absolute lit-tleness or greatness of bodies, is unknown to us. If therefore the same proposition was true and false, according as it is considered either in Divinity or Philosophy, it would necessarily follow, that we could not know truth in itself, and that it consisted only in a mutable relation to the dispositions of our mind; as the pleasantness of foods consists only in a certain relation to the dispositions of the tongue; which when they happen to change the foods which were agreeable are no longer
so. I am going to cite an author, who will tell us, that our Hoffman, and his party, maintained, that Philosophy ought to be banished the universities, as a most pernicious discipline, according to which many theological truths are false. The opposers of this faction were excluded from the ministry. At last, by the authority of the prince, those disputes were quieted, and Hoffman was obliged to submit. * Contendebant Hoff-mannus & ipsius asseclæ Philosophiam pugnare cum Theologia: multa esse vera in Theologia quæ sint falsa in Philosophia, & contra; exterminandam Christia-nis Academicis ut noxiam, ut toties etiam graviter ab antiqua Ecclesia damnatam. His se initio statim opposuerunt ejus Academicæ Philosophi, Duncanus Lid-delius Scutus Med. D. Corn. Martini, Job. Caselius & alii, rati ad se pertinere ejus defensionem, cujus professores essent. Res contentione diu acta est, ita ut Hoffmannus eos tandem à Ministerio excludere ret qui contrarium sentirent. Habitu sæpius dispu-tationes & magni fluctus in illo simpulo excitati.
Extant ejus tamen aliquam multa acta. Tandem lis sopita est autoritate Principis: restitutus honos suus Philosophiæ ejusque Doctoribus est. Hoffmanniani cesserunt (8). — Hoffman and his party maintained, that Philosophy was repugnant to Divinity: that many things are true in Divinity, which are false in Philosophy, and contrarywise: that Philosophy ought to be banished from Christian universities, as pernicious; and as a thing which has been frequently, and solemnly condemned by the ancient church. The professors of Philosophy in that university, viz. Duncan Liddel a Scotchman Med. D. Corn. Martini, Jobn Caselius, and some others, opposed themselves to these opinions, thinking it their duty to defend Philosophy of which they were teachers. The contentions continued fierce a long while, to such a degree that Hof-man at last excluded those from the ministry, who maintained the contrary opinion. Many disputations were bad and great dissensions raised. Some of the decisions are still extant. At last the controversy was ended by the authority of the prince: Philosophy and its professors were restored to their honours, and Hof-man and his partisans were obliged to submit.

Henry Julius, duke of Brunswick, ordered that Daniel Hoffman should publicly acknowledge his error, and make a public recantation of it. That order was executed the seventh of March, 1601. See the Memorabilia Ecclesiastica seculi a nato Christo de-cimi septimi, pag. 23, and 24 (9), and Græwus in his book De unica veritate.

To say that what is true in Philosophy, is false in Divinity, is a pernicious error.

(7) Non erubuerim dicere, dupitem illam ve-ritatem esse pseu-dofideiasticum figmentum ad omnes errores & atheismos excusandos & defen-dendos. Casmannus Cysmopæia,
cap. i. q. 6, apud Thomæum, Præf.
xlii, pag. 243.

(8) Georgius
Hornius, Histor.
Philosoph. lib.
vi, cap. xii, pag.
321, 322. See Nitschius, remark [C].

(9) That book, compiled by Andreas Carolus, abbot of St George, in the duchy of Wirtemberg, was printed at Tubingen, in 1697.

[D] I

one another, upon the controversy of the Eucharist. See the remark, where I give the titles of some of Hoffman's works [D].

It was not only upon the Ubiquity that our doctor quarrelled with the other ministers, but also about Predestination; for he accused Hunnius of explaining it contrary to the intent of the book of the Concord. Nay, he accused him of having vented in Luther's chair, a more pernicious doctrine than that of the Papists. The book of the Concord, said he, teaches, that the cause of election is wholly out of ourselves; but Hunnius and Mylius teach, that election is founded on the foresight of faith. Hunnius and Mylius caused Hoffman to be condemned in an assembly of divines in the year 1593, and threatened him with excommunication, if he did not subscribe to their opinion. He published an apology against them in the year following (b). Hospinian relates this more exactly. He says (c), that some divines of Leipzig, Jena, and Wittemberg, having assisted at the second marriage of Samuel Huber, in 1593, met at Polycarp Lyserus's house; and that some of them were of opinion, that it ought to be declared in a public and authentic form, that Daniel Hoffman was a Calvinist, and of the number of those Heretics, who ought to be avoided: but the greater number of them were for writing to him to exhort him to conform to their doctrine, under the penalty of excommunication, if he neglected to do so. Hunnius, in the name of the rest, wrote a long letter to him to that purpose. It was against this letter that Hoffman published an apology in the year following (d), in which he declared the reasons that hindered him from conforming to the divines of Wittemberg. He declared that he had found in their books above a hundred errors, quite contrary to the articles of the Christian faith (e).

(b) Taken from Henry Altling. Theolog. Histor. pag. 302.

(c) Hospinian. de Origin. & Progressu Libri Concordiæ, cap. li, pag. 429.

(d) Id. ibid. pag. 431, & seq.

(e) Id. ibid. pag. 434.

[D] I give the title of some of Hoffman's works. He published at Helmstadt in 1583. Quæstionum & responsum in gravissima controversia de sacrosancta cœna pars prima, in 8vo. Theodore Beza refuted it in the year following; but presently after came out (10), Danielis Hofmanni Apologia missa ad Theodorum Bezam, qua rō p̄ntdy in verbis cœnæ dominicæ immotum, Beza autem demonstrationes falsissimæ demonstrantur. Beza published in 1585, Responsionis pars altera contra Danielem Hofmannum; and in the year 1586 Conspectum ad Danielis Hofmanni demonstrationes, &c. These are some other books of Hofman; Responsio ad rationes & signa Christophori Pezælii, &c. quibus docuit veros sacramentarios agnoscere: De 17. erroribus trassoribus Jacobi Andree. Those two are in High-Dutch. These which follow are in Latin. De usu & applicatione notionum Logicarum ad res Theologicas, & de inusitatarum prædicationum reductione contra Goclenium, at Francfort, 1596. Liber apologeticus respondens echartis Ministrorum Ecclesiæ Bremensis, at Helmstadt 1585. Officina locorum Theologicorum. Explicatio sententiæ in Epist. Canonica Job. Apostoli, sanguis Jesu Christi Filius Dei mundat nos ab omni peccato, Helmstadt 1581.

(10) At Helmstadt, in 1585.

(a) Expellione in Theologorum transmutatus. Mollerus, ubi infra, citat. (c).

(b) It was held at Flensburg.

(1) Luther. Epist. ad Wilh. Prævill, anno 1528. See Tom. II, Epist. Lutheri à Joh. Aurifabro Francoforti ad Viadrum ann. 1597, editurum, pag. 371. Mollerus, Isæoge ad Histor. Cherson. Cimbricæ, Part. III, pag. 129.

(2) In Epist. ad Petrum Suaverium Confil. Danicæ A. 1528, scripta, evam exhibit. J. Manlii Farnago Epistol. Melanch. Part. III, pag. 497, 494. Moller. ibid.

[A] He maintained himself . . . notwithstanding Luther's opposition. See what Luther wrote to a minister of Kiel (1): 'A Melchior pellissice velim cavere vos omnes, ac curare apud Magistratus ne ad conciones admittatur, etiam si literas Regis ostenderit. A nobis enim recessit indignandus, dum non voluit ejus somnia probare. Ad docendum neque valet, neque vocatus est. Hæc dicito nomine meo omnibus vestris, ut ipsum vitent ac tacere cogant. — I would have you all beware of Melchior the Tanner, and apply to the magistrates to get him hindered from preaching, tho' he should show the king's letters. For he went from me full of rage, because I would not approve of his dreams. He has neither abilities nor a call to teach. Acquaint every body with my desire in this matter, that they may shun him, and force him to silence.' Luther would have no body to hear this man who thrust himself into the ministry, without any call or capacity. And Francis Burchard, counsellor of the dukes of Saxony, did also give notice to beware of him (2).

[B] He answered them with the greatest fury. All his books were written in the vulgar language: His apology against Nicholas Ambrosius, first minister at Magdeburg, was printed in the year 1528. This minister had confuted him, concerning the time of the world's end. 'Opposuit ei Hofmannus apologiam amarulentissimam . . . in ista convitiorum plautra in Adversarium evomit (3). — Hofman wrote an apology, wherein he pours out all manner of reproaches against his adversary.'

[C] He reproached Schuldorpius with the crime of incest. The accusation was founded upon Schuldorpius's marrying his niece. Marg. Schuldorpio, Kiloniensi, Parocho Slesvic. qui suam de S. Cœna sententiam impugnarat, duobus itidem scriptis, Kiloni ann. 1528 impressis . . . respondit & hominem, cum aliis ob causis, tum ob matrimonium cum filia sororis, ope eloquentiæ suæ canine, miere exagitavit (4). — He answered Marquardus Schuldorpius of Kiel, minister of Sleswic, who had impugned his doctrine concerning the Eucharist, by two pieces, printed at Kiel, anno 1528, and in his cynical stile handled him very roughly on several heads, and particularly on his having married his niece. Schuldorpius alleges in his defence, among other reasons, the authority of Luther, whose letter he produced, wherein he confesses, that he advised that marriage, and maintains, that it is lawful. 'Utrique Schuldorpius mox repofuit Epistolam ad Fideles civitatis Kiloniensis Saxoniam,

(3) Moller. ibid. pag. 130.

(4) Id. ibid.

went to Strasburg, where he published a false relation of the conference [D]. He was imprisoned there in the year 1532, after a public dispute, wherein he engaged with the ministers. This lost his reputation with his followers. He died in the year 1533, or thereabouts (c). He was not of Holstein as some have affirmed [E].

Several writers say, that Hofman began to distinguish himself in Strasburg (d), and was followed by a crowd of disciples, and that removing to Embden in the year 1528 [F], he there vented his visions with so astonishing a success, as to pass for the first Patriarch of the Anabaptists of the Netherlands and the Lower Germany [G]. He so infatuated his followers, that they took him for that Elias, whom God is to send upon earth before the day of judgment. He returned from thence to Strasburg, with hopes of seeing the accomplishment of a prophecy, that concerned him [H], and which had been delivered by a good old man of Friesland. He there preached up Anabaptism openly. The disturbances he raised, occasioned the calling of a synod in June, 1532, where he was permitted to dispute with the ministers. He was solidly confuted, but he continued, notwithstanding, to dogmatize, and it was thought necessary to imprison him [I], the people thinking themselves upon the brink of great troubles, because his followers

(c) Taken from the Isagoge ad Historiam Chetonesi Cimbricæ of John Mollerus, Part. III, pag. 128, & seq.

(d) Argentines inclarescere capit. Frider. Spanhemius, de Origine & Progressu Anabaptismi, n. 22, pag. m. 211.

(5) Id. ibid. pag. 131.

(6) His name is Joh. Bugenb. gus: but he is commonly called Pomeranus, from his native country.

(7) Idem, Mollerus, pag. 133.

(8) Ibid.

(9) Parasitæ Hofmanni fuit Johann. à Campen & Jac. Hegge Dioniscanus, ad saniorum in colloquio hoc mentem reduci. Id. Moller, pag. 131, 132.

(10) Mollerus, ibid. pag. 131.

(11) Id. ibid.

(12) Idem, pag. 127.

† In Analyti Pericæche Evang. Dom. II. Adventus.

‡ In Diff. de Chiliasmo Apocalypico, pag. 9.

(13) An. 1527. Magdeburgo in Holatium delatus. Mollerus, ubi supra, pag. 128. See Sendorf, Hist. Lutheran lib. ii, pag. 122, says he departed from Wittenberg.

(14) Johann. Henricus Otius, Hist. Anabapt. ad ann. 1528, n. 3, pag. 45.

(15) It was held a little after Easter, in the year 1529. See Mollerus, ubi supra, pag. 131.

(16) Tumultum, quos Hofmannus post abitum ex Holstia, Argentinae & Embdae concitavit Anabaptistico Enthusiastico. Id. ibid. pag. 133.

(17) Hoornb. Summa Controversæ pag. m. 362.

(18) Cassander, Epist. Dedicat. Tractatus de Ruptismo.

Saxoniam, eique adjecti Lutheri ad se literas, in eandem Dialectum transulas, in quibus ille conjugio huic, cuius se suaforem fuisse fateatur, ingenti com trappologia patrociniari, ac Abrahami, Sarum ducentis, exemplo defendere istud non dubitat (5).

[D] He published a false relation of the conference at Flensburg. He maintained, that he had stopped Pomeranus's mouth (6), and that the secretaries of the conference were forgers (7). Pomeranus, to refute these vauntings, published the acts of the conference with the most authentic formalities. He added to them a refutation of Hofman's writing, and the conversion of Heggus (8), which was one of the fruits of that dispute: Heggus had been one of Hofman's seconds in it, and he gained so much knowledge by it, as induced him to renounce his sect (9). The other of Hofman's seconds had done the same thing. Pomeranus did not appear at the conference as a disputant, but as one of the directors under the eldest son of his Danish majesty (10). He ended the conference with an oration, in which he confuted Hofman's arguments. Finem Colloquio oratione Bugenbagii adversus argumenta ipsius aversuavit impoſitum (11).

[E] He was not of Holstein as some have reported. See the words of Mr Mollerus (12): 'Suevus ortu fuit, non autem Holstus, uti Conrad. Dietericus & Sebastianus Schmidius falso sibi persuadent. — He was originally of Suabia, and not of Holstein, as Conrad Dietericus and Sebastian Schmidius falsely affirm.'

[F] Several authors affirm that he removed to Embden in the year 1528. After Mr Mollerus's proofs, it cannot be doubted that Hofman was at Kiel in the year 1528, and 1529, and that he had retired thither upon his leaving Saxony in discontent (13), and therefore we may believe they are mistaken, who make him remove from Strasburg to Embden in 1528. Mr Otius observes, that many say this; and he doth not criticise them. 'Embdam Argentorato abſſe Melchior Hofmannum plures ajunt. Ergo non de mum anno 1531 eo concessit nisi forte redierit, vel diutius ibi commoratus sit (14). These words inform us, that some say, Hofman went to Embden in 1531. This seems to be the true epoch of his ministry at Embden: for since he published in Strasburg a relation of the conference of Flensburg (15) in the year 1529; it is a proof that he went to Strasburg as soon as he was expelled from Holstein. It is very probable that from Strasburg he went to Embden, and that he returned again to Strasburg: he was there in the year 1532. Note, that Mr Mollerus promises a relation of the tumults he raised in Strasburg and Embden, after he left Holstein (16). Is not this to tell us, that he went to Embden after he had divulged his dreams in Strasburg, in the year 1529? Mr Hoornbeek has reason for saying, that he returned from Embden to Strasburg, but not for saying, that he went from Strasburg to Embden in 1528 (17). This author observes, that at his going from Embden, he left there one Trypmaecker, who quarrelling with his colleagues, retired into Holland, and became the first apostle of the Anabaptists. Cassander is less mistaken about the date of this fanatic's ministry. 'Donec tandem, says he, sub ann. 1532 Melchior quidam Hmannus, arte pello, hanc novam contagionem cum aliis quibusdam non minus perniciosus erroribus in Germaniam hanc inferiorem & Belgicam invexit (18). — Till at last, about the year 1542, one Melchior Hofman, a Tanner, brought this new contagion, together with some other no less dangerous errors, into the Netherlands, and into Holland.'

[G] He passed for the first patriarch of the Anabaptists of the Netherlands, and Lower Germany. The above cited words of Cassander prove this. Here follow two other witnesses. 'Huic Patriarchæ etiam eorum qui in inferiori Germania succreverunt, Anabaptistarum tradux adscribi solet. — The origin of the Anabaptists in Lower Germany, is likewise usually ascribed to this patriarch.' It is thus, Frederic Spanheim speaks (19). 'Qui huc Anabaptistica deliria attulit ex Germania superiore primus fuit Melchior Hofman. — Melchior Hofman was the first who introduced the dreams of the Anabaptists into this country from Germany.' Hoornbeek says this (20).

[H] He hoped to see the accomplishment of a prophecy that concerned him. Will he was planting his gospel at Embden with great heat, and loudly re-baptizing people, there was a good old man there, who possessed him with a desire of returning to Strasburg. This old man was of that party. He prophesied, that the magistrates of Strasburg should imprison Hofman, but that at six months end the prisoner should be delivered, and should go and preach the gospel over all the earth, as another Elias, having with him a great train of prophets, and the one hundred and forty four thousand sealed persons, mentioned in the Revelation (21). Hofman having publicly disputed with the ministers the eleventh of June, 1532, and not ceasing to spread his enthusiasms, after he had been confounded in that dispute, was put in prison. When he saw that part of the prophecy was accomplished, he became more insolent. He shook off the dust from his feet, he threw his hat upon the ground, and protested before God, that he would feed upon nothing but bread and water, till he should point out with his finger him that sent him. His hopes were confounded, for he died in prison (22). A hundred instances shew, that the most chimerical predictions have had some parts of them confirmed by the event: which has given strength to the error; nothing contributing more to the drawing in of these visionaries and their adherents. It is especially with relation to these matters, that it may be said, The end crowns the work. Men should be very cautious of judging of the whole by a part, ex angulo leonem. The conclusion is to be waited for, and the first success ought to be distrusted; for this is a snare, and a dangerous allurements.

[I] They found it necessary to imprison him. Spanhemius, Hoornbeek, and many others, affirm, that Hofman disputed in June 1532, and was not imprisoned till after the obliquity with which he still continued to dogmatize after the dispute. But I will here produce an author, who places that conference in June 1533, and assures us, that this enthusiast was brought out of prison to dispute with the ministers. 'Anno 1533, Mense Junio die 11, Hofmannus Argentorati è vinculis ad publicam disputationem productus & admittus fuit: à quo tempore institutionem Regni DEI ortam esse sui affirmabant. Idem Hofmannus Autoritate prædicationum ejusmodi verè deliri Leonardi Joest civis Argentinenſis, & aliorum similibus fanaticorum hominum, multa vana de urbe Argent. prædixit, &c. quæ tamen ab urbe non recepta,

(19) Spanh. de Orig. & Progressu Anabapt. n. 22, pag. m. 211.

(20) Hoornbeek's Summa Controv. pag. m. 362.

(21) Cf. ap. vii. and xiv.

(22) Taken from Hoornbeek, ubi supra, pag. 302.

followers said that the town of Strasburg was to be the New Jerusalem, where the new kingdom of CHRIST should be established, and that as Hofman was the Elias that was to come, Polterman was the Enoch who was to second him. When they saw Hofman in prison, they gave out, that he should come out with one hundred forty four thousand sealed people, who should anathematize the earth, and break through all the obstacles which should be opposed to them. Our Elias, and our Enoch, said they, are the two olives, and the two candlesticks in the Revelation (e), which no body can hurt, and if any one attempt it, fire shall come out of their mouth, and devour their enemies. When they saw Hofman did not come out of prison at the time foretold by certain prophets, they were in a great consternation; but to amuse them, he sent them word, to rest for two years, after the example of Esdras and Haggai, who were forced for a like space of time to interrupt the building of the temple. He died in prison, and frustrated the hopes of his disciples (f). I will mention some of his Heresies [K]. Some say that he began to preach near the Rhine, after the defeat of the peasants in 1525 (g).

(e) See Revelation, chap. xi, ver. 4, 5.

(f) Taken from Frederic Spanheim, de Orig. & Progressu Anabaptist. pag. 211.

(g) Joh. Henricus Ottius, Hist. Anabapt. ad ann. 1525, p. 21, pag. 35.

(23) Ottius, Hist. Anabapt. ad ann. 1533, p. 6, pag. 61. He quotes Revis in Hist. Georgii. But he should have quoted Nicolaus Biedikius; for it is he who wrote the History of David George, and Revis did but publish it.

(24) Ottius, ibid.

(25) Henr. Ursinus, Praef. in Apocalyp. in fine.

New Jerusalem, as Rome was Babylon; that Strasburg should be besieged the same year, and that there should be a great slaughter in it; and that this man preferred his predictions before those of Isaiah and Jeremiah; and that Matthias and his followers applied to Munster all these fine prerogatives of Strasburg, which displeased Hofman when he knew it.

[K] I shall mention some of his heresies. He taught, I. that the word was not united to the flesh taken from the Holy Virgin: his reason was, that all humane flesh is defiled with sin, and consequently cursed. II. That JESUS CHRIST has but one nature. III. That the obtaining of Salvation depends on ourselves, and that we are only saved or damned according to the use that we make of our free-will. IV. That the baptism of infants proceeds rather from the enemy of God and men, than from God (26).

(26) Taken from Spanheim, ubi supra, pag. 211.

HONORIA, sister of Valentinian III, incurred the indignation of that emperor by her lewdness, and endeavoured to revenge herself by another crime. She solicited Attila to undertake the conquest of the empire, and promised to marry him. Authors vary a little about this. Some pretend that she preserved her chastity till she saw her design of marrying the king of the Huns miscarry [A]: others say that before she had that intention, she had led a disorderly life [B].

[A] Some pretend that she preserved her chastity till she saw her design of marrying the king of the Huns miscarry. A modern author, who quotes Sigonius and Marcellinus, says that Honoria, devoured with a lustful flame, sent an eunuch to Attila, to offer herself in marriage to him with the empire; that Attila sent some ambassadors to the emperor Valentinian to ask Honoria of him; but that before their return he fell so much in love with a young lady of his own nation, that he married her, and died on his wedding-day by too much drinking and caressing his spouse: that upon this, Honoria, being disappointed of her hopes, gave up herself to some gallants, who got her with child, after which she was sent to Constantinople. 'Hæc libidine inflammata Eunuchum legatum ad Attilam Hunnorum regem misit, conjugium & regnum ei offerens. Misit igitur Attila legatos ad Valentinianum, qui susceptionibus minas adjicientes, Honoriam petebant, sed priusquam legati Roma reverterentur, Attila . . . puellæ ejusdem . . . amore captus . . . nuptias cum ea celebravit . . . Honoria igitur

tur cum spe sua frustraretur, aliis se sublemit: inde gravida facta, Constantinopolim mittitur (1).

[B] Others say, that before she had that intention, she led a disorderly life. Honoria, sister of the emperor Valentinian, giving herself up to the steward of his household, was disgracefully driven out of her brother's palace, and afterwards forced to retire into the east to Theodosius. This inspired her with so furious a passion for revenge, that finding no other way to satisfy it, she secretly sent to Attila, to persuade him to undertake the conquest of Italy, representing to him, that the weakness of Valentinian, and the confusion of the affairs of the empire, would make it very easy for him (2). According to Bonfinius's account (3), she was in a convent when she sent to sound Attila, who perceiving that the affair did not go on, fancied that they made a jest of him; and that this induced him to marry the daughter of the king of the Bactrians. If Honoria was in a cloyster, it is a sign she had behaved herself ill.

(1) Christian. Mathieu. Theat. Hist. pag. 300. 733.

(2) Malmibourg, Hist. de l'Action. Tom. III, liv. ix, pag. 6, & 7. Dutch Edit.

(3) Histor. Hungar. Decad. I, lib. vii.

HONORIUS, a Roman emperor, son of Theodosius. Not to repeat what is to be found in Moreri, I shall only speak of his marriages. He married successively Stilico's two daughters [A], who both died, as is said, virgins. Zofimus relates hereupon some very singular circumstances [B], not to be found in other historians; but he

(1) Marcellinus Comes in Chron. apud Barchin. in Claudian. pag. 766. Edit. in 4to.

(2) Tyrio qua fatus Honorius cetero, Carpathi tenebris Maria cum conjugio somnos. Claudian. de Bello Gildonio, ver. 327.

[A] He married Stilico's two daughters. The first was called Mary, and the other Thermania. Their mother Serena, fired with ambition, did not stay till Mary should arrive to the age of marriage, in order to give her to the emperor; and after Mary's death, she was in as great haste to marry Thermania to the same prince. The words I am going to quote, prove that they died maids. Stilico Comes, cujus filiae duæ Maria & Thermania, singulæ uxores Honorii principis fuerant, utraque tamen virgo defuncta (1). And yet the poet Claudian tells us, that Honorius and Mary lay together (2). See what Zofimus tells us below.

[B] Zofimus relates hereupon some singular circumstances. Serena, not being able to resolve upon deferring the marriage of her daughter Mary with the emperor, nor to consent that nature should be forced by the consummation of the marriage with Mary, who was not yet ripe for it, resolved on a medium, which was to debilitate Honorius. She found out a woman experienced in this sort of charms, who contrived the matter so, that Honorius when he went to bed to his young spouse, had neither inclination nor power to pay what is called the conjugal duty. Mary died soon after with her virginity. Honorius some time after courted Thermania, Mary's sister: the father

he is accused of a gross contradiction [C], which every reader must perceive at first sight.

ther was not inclined to that marriage; but Serena passionately desired it, in order to maintain her authority. Ο δὲ βασιλεὺς Ὀνώσιον ἀπὸ πολλῆς Μαρίας αὐτῇ τελευτήσαντος τῆς γαμετῆς τὴν ταύτης ἀδελφὴν Θερμαντίαν ἤπει εἰ δεῖναι πρὸς γάμον. Imperator autem Honorius, Maria conjugē jampridem rebus humanis exempta, sororem ejus Thermanthiam sibi matrimonio jungi petebat (3). The marriage was concluded, but was but of short continuance: Thermanthia soon dying with the same fate as her sister. That is to say, she lay with a man who neither had the desire, nor the power to know her: the sorcerer, whom Serena had made use of, renewed the operation of her charms. Zosimus doth not expressly say this. It is only a consequence I draw from his words. I will set them down at length; they deserve it, as containing a very singular fact. Τῷ γάμῳ πρὸς τὴν Μαρίαν Ὀνώσιον ἐνισαμένη, γάμον ἔραν ἐπὶ τὴν κόρην ἀγαγὼν ἡ μήτηρ ὀρώσα, καὶ ὅτε ἀνακαλίσσεται τὸν γάμον ἀνεχομένη, καὶ τὸ παρ' ἡλικίαν εἰς μίαν ἐκδέναι, φύσιν ἀδίκιαν καὶ ἄδεν ἔτερον εἶναι νομίζουσα, γυναικὶ τὰ τοιαῦτα δεξαμένη ἐπισαμένη περὶ ὑγίαινα, πράττει διὰ ταύτης τὸ συνέιναι μὲν τὴν θυγατέρα τῷ βασιλεὶ καὶ οὐκ ἐκτενέον εἶναι. Τὸν δὲ μήτε ἐθέλειν μήτε δύνασθαι, τὰ τῷ γάμῳ περικκοντα πράττειν. Ἐν τῷ τῆς κόρης ἀπειρὶ γάμον ἀποδανῆς, εἰκότως ἡ Σερῆνα βασιλεὺς γοῆς ἐπιδυνάσσα δεικνύει τὴν τοσαύτην αὐτῇ δύνασιν ἐλαττωθῆναι, τῇ δευτέρᾳ θυγατρὶ συναλῆαι τὸν Ὀνώσιον ἔσπευδεν ἢ ἀλλ' ἡγενομένη τελευτᾷ μὲν ἡ κόρη μετ' αὐτὸν ταῦτα τῇ περὶ τὴν παῖδα. Quam Honorius matrimonium cum Maria contraheret, mater ejus Serena quæ puellam necdum nubilem ætatem attigisse cerneret, ac neque sibi posset imperare ut nuptiæ differrentur, & immaturam maritali consuetudini tradere nihil esse arbitraretur aliud quam injuriam naturæ facere; nacta mulierem quæ rebus hujusmodi remedium adferre sciret, ejus opera perfecit, ut filia cum principe quidem viveret, ac tori consors ejusdem esset, verum ille nec vellet nec posset, ea quæ matrimonium requireret, implere. Interim puella virgine mortua, non abs re Serena quæ sobolis imperatoris consequendæ percupida esset, ob metum ne quid sibi de tanta potentia decederet, id operam dabat ut Honorium alteri filiæ copularet. Quo factō, puella non multo post vitam cum morte commutat, quum idem ei quod priori accidisset (4).

[C] He is accused of a gross contradiction.] We have seen, that he says, that Thermanthia died a little after her marriage; yet he assures us in the same book, that Honorius having put Stilico to death, sent back Thermanthia to her mother. Ο δὲ βασιλεὺς Ὀνώσιον τὴν μὲν γαμετὴν Θερμαντίαν παρὰ τοῦ βασιλέως δρῶν τῇ μητρὶ προσέταττε παρὰ δίδουσαι μὴδὲν διὰ τὸ τοῦ υἱοποιήσαντος. Imperator autem Honorius uxorem Thermanthiam augustali dejectam solio matri suæ reddi jussit, nulla tamen idcirco suspitione gravatam (5). Stilico was killed the same year in which Honorius married Thermanthia, that is, during the consulship of Bassus and Philip in the year 408. As to the other daughter of Stilico, she was married to the emperor in the year 398, in which year was the war against Gildo. See the passage of Claudian (6).

(4) Id, ibid.

(5) Ib pag. 346. At pag. 350, he speaks of the rewards bestowed upon the Eunuchs who brought Thermanthia to Serena.

(6) In the remark [A].

HOORNBECK (JOHN) professor of Divinity in the universities of Utrecht and Leyden, was one of the most famous divines, who appeared in Holland in the XVIIth century. He was born at Haerlem (a), in the year 1617, where he performed his studies till he was fifteen or sixteen years of age; after which he was sent to Leyden, where he made great improvement under the learned professors of that university. Having staid two years there, he went to study at Utrecht, in the year 1635, from whence he returned to Leyden the year following. He was ordained minister in the year 1639, and went to exercise his office secretly at Cologne. He discharged all the duties of it, with a great deal of piety and prudence, and was not discouraged by the dangers he was exposed to in that city which is so much addicted to the Popish religion. He returned to Holland in the year 1643, and was promoted (b) to the degree of doctor of Divinity with great applause, the twenty first of December the same year. He gave such proofs of his great capacity, that he was looked upon as a man sufficiently qualified for the professorship of Divinity, which was vacant at Utrecht by the death of Schotanus. He accepted that employment preferably to all others, which were offered him in other towns [A]. He was installed professor of Divinity at Utrecht in July 1644. He was chosen one the ordinary pastors of the same town the year following, and notwithstanding the difficulty of discharging the duties of those two employments, he acquitted himself of them with great exactness [B], whereby his excellent talents became so useful to the public;

(a) John Hoornbeek his grandfather, retired thither with his wife in the year 1648, when he left Flanders his native country on account of religion.

(b) In the university of Utrecht.

[A] Post were offered to him in other towns.] In February 1644, the church of Maestricht desired to have him for their minister. That of Graft in North Holland invited him in March in the same year, and he was offered a professorship of Divinity in the illustrious school at Harderwic (1) in May following (2). It is a very glorious thing to be thus courted at twenty seven years of age.

[B] He discharged the duties of these two employments with great exactness.] I have reserved the particulars of it for this remark, in which I make use of the words of him who wrote our Hoornbeek's life. 'In utraque autem Statione (3) per decennium fere perseveravit, tanta eruditionis, eloquentiæ, pietatis & diligentiae fama, omnibusque ordinibus adeo gratus, ut nullus in majori fuerit exultatione, non Ultrajecti solum, sed in toto Belgio. Nempe assiduus erat in docendo, precando, concionando, legendo, disputando, regendo, prædicando, catechisationibus habendis, membris Ecclesiæ, imprimis ægris visitandis. Quibus artibus optimis certe, Magistratus Trajectini gratiam adeo meruit & inivit, ut Magistratus optimus suo proprio motu, non petentem, nec forte cogitantem, liberaverit dimidia parte oneris Pastoralis, servato tamen integro honore & honorario. — In both these stations he continued near the space of ten years, in so great reputation for learning, eloquence, piety, and diligence, and so acceptable to people of all ranks, that none had a greater share of the public esteem, not only at Utrecht but in all Holland. For he was assiduous in teaching, praying, preaching, reading, disputing, presiding, catechizing and visiting the members of the church, and especially the sick. By this excellent conduct, he deserved and obtained the favour of the magistrates of Utrecht to such a degree, that they of their own accord, without his asking, and possibly without his knowledge of it, freed him from one half of his pastoral charge, preserving his rank and salary.' Would you have a notion of a good pastor, read in what manner Hoornbeek performed his visits. 'Membra Ecclesiæ frequenter invisebat, pios animabat, ignaros docebat, malos corripbat, hæreticos confutabat, afflictos solabatur, ægros recreabat, infirmos roborabat, dejectos erigebat, pauperibus subveniebat, omnes denique juvabat pro eorum statu & conditione, omnibus, aderat in omnibus, omnibus se omnia faciebat, gravibus gravem, hilaribus hilarem, afflictis condolentem, doctis doctum & Doctorem, plebi Pastorem, erantibus ducem, ut in viam reduceret veritatis. — He frequently visited the members of his congregation, encouraged

(3) Zosimus, lib. 1, pag. m. 333.

(1) A town in Guelderland.

(2) Taken from John Hoornbeek's Life prefixed to his book De Conversione Indorum.

(3) That is the place of professor and that of pastor.

public, that he got the love and esteem of every body. But that he might not sink under so many labours, the magistrates exempted him from part of his ministerial functions. He was invited to Leyden, to the same employments that he had exercised at Utrecht; and he accepted of that invitation in the year 1654. He was a great ornament to that famous university, till his death, which happened the first of September 1666. He deserved a much longer life; but it is more to be wondered that a man so laborious as he was [C], should live forty nine years, than that he lived no longer. The many books he published [D], are a speaking proof of his application, and of the vast extent of his knowledge. He understood several languages [E], and enjoyed the friendship of the greatest divines of his age (c). He never deviated from the most rigid orthodoxy, and was no less valuable for the qualities of a moral and virtuous man, than for the talents of his mind, and of a learned professor. This we may see at large in his life (d). He left children worthy of him [F], and one needs say no more in their commendation.

(c) See the catalogue of them in his Life.

(d) It is prefixed to his treatise De Conversione Indorum & Gentilium, and it was written by David Stuart. I have taken this article from it.

encouraged the pious, taught the ignorant, reprobated the wicked, confuted the Heretics, comforted the afflicted, refreshed the sick, strengthened the weak, raised the dejected, relieved the poor, and, in fine, assisted every person according to his state and condition; was helpful to all in all things, made himself all things to all men, grave with the grave, gay with the gay, sorrowful with the afflicted, learned with the learned, a shepherd to the people, and a guide to those that wandered, in order to bring them back to the ways of truth. As to his vigilance in the functions of his professorship, this is the testimony that is given of him. 'Studiosos vero Theologiae velut filios omni cura complectebatur, labore, quo suos præcipuos iis impendebat; non lectiones solum in eorum gratiam habebat, sed frequentia Collegia omnis generis, atque Disputationes ordinarias & extraordinarias, ex quibus resularunt tot valla & egregia volumina ad institutionem juventutis imo ad usum omnium, sed imprimis ad conversionem Hæreticorum (4). — He was as a father to the students of Divinity, and on them he bestowed his chief labours; he not only gave them lectures in Divinity, but frequent courses in all kinds of learning, as also disputations ordinary and extraordinary, which produced many and excellent books, for the instruction of youth, may for the benefit of all, but especially for the conversion of Heretics.'

[C] So laborious as he was.] This may be known from the particulars contained in the preceding remark; but we shall know it still better by the words that follow. They relate to the time that he was professor of Divinity and pastor at Leyden. 'Curam Ecclesiæ suo jure poterat in Collegas derivare, quia primario Pastori (5) ab ea immuni adjunctus, cum eo labores, honores, præmia & privilegia omnia ex decreto sapientissimi Magistratus æqualiter distribuebat. Sed ab Ecclesiæ cura, membrorumque & ægrorum visitatione dispensari noluit, contra vero, cum dimidias tantum Pastoris vices demandatas haberet, integras voluit implere, zelo & diligentia stupenda in homine alias occupatissimo, imo non tam onerato quam oppresso, & tantum non fatisciente sub multiplici onere, cui plures simul juncti vix essent pares. Concionabatur in Templo, legebat in Academia, præsidebat in Consistorio, Catechisationes instituebat in Choro, Collegia habebat in domo, scribebat in musæo, sæpe in lecto, membra Ecclesiæ visitabat in ædibus, ægros etiam & pestiferos, curam ad omnes & ad omnia extendebat (6). — He might have justly thrown his pastoral charge upon his colleagues, because he was put upon the same foot with the first minister, who was exempted from that charge; and by the decree of the magistrates was to share all labours, honours, emoluments, and privileges with him. But he would not be exempted from the pastoral office, and visiting of the sick, on the contrary tho' he was only charged with one half of the duty he would perform the whole; a zeal and diligence prodigious in a man, who had so much other business, who was not only loaded but oppressed, and scarce able to sustain the various burthen for which the joint force of many would hardly have sufficed. He preached in the Church, read in the University, presided in the Consistory, catechized in the Choir, gave lectures at home, wrote in his closet, and many times in his bed, visited his parishioners in their houses, as also the sick and those infected with the plague. His care extended to all things, and all persons.'

[D] The great number of books he published.] They may be divided into five classes, Didactica, Polemica, Practica, Historica, Oratoria. Those of the I. are, Institutiones Theologicae in 8vo. Irenicum de studio pacis & concordiae, in 4to. De consecratione Evangelica inter Reformatos, & Evangelicos, in 4to. Those of the II. are, Socinianismi confutati tomi tres, in 4to. Pro convincendis & convertendis Judæis, l. 8 (7) in 4to. De conversione Gentilium, libri duo in 4to. Examen Bullæ Urbani VIII. de Jesuitis, Imaginibus, & Festis, in 4to. Examen Bullæ Innocentii X. de pace Germaniæ, in 4to. Epistola ad Duræum de Independentismo, in 8vo. Commentarius de Paradoxis Weigelianis, in 12mo. Apologia pro Ecclesia Christiana hodierna, contra Libellum, ad Legem & Testimonium, &c. in 8vo. De observando à Christianis Præcepto Decalogi quarto, in 12mo. De Episcopatu, in 8vo. Those of the III. are, Theologiæ practicæ tomi duo, in 4to. De Peste, in 12mo. Those of the IV. are, Summa controversiarum, in 8vo. Miscella vetera & nova. I put in the V. Orationes variae Inaugurales, Valedictoriae, Restorales & Funebres. I do not give the titles of his Dutch works, which contain several tracts.

[E] He understood several languages.] Here follow the words of the author of his Life. 'Linguas siquæ novit plurimas doctarum & vulgariarum, Latinam, Græcam, Hebraicam, Chaldaicam, Syriacam, Rabinicam, Belgicam, Germanicam, Anglicam, Gallicam, Italicam, Arabicam & Hispanicam Rudimentis attigit (8). — He understood many of the learned and modern languages, the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldaic, Syriac, Rabinic, Dutch, German, English, French, Italian, and had attained the elements of the Arabic and Spanish.'

[F] He left children worthy of him.] He married at Utrecht Anne Bernard in the year 1650. By this marriage he became related to several famous men, as to Constantine l'Empereur (9), professor of Divinity (10), and Jodocus Hondius (11) a famous Geographer, grandfather to Henry Hondius, who was killed in fighting valiantly for the service of his country, in the ship of admiral Van Tromp which he commanded. Mr Hoornbeek left two sons, ISAAC HOORN-BEEK formerly an eminent advocate at the Hague, and at present pensionary of the city of Rotterdam (12); and HENRY EMILIUS HOORN-BEEK, a commissioner of the imposts in the province of Holland.

[(12) He was made in 1720 counsellor-pensionary, keeper of the seals, and Stadholder of the Fiefs of Holland and West-Friesland, &c. and he died at the Hague, the seventeenth of June 1727, in the seventy first year of his age. R. E. M. C. R. I. T.]

(7) This book is without doubt the same that Mr Baillet, Tom. II. of his Antiq. pag. 38, calls Dispo. Anti-Judaïque, but it is certain, that this is not the title of it. It is likely that Mr Baillet was deceived by somebody, who quoted it thus for brevity sake.

(8) In Vita Hoornbecki.

(9) The grandmother, by the father's side, of Anne Bernard was called Jacqueline l'Empereur, and was the aunt of Constantine l'Empereur, and of John l'Empereur, minister at the Hague.

(10) At Harlem, wic, and afterwards at Leyden.

(11) He was Anne Bernard's grandfather by the mother's side.

(a) In the Paris, edition 1699.

HORATIUS (PUBLIUS) surnamed Cocles, did a glorious action, whilst the city of Rome, his native country, was besieged by king Porfenna. His article being very good, and large enough in Moreri's Dictionary (a), mine shall be very short, and I shall insist only on the disagreement that is to be found among the ancient historians, with with respect to a circumstance, that should have been related without any variation [A].

[A] I shall only insist on the disagreement that is to be found . . . with respect to a circumstance which should have been related without any variation.] Some historians say, that throwing himself into the Tyber, after having repulsed the enemy till the bridge was broken behind him, he swam to the other side of the river, notwithstanding the weight of his arms, without receiving any wound; but others affirm, that he received to great a wound in his thigh, that he continued lame of it all his life. Livy manifestly supposes that he was not wounded. 'Cunctati aliquandiu sunt (Hetrusci) dum alius alium ut prælum incipiant, circumpectant. Pudor deinde commovit aciem & clamore sublati undique in unum hostem tela conieciunt, quæ cum in objecto cuncta scuto hæssissent, neque ille minus obstinatus ingenti pontem obtinebat gradu, jam impetu detrudere conabantur virum, cum simul fragor rupti ponderis, simul clamor Romanorum alacritate perfecti operis sublatus pavore subito impetum sustinuit. Tum Cocles, Tyberine pater, inquit, te sancte precor, hæc arma & hunc militem propitio flumine accipias. Ita sic armatus in Tyberim desiluit: multisque superincidentibus TELIS INCOLUMIS ad suos tranavit, rem ausus plus famæ habituram ad posterum quam fidei (1). We may be sure that all those who do not expressly observe his receiving of a wound, are of Livy's opinion; for their design is to raise our admiration of the great courage of this Roman. Now that action is more admirable and glorious if he was wounded, than if he was not. We must conclude then, that if Florus (2), and Seneca (3) make no mention of the wound, it is because they were persuaded he received none. Valerius Maximus has so positively denied that he received any, that this ought to induce us to believe, there was a tradition for the negative. 'Ut patriam periculum imminenti liberatam vidit, armatus se in Tiberim misit: cuius fortitudinem Dii immortales admirati, INCOLUMITATEM SINCERAM ei præstiterunt. Nam neque altitudine dejectus, quasiæque, neque pondere armorum pressus, nec ullo vorticis circuitu actus: nec telis quidem, que undique coniecerantur, LAESUS, TUTUM natandi eventum habuit (4). — As soon as he saw his country delivered from this imminent danger, he threw himself armed into the Tyber: the gods, admiring his valour, saved him FROM ANY HARM. For he did swim safe to shore without being either stunned by the height, from which he leaped, or oppressed by the weight of his arms, or carried down by the rapidity of the stream: or wounded by the darts which were thrown at him from all quarters.' But here are three famous historians, who go upon another tradition. Dionysius Halicarnæus gives a long account of this fight, and assures us, in express words, that Horatius received a wound with a lance that pierced his thigh, and put him to such torture that he could scarce stand, when he understood the bridge was broken (5). This historian adds, I. that it was believed, he would soon die of his wounds. II. That when it was known he would recover, he had noble rewards given him; but that he could not arrive at the consulship, nor any military command, because he halted ever after that fight. Plutarch says that a statue of brass was erected to him in the temple of Vulcan, to comfort him upon the misfortune of his becoming lame by that wound (6). He had (9) Plutarch in said before, that he had entered the city by swimming, being wounded in his hip: Δράσι θυρήνικῳ βι-ζλῆντος τὸν γλῆδιν. Jaculo Hetrusco in natis ihus (7). Dion Cassius affirms, that Cicero declaiming against Marc Antony before the senate, swore by Horatius's thigh, and Mutius's hand (8). I am not ignorant that that direct oration which he speaks of, is not like any of Cicero's Philippics (9). But Dion who forged it, would not have used such an oath, had not there been a tradition that Horatius was wounded in the thigh, in defending his country against Tarquin's friends. We will produce a fourth witness, viz. Servius. 'Solus Cocles hostilem impetum, sustinuit, donec à tergo pons solveretur à sociis, quo soluto se cum armis præcipitavit in Tyberim, & licet LAESUS esset in coxa, tamen ejus fluentia superavit. Unde est illud ab eo dictum, cum ei in comitiis coxæ vitium objiceretur, per singulos gradus admeor triumphum mei. (10) — Cocles alone sustained the shock of the enemy, till the bridge behind him should be broke down by his companions, which being accomplished, he threw himself all in armour into the Tyber, and tho' he was wounded in the thigh, swam over. This made him say to those who reproached him in the comitia with his lameness, every step that I make reminds me of my triumph.' You see that the tradition about Horatius's wound was supported by the circumstance of a witty saying which he made use of when he was reproached with his lameness: Every step, said he, that I make, puts me in mind of my triumph. It is said that Alexander made use of that thought to comfort the king, his father, who was afflicted on the account of his lameness occasioned by a wound which he had received in a battle (11). If we have reason to wonder that in an event so remarkable as this of Horatius, the traditions for and against his being wounded, should have had each their partisans and followers, even among the most famous writers, what shall we say of Polybius (12) who supposes that this brave and undaunted Roman lost his life in the Tyber? Shall we say that he likewise had a tradition for it? Shall we conclude from hence, that ancient history is so dark, that we know not generally what side to take amongst those who deny, and those who affirm the same things? And that the yea and the no seeming to be equally authorized in matters, wherein it was the easiest thing in the world to know the truth, we may well doubt of the less notable events which the historians have mentioned? shall we, I say, infer such conclusions? I should rather advise the reader to make use of these observations to fortify his judgment against the custom of reading without attention, and of believing without examination. Note, that the difference of opinions about Horatius's fate, is not so much to be wondered at; it is however a sign of historical uncertainty. Some affirm that Horatius was a very handsome man (13), others say, that he was surnamed Cocles. . . . because he was extremely flat-nosed, and that the upper part of his nose was so sunk into his head, that there was no division betwixt his two eyes, and that his eyebrows joined; so that the people designing to call him Cyclops, mistook and called Cocles (14).

HORSTIUS (JAMES) professor of Physic in the university of Helmstadt, was born at Torgau, May 1, 1537 (a). He was admitted master of arts in the university of Francfort on the Oder, in the year 1556 (b), and doctor of Physic in the year 1562 (c). He was invited to the post of public Physician in several cities, and exercised it successively at Sagan and Suidnitz in Silesia, and at Iglaw in Moravia, till he was called, in the year 1580, to be Physician in ordinary to the archduke of Austria (d). He continued in that post four years, after which he was called to be professor of Physic in the university of Helmstadt. His inaugural oration De remoris difficultum Medicinam & earum remediis, concerning the obstacles to the study of Physic and their remedies, is exceeding good (e). He acquitted himself worthily in that profession, and published some books [A], which supported his reputation. I have not been able

[A] He published some books.] The first, if I do not mistake, is a Commentary on Hippocrates's book concerning the heart, in Librum Hippocratis de Corde, which appeared in the year 1563 (1). He published in 1576 a Treatise qualem virum Pharmacopolam esse conveniat, concerning the qualifications of an Apothecary (2). He had before published (3) in the German language, A Description of the Qualifications of a good Physician. (3) In the year He published likewise a description of the same kind in Latin, in the year 1580, which he dedicated

(1) Titus Livius, lib. ii, Dec. I, cap. x.

(2) Florus, lib. i, (and see lib. v, c. 15 in Moreri. Florus's History is only divided into four books) cap. x.

(3) Seneca, Epist. cxx, pag. m. 464.

(4) Val. Maxim. lib. iii, cap. ii, n. 1, pag. m. 241, 242.

(5) Dion. Halic. lib. v, cap. xxiii, xxiv.

(1) Epist. Philoloph. & Medicin. Jacobi Horstii, pag. 79.

(9) Plutarch. in Valerio, pag. 106.

(7) Id. ibid. pag. 105.

(8) Oδ' μὲν το αὐτὸς τῷ Ὀρᾷ τῷ καὶ τῷ ἡλίου τῷ Μυκίᾳ. Non per cras Horatii & manum Mutii. Dio, lib. xiv, pag. m. 325.

(9) See, above, remark [E] of the article FULVIA.

(10) Servius. in Æneid. lib. viii, ver. 646.

(11) Plut. de Fortuna Alex. Orat. II, pag. 331. B.

(12) Polyb. lib. vi, cap. liii.

(13) Dion. Halic. lib. v, cap. xxii.

(14) Plutarch. in Valerio, pag. 105.

(a) Jacobi Horstii, Epist. Philoloph. & Medicinal. pag. 41.

(b) Ibid. pag. 48.

(c) Ibid. pag. 77.

(d) Ib. pag. 199.

(e) It is to be found, pag. 530, & seq. of the book above quoted.

able to discover in what year he died; I only know that he was alive in the year 1595, and was then dean of the faculty of Physic at Helmstadt, and vice-rector of that university. I learn this from the Latin verses which were made upon his Anagram, and are to be found at the end of a book intitled, Jacobi Horstii Epistolæ Philosophicæ & Medicinales, printed at Leipsic in 8vo, in the year 1596. We must observe to his praise, a thing which will be thought very singular, though perhaps without reason; viz. that he joined devotion to the knowledge and practice of Physic. He always implored the blessing of God upon his remedies, and published a book of prayers for that occasion [B].

He

(4) It is among his Letters, Philosophicæ & Medicinæ pag. 209, & seq.

(5) Ib. pag. 189.

(6) Ib. pag. 203.

(7) Ib. pag. 257.

(8) Ib. pag. 354.

(9) Ib. pag. 435.

(10) Ib. pag. 523.

(11) Pag. 485, of the edit. 1686.

(12) Pag. 423, Edit. 1700.

(13) Stella prope Cassiopeam nec tunc ferabatur. Jac. Horstius, Epist. Philosophicæ & Medicinæ pag. 521.

(14) Id. ibid.

(15) Ibid. pag. 282.

(16) See Jacobi Horstii, Epist. Philosophicæ & Medicinæ pag. 283, & seq.

to the bishop of Olmutz (4). He put out a German translation of Lemnius's book De occultis naturæ Miraculis, concerning the hidden wonders of nature, in the year 1579, and added many things to it (5). In 1580 he published a book De morbo epidemio febris Catarrhalis per totam Europam grassante. Concerning an epidemic catarrh and fever raging over all Europe (6), and in 1583, a Treatise, in German, of Remedies for the Plague (7), in 1587 he published a book de Vite Vinifera (8), and in 1593, another De Noctambulibus, concerning those who walk during their sleep (9), and in 1595, a Dissertation concerning the Golden Tooth of a Child in Silesia (10). You will find in Lindenius renovatus (11) that his Disputationes Catholicæ de rebus secundum & præter naturam, General Dissertations concerning things Natural and Preternatural, were printed at Wittemberg in the year 1630, with the Compendium Medicarum Institutionum, of Gregory Horstius, and that the abridgement of his Herbarium, seu de selectis Plantis & Radicibus libri duo, by the same Gregory, was printed at Marburg in the year 1630.

Let us observe that he suffered himself to be grossly deceived concerning the pretended golden tooth. It was a meer imposture, if you desire to know how it was discovered, you need only read Van Dale de Oraculis, book I. Chap. ult. (12). He observes that our James Horstius discovered a great prodigy in this golden tooth, which, according to him, ought to give comfort to the Christians under the Turkish yoke, that is to say, that it was a happy presage of the fall of the Ottoman empire. I have seen a letter which this Physician wrote to David Chytræus, dated February 7, 1595, in which he treats of the presages of meteors. He says that the comet which appeared in the year 1556, and which was seen at Constantinople after it disappeared in Germany, might well produce its bad effects in the year 1596, and that then likewise the new star in Cassiopea, would be not idle (13), and that the golden tooth also would not fail to act its part. 'Dens Aureus, dens pueri Silesii molaris, quem ipse vidi, teigii & declarandum duxi, non prædicatione atque effectu carebit. O miseros nos, qui adeo stupidi & securi ad hæc sumus! Deus nostri & ecclesie sue misereatur. Nos pio studio preces, votique conjungamus (14). — The golden tooth, the cheek tooth of the Silesian boy, which I myself saw and felt, and thought deserved to be made public, will not be without prediction and accomplishment. Oh wretched we, who are so stupid and secure as to this matter! GOD have pity on us and his church! Let us piously unite our prayers and vows.' You see he doth not conclude without condemning the security of the world, and without putting up earnest prayers.

[B] He implored the blessing of GOD upon his remedies, and published a book of prayers for that occasion.] It was by this book that he signalized his admission to the place of professor of Physic in the university of Helmstadt. This was the first present he made to the university. 'Helmstadtium ubi venisset, publicè librum, dictum Precationes medicorum, promulgat, & in præfatione causas necessitatis hujus libri reddit (15). — When he came to Helmstadt, he published the book called the Prayers of Physicians, and gave the reasons, why he was obliged to publish it, in a preface.' I must observe to the honour of Physicians, that many of them thanked him for publishing these prayers, and acknowledged that their art had a very particular need of the divine assistance (16). See what the Physician of the city Ratisbon wrote to him. 'Mittis ad me libellum medicarum precationum nuper à te editum, unà cum tabula, in qua methodum inventionis, qua in conficiendo illo opusculo usus es, eruditè exponis. Quam tuam operam non possum non vehementer probare, ut qui reipsa quotidie experior, nulli hominum generi in hac vita imploratione divini auxilii magis opus esse, quam ipsis medicis; Qui etiam si omnia ex præscripto artis rectissime agunt, malevolorum tamen calumnias ingratisimo hoc seculo evitare nunquam possunt. Id ne fiat, utque actiones illorum Deus Opt. Max. fortunet, precibus à Deo impetrent, necesse est (17). — You send me the book of the Prayers of Physicians, which you lately published, together with a table, in which you learnedly explain the method you followed in writing that piece. Which work of yours I cannot but greatly approve, as I daily experience in fact, that no men in this life have more occasion to implore the divine assistance, than Physicians: who, though they do every thing according to the exactest rules of their art, cannot escape, in this most ungrateful age, the censure of the ill-natured. To prevent which, and to obtain a blessing from heaven on their endeavours, they must necessarily have recourse to prayers.' Among the letters which were wrote to him on this subject, there is one which tells him, that very few of the Physicians in Bohemia followed his advice of praying to GOD; but that many old women there made use of charms and incantations. 'Cum paucis, optime Horstii, habes hoc commune, ut non tantum sequaris Hippoc. & Galenum, qui gemino medicam crure ministrat opem: sed etiam sanctos Patres & Prophetas, qui supra ægrotos invocant nomen Domini vulnerantis & sanantis. Rara sunt hæc exempla in nostra Bohemia, utpote ubi plures sunt insanæ & incantatrices vetulæ: quæ miscuerunt herbas & non innoxia verba (18). — This, my best Horstius, you have in common with a few, that you not only follow Hippocrates and Galen, the great master of Medicine, but the holy fathers likewise and the prophets, who called over the sick on the name of the Lord, who both wound, and heal. These are uncommon examples in our Bohemia, where there are so many silly, quackish, old-women, who deal in potions and charms.' Matthew Dresserus, professor of Eloquence at Leipsic, praiseth him highly on account of his piety and of his prayers, and informs him that he knew a Physician, who never undertook any cure, nor gave any medicine without reciting the Lord's-Prayer. 'De precum medicarum formulis à te editis, quid sentiam aut scribam aliud, nisi videri mihi eas ad pietatem medico dignam, maximè esse compositas? Si enim Hymnus est Deo gratus, Medicina nostra & medicamenta Dei munus sunt: Num dubitare possumus, quin religiosè tota ars atque professio tractanda sit? noveram præclarum medicum, amicum meum intergerimum, qui nullam morbi curationem attingebat, aut suscipiebat, nullumque medicamentum ægroti propinabat, nisi prius recitata oratione Dominica, & piis votis adjunctis. Quod cum laude & prædicatione dignum semper judicarem, ne nunc quidem hoc quod in pietate ponis studium improbare possum. Sed opus dignum tua professione atque personæ judico (19). — As to the Formulary of Prayers for Physicians, published by you, I can only say, that they conduce greatly to that piety, which is worthy of a Physician. For if an hymn be acceptable to GOD, our medicines are the gift of GOD. Can we doubt, that the whole art and profession is to be carried on religiously? I knew an excellent Physician, my very sincere friend, who never undertook a cure, or administered Physic, without repeating the Lord's-Prayer, and adding pious wishes. Which as I always thought praise-worthy, I cannot now disprove your labours in the cause of piety, but think it a work worthy your profession and character.' Compare with this remark [C] of the KIRSTEINIUS, and read (20) the pious letter which James Horstius wrote to a minister of Berlin. He appears there to have resolved to set about a Christian Physic. Binis literis tuis, quibus me de medicina corporis sacro-sancta ex fragmentis Bibliorum sacrorum excolenda etiam atque etiam mones, ita sum affectus, ut ad ista perscicienda, quæ cupis, vim mihi illatam esse putem

(17) Ibid. pag. 284.

(18) Ibid. pag. 290.

(19) Ibid. pag. 292.

(20) Ibid. pag. 194, & seq.

(f) Ibid. pag. 77. He married his first wife in the year 1562, and she died in the year 1585 (f), after bearing him ten children (g). He married again in the year 1587 (h). He was brother to GREGORY HORSTIUS, who died May the 10th, 1592; and had been seven times Burgo-master of the town of Torgau, a man of great merit, as his elogy composed by Reineccius informs us (i). The book that I have quoted contains a thing which I think is worthy of being related [C].

(i) It is published in the beginning of Jacobi Horstii Epit. Philosoph. & Medicinalis.

* putem. — I am so affected by your two letters, in which you again and again put me in mind of cultivating the sacred medicine of the body, out of the fragments of the sacred books, that I find myself as it were compelled to do what you desire. I must likewise add, that the program by which he exhorted the students to celebrate devoutly the feast of St Michael, in honour of the angels (22), is a very devout piece.

(22) Ibid. pag. 493, & seq.

For the rest, I do not believe that there are any books of devotion, which have not had a better sale than these Prayers for the use of Physicians.

[C] His letters contain . . . a thing worthy to be related.] Jerom Nymnan, a minister and brother-in-law to Horstius (23), wrote a letter to him dated from Torgau, March 10, 1556, in which he desires him (24) to acquaint him whether a story which Sabinus had lately told at Wittemberg was true. It was that a gentleman of the March of Brandenburg, near Standel, had harshly rejected the request of a poor woman, who desired him in the name of God to abate something of the price of the corn, that she wanted to buy of him, and that the piece of money which she gave him, was changed into a serpent by an unknown person whom he met on the road, and that this serpent had wreathed itself about that gentleman's neck, and could not be removed from thence. Horstius, who was then at Francfort on the Oder, answered (25) to his brother-in-law, that he had heard nothing of all this, but that if he should hear any thing about it he would inform him. We have here an example of the caprices of common fame. Prodigies frequently make more noise in remote countries than in that where it is pretended that they happen. This is a character of falsehood; for things that are true, are more certainly known in the places where they have happened than any where else. People who have a mind to tell lies ought to take care not to lay the scene too near. They do not always observe this precaution, and yet they are believed, but still they run a greater hazard by doing so.

(23) Ibid. pag. 11.

(24) Ibid. pag. 53.

(25) Ibid. pag. 54.

HORSTIUS (GREGORY) nephew (a) to the former, acquired such a reputation by the practice of Physic that he is usually named the Æsculapius of Germany (b). He was born at Torgau in the year 1578, and received the degree of master of Philosophy at Wittemberg, in the year 1601 (c), and of doctor of Physic at Basil, in the year 1606, and in the same year was advanced to the post of professor of Physic in the university of Brandenburg. He resigned it a year after, and went to Soltwedel, in the territory of Brandenburg, to be Physician of that city. He made no long stay there, for he accepted of the place offered to him by the Landgrave of Hesse, of professor of Physic in the university of Gießen in the year 1608. He was appointed first Physician to that prince the year following, and being at last weary of a single life (d), he married in the year 1615. The reputation which he had acquired, made the magistrates of Ulm offer him the post of first Physician of their city: He accepted of it, and exercised it with great reputation from the year 1622 to 1636, which was the year in which he died. He left by his first wife four sons [A] and two daughters. She died in the month of November 1634; and he being by that means encumbered with domestic affairs, married a second time in the month of June 1635. He was exceedingly happy in this second marriage [B], but the gout, which he had more than once vigorously resisted before, having attacked him again, and that being attended by many dangerous symptoms, brought him to his end on the ninth of August 1636. He possessed in the highest degree, the three qualities

(a) He was son to George Horstius, counsellor in the town of Torgau.

(b) Konig. Bibl. pag. 413.

(c) Lindenius, Renovat. pag. 359.

(d) Solitaria vite pertuso sibi privato quoque invigilare curatio fuit. Joh. Daniel Dietterici in Oratione funebri Gr. Horstii, apud Witte Memor. Medicor. pag. 67, & seq.

[A] He left four sons by his first wife.] Three of them were Physicians, and the fourth an Apothecary (1). JOHN DANIEL HORSTIUS, the eldest, was born at Gießen and was professor of Physic in the university of Marburg, and afterwards in that of his own country; and Physician to the Landgrave of Hesse Darmstadt, and last of all to the city of Francfort. He was admitted into the academy of the Curious Inquirers into Nature, by the name of Phoenix. He published several books, and died January 27, 1685, aged sixty eight years (2). Here follow the titles of some of his works: Physica Hippocratea, Tachenii, Helmontii, Cartesii, Espagnet, Boylei, aliorumque recentiorum Commentis illustrata, Francfort 1682, in 8vo. Decas Observationum & Epistolarum Anatomicarum, quibus singularia scitu digna, lactearum nempe thoracicarum, & vasorum lymphaticorum natura, embryonisque per os nutritio, atque alia rariora exponuntur, Francfort 1646 in 4to. Pharmacopœia Galeno-Chemica Catholica, Francfort 1651, in Folio. He procured a new edition corrected and augmented of Pauli Zacchiæ Quæstiones Medico-Legales, at Francfort 1666, in Folio, and of Lazarri Riverii Opera Medica Universa, in the same city in 1674 in Folio (3). GREGORY HORSTIUS, the youngest of these brothers, was born at Ulm, September 20, 1626. He received the degree of Doctor of Physic at Padua, Fortunius Licetus being Præses May 11, 1650. He was admitted a member of the college of Physicians at Ulm, and declared public professor of Physic in the year 1653. He died the thirty first of May 1661, and left

(1) Paul. Freher. in Theatro, pag. 1566.

(2) Witte, in Diario Biographico, ad ann. 1685.

(3) Taken from Lindenius renovatus, pag. 564, 565.

children (4). He is author of a Treatise de Mania and promised Historiam Zibethi (5).

[B] Being encumbered with domestic affairs, he married a second time . . . He was exceedingly happy in this second marriage.] He had been no less so in the first, if we believe the author of his Funeral Oration, 'Huic optimi consorti suæ, dum fata Deique spectant, ex veteri formula, felicissime convixit, & optime cohabitavit. Quid autem hic Archiater noster gloriosus, concessit ne illorum in numerum, qui blandâ venere detenti, omnem Musis remittunt nuntium? Nullatenus, sed potius domesticis, privatique omnibus scitè adornatis, famæ suæ gloriam & calamo, & ore, & praxi expandere, & diffundere fategit (6). — With this his excellent consort he lived in the sweetest society imaginable, while heaven spared her with him. But did this famous Physician imitate those who being slaves to the blandishments of Venus, quite neglect the Muses? quite the contrary, for having wisely settled his private and domestic affairs, he spared no pains to increase his fame, both by his writings, discourses, and practice.' The latter part of this passage acquaints us, that Horstius did not do as a great many who abandon themselves so entirely to the nuptial pleasures, that they quite neglect the Muses. As to the happiness of his second marriage, the same author gives us the following account of it. 'Is . . . postquam secunda, quæ vocant, expleisset vota, . . . jamque conjugalem lineam ex animi sententiâ duceret, amantissimè ab amantissimâ ma marita habitus, domique ac foris felix, optatâ

(4) Paul. Freher. in Theatro, pag. 1389.

(5) Witte, in Diario Biographico, ad ann. 1661.

(6) Joh. Daniel Dietterici, apud Witte, Memor. Medicor. fol. 4.

qualities of a good Physician, probity, learning, and good fortune (e) [C], as we see

(e) Taken from his Funeral Oration spoke by John Daniel Dietericus apud Witte Memor. Medicor. pag. 67, &c.

(7) Id. ibid. pag. 67, 68. εὐποροῦντα gauderet: ecce! malo arthritico, quod multo ante non semel fortiter sustinendo repulerat, invaditur (7). — After his second marriage in which he enjoyed all the charms of reciprocal love, being happy both at home and abroad, while he rejoiced in his wife's happiness, he was seized with a violent fit of the gout, which he had frequently before

(8) Id. ibid. pag. 5, before the end. I cite it in this manner, because the most part of the Funeral Oration are not numbered. quod, relates to both his marriages (8). 'Quando autem factum ut Anno 1634: suavisimam hanc ipsius tori sociam maligna febris deartuaret, in hoc infelix fuit, quod sævam illam declinare nesciens, mense Novembri miseram viduitatem colere fuerit coactus: quâ in cum sex Liberos Pater & occupatissimo functionis muneri & molestissimæ rei familiaris curæ vix non succumberet, divinâ adlucente gratiâ, ad vota secunda accedens, Præclarissimi Medici Fingerlini p. m. relicta viduæ (9), matrimonialem addixit fidem hoc ipso iterum titulo felicitatis privatæ redonatus, quod hæc castissimis illius amoribus mirâ morum amabilitate respondebat: ita ut charitate Conjugum, sedulitate Ministram præstaret. — His beloved wife was seized with a malignant fever in the year 1634, he was so unfortunate as not to be able to cure it, and in the month of November was obliged to submit to a melancholy widowhood: being left with six children, and ready to sink under the weight of the laborious duties of his profession, joined to a load of domestic cares, he being guided by the divine favour made choice of the widow of the famous Physician Fingerlinus for his second wife. By whom he was again restored to all manner of domestic happiness, she answering his love with a wonderful sweetness of manners, so that he found in her the affection of a wife and the assiduity of a servant.'

(9) This author had observed, that Horstius had married a maid in his first marriage. Interca, says he, pag. 69, & maritalium conditionem excoluit. HEDWIGEM STAMMIAM, Virginem lectissimam consecratione sibi sacrosanctâ copulat.

[C] He possessed in the highest degree the three qualities of a good physician, probity, learning, and good fortune.] I shall pass over what relates to the first, and I shall only observe that, with regard to the third, the panegyrist observes, that the good success of Horstius's prescriptions, did not proceed from chance, but from the attention with which he considered the nature of distempers, &c. He, by the by, gives severe strokes to those quacks, who boast of the vast numbers of cures which they have performed, and by their impudence wheedle people out of a great deal of money. He applies to them what a poet said of a man who was both Chirurgion and Physician, I do not doubt it, said the poet, for you kill abundance of people both by steel and poison. 'Ea est Empiricorum, Thalmudicorum, & Bullatorum Medicorum indoles & natura, ut mucosam suam praxin pro admiranda felicitate venditantes, sèpissime animos Magnatum & Divitum (utpote hoc censu facile se defraudari patientium) à verò Medicorum vultu & cultu abalienent, egregiam spem, & vere prodigiosæ suæ curæ (quippe illâ ipsâ excidium denunciant) expectationem concitando: quâ supersticiosa, splendidiq; strophis suffulta infelicissimâ felicitate Microcosmum argento simul, & sanguine emungere sceleratissime norunt: quibus Plagiarii interim illud Poëtæ apprimè adaptari convenit.

Es Medicus, simul Chirurgus,
Cur? mittis stygiam, viros ad Orcum,
Et manu simul, & simul veneno:

'Nequaquam autem hujusmodi felicitatis excessum in Desunio nostro, velut absoluto Practici Exemplo, quæremus: quin Potius fortunam illius in Praxi integram & illibatam, cumulatissimo rationis & experientie instructu partem demirabimur, &c (10).'

(10) Dieterici Oratio funeb. Gr. Horstii, apud Witte, Memor. Medicor. page which follows the leaf (e) 5.

(11) Joubert, Erreurs Populaires, livr. i. chap. vii. pag. m. 33. 34.

Since this occasion offers, I shall observe, that some people are of opinion, that the success of a Physician, doth not at all depend upon his skill in his profession. This is the opinion of Joubert. 'If a person recovers,' says he (11), we are ready to commend the skill of his Physician: tho' he has done nothing to contribute to it. And on the contrary a Physician is accounted ignorant, if his patient dies or languishes a long time in those distempers, which are thought the most slight by the vulgar. Modest people will not say that he is more or less skillful, if he has the character of a learned man, among men of learning: but they will say that he is not happy in his practice, and consequently is not a good Physician, always judging by the success. It is certainly true, that in every thing there is a good and a bad fortune, and (as the Italians say) la buona e la mala sorte. And the good fortune of a Physician consists in his not being called to those who are to die. For there he will acquire neither reputation, honour, nor friendship, notwithstanding the Physician ought not in this case to be blamed, if he has done his duty; nor ought he to be less esteemed than if the patient had recovered. . . . It is indeed a great happiness to be fortunate in our affairs, but good fortune doth not depend upon knowledge, or abilities: it is a special gift of God to be called to the assistance of those who are to recover: with regard to whom he is pleased to make effectual, and continue the virtues bestowed on medicines: and likewise not to be called to those who are to die, whom nothing can avail or profit. It is therefore quite wrong to judge of the abilities of Physicians by their success, which is more owing to good fortune, and the grace of God, than to the skill of man (12). A Flemish Physician who has translated into Latin, and commented upon the first book of Joubert, concerning Vulgar Errors, has not adopted this opinion; he has maintained that the good fortune of Physicians flows only from their skill, and their bad fortune from their ignorance. He cites on this occasion a passage of Crato, a famous Physician. Huic equidem Jouberti sententiæ non subscribam: quin potius ad Cratonis, &c (13). He also quotes a passage of Paracelsus, affirming the same thing. In my opinion he carries the matter too far, I believe there are Physicians who sometimes kill or cure their patients, without deserving either praise or blame on that account. However skillful they may be, they do not always know the true cause of distempers, and they prescribe a medicine, according to the rules of their art, which proves very pernicious, because there is something in the constitution of the patient which they cannot discover. The particular dispositions of the machine, the imagination of the patient affected in a particular manner, the secret passions may produce effects, which the skill and most consummate experience of Physicians could never have expected. The efficacy of these unknown causes, will occasion a medicine given rashly, ignorantly, and foolishly, to drive away a distemper: and another medicine given according to the rules of Physic to kill the patient. There is therefore good and bad fortune here, independent on skill or ignorance, and one cannot be said to be ignorant because he doth not know the secret passions of the heart, or the odd properties of a particular constitution, and because he could not foresee the obstacles they would make to the virtue of the medicine. A Physician is not thought to fail through ignorance, except he be ignorant of what he might have learned from study and practice. The question is, if there be Physicians, who, by a prerogative attached to their person, fall by chance, and frequently, upon the remedy which cures, and if there are others who, by a personal destiny, do quite the contrary: or the question is this, are there some Physicians, who are called precisely when it is predestinated, that the sick person shall recover? and are there others who are called precisely, when it is predestinated that he shall die? It would seem that Joubert has pretended this, and called it a particular favour of heaven, or a privation of that divine favour. Crato laughs at this conceit. This dispute is the same with that which I have treated at large in another place (14), whether there is a good or bad fortune attached to certain persons, or if good and bad fortune is always the consequence the one of prudence and the other of imprudence? The ancients did not pretend this; for when they enumerated the qualifications of a great general, they gave his fortune a particular rank, distinct from his skill in the art of war. 'Ego sic existimo, said Cicero, in summo Imperatore quatuor has res interesse oportere, scientiam rei Militaris, virtutem, auctoritatem, felicitatem (15). — I think a great general should be possessed of these four qualities, skill in the art of war, valour, authority, and good fortune.' He afterward shows, that Pompey possessed these four qualities in an eminent degree, and owns that the (12) Joannes Bourgesius, in Scholii ad cap. vii. Jouberti de Erroribus Vulgi, pag. 105, 106.

(14) See remark [K] of the article TIMOLEON.

(15) Cicero, pro Lege Manliæ, cap. x. pag. m. 33, Tom. III.

at large in his funeral oration. He published several books [D] which were very much esteemed. Two of his sons were likewise authors.

last of them depends on God, and not upon man. Reliquum est ut de felicitate quam præstare DE SE 1750 nemo potest, meminisse, & commemorare de altero possumus: sicut æquum est homini de potestate deorum, timide & pauca dicamus. Ego enim sic existimo: Maximo, Marcello, Scipioni, Mario, & ceteris magnis imperatoribus, non solum propter virtutem, sed etiam propter fortunam, sæpius imperia mandata atque exercitus esse commissos. Fuit enim profecto quibusdam summis viris quædam ad amplitudinem, & gloriam, & ad res magnas bene gerendas divinitus adjuncta fortuna (16). — It remains that we should with caution and brevity, as becomes men when they speak of the power of the gods, say something concerning good fortune, which though no man can secure to himself, yet we can remember and relate it of others. For I am of opinion, that Maximus, Marcellus, Scipio, Marius, and the other great generals, were frequently entrusted with the biggest dignities, and the command of armies; not only on account of their valour, and other great qualities, but likewise on account of their good fortune. For certainly some great men have been blessed by the gods with good fortune, to guide them to grandeur, glory, and the performance of heroic actions.

(16) Cicero pro lege Manilia, cap. XVI, pag. 53, Tom. III.

[D] He published several books. I believe the first was his Institutiones Logicae, which he published while he gave private lectures of Philosophy in his chamber at Wittenberg, about the year 1601 (17). He printed in the same city, in the year 1607, his treatise de Natura Humana, On human nature (18). His Dissertatio de natura Amoris additis Resolutionibus de cura Furoris amatorii, de Philtiris, atque de pulsu Amantium, at Gießen in 4to, in the year 1611. He published there in 1615, his book de seunda Sanitate Studiosorum & Literatorum, in 4to, and in 1619 his treatise de causis similitudinis & dissimilitudinis, in sætu, respectu parentum &c. cui annexa est Resolutio Quæstionis de diverso partu temporis, imprimique quid de septimestri & octimestri partu sentiendum in 4to. I refer you to Lindenius renovatus (19), where we find the titles and editions of all the works of this Physician particularly set down; and I shall only observe, that after his death they were published in one volume in folio at Nuremberg, in the year 1660, and in three volumes in 4to, at Torgau, in the year 1661.

(17) Dieterici Oratio, &c. obl. supra, folio (4) 2.

(18) Id. ibid. folio (4) 3.

(19) Pag. 359 & seq.

HORTENSIA, sister of the orator Hortensius. Thus it is a modern author names her (a); but as he himself acknowledges in another place (b), the name which Plutarch gives Hortensius's sister is Valeria. Turn therefore to VALERIA, for there is no reason to give Hortensius two sisters of different names.

(a) Glandorpius, Onom. pag. 406.

(b) Idem. pag. 865.

HORTENSIA, daughter of the orator Hortensius, shewed herself worthy of such a father, by her eloquence, when she pleaded the cause of the Roman ladies before the Triumviri, who had decreed that fourteen hundred of them should declare what estates they possessed, intending after that to tax them according to their fancy for the expences of the war. Those Triumviri were Mark Antony, Octavius, and Lepidus. They had at first signified that those who should not give in a true valuation of their estates, should be fined; and that a reward should be given to those who should discover their deceit. The ladies had recourse to the intercession of those amongst them, who might have interest with the Triumviri, and were civilly received by the sister of Octavius, and the mother of Marc Antony; but Fulvia, Marc Antony's wife, shut the door against them; inasmuch that they resolved to present themselves before the Triumviri. Hortensia was their speaker, and made a most excellent speech. Quintilian has mentioned it with praise (a). The Triumviri were so unkind as to censure the boldness which the ladies had expressed, and they commanded their officers to turn them out [A]. That order made all the company murmur, which hindered the officers from executing it. Whereupon the Triumviri put off the business to the next day. The issue was, that only four hundred women were obliged to give an account of their estates (b). By this we may form a better judgment of that event than by Moreri's account of it, or even by Valerius Maximus's words, which will be seen below [B].

(a) Quinti Hortensii filie oratio apud Triumviros habita læptor n. n. tantum in locus honorum Quintil. Instit. lib. 1, cap. 1.

(b) Ex Appiano, lib. 14. Bell. Civil.

(17) In Biblioth. Rom. Cent. II, n. 88.

[A] The Triumviri commanded their officers to turn them out. Instead of this, James Philip de Bergamo, whom Prosper Mandosius (1) follows, says that Hortensia's eloquence was so admired by the auditory, that they thought they had heard her father, and that she obtained of the Triumviri whatever the ladies desired, besides great praises. He has committed two other faults; 1. That Hortensia writ many things. 2. That the Roman ladies were taxed, because the public necessities required it. It was rather from the tyrannical avarice of the Triumviri. How many faults does the desire of praising people, occasion!

[B] Moreri's account . . . or even by the words of Valerius Maximus. He says, that the senate had laid a severe tax upon the women of Rome . . . and that Hortensia alone undertook the cause of her sex. I. The Triumviri and not the senate laid this severe tax, as he calls it. II. They did not lay it on all the women of Rome, but only on the rich: it was a tax on those that could well bear it. III. Hortensia was indeed the only speaker, but not the only actor or intercessor for her sex; for all that were concerned, went in a body to solicit the mothers, sisters, and wives, of the Triumviri; and afterwards they came to an audience; where, as in all sorts of deputations, one spoke for the rest. I say nothing of Moreri's omissions, nor of his wrong citation of Appian of Alexandria, which has been transferred into the Dutch edition with a little change, that may deceive the reader. That fault proceeds from the press: Moreri doubtless writ, li. 4. belli civil. Instead of which the Printers of Lyons put in li. 4. b. li. civil. and those of Holland li. 4. b. li. civil. Such a small mistake has been sufficient upon many occasions, to make people believe that an author had wrote books which he never thought of. Who would not believe, seeing Ovid quoted in eleg. at the end of the article HORTENSIVS the orator, both in the Dutch and the preceding editions, that Ovid wrote a poem intitled Elegies? Every body doth not find out that instead of in eleg. it should be in eleg. a citation somewhat too general, by Vossius's leave who has used it (2), but yet true at the bottom. There are many other wrong citations in this article of Moreri's Dictionary; Pliny is there cited twice the first time falsely. The fifth chapter of the third book of Varro de re rustica, and the thirteenth of the third book of Macrobius's Saturnalia, are quoted wrong, and shew that Moreri did not verify whether Vossius's Printers had put one figure for another.

Here are the words of Valerius Maximus which I have promised. 'Hortensia Q. Hortensii filia cum ordo Matronarum gravi tributo à Triumviris esset oneratus, nec quisquam virorum patrocinium eis accommodare auderet, causam fœminarum apud Triumvires constanter & feliciter egit. Repræsentata enim patris facundia impetravit ut major pars imparate pecunie

(1) De Hist. Lat. pag. 48, de Poët. Lat. pag. 15.

(2) De Hist. Lat. pag. 15.

(3) Val. Maxim.
lib. viii, cap. iii.
Moreri quotes
lib. iii. Hofmann,
lib. ii.

‘curia his remitteretur (3). — The Triumviri ‘having loaded the Roman ladies with a grievous tax,
‘and no man daring to appear in their favour, Horten- ‘sia, daughter to Q. Hortensius, pleaded their cause

‘before the Triumviri with great constancy and success,
‘For being mistress of all her father's eloquence, she ‘obtained a remission of the greatest part of it.’

HORTENSIUS, the name of a Plebeian family of Rome, taken probably from their application to gardening, as that of Fabius and Lentulus, &c. came from a like original. Antonius Augustinus had no reason to rank this family among the Patrician [A], since we find in the Fasti one LUCIUS HORTENSIUS, tribune of the people in the year of Rome 331. He accused Sempronius Atratinus, the consul of the foregoing year, of having rashly attack'd the Volsci: But his four colleagues who were present at the battle, so earnestly desired him to drop the accusation, that after having done all that was possible on his side to persuade them to allow him to proceed in it, at last, when he saw them resolved to quit the ensigns of their dignity all the time that the trial should last, he complied with their desire. He would not suffer the people to see their tribunes in such a condition, nor push a consul to the last extremity, who had at least gained the love of his soldiers (a). Above a hundred years after, we find one QUINTUS HORTENSIUS, Dictator [B]. He brought back the people, who had retired to the Janiculum, and made a law, that thenceforth all the Romans should be obliged to obey the ordinances of the people [C]. He died in his office (b) which had never happened before (c). Moreri is strangely mistaken concerning this Dictator [D]. Of all the Hortensius's, he that made himself the most famous, was the orator, who is the subject of the following article.

(a) Non videbit
plebs Romana fordidatos Tribunos suos. C.
Sempronium ni-
hil moror quando hoc est in imperio consecutus ut tam citus esset militibus.
Livius, lib. iv,
Dec. 1, cap. xlii.
See also Valer.
Maxim. lib. vi,
cap. v.

(b) Livius, in Epit. lib. xi.

(c) August. de
Civ. Dei, lib.
iii, cap. xvii.

[A] Antonius Augustinus had no reason to rank this family among the patrician. The tract of Antonius Augustinus de Romanorum gentibus & familiis, which I make use of, was printed at Lyons in 1592, in 4to. We there find word for word upon the Familia Hortensia, what Richard Streinius said of it in a book he published upon the same subject in 1559. They both go upon a very false foundation, in placing this family among the Patrician; namely, that Cicero gives the title of nobilis to Hortensius, in his orations against Verres. Who knows not that nobilis and plebeius were not inconsistent words in antient Rome?

[B] Above a hundred years after . . . Q. HORTENSIUS, the dictator. It is hard to fix the precise year of our Quintus Hortensius's dictatorship. I believe Sigonius was right in placing it in the year 467. Father Hardouin (1) doubtless approved that opinion; but his Printers by omitting a letter, make him say, that the sedition of the people, which was suppressed by the dictator Hortensius, happened in the year CCCCLXVII. St Austin will have it, that Hortensius was created dictator by reason of the retiring of the people to the Janiculum, which is very probable. Post graves & longas Rom. seditiones quibus ad ultimum plebs in Janiculum hostili diremptione secesserat, cuius mali tam dira calamitas erat, ut ejus rei causa quod in extremis periculis fieri solebat, & Dictator crearetur Hortensius, qui plebe revocata in eodem Magistratu expiravit, quod nulli Dictatori ante contigerat (2). — After grievous and long dissensions in Rome, the commons at last retired in a hostile manner to the Janiculum, which produced such dreadful calamities, that on this account, as was usual in the most extremest dangers, they chose Hortensius dictator, who, having appeased the people, died in that office, which had never happened to any dictator before him.

(1) In Plin. lib.
xvi, cap. x, pag.
239. Tom. III.

(2) Augustin de
Civ. Dei, lib.
iii, cap. xvii.

[C] . . . and made a law, that thenceforth all the Romans should obey the ordinances of the people. An author cited by Aulus Gellius teaches us, that the ordinances made by the report or at the request of the tribunes of the people, were not properly called laws, but plebiscita, and that before Hortensius's dictatorship, the patricians were not subject to ordinances of this sort. Ne leges quidem proprie sed plebiscita appellantur quæ Tribunis plebis ferentibus accepta sunt, quibus rogationibus ante Patricii non tenebantur, donec Q. Hortensius Dictator eam legem tulit ut eo jure quod plebs statuisset, omnes Quirites tenerentur (3). Livy tells us the quite contrary; for he says, that Lucius Valerius, and Marcus Horatius, who were made consuls in the year of Rome 305, began to shew their complaisance to the people by making a law, which left it no longer in doubt, whether the laws established

(3) Lælius Felix,
apud A. Gell.
lib. xv, cap.
xxvii.

by the people obliged the senate. That law decided this matter in favour of the people. ‘Omnium primum cum velati in controversio jure esset tenerentur Patres Plebiscitis, legem centuriatis comitiis tulerunt, ut quod tributum plebes jussisset populum teneret, qua lege Tribunitius rogationibus telum acerrimum datum est (4). — First of all, it having been controverted, whether the senators were bound by the ordinances of the commons, they made a law in the Comitiis Centuriatis, that whatever the commons decreed in their tribes should bind the whole Roman people, by which law a dreadful force was given to the rogations of the tribunes.’ They had just destroyed the power of the Decemviri, and recalled the mutinous populace that had withdrawn to mount Aventinus. The new consuls omitted nothing to make themselves popular. The consul Quintus Capitolinus acknowledged the force of this new law three years after; when representing to the people the advantages that the senate had yielded to them, he brings into the account Scita plebis injuncta patribus (5). This law was renewed in the 415th year of Rome; the dictator Publius Philo having ordained that the plebiscita should oblige all the Romans (6). The author alledged by Aulus Gellius was not therefore well informed. If he had said that the senators had found the art of evading this decision, so that it was necessary to renew it authentically in Quintus Hortensius's dictatorship, he would be above our criticisms: but this he has not done. Pliny (7) speaks of what was enacted by this dictator to the peoples advantage, without saying, whether there was any such law before or not. Sigonius did not know what was done under the consuls Valerius and Horatius; for he says (8), that the law of Hortensius had been already made by the dictator ann. 467. Publius Philo in the year of Rome 414.

(4) Liv. lib. iii,
Dec. 1, cap. iv.

(5) Id. cap. lxviii.

(6) Ut plebiscita
omnes Quirites tenerent. Livius, Dec. 1, lib. viii,
cap. xii.

(7) Lib. xvi,
cap. x.

(8) In Fast. ad
ann. 467.

[D] Moreri is strangely mistaken concerning this dictator. Two gross blunders in a few words: one in saying, that he was a famous civilian and law-maker; the other in saying, that the orator Hortensius was his grandson. Did ever any one call the magistrates of the Roman common-wealth legislators, because they procured the enacting some laws? In that case the number of the Roman legislators would be very great. Neither are they the persons called Jurisconsulti. But it is very probable, that Moreri had no other knowledge of Q. Hortensius the dictator, but his passing a law which subjected the senate to the plebiscita. Besides, since Moreri observes that the dictatorship of this Hortensius fell in the year of Rome 468, how could he take him for the grandfather of the orator Hortensius, a military tribune, according to him, in the year of Rome 664? What want of attention! What negligence is this!

HORTENSIUS (QUINTUS) cotemporary with Cicero, and almost as great an orator as he, was born in the 639th year of Rome (a). He pleaded his first cause at nineteen years of age, and succeeded so well in it, that he had not only the approbation of the auditory, but also that of the two consuls, who were best judges of that age [A]. This was the cause which he pleaded for Africa before the senate under those two consuls. Some time after he pleaded for the king of Bythynia, and had still better success. The Social war arising in the 663d year of Rome, the proceedings of justice were so interrupted in the city, that Hortensius betook himself to arms (b). In the second campaign he was made a military tribune; but I believe that he stopped there, and that those who pretend that he was lieutenant-general under Sylla, in the war with Mithridates, take him for another [B]. He went successively through all the honours of the republic; he was questor, ædile, prætor, and then consul with Q. Cecilius Metellus, in the year of Rome 684. The lot fell upon him to go into Crete, to reduce the inhabitants of that island; but as he triumphed at Rome by his eloquence (c), he chose rather to shine at the bar, than in the field. He therefore yielded up that post to his colleague, who gained thereby the honour of a triumph, and the surname of Creticus. Hortensius had the happiest memory in the world [C]. He used many gesticulations in pleading [D], which drew upon him a very blunt raillery before the judges; for L. Torquatus called him Dionysia, who was a famous dancer. You may see in Aulus Gellius, what Hortensius answered him. It cannot be denied that he had a great deal of affectation in his manner; or at least, that he was excessively nice in his cloaths [E]. He carefully consulted his glass as he dressed himself, and

(a) See the remark [B].

(b) Cicero in Bruto.

(c) Xiphilins. ex Dion. lib. xxxv. init.

[A] He had the approbation of the two consuls, who were the best judges of that age. These were Lucius Crassus and Quintus Scævola, the first whereof was one of the greatest orators, and the latter one of the greatest lawyers that had ever appeared in Rome (1). This consulship fell in the year 658: so that Hortensius being then but nineteen years old, it is a necessary consequence that he was born in the year 639: which we may likewise gather from Cicero's being eight years younger than he (2). Cicero, I say, who was born in the year 647. Here is the proof of what I have said concerning the first cause which Hortensius pleaded (3). * Q. Hortensii admodum adolescentis ingenium, ut Phidias signum, simul aspectum & probatum est. Is L. Crasso, Q. Scævola Coss. primum in foro dixit, & apud hos ipsos quidem Consules, & cum eorum qui assuerunt, tum ipsorum Consulium qui omnes intelligentia antebant, iudicio discessit probatus: undeviginti annos natus erat eo tempore. — Hortensius's genius, while he was very young, like Phidias's statue, was no sooner seen than admired. He first appeared at the bar in the consulship of L. Crassus and Q. Scævola, and pleaded before the consuls with the approbation, not only of all present, but of the consuls themselves, who were the best judges of that age; he was at that time eighteen years old. Cicero (4) makes this L. Crassus speak thus: Ego esse jam iudico (omnibus istis laudibus quas oratione complexus sum, excellentem Hortensium) & tum iudicavi cum me Consule in Senatu causam defendit Africæ, nuperque etiam magis cum pro Bythyniæ rege dixit. — I now think that Hortensius deserves all the praises I have bestowed upon him) and I was of the same opinion, when, during my consulship, he defended the cause of Africa in the senate, and still more when he lately defended the king of Bythynia.

[B] They who pretend that he was lieutenant-general under Sylla in the war against Mithridates, take him for another. What makes me believe that our orator is not the Hortensius, who had that post in Sylla's armies, is on one hand Cicero's silence, and on the other the character which Plutarch gives to that lieutenant-general. Plutarch represents him as a man who perfectly understood the art of war, and who never yielded (5); and relates some actions of him, which favour of an old experienced officer, and which concern the 667th year of Rome. Where should the orator Hortensius have got that experience; he who began to bear arms but in the year 663? And if he had acquired it, and signalized himself under Sylla, how comes it that it was not mentioned in those passages where his praises are enlarged upon, and where it is observed that he was military tribune in his second campaign? Judicia intermissa bello. . . . Erat Hortensius in bello primo anno miles, altero Tribunus militum (6). Doubtless Glandorpius (7) was mistaken in taking him for Sylla's lieutenant-general. But what need is there to take advantage of Cicero's silence? What he says, is much more favourable to me. Do not the three years in which Hortensius was the chief man at the bar, by reason of the death or absence the most famous orators (8), coincide with the time that Sylla had the other Hortensius in his army?

[C] He had the happiest memory in the world. He pronounced his pleadings just as he had meditated them, without writing one word, and forgot nothing that was said by his adversaries. * Primum memoria tanta quantam in viro cognovisse me arbitror, ut quæ secum commentatus esset, ea sine scripto verbis illidem redderet quibus cogitavisset. Hoc adjumento illo tanto sic utebatur, ut sua & commentata & scripta, & nullo referente omnia adversariorum dicta meminisset (9). What Seneca says of him, is much more remarkable. Upon a challenge that was given Hortensius, he staid a whole day at a public auction, and repeated in order what had been sold, to whom, and at what price. His recital was compared with the clerk's account, and his memory was found to have served him faithfully in every particular. * Hortensius à Sisenna provocatus in auctione perdidit diem totum, & omnes res, & pretia, & emptores ordine suo argentiis recognoscens, ita ut in nullo falleretur, recensuit (10).

[D] He used many gesticulations in pleading. The his gestures were fine enough to make the two best actors of that time ambitious of imitating them on the stage (11); it is certain they exceeded the just bounds of the art of oratory. * Vox canora & suavis, lays Cicero in his Brutus, motus & gestus etiam plus artis habebat quam erat Oratori satis. Moreri doth not give an exact account of the jest of Torquatus: * He used for many motions in declaiming, that they gave him the name of Grasshopper, Dionysia Saltatricula. Who would not believe from these words, that Hortensius had this nick-name given him all over the city? And yet there was but one man, who upon one single occasion, gave him not the name of Grasshopper, but of Dionysia, a woman who was a celebrated dancer. The word Saltatricula is very ill rendered Grasshopper. Here is the passage of Aulus Gellius, in the fifth chapter of the first book: * Cum L. Torquatus, subagressi homo ingenio & infelivo, gravior ac cerbuiusque apud consilium iudicum, cum de causa Sullæ quæreretur, non jam histrionem cum esse diceret, sed gesticulariam Dionysiamque cum notissimam Saltatriculam nomine appellaret; tum voce molli atque demissa Hortensius, Dionysia, inquit, Dionysia malo equidem esse quam quod tu Torquate, luxu, ἀγροδίαστῶν, καὶ ἀπὸ πύργου. — Lucius Torquatus, a rude and unpolite man, having said in a very bitter and severe manner before the judges, in the cause of Sylla, that Hortensius did not now as formerly behave like a player, but like the dancer Dionysia, Hortensius replied in a soft and low voice, I would rather be Dionysia, than be void of all taste, elegance, or humanity, as you are.

[E] He was excessively nice in his cloaths. This passage of Aulus Gellius, that I am going to quote, and which goes before the words you have just now read, will serve both to prove Hortensius's gesticulations,

(8) Triennium sine armis, sed oratorum aut interitu aut discessu, aut fuga — Præmissa in causis agebat Hortensius, magisque quotidie probabatur. Cicero in Bruto.

(9) Cicero in Bruto. See also Tacul. 1, & Academ. 2. init.

(10) Senec. Præf. lib. 1, Controv.

(11) Nescires utrum cupidius ad audiendum eum, an ad spectandum concurreretur, sic verbis oratoris aspectus, & rursus aspectus verba serviebant. Itaque confat Aelopus & Roscius Iodieræ artis peritissimos viros illo causas agente in corona frequenter assistisse, ut foro petitos gestus in scenam referrent. Val. Maxim. lib. viii, cap. 2.

(1) Eloquentium jurisperitissimus Crassus, jurisperitum eloquentissimus Scævola pararetur. Cicero in Bruto, cap. xxxix.

(2) Me adolescentem (Hortensius) nactus octo annis minorem quam erat ipse. Id. in Bruto.

(3) Id. ibid. cap. lxxv.

(4) De Orat. lib. iii, sub fin.

(5) Στράτηνος ἄνδρα καὶ φιλόστρατον. Vir bellicæ peritus & pervicax. Plat. in Sylla, pag. 461.

(6) Cicero in Bruto.

(7) Onomast. pag. 404.

(d) Macrob. Saturn. lib. ii, cap. ix. Moreri, after Vellius, quotes lib. iii, cap. xiii, but the third book contains only twelve chapters.

(e) Dion, lib. xxxix.

(f) Varro de re Rustica, lib. iii, cap. vi. Plin. lib. x, cap. xx. Ælian. lib. v, Hist. Anim. cap. xxi. Tertull. de Pallio, sub fin.

(g) Varro, de re Rustica, lib. iii, cap. xlii, & xliii.

it is said that he commenced a suit against his colleague, who passing through a narrow place, had ruffled the symmetry of his gown (d). He had heaped up great riches, and used them plentifully to live an easy life in the city and in the country. He had several country-houses [F]; and as he was very sumptuous, he opposed the sumptuary laws (e), which the consuls had a mind to enact in the 699th year of Rome. He praised them so cunningly for their magnificence in their houses, that they durst not insist upon a thing which did not agree with their own conduct. He was the first that eat peacocks (f), it was to furnish a dish in an entertainment he gave to the college of the Augurs. He was very curious and magnificent in parks and fish-ponds (g), and was as careful of the health of his fish [G], as of that of his servants. He must needs have been a great lover of plane-trees, since he watered them with wine; which he made so little a secret of, that he one day desired Cicero to change with him his hour of pleading; for, said he, I must go and pour some wine upon a plane-tree I have at one of my country-houses (h). Whoever knows the heart of man never so little, will much more wonder that those two great orators should have given one another many marks of affection upon several occasions [H], than that they should not always have been perfectly good friends; for after all, Cicero was the cause that Hortensius did not preserve the glory which he had long enjoy'd of being the first orator in Rome; and Hortensius was the cause of Cicero's having a dangerous rival, who came close to his heels. Hortensius published not only some orations, and some tions, and his great niceness in his cloaths. 'Hortensius omnibus ferme Oratoribus ætatis suæ nisi M. Tullio clarior, quod multa munditia & circumspèctè compositione indutus & amictus esset, manusque ejus inter agendum forent argute admodum & gestuolæ, maledictis compellationibusque probrosis jactatus est, multaque in eum quasi in histrionem in ipsi causis atque judiciis dicta sunt. — Hortensius who next to Cicero was the most celebrated orator of his age, being very nice and curious in his dress, and in pleading, making use of a great deal of action, was much ridiculed and abused, and was frequently even at the bar twitted with being a comedian rather than an orator.' As for the suit he entered for disordering the folds of his gown, here is a proof or a testimony for it. 'Hortensius vir alioquin ex professo mollis & in præcinctu ponens omnem decorem; fuit enim vestitus ad munditiem curioſo, & ut bene amictus iret, faciem in speculo ponebat; ubi se intuens togam corpori sic applicabat, ut rugas non forte sed industria locatas artificis nodos confringeret, & sinus ex composito deflueret nodum lateris ambiret. Is quondam cum incederet elaboratus ad speciem collegæ de injuriis diem dixit; quod sibi in angustiis obvisu offensus fortuito struſturam togæ destruxerat, & capitale putavit quod in humero suo locum ruga mutasset (12). — Hortensius was a man professedly effeminate, and placed all decency in outward show; he was curious in his dress even to nicety, and to adjust it the better made use of a looking-glass, by help of which he tricked up his gown in such a manner, that the folds did not fall by chance, but were formed with great care by help of artful knots, and the lappet falling formally down went round the knots at his side. As he was a walking one day in this elaborate dress, he brought an action of damages against his colleague, because he had accidentally discomposed the economy of his gown as he went by him in a narrow passage, considering it as a capital injury that he had changed one's fold on his shoulder.'

(12) Macrob. lib. ii. Saturn. cap. ix.

(13) Plinius, lib. xxxv, cap. xi.

(14) Cicero, 2. Acad. quest. Varro, de re Rust. lib. iii, cap. xvii.

(15) Varro, lib. ii.

(16) Cicero, ad Attic. lib. vii, Ep. iii.

(17) Varro, apud Plin. lib. xiv, cap. xiv.

(18) I have mentioned this in the text, citat. (b).

(19) Macrob. Saturn. lib. ii, cap. ix.

'ged to go to the country to pour some wine on a plane-tree which I have planted at my villa of Tusculanum.'

[G] He was careful of the health of his fish. Varro (20) relates upon this subject some very singular things. Hortensius did with respect to his fish, as misers do with respect to their money; he durst not make use of them, he chose rather to buy fish in any neighbouring town, than to take them out of his ponds: nor was he only contented not to feed upon his own fish, but he also fed them nicely and plentifully. 'Neque satis erat eum non pasci piscinis, nisi eos ipse pasceret ultro . . . Celerius voluntate Hortensii ex equili educeres rhedarias ut tibi haberet mulas, quam è piscina barbatum mullum . . . Non minor cura ejus erat de ægrotis piscibus, quam de minus valentibus servis: iaque minus laborabat ne servus æger, quam aquam frigidam biberent sui pisces. — It was not enough for him that he did not feed upon the fish of his own ponds, but he fed them with great care . . . And he would have been more easily persuaded to give you the mules out of his stable, than a mullet out of his pond . . . He was as careful of the health of his fish as of that of his servants: and was more solicitous that his fish should have fresh water, than that his servants when indisposed should be furnished with it.' It is said he was so passionately fond of a lamprey that he shed tears for the death of her (21). This Porphyry (22), Macrobius (23), and Tzetzes (24) have ascribed to the orator Crassus.

[H] One will much more wonder that he and Cicero gave one another . . . marks of affection. Perhaps there is nothing upon which jealousy is more able to cause a greater alienation in mens minds than eloquence. I know not whether beauty or poetry ought to be excepted. Two famous preachers seldom love one another, and easily quarrel even to the utmost rupture. It is much if they can conceal their jealousy, and keep fair appearances with each other. So that what Hortensius did in Cicero's behalf, may well be admired; but the ill offices he may have done him privately, ought not to surprize us. He got him admitted into the college of the Augurs (25): he praised him nobly on an occasion, wherein his praises might be of use of him (26); he ran the hazard of losing his life for his sake (27); and Cicero himself confesses, that there had always been between them a reciprocal commerce of good offices. 'Cum præsertim non modo nunquam sit aut illius à me cursus impeditus, aut ab illo meus, sed contra semper alter ab altero adjutus, & communicando, & monendo, & savendo (28). — Especially since we never opposed one another's interests, but, on the contrary, always assisted each other, by mutual communication, of counsels, advice, and favour.' Cicero's good-offices towards Hortensius, are not so much to be wondered at, as those of Hortensius towards him; because, though naturally speaking, Cicero must have had for many years, his heart filled with the rancour of jealousy, it is likely he did not keep half of it, when he saw himself superior. There was a time when he did not equal Hortensius, another when he equalled him, and a third, when he excelled him. This last period is an excellent

(b) See the remark [F].

(20) De re Rust. lib. iii, cap. xvii.

(21) Apud Baule in parte Baiana Piscinam habuit Hortensius Crator, in qua Murenam adeo dilexit ut extenuatam flectere crederetur. Plin. lib. ix, cap. lv.

(22) De abstinentia lib. iii.

(23) Saturn. lib. ii, cap. xi.

(24) Chyl. viii, Hist. 174.

(25) Cicero in Bruto, init.

(26) At Hercule alter tuos familiaris Hortensius quam plena manu, quam ingenuam quam ornate nostras laudes in altra sustulit, quum de Flacci Prætura & de illo tempore Allobrogum diceret. Sic habeto nec amantius, nec honorificentius, nec copiosius potuisse dici. . . . I cannot extol him too copiously, how ingeniously, and how elegantly your other friend Hortensius raised my fame to its very flux in the Oration, in which he mentioned the prætorship of Flaccus, and the time of the Allobroges. He assured that nothing could be said more affectionately, more honourably, or more fully. Id. ad Attic. Ep. lib. ii.

(27) Viti, viti hunc ipsum Q. Hortensium lumen & ornamentum Reip. penè interfecit severum manu cum mihi addeisset. . . . I saw with these eyes that very Hortensius, the glory and ornament of the commonwealth, in the utmost hazard of being slain by the hands of slaves, on my account. Id. pro Milone.

(28) Idem in Bruto.

some annals, but also some lascivious poems [I]. None of all these are now extant; and it must be confessed, that his tongue was much better than his pen [K]. Tho' he carried the cause of Messala his sister's son, having pleaded with the best of his eloquence for excellent remedy against jealousy. But, on the contrary, what a mortification must it have been to Hortensius to see Cicero, who only came after him at the beginning, overtake him some time after, and at last get the start of him? 'Hortensius . . . qui diu princeps Oratorum, aliquando æmulus Ciceronis existimatus est, novissime quoad vixit, secundus.' Thus Quintilian speaks in the third chapter of the eleventh book: I know, that it was not a disadvantage to Hortensius to have such a rival as Cicero. The honours of his consulship had so slackened that ardent and indefatigable application, with which he had cultivated his mind from his youth, that he was perceived every day more and more to decline (29). He took heart again when he saw the great progress of Cicero's glory. But in truth, he would have easily dispensed with such a spur, which cost him the first place. There were hardly any great causes, wherein these two famous orators were not retained, sometimes for the fame, and sometimes for contrary parties (30). The famous extortioner Verres was to have Hortensius for his advocate, which was one of the strongest reasons Cicero alleged to exclude Cæcilius from being the accuser. It appears by that pleading (31) how fit Hortensius was to make the best of the causes he undertook. Cicero had all sorts of advantages here: he was the accuser; and it is said that he at first made Hortensius give over thoughts of pleading for his client Verres (32) there being so many charges and proofs against him. 'Multis diebus prima actio celebrata est, dum testes Verri producuntur criminum diversorum, dum recitantur publicæ privatorumque literæ. Quibus rebus adeo stupefactus Hortensius dicitur, ut rationem defensionis omitteret (33). — The opening of the cause continued many days, while by the witnesses of Verres many crimes were produced, and the public and private documents were read. At the hearing of which Hortensius, is said to have been so astonished, that he laid aside thoughts of making any defence for his client.' We have seen how Cicero declared that Hortensius had never done him any ill offices: and we may see in the same place, that he confutes those, who thought that Hortensius was not favourable to him. 'Dolebam quod, non ut plerique putabant, adversarium aut obrectatorem laudem meam, sed socium potius & confortem gloriosi laboris amiseram (34). — What added to my grief was, that I had lost not, as most people fancied, an enemy, and an envious rival, but rather a companion and fellow in our glorious toils.' But he wrote in another stile to his brother Quintus, when he told him, 'Quantum Hortensio credendum sit nescio: me summa simulatione amoris, summaque assiduitate quotidiana sceleratissime infidiosissimeque tractavit, adjuncto quoque Arrio: quorum ego consilii, promissis, præceptis destitutus in hanc calamitatem incidi (35). — I do not know how far Hortensius is to be trusted: he together with Arrius have used me in the most base and treacherous manner, under appearances of the warmest friendship and affection to my interests: and I have fallen into this distress, by being at once deprived of their counsels, promises, and directions.' How few people are there even amongst those who are accounted honest men, who have not two sorts of language, one for books which they design for the public, and another for the letters which they write to their friends. See the remark [M] of the article GROTIUS. As long as these are not public, this insincerity or ambiguous language doth not appear: but I wait for the publication of their letters to find it. We should vex some authors not a little, should we oblige them to repeat in conversation, or to hear repeated, the same eulogies they have given in their writings, prefaces, citations, and the agreeable necessity of making a funeral oration, how do you impose on the world! However it be, we have reason to look upon it as a wonderful address of Pomponius Atticus, that he was able to preserve the intimate friendship both of Cicero and Hortensius, and to hinder them from falling out. 'Utebatur intimè Q. Hortensio, qui iis temporibus principatum eloquentiæ tenebat, ut intelligi non posset uter eum plus diligeret, Cicero.

cero an Hortensius, & id quod erat difficillimum, efficiebat ut inter quos tantæ laudis esset æmulation, nulla intercederet obreclatio, effectque talium virorum copula (36). — He lived in the closest friendship with Hortensius, so that it was impossible to tell whether Cicero or Hortensius loved him most, and what was a proof of his great address, he was the cause that these two mighty rivals, never expressed any jealousy of one another, so that he was, as it were, the bond of friendship betwixt them.

[I] He had published some lascivious poems.] This we learn from Ovid in his second book de Tristibus, where he gives a catalogue of those who have with impunity composed love poems.

Is quoque Phasias Argo qui duxit in undas

Non potuit Veneris furta tacere suæ.

Nec minus HORTENSI, nec sunt minus improba Servi

Carmina. Quis dubitet nomina tanta sequi?

The hero too, whom far-fam'd Argo bore
To distant Phasis, and the Chælbic shore, Disclor'd the love-intrigues he follow'd there,
And boasted of the favours of the fair.
Nor lest obscene Hortensius' numbers flow,
Nor Servius' lines a chaster subject know.
To copy such examples who'd refuse?
They authorize the licence of the Muse.

Aulus Gellius doubtless speaks of these poems of Hortensius, when he says (37), they were not polite, in-venusta. I know not whether the poem which Varro (38) ascribes to him, be another work: as to the annals, they have been cited by Velleius Paterculus. I believe Hortensius was a learned man, Cicero having given him that commendation. But I do not see that his poems, his annals, and the proffer of Lucullus, are so good proofs of his learning, as Corradus would fain have us believe. 'Sane, says he (39), videtur bene doctus fuisse, siquidem poema scripsit, ut Auctor est Varro libro primo de Analogia, & Annales, ut Paterculus affirmat, & certè cum Sisenna & Lucullo de Græce Latineque scribendo venit in eam contentionem quam Plutarchus in Lucullo refert. — He seems to have been a learned man, for he wrote a poem, as we are told by Varro, in his first book of Analogia; he wrote likewise Annals, as Paterculus affirms; and he certainly strove with Sisenna and Lucullus for the superiority of writing, both in Greek and Latin, as Plutarch testifies in the Life of Lucullus.' Methinks Corradus has not understood Plutarch's meaning; for he does not speak there of a challenge betwixt Hortensius, Sisenna, and Lucullus, but of a little presumption of the later, who undertook in the presence of the other two, to write the Social War, either in Latin or Greek, in prose or in verse, as the lot should decide. Plutarch conjectures, that the Greek prose fell to him by lot, since the history of that war, written by Lucullus in Greek prose, was extant in his time: but still, this doth not at all signify, that Hortensius and Sisenna had engaged to perform the same task if the lot fell to them. Caranæus who relates it so (40), is mistaken.

[K] His tongue was better than his pen.] This we learn from Quintilian, third chapter, eleventh book, where he observes that action has a mighty force in an orator; and that as this was Hortensius's great talent, when his pleading came to be read, they were not found to come up to the reputation of their author. 'M. Cicero, says he, unam in dicendo actionem dominari putat, hac . . . Antonium & Crassum multum valuisse, plurimam verò Q. Hortensium, cujus rei fides est quod ejus scripta tantum infra famam sunt . . . ut apparent placuisse aliquid eo orante quod legentes non invenimus. — Cicero is of opinion, that action is the chief talent of an orator . . . that Anthony and Crassus excelled in it, but especially Hortensius, which will appear, if we consider how much

(29) Cicero, in Bruto, sub fin.

(30) Sæpe, in iisdem, sæpe in contrariis causis versati sumus. Cicero, Divinat. in 2. Cæcil.

(31) Divinat. in Q. Cæcilius.

(32) It is to be observed, that Hortensius did not so forsake Verres, but that Quintilian, lib. x. cap. i. speaks of his pleadings for him.

(33) Ascend. Pedian. in prozimo act. in Verrem.

(34) Cicero, in Bruto, init.

(35) Id. Epist. iii, lib. i, ad Quint. fratrem. See also Epist. ix. ad Attic lib. iii.

(36) Cornel. Nepos, in Vita Pomp. Attic.

(37) Lib. xix, cap. ix.

(38) Lib. i. de Annal. apud Corradum in Cicero, Brutum, pag. 428.

(39) Ibid.

(40) In Plin. Ep. lib. v, pag. m. 233.

(i) Epist. ii, Cicer. ad Famil. lib. viii.

(k) Est autem L. Paulo, C. Marcello Coff. mortuus, ex quo videmus eum in Patronorum numero annos quatuor & quadraginta fuisse. Cicer. in Bruto.

for him [L], seeing him charged with being engaged in a faction; yet he did himself a great injury by it, and exposed himself, in his old age, to hissings and clamours, which he alone had escaped before (i). He died in the 703d year of Rome, in the 64th year of his age, 44 or 45 of which he had spent with a mighty reputation at the bar (k). It has been said that he had so worn out his voice, that he lost it before he lost his life. Others have so ill understood that thought, that they have taken it, as if he died in pleading, having killed himself by the violence of speaking. We must look upon this as fabulous, since he pleaded a cause of importance a few days before his death [M]; and since Cicero is so far from mentioning this sort of death, as he would doubtless have done if he had died in that manner, he affords us reasons to think otherwise. Consult upon all this, the remark [M]. Hortensius married in his youth a daughter of C. Catulus (l), I cannot well tell whether she was also the daughter of Servilia (m), a lady of the greatest distinction in Rome. He was Catulus's son-in-law, at the time of Verres's trial. But nothing can be more singular than his marriage with Martia [N] the wife of Cato of Utica, and

(l) Id. de Orat. lib. iii, sub fin.

(m) Ex focu tua, femina primaria Servilia. Id. Ver. 4.

'much inferior his writings are to the great fame he enjoyed . . . so that it would seem that they had certain charms while he pronounced them, which are quite lost in the reading.' How many preachers have we of whom we may say the same thing? Mr Morus is an instance of it.

[L] Having pleaded with the best of his eloquence for him.] This cause was pleaded in the year of Rome 702. Hortensius was then sixty three years old, which age did not hinder him from making an excellent plea. Brutus, who always thought him a great orator, never admired him so much as he did on that day; others passed the same judgment; and Cicero having read the piece, published word for word, as it was pronounced, was of the same opinion (41). And if Hortensius was hissed the next day, it was not because he had pleaded less eloquently than he used to do, but because people were vexed to see that he had brought his client off. That repentment had already shewn itself against the judges. 'Clamoribus scilicet

(41) Hortensium magnum Oratorem semper putavi maximeque probavi pro Mefila dicentem, cum tu abfuit. Sic ferunt, inquam, idque declarat totidem quot dixit, ut ajunt, scripta verba oratio. Cicer. in Bruto.

(42) Caelius ad Cicer. Epist. ii, lib. viii, ad Famil.

'maximis iudices corripuerunt, & ostenderunt planè esse quod ferri non posset. . . Accessit huc, quod postredie ejus absolutionem in Theatrum Curionis Hortensius introiit, puto ut suum gaudium gauderemus. Hic tibi strepitus, fremitus, clamor, tonitruum & rudentium sibilus. Hoc magis animadversum est quod intactus ab sibilis pervenerat Hortensius ad senectutem. Sed tum ita bene ut in totam vitam cuius satis esset, & poeniteret eum jam vicisse (42). — They inveighed against the judges with terrible outcries, and showed that it was a thing not to be suffered. . . Besides, the next day after his acquittal, Hortensius entered into the theatre of Curio, expecting, no doubt, the compliments of his friends upon that occasion, but instead of that he was received with murmurs, outcries, clamour, and hissing. This was the more taken notice of, because Hortensius had arrived to old age, without ever being so used before, but then he got as much of it as was enough for one's whole life, and as made him regret that he had got his cause.' He pleaded a few days before his death, as Cicero observes; he was undoubtedly one of those great wits, who have a lasting strength of mind. It is true, he shined more in his youth, than in his more advanced age, for which two reasons are assigned: one is that he had made choice of the Asiatic eloquence, which was more becoming in a young than an old man: the other was, that he laboured with greater application when he was young. 'Si quærimus, cur adolescens magis floruerit dicendo, quam senior. Hortensius, causas reperiemus verissimas duas: primum, quod genus erat orationis Asiaticum, adolescentis magis concessum, quam senectuti. Genera autem Asiaticæ dictionis duo sunt. . . Hæc . . . genera dicendi aptiora sunt adolescentibus, in senibus gravitatem non habent. Itaque Hortensius utroque genere florens, clamores faciebat adolescens. . . Sed cum jam honores, & illa senior auctoritas gravior quiddam requireret, remanebat idem, nec decebat idem: quodque exercitationem studiumque dimiserat, quod in eo fuerat acerrimum, concinnitas illa creberrimæ sententiarum pristina manebat, sed ea vestitus illo orationis, quo consueverat, ornata non erat (43). — If we ask why Hortensius was more famed for eloquence in his youth, than when he came to years, we shall find two very good reasons for it, the first is, that he chose the Asiatic style, which is more allowable in youth than in age. There are two kinds of Asiatic eloquence. . . These . . . are fitter

(43) Cicero, in Bruto, sub fin. pag. m. 451.

'for young men, but have not gravity enough for the old. Therefore Hortensius excelling in both these, could not fail to gain a great reputation in his youth. . . But when the honours he had obtained, and that authority which his age gave him required a graver manner, he continued in the same, which had not now its former grace: besides, he having slackened his application and study, which had been prodigious, the concinnity and frequency of his sentences remained, but the elegant dress with which he used to adorn them was now gone.' He was happy even in the time of his death: for he died just before the deplorable confusions into which the common-wealth was plunged (44).

[M] It has been said that he lost his voice. . . Others have ill understood that thought. . . We may look on this as fabulous, since he pleaded a cause of importance a few days before his death.] The proof of the first of these two things is contained in this passage of Quintus Serenus Samonicus:

Sic est Hortensius olim

Absumptus, causis etenim confectus agendis,
Obtuit, cum vox domino vivente periret,
Et nondum extincti moreretur lingua disert.

Hortensius, tired with law, his tongue survive'd,
And liv'd, an orator of voice depriv'd.

Glandorpius has not understood the sense of these verses. 'Decessit à vita, says he (45), sub bellum civile Cæs. & Pompeii. . . clamore in actione causæ disruptus, ut indicat Q. Serenus — He died during the civil-war between Cæsar and Pompey, having burst himself by the vehemence of his speaking in pleading a cause, as Serenus reports.' The following words of Cicero do not agree with the passage of Samonicus. 'Perpaucis ante mortem diebus una tecum socerum tuum defendit Appium. . . Q. Hortensii vox extincta fato suo est, nostra publico (46). — A few days before his death, he, together with you, defended your father-in-law Appius. . . The voice of Hortensius was put to silence by his own fate, but ours by the fate of the public.'

[N] Nothing can be more singular than his marriage with Martia.] Plutarch tells the story thus (47). Hortensius desired Cato to give him Porcia his daughter, who was married to Bibulus, and had already born two children. Give her to me also, said he, as a fertile soil, in which I may sow children: I am sensible, added he, that, according to the opinion of the world, this is somewhat absurd; but in reality is there any thing more excellent and more beneficial to societies, than not to leave the fruitful field of a young woman uncultivated; and on the other hand, not to suffer a family to be oppressed with too many children, which have enough already? Besides, the mutual lending of wives amongst worthy men disperses virtue amongst a greater number of families, and occasions more alliances in the state; and if Bibulus is not willing entirely to quit his title to Porcia, I promise to restore her, after she has brought me some children, which may be a stricter bond betwixt you and him, and my self. Cato did not think proper to treat of this affair; but when Hortensius declared to him, that he had a mind to Martia, Cato's own wife, considering she was still very young, and that Cato had children enough, he readily promised her, provided Martius the lady's father would agree to it.

(44) Perpetua quadam felicitate usus ille cessit à vita suo magis quam suorum civium tempore, & tum occidit cum lugere scilicet Remus posset si viveret quam juvare. Id. ibid. rest.

(45) Glandorpius. Onorat. pag. 405, 406.

(46) Cicero, in Bruto.

(47) Plut. in Catone Utic. pag. m. 770.

and daughter of Martius Philippus. He asked her of Cato by way of loan, and obtained her without much difficulty, though her big belly declared she had no great misunderstanding with her Husband. He had one son who gave him much trouble, so that when

he

it. Martius consented to it, and presently Martia was transferred to Hortensius. When she became afterwards both his widow and heir she again returned to her first husband. This Cæsar did not forget in his Anti-Cato. 'If he had need of a wife, said he (48) why did he give her to another? And if he had no need of her, why did he take her again? Does not this shew, that he made use of this lure, that by lending a young wife to Hortensius, he might recover her with great wealth?' Strabo (49), having said that the Tapyri (50) had a law, by which the husbands gave their wives to others, when they had two or three children by them, adds, that Cato practised the same thing to gratify Hortensius's request who desired his Martia of him; and observes that Cato, in this only, followed the ancient custom of the Romans. There is reason to doubt whether this was their ancient custom; for besides that, there are so few instances of it, that Tertullian cites only that of Cato (51); it appears that Hortensius owned some singularity or novelty in his design, according to the common opinion. Δὲν μὲν γὰρ ἀνδρῶν αὐτοῦ εἶναι τὸ τοῦτον, οὗτος δὲ καλὸν καὶ πολιτικόν. Nam esse hominum quidem illud opinione novum (so Xilander renders it) natura pulchrum tamen & civile (52). — For this indeed is strange in the opinion of men, but naturally it is beautiful and politic. He does not oppose to this opinion the ancient laws or customs of the Romans, which so great a civilian would not have omitted on that occasion, but only nature. Bodinus (53) censures Plutarch without reason, as if he had said, in the life of Cato Uticensis, that it was lawful for the Romans to lend their wives; for that historian does not speak of it as of a custom founded upon the laws, or as a thing that was usually practised; on the contrary, he introduces Hortensius, confessing, that his proposal seemed strange or new. It is a great rashness in the same Bodinus, not to give credit to this lending of Cato's wife; for it is a story that Thraseas had taken from the writings of Munatius, Cato's friend, and Cæsar would not have ventured to have reproached him for it, if it had not been well known (54). The reason upon which Bodinus grounds his not believing it, is a new fault; it is because, says he, by the law of Romulus, and the ancient practice restored by Tiberius, the relations punished at their discretion wives that committed adultery. But what does this make against Cato's wife, who was given to another by her father and her husband? I say nothing against these words. Plutarchus & Strabo Partbos æque ac Lacedæmonios mutuas uxores amicis dare consuevisse ajunt (55), tho' they are very likely to deceive the reader; for who in reading them would not think, that Plutarch attributed this conduct to the Parthians, and Strabo to the Lacedæmonians? And yet Bodin means, that Strabo ascribes this to the Parthians (56), and Plutarch to the Lacedæmonians. This way of quoting is but too frequent, and leads into mistakes; it seems to bring many witnesses for the same thing, when in reality there is but one. Bodinus seems to say, that Plutarch and Strabo both tellify, that the lending of wives was practised both among the Parthians, and among the Lacedæmonians. I have read in Mr Menage, that, according to Casaubon, Plutarch mentions this marriage of Hortensius and Martia, as a thing of which he doubted. Ad quem Strabonis locum notat Casaubonus. Plutarchum de Catone rem ita narrare ut de ea dubitasse significet (57). Mr Menage had reason to say that this is false: it is not about the fact it self that Plutarch expresses his doubts; he only says, that that part of Cato's life is like a piece of a play, in which the plot is not well opened, that is, in my opinion, that people passed different judgments upon it. Note, that when I censure Bodinus for imputing this to Plutarch, I consider that he cites the life of Cato of Utica; for if he had cited the parallel between Lycurgus and Numa Pompilius, he could not have erred. Plutarch there affirms, that this king of Rome permitted husbands to lend their wives; but I think he is mistaken in saying so, and so does Mr Dacier. 'This is true, say he (58), of Lycurgus, but it does not appear that Numa ever had any such design; it would be also easy to prove, that this community of wives did not begin at Rome, under Numa, but much later, and that it was not general.

Lucan supposes, that Martia, after Hortensius's death, went to Cato, and most humbly intreated him to take her again. She declared to him, that being past child-bearing, she only asked the name of wife, that she would live in continence, and desired only to share with him in those troubles and fatigues, that the ill posture of public affairs had brought upon him. Lucan adds, that Cato was moved by these words of Martia, and though that was not a proper time for marriage, he granted her request: it is true, that all the nuptial ceremonies were omitted, without excepting that which is looked upon as the principal, and the consummation of the work. Martia did not quit her mourning weed, she embraced her husband, as a mother doth her child (59). Cato was so deeply afflicted for the public calamities, that from the beginning of the civil war, he deprived himself of all diversions; he let his beard grow, and lived as a man in mourning. Martia's offers were accepted in the literal sense. See what Lucan makes her say:

(59) Sic ut erat, mastris servans iugubria cultus, Quoque in do natos, hoc est amplexa maritum. Lucan. lib. ii, ver. 365.

Dum sanguis inerat, dum vis materna, peregrini
Iussa Cato, & geminos excepi sceta maritos.
Visceribus lassis, partuque exhausta, revertor
Jam nulli tradenda viro: da fœdera prisca
Illibata tori: da tantum nomen inane
Connubii: liceat tumulo scripsisse, Catonis
Martia; dec dubium longo quæretur in ævo, Mutarim primas expulsa, an tradita, tædas.
Non me lætorum sociam, rebusque secundis
Accipis: in curas venio, partemque laborum.
Da mihi castra sequi (60).

(60) Lucan lib. ii, ver. 338.

While nature yet with vigour fed my veins,
And made me equal to a mother's pains,
To thee obedient I thy house forsook,
And to my arms; another husband took;
My powers at length with genial labours worn,
Weary to thee and wasted I return,
At length a barren wedlock let me prove,
Give me the name without the joys of love.
No more to be abandon'd let me come,
That Cato's wife may live upon my tomb,
So shall my truth to latest times be read,
And none shall ask if guiltily I fled,
Or thy commands estranged me from thy bed.
Nor ask I now thy happiness to share,
I seek thy days of toil, thy nights of care.

ROWE.

If he had been throughout all his work as fond of fiction, as in this place, I am apt to think he would not have been accused of following too closely the thread of history, and not giving his work a form poetical enough. However it be, let us see what he says of the extreme rigidity Cato.

Ille nec horrificam sancto dimovit ab oræ
Cæsariem, duroque admisit gaudia vultu.
(Ut primum tolli feralia viderat arma,
Intonsus rigidam in frontem descendere canos.
Passus erat, mœstamque genis increfcere barbam,
Uni quippe vacat studiisque odiisque carenti, Humanum lugere genus) nec fœdera prisca
Sunt tentata tori: iusto quoque robur amoris Restitit: hi mores (61).

(61) Id. lib. ii, ver. 372.

Nor be the chief his sacred visage cheer'd,
Nor smoo'd his matted locks or horrid beard,
Nor deigns his heart one thought of joy know,
But met his Martia with the same stern brow.
For when he saw the fatal faction's arm,
The coming war, and Rome's impending harm, Regardless,

(48) Id. ibid. pag. 784.

(49) Strabo, lib. xi, pag. 355.

(50) They bordered upon the Parthians.

(51) Ex illa, credo, majorum & sapientissimorum discipulis, Græci Socratis & Romani Catonis qui uxores suas amicis communiverunt. — O sapientiae Atticæ! O Romanæ gravitatis exemplum! leones Philosophus & Censor. — Agreeably I suppose to the doctrine of the ancients, and of the most wise men, of the Grecian Socrates, and the Roman Cato, who lent their wives to their friends. — O wonderful example of the Attic wisdom, and Roman gravity! A Philosopher and Censor both panders. Tertullian in Apologet. The example of Socrates does not concern the Romans. Tertullian ascribes to Cato the Censor, what he should have ascribed to Cato of Utica.

(52) Plut. pag. 771.

(53) Bodin. Meth. Hist. cap. pag. m. 73.

(54) Plut. in Cat. pag. 770.

(55) Bod. Meth. Hist. pag. 78.

(56) He should have said to the Tapyri, and not to the Parthians.

(57) Menage. Amén. Juris. cap. x. I do not find this in Casaubon's notes upon Strabo.

(58) Dacier in a marginal note of his translation of Plutarch, in the parallel between Lycurgus and Numa, pag. 362, 363. Dutch Edit.

he pleaded for his nephew, he declared, that he made choice of him for his heir, to the prejudice of his son. And yet it was to this unworthy son that he left his estate, if we may believe Valerius Maximus. See the following article.

*Regardless quite of every other care,
Unshorn he left his loose neglected hair;
Rude hung the boary honours of his head,
And a foul growth his mournful cheeks o're spread,
No stings of private hate his peace infest,
Nor partial favour grew up in his breast,*

*But safe from prejudice he kept his mind,
Free, and at leisure to lament mankind,
Nor could his former loves returning fire,
The warmth of one connubial wish inspire,
But strongly he withstood the just desire.*

Rowe.

HORTENSIUS (QUINTUS) son to the former, behav'd himself so unworthily of such a father, that he had like to have been disinherited by him [A]. But if he be the same that was proconsul of Macedonia after Julius Cæsar's death, we may presume he reformed his life. He warmly sided with the asserters of liberty, and strenuously engaged with Brutus, to raise armies which might be able to maintain the cause (a). He was taken at the battle of Philippi, and put to death by way of reprisal, by Marc Antony's order, upon Caius Antonius's tomb [B]. Some believe our Hortensius was the same with him, who had joined with Julius Cæsar against Pompey [C]. But as they who speak of him, sufficiently intimate, that he was the only Son of Hortensius, we may look upon him as the Father of Q. HORTENSIUS CORBIO and MARCUS HORTENSIUS HORTALUS, the first whereof was a monster of impurity and debauchery [D], and the latter fell into poverty, and had the discretion not to marry, till

(a) Cicero, Philipp. x.

(1) Epist. lib. iii,
vi, ad Attic.

(2) Natura metuenda est: hæc Curionem, hæc Hortensii filium non patrum culpa corruptit. Ibid. lib. x, Epist. xv.

(3) Illa Hortensiana omnia fuerunt infantia: ita fiet homo nequissimus: à Salvio liberto depravatus est. Ibid. Epist. xviii.

(4) Ibid. Ep. iii, lib. vi.

(5) Valer. Maxim. lib. v, cap. ix, n. 2.

(6) Plutarch. in Catone min. pag. 784.

[A] He had like to have been disinherited.] Cicero intimates plainly enough in his letters (1), that Hortensius's son was good for nothing, and that his own ill temper (2) and a freed-man called Salvius, had spoiled him (3). He seems to say that his father did not love him (4); but let us hear Valerius Maximus, who is more than ordinary clear in this matter. 'Q. Hortensii, qui suis temporibus ornamentum Romanæ eloquentiæ fuit, admirabilis in filio patientia extitit. Cum enim eo usque impietatem ejus suspectam & nequitiam inviam haberet, ut Messalam suæ sororis filium heredem habiturus ambitus reum defendens iudicibus diceret, si illum damnaissent nihil sibi præter oculum nepotum in quibus acquiesceret super futurum: Hac scilicet sententia quam etiam editæ orationi inseruit, filium potius in tormento animi quam in voluptatibus reponens: tamen ne naturæ ordinem confunderet, non nepotes sed filium heredem reliquit (5) — The patience of Hortensius, who was the ornament of the Roman eloquence, in the age in which he lived, towards his son is worthy of admiration. For tho' he was so incensed against him on account of his undutiful and scandalous behaviour, that he said to the judges in a speech which he made in defence of Messala, his sister's son, whom he then designed to make his heir, and who was accused of corruption, that if they condemned him he should have no other solace left but the embraces of his grand-children: by this sentence, (which he likewise inserted in this oration when he made it public) showing that he considered his son rather as the torment than the pleasure of his soul; yet, that he might not overturn the order of nature, he left his son his heir, and not his grand-children.' It is somewhat strange that Hortensius should have given out, that he had made choice of his nephew for his heir; for if he thought his own son deserved to be disinherited, could not he transfer his estate to his grand-children, as he said he should be obliged to do, if they condemned his nephew? A strange grand-father sure, not to think of his grand-sons, but in case of failure of his sister's son! Valerius Maximus has perhaps curtailed the matter by the suppression of some essential circumstances. It may be too, that we must take this declaration of Hortensius only as a figure of rhetoric: there are stratagems in this profession, which our orator knew well how to make use of. Probably he had a mind to move the judges in appearing so much concerned for the discharge of his client, as a person that was to be to him instead of a son. Others say that Hortensius's wife inherited his estate (6), she whom Cato had lent him, and whom he took again after Hortensius's death.

[B] He was murdered by way of reprisal, on the tomb of Caius Antonius.] To understand what this reprisal was, we must remember that Caius Antonius, brother to Marc, fell into Hortensius's hands during the confusions that followed Julius Cæsar's death; and that

Brutus understanding that by the rage of the Triumvirate, D. Brutus and Cicero had been put to death, together with other illustrious men, wrote to Hortensius to sacrifice his prisoner to their ghosts (7): which was done. Thus you see what was the end of Caius Antonius, and how his death was revenged.

[C] Some believe . . . that he had sided with Julius Cæsar against Pompey.] That which causes some difficulty here, is, that Hortensius's son was at Laodicea in the year of Rome 702, and led a very scandalous life there (8). How then is it probable, will some say, that two years after he should have raised himself so high in Cæsar's esteem, that he should entrust him with the command of his army, the day that he designed to pass the Rubicon, and possess himself of Ariminum, which was the leading stroke of that great affair, that was to determine the fate of the empire? Yet this he did to that Hortensius who was in Cæsar's party (9). Some time after he gave him the command of a fleet upon the coasts of Italy (10). We must not determine upon appearances.

I have not found in Eutropius what Glandorpius (11) pretends to have taken from his sixth book, that Octavius and Libo, Pompey's lieutenants, defeated this fleet of Hortensius. It is Orosius who says it (12). However, Glandorpius will have Hortensius, the orator's son, of whom Valerius speaks so ill, to be the commander of that fleet. He goes upon good grounds in this; for Cicero (13) does not permit us to doubt, that this son of Hortensius went over to Cæsar's party. I have not been able to find when he left it, nor how he obtained the proconsulship of Macedonia, a post, wherein he merited the applauses of Cicero (14). Catanzæus (15) confounding the father and the son, ascribes to the orator the being in Pompey's party, and the putting to death Caius Antonius, and the having been put to death by Marc Antony.

[D] Q. HORTENSIUS CORBIO was a monster of impurity and debauchery.] Valerius Maximus (16) giving a list of children that have verified the proverb, Heroum filii noxæ, forgets the son (17) but not the grandson of Hortensius. 'Q. Hortensii nepos Hortensius Corbio omnibus scortis abjectiorem & obseciorem vitam exegit, ad ultimumque lingua ejus tam libidini cunctorum inter lupanaria prostitit, quam avi pro salute civium in foro excubuerat. — Hortensius Corbio, grand-son to Hortensius, lived in a more vile and beastly manner, than the most abandoned women, and at last his tongue was as much prostituted to the lust of all men in the brothels, as that of his grand-father had been watchful in the Forum for the safety of the citizen.' If Lipsius had remembered that this author spoke in the plural number of Hortensius's grand-sons in the ninth chapter of the fifth book, he would not have believed (18) that Hortensius Hortalus, and Hortensius Corbio were one and the same person. The character in Tacitus gives the former, plainly distinguishes him from

(7) Plutarch. in Bruto. See also Velleius Paterculus, lib. ii, cap. lxxxi, who says, that the son of Hortensius left his life in that war.

(8) Cicero. Ep. ad Attic. iii, lib. vi.

(9) Plut. in Cæsar. pag. 723.

(10) Appian lib. ii, Bell. Civil.

(11) Orosius, pag. 406.

(12) Lib. vi, cap. xvi.

(13) Epist. ad Attic. iv, xvi, xvii, xviii, lib. xi.

(14) Plutarch. x.

(15) In Plin. Ep. lib. v.

(16) Lib. iii, cap. v.

(17) He speaks of him upon another occasion, as we have seen in the remark [A].

(18) Comment. in Tacit. Ann. lib. ii.

(h) Tacitus, Ann. lib. ii, cap. 37, 38.

(i) Ducens seferia singulis qui sexus virilis essent. Tacit. ibid. Ryckius makes it amount to 5000 Crowns.

till Augustus gave him the means of maintaining a family (b). But that emperor's liberality not being sufficient to supply the necessities of all the children that were born of that marriage, Hortalus begg'd the assistance of the senate [E]. Tiberius at first rejected this petition very harshly; but afterwards perceiving that his severity was disliked by the senate, he said that, if they desired it, he would give a certain sum to each of Hortalus's male-children (c) [F]. They thanked him for it, but Hortalus, either out of fear or greatness of soul, said not a word; and from this time, Tiberius shewing him no favour, he by degrees fell into the most extreme poverty (d).

(d) Egere affigrates; sicut Hortalus, povere an avice nobi-litas etiam inter angustias fortune retinens. Neque miseratus est
posthac Tiberius, quamvis domos Hortensii puden-dam ad inopiam
dilateretur.
Tacit. Ann. lib.
ii, cap. xxxviii.

from the later. Moreri and Hofman commit the same fault as Lipsius, since they cite Valerius Maximus chap. 5, book 3, Tacitus in the second book of his annals, and Suetonius in the Life of Tiberius, with respect to Hortensius's grandson, who was extremely debauched. Vossius has mislead them, because he refers those three citations to a grand-son of Hortensius, as if they had concerned the same person (19).

[E] M. HORTENSIUS HORTALUS begged the assistance of the senate. His speech is in Tacitus (20): he brought with him his four little boys, and shewing them to the senate, intreated them to have some regard for the posterity of so many consuls, and so many dictators, En stirps & progenies tot Consulatum tot Dictatorum. Lipsius (21) thinks the hyperbole somewhat strong, since the family of Hortensius produced but one consul, and one dictator. He endeavours to excuse Hortalus, by saying that probably he had his mother's

(19) Vossius, de Hist. Latin. pag. 48.

(20) Ann. lib. ii, cap. xxxvii.

(21) Comment. in Tacit.

(22) In Tacit. pag. 41.

ancestors in view. Ryckius (22) speaks with more assurance, and lays it down as a thing undeniable, and is of opinion that Hortensius had chiefly in view the Marcus Philippus's, from whose family, says he, Martia, Hortalus's grand-mother, descended. This last fact is by no means probable: for on one side, we find but one son of Hortensius the orator; and this son was a grown man when Cicero passed through Laodicea in the year 702. On the other side, Cato could not be very young, when he parted with Martia to Hortensius, since his daughter Portia had born already two children (23). But Cato died at forty eight years of age in the year 707 of Rome (24). If then we suppose, as it is very probable, that he was at least 35 years old when he obliged Hortensius with his wife, we must say that this marriage happened in the 694th year of Rome. It is not there possible that Hortensius's son, whom Cicero saw in Laodicea, in the 702d year of Rome, should be Martia's son. But we need not go upon a conjecture: there is a fact in Plutarch which decides the question: Martia was still Cato's wife during the expedition of Cyprus (25), that is, in the 696th year of Rome. It must not be dissembled that Hortalus is called a young man by Tacitus in the 769th year of Rome, which would not very well agree with the supposition, that the only son of Hortensius was that debauchee mentioned by Cicero, and Valerius Maximus, who died a little after the battle of Philippi in 712. But it is much more reasonable to think, that Tacitus has not been so exact as to the age of Hortalus, than to cavil about the speech which Valerius Maximus read, and Hortensius spoke a little before his death. Now that speech plainly supposes he had but one son: for if besides this rake, who saluted Cicero in Laodicea, he had had any son by Martia, there had been no need of his making his grand-children his heirs, in default of his debauched son, and of Messala his nephew.

(23) Plut. in Cato. min. pag. 770, 771.

(24) Ibid. pag. 794.

(25) Id. Ibid. pag. 777.

[F] Tiberius . . . said that . . . he would give . . . to each of Hortalus's male-children.] This leaves room to believe that Hortalus only brought his four sons with him, but that he left his daughters behind; so that to speak exactly, we must not say with Suetonius (26), (26) In Tiber. cap. xviii. that he had four children by his marriage; for if he had no more, Tacitus would make Tiberius guilty of an absurdity. Neither do I think that, speaking strictly, we can say that Tiberius gave nothing to Hortalus (27). Did not he offer to give him a sum, if the senate approved of it? was not he thanked for it? could he doubt of the favourable intention of the senate for that poor member? it is therefore highly probable that this sum was given; but as it was the only liberality of that prince, it did not prevent the misery of Hortalus. Let not Suetonius be urged (28), who pretends that the charities of Tiberius towards the poor senators, were annexed to some conditions, which excluded him from them. These conditions, said he, were, that he should make his indigence appear to the senate (29):

Quo pacto plerosque modestia & pudore deteruit, in quibus Hortalum Q. Hortensii oratoris nepotem, lxxv, pag. 12

By which means the greatest part were hindered by shame and modesty, and amongst others Hortlus grand-son to the orator Hortensius.] But it is not true that shame or modesty hindered Hortensius's grandson from performing that condition: did not he confess his misery? did not he carry his four sons to desire the senate to have compassion on them? did not he intreat the emperor to preserve them from starving? Nec ad invidiam ista sed conciliandae

miseri cordiae refero: adsequenter florente te, Caesar, quos dederis honores, interim Q. Hortensii pronepotes, divi Augusti alumnos ab inopia defende

(30). Nor is this request invidiously made, but to move pity. In the progress of your happy reign,

Cæsar, these children may arrive at the places you will be pleased to honour them with; defend them in the mean time from want; they are the great grandsons of Hortensius, they are sister sons of Augustus.

Achilles Statius (31), who says that our Hortalus is probably the person who is mentioned in the sixty seventh epigram of Catullus, did not consider that what he relates out of Tacitus, and we have just now seen, belongs to the year of Rome 769. It is true

Catullus did not die in 697. Scaliger has solidly con-futed that falsity of St Jerome; but there is no likelihood that he lived till 763. I have refused Joseph

Scaliger upon this, in the article of CATULLUS.

Certainly, Hortalus, mentioned by that ancient poet, was rather Hortensius than his grand-son; and I cannot but be amazed that Isaac Vossius in the same book

(32), wherein he maintains against Scaliger, that Catullus died, in the 704th, or 705th year of Rome, should pretend (33) that the Hortalus mentioned by that poet, is the same with him mentioned by Tacitus.

(27) This is said in Moreri's Dictionary of the Dutch edition, at the word Hortalus.

(28) In Tiber. cap. xviii.

(29) Tacitus, Ann. lib. i, cap. lxxv, pag. 12

(30) Tacit. Ann. lib. ii, cap. xxxvii.

(31) Notis, in Catull. Epig. lxxvii.

(32) Observat. ad Catull. pag. 83.

(33) Pag. 252.

HORTENSIUS' (JOHN) in French Des-Jardins, Physician to Francis I, was born near Laon in Picardy, being son of John Des-Jardins, governor of the castle of Hamelle in the diocese of Laon. He taught classical learning at Paris, in the college of cardinal le Moine, and afterwards applying himself to the study of Physic, he was made bachelor in that science in the year 1514, a licentiate in the year 1517, and doctor in 1519. It appears by the registers of the university of Paris, that he was regent-doctor in the year 1521, and dean of the faculty in 1524. As he understood Greek to perfection, he warmly exhorted his scholars to the study of that language; and that every body might be in a capacity of consulting Galen in the original, he made a present of a Greek edition of that ancient Physician to the library of that faculty; for at that time the Physicians at Paris had a public library in their schools (a). He got such a reputation, that he was thought able to cure all sorts of diseases, provided the fatal hour was not come (b). That was the only exception [A], so that this proverb was commonly applied to him,

(a) Hemeranus, Differt. de Acad. Parisiensis.

(b) Boileau, Histoire Académ. Paris.

Contra

[A] That was the only exception.] Vulgarly speaking, except a great deal; for if death does not interpose, there is no distemper but a Physician may cure; nature itself is then

VOL. III.

6 K

(c) He was called in Latin Hortensius, or de Mortis.

(d) It is in Latin, in the volume he published at Paris in the year 1675, in 4to, containing the Lives of Peter Ayrault, William Menage, &c. with several remarks.

(1) Remarques sur la Vie de Pierre Ayrault, pag. 150.

(2) El præterea & Martino Acacia & Michæli Dumontio, Me-dicis Parisienbus doctissimi interpretationem librorum Hippocratis & Galeni
de victus ratione in morbis acutis nuncupavit Johannes Valerius
Medicus & isse Parisienis doctissimus. Menage, in eodem volumi-ne, pag. 512.

(3) Ib. pag. 514.

(4) Petrum Hortensium militem strenuum, qui Margaretam de Gravella uxorem sibi adjunxit
Ibid. pag. 517.

(a) Occiso in oculis filio suo naturali. Valer.
Andr. Bibl.
Bibl. pag. 613.
But observe that Brindt in his Dutch History of the Reformation,
ad ann. 1584,
pag. 703, 705,
speaks of Jerom Hortensius, minister at the Hague, and then at Wallemaer, who he says was Lambert's son.

(1) Athen. Belg.
pag. 508.

(a) Admodum adolescent, pag.
613.

Contra vim mortis non est medicamen in hortis (c). We find him commended in many books [B]; but as for himself, he printed nothing; nor have we any posthumous work of his. He married Joan Bourdin in 1520, and Mary le Tellier in 1541. He left seven children by the first, and four by the later. Their settlements they had [C], and the real estate he left, are a proof that he had gained a great deal of money. He died suddenly of an apoplexy, as he was entertaining his relations and friends on his birth-day in 1547. This occasioned a fine sonnet of Des-Portes [D], which I will give intire in the remarks. Mr Menage, who descended from John Des-Jardins by the mother's side [E], has wrote his life (d). We have taken this article from thence.

then sufficient for the work. However according to our way judging of things, by representing to our selves a-bundance of very possible conditions, which may change the chain and course of events, it is to give a great idea of a Physician, to say, that if a greater force does not interpose, he will restore a sick man's health. This makes me remember a too hardy expression of I do not know what admiral, who being ready to engage in very favourable circumstances, and after having taken all proper measures, said they were sure of victory, if God would stand neuter, and leave both parties to themselves.

[B] We find him commended in many books.] Mr Menage (1) cites Arnaud d'Ossat, in his Exposition against James Charpentier; Renatus Moreau, in the Life of James Sylvius; du Boulay, in the History of the University of Paris; Lewis d'Orleans, in the Human Plant; Peter Ayrault, in his books of Ordine judiciario; John Vasse (2), in an Epistle Dedicatory.

[C] The settlements his children had.] Mr Menage has these words (3). Prædiquem fuisse, ut tum erant tempora, testantur & ejus ædes plurimæ, & prædia multa & liberi undecim, qui nido majores pennas, ut Placeti verbis utar, extenderunt. From the particular account of these eleven children, it appears that the daughters were married to persons of distinction; one to William Verloris, counsellor in the Chatelet, the son of John Verloris, a famous advocate in the parliament of Paris; another to John Matayer, counsellor of the exchequer; a third to Peter Ayrault, lieutenant-criminal at Angers. One of the sons was a counsellor in the Chatelet; another was canon of Senlis; a third was counsellor of the exchequer. He that was counsellor in the Chatelet, left a son who had the same office, was echevin at Paris in 1600, and left a son, who had, amongst other children, the wife of Denis Godefroy, Historiographer of France. There remained amongst John Des-Jardins's descendants but one person (4) who bore his name, when Mr Menage wrote his book.

[D] His death . . . gave occasion to a fine sonnet of Des-Portes.] The reader will not be displeased to see it. Here Father Vavasseur has translated into Latin, and Mr Menage has made an epigram upon the same thought (5).

Après avoir sauvé par mon art secourable
Tant de corps languissans que la mort menaçoit, Et chassé la rigueur du mal qui les pressoit,
Gagnant comme Esculape un nom toujours durable.
Cette fatale sœur, cruelle, inexorable,
Voyant que mon pouvoir le sien amoindrissoit;
Un jour que son courroux contre moi la pouffoit;
Finit quant & mes jours mon labeur profitable.
P A S S A N T, moi qui pouvois les autres secourir, Ne dis point qu'au besoin je ne me pus guerir,
Car la mort qui doutoit l'effort de ma science,
Ainsi que je prenois sobrement mon repas,
Me prit en trahison, sain & sans défiance,
Ne me donnant loisir de penser au trespas.

Long had I flourish'd in the godlike art
To ward the threats of death, and health impart;
From num'rous patients heal'd had gain'd a name,
And settled, Esculapius-like, my fame.
Th' inexorable sister saw each hour
Lessen her conquest, and decrease her pow'r;
And jealous of my rival prowess grown,
She stop'd my triumphs, to secure her own.
Yet say not, passenger, who bear'st this tale,
To heal myself my art could not avail:
Death, when my thoughts were otherwise employ'd,
Seiz'd an unguarded hour, and all my art destroy'd.

[E] Mr Menage was descended from John Des-Jardins by the mother's side.] Peter Ayrault, grandfather by the mother's side to Mr Menage, married Anne Des-Jardins, daughter of our Hortensius, and of Mary le Tellier his second wife, who was of the same family, from which chancellor le Tellier descended (6).

(5) All this is to be found, ibid. pag. 514. The Sonnet is at pag. 510.

(6) Menage, Remarques sur la Vie de P. Ayrault, pag. 515, 517.

HORTENSIUS (LAMBERT) born at Montfort in the province of Utrecht, the first day of April 1518 [A], has been ranked among the learned of his age. He studied at Louvain the learned languages with an extreme application, under excellent masters, and heard also Vives's lectures upon Logic. He published in Latin verse a translation of Aristophanes's Plutus, with notes, where he shewed the progress he had made in the Greek tongue. He published many other books [B]. He taught school a long time at Naerden in Holland, and very nearly escaped with his life when that town was sacked by the Spaniards in 1572, under the conduct of Frederic de Toledo, son to the duke of Alva. His house was plunder'd, and his natural son killed before his eyes (a), and he himself was going to be killed, notwithstanding his being a priest, but by good luck a gentleman (b) who had been his scholar, and then bore arms in the Spanish service, came in very seasonably to save his life. It is observed, that his only care was to save from the common wreck his comment upon Lucan's Pharsalia. He wrote a description of the

[A] He was born at Montfort the first day of April 1518. In this I disagree with my author Valerius Andreas, who says he was born in the year 1500. He was deceived doubtless by these words of Swertius (1), Nascitur anno dno. 15. xviii. Kal. Aprilis: he thought the numeral letters xviii, referred to the word Kalends, for want of remembering that there is not in the Roman Calendar, any eighteenth day, before the Calends of April. But this is not the only reason that determined me to join xviii to the preceding letters; I have been moved to that by another consideration; Valerius Andreas says, that Hortensius was very young (2) when he went to study at Louvain under Rutgerus Rescius, professor of the the Greek tongue: now

he says in another place (3), that Rescius died in 1545; (3) Pag. 805. which was the seventeenth year of his professorship; so that he began it only in 1528. How then could Hortensius study under this professor when he was very young, if he was born in the year 1500? but if he was born in the year 1518, all is easily reconciled. Paul Freherus (4) is mistaken, both in the year of his birth and of his death; for he says that Lambert Hortensius was born in the year 1501, and died in 1577.

[B] We have many books of his.] These are the titles of them: Enarrationes in Virgilio Æneida, in Fol. Explanationes in Lucani Pharsalia, printed at Basil in the year 1578, in Fol. Satyram in ævi sui

(b) His name was Weidam.

(4) In Theatro, pag. 1473. König says also, that he was born in 1501.

the plundering and slaughter of Naerden; the manuscript whereof is at Utrecht. He scarce survived that desolation, for he died in 1573 (c) near Naerden, in (d) a country house (e).

- (c) Anno à Ianuaria quæ soli propter doctrinam singularem pacierat altero, à nato Christo MDLXXIII. See the epitaph which those of Naerden ordered to be made for him in the church of St Vitus. Valerius Andreas has it.
(d) Freberus, in his Theatrum, pag. 1473, says, in præsidio sub suburbano. It should be prædio.
(e) Ex Valer. Andrea, Bibl. Belg. pag. 613.

fui vitia & mores libri II. Epithalamiorum liber I. Germanico à Carolo V. Casare gesto libri VII. Tu-Secessionum civilium Ultrajectinarum libri VII. De Bello multuum Anabaptistarum liber I. (5).

(5) I have quoted that book in the remark [B] of the article PICARDS. I add here, that it was reprinted at Amsterdam, in 1696, with the Historia Anabaptistica de factione Monasteriensis of Conrad. Herzbachius, by the care of Theodorus Strackius, minister of Burkh in the country of Cleves.

HORTENSIVS (MARTIN) a native of Delft in Holland, and professor of Mathematics at Amsterdam, would have made a greater progress in that science, if he had not died in the flower of his age (a) in the year 1639 [A]. The preface which he prefixed to a book of Philip Lansbergius, which he translated into Latin, and in which he makes strong objections against Tycho Brahe's system, shews how he cultivated the study of Astronomy; in which he was assisted by Lansbergius's conversation, to whom Beekman, rector of the school of Dort, a man very much spoken of in Des Cartes's history, recommended him. That book of Lansbergius is intitled Commentationes in motum terræ diurnum & annuum, & in verum aspectabilis cæli typum, and was printed at Middleburg in the year 1630, in 4to. Hortensius has also translated the Astronomical Institution of William Blaeuw, and writ a dissertation de Mercurio sub Sole visio & Venere invisio, dedicated to Gassendus, and an answer to what Kepler had prefixed to his Almanack in 1624 (b). Gassendus's letters to him, shew the particular esteem he had for him. Hortensius's letters to Gassendus are printed among those of that famous Philosopher. From them I learned that he was born in 1605 (c), and that he was admitted professor at Amsterdam in the year 1634 (d). He did not seem to be contented with his condition; and he speaks (e) of the spirit that reigned in that famous town, like a man vexed and enraged that they did not come to his lectures, nor encouraged the making of those machines he had contrived, from which he expected a success above all that Tycho Brahe had done (f). We have some orations of his, one de utilitate & dignitate Mathematicæ, and another de Oculo ejusque præstantia. He says in one of his letters to Gassendus (g), that the impression of his answer to the book which Peter Bartholinus had published against him in defence of Tycho Brahe, was only put off for want of paper. Probably that work kept company with the Pleiadographia (h), which remained in manuscript among the papers of the same author when he died. Des Cartes does not speak advantageously of his ability. As for the school-professors, says he (i), not one of them understands my Geometry; no not Golius, much less Hortensius, who has not made a sufficient progress for that.

(a) Valer. Andr. Bibl. Belg. pag. 652.

(b) See Vossius, de Scient. Math. pag. 201, 202.

(c) Oper. Gass. pag. 418, Tom. VI.

(d) Ibid. pag. 422.

(e) Ib. pag. 429.

(f) Ibid. pag. 425. Vide etiam pag. 429, & pag. 432.

(g) Pag. 129.

(h) Valer. Andr. Biblioth. Belg. pag. 652.

(i) Letters, Tom. III, pag. 191.

[A] He died in the year 1639. I have not followed Valerius Andreas here, who says he died in the year 1640. That which induced me not to follow him is a passage of Des Cartes, which deserves to be copied: I take it from one of his letters to Father Merfennus (1) which tho' it be not dated, yet it solidly fixes the date which I have occasion for, since in the very first lines the author acquaints us, that he wrote in answer to a letter of the last of December 1639. This is what I thought proper to copy of it: 'Hortensius being some years ago in Italy set about making the scheme of his nativity, and told two young men of this country who were with him, that he should die in the year 1639, and as for them they should not live long after. Now he dying this summer as you know, these two young men fell into such fears that one of them is already dead, and the other, who is the son of Heinius (2), languisheth in such a manner, and is so melancholy, that he seems to do all that is possible to verify the Astrologer's prediction. Here is a fine science indeed, which serves to kill people, who perhaps would not have been sick without it.' It would be wrong to object to me that Des Cartes might have written this letter after the summer of the year 1640, and consequently that he does not contradict Valerius Andreas; for his correspondence by letters with Father Merfennus was so frequent, that this objection must needs be false. But besides, I find in a letter of Boxhornius (3), dated the thirteenth of September 1639, that he laments the loss of Hortensius, who was lately dead.

(2) It is doubtless Nicolas Heinius, who did not die till 1681. Mr Baillet says the contrary, pretending that Heinius had two sons, and that he whom Des Cartes speaks of, actually died, and that his name was Daniel.

(3) Vide Epistolæ Boxhornii, pag. 144. Edit. Francof. 1679.

HOSIVS (STANISLAUS) cardinal and bishop of Warmia, was one of the most ingenious men that Poland has produced: he was born at Cracow in the year 1504. You will find in Moreri (a) an account of his actions, and of the honours he arrived to: It was not thought, when he was one of the presidents of the council, that he had all the address that such a station required [A]. His books of controversy are not inferior

(a) And better still in Bullart's Académie des Sciences, Tom. I, pag. 64, and following.

to

[A] It was not thought, when he was one of the presidents of the council, that he had all the address that such a station required. The cardinal of Mantua dying the second of March 1563, his colleagues, who presided with him in the council, wrote immediately to the Pope. He who was the first president (1), desired that a legate might be sent that should be above him. Hosius desired that he might have leave to go into Poland: but Simoneta advised the Pope not to send a new legate to Trent, hoping thereby to obtain the direction, not only because cardinal Seripande was weary of the council, and had no inclination to direct it any longer, but because cardinal Hosius was a plain man, who was easily governed. Simoneta desidero che la somma di guidare il Concilio restasse à lui, & havendo speranza di condurlo bene, con soddisfazione del Pontefice, & honor proprio; considerando che Seripando era satiato di quel negotio, & poco inclinato a volerlo guidare, & che Varmienese era semplice persona, disposta à lasciarsi reggere; mise in considerazione al Pontefice, che, ritrovandosi le cose del Concilio, &c. (2). Mr Amelot has not well translated these words, as any one may easily perceive. Here follows his version: 'Simoneta earnestly desiring the direction, and hoping

(1) Fra-Paolo, storico del Concilio di Trento, lib. vii, pag. m. 603. Compare with this the passage of the sixth book, pag. 448. It is the 517th page in Amelot's translation.

to

to the best that were written in that age. Casaubon has justly accused him [B] of having made an apology for a controversialist, who had said, that without the authority of the church, the holy Scripture has no more weight than Æsop's Fables. The Jesuit who has censured Casaubon upon this account, has only shewn his own ignorance (b). Hosius died near Rome the fifth of August 1579. Moreri has committed some mistakes [C].

It

(2) Hist. du Concile de Trente, pag. 657, 658. Amsterdam Edit. 1686.

(3) Hist. du Concile Trident. lib. xx, cap. vi, n. 6.

(c) Casaubon. in Bironium, Exercit. i, cap. xxxiii, pag. m. 134.

(4) Hist. Concil. Trident. lib. xx, cap. vi, n. 6.

(5) Hist. du Concile de Trente, pag. 657, 658. Amsterdam Edit. 1686.

(6) Hist. du Concile de Trente, pag. 657, 658. Amsterdam Edit. 1686.

(7) The words of Hosius quoted by Eudæmon-Johannes, are to be found in the third book against Brentius's Prolegomena, pag. 196. Edit. Colon. 1551, in fol.

(8) Si nihil gravius dixit Hosius, erit hæc in Brentium calumnia, non in Spiritum S. blasphemia. Ego Pighius, Hosii nihil habeo, nec Hermannus, cui blasphemiam hæc Scripturæ cum Æsopi fabulis comparationem tribuentes viros magis audiui. Jacob. Capellus, Pindia. If. Casaub. lib. iii, cap. v, pag. 78.

(9) Hosius, lib. iii, in Prolegomena Brentii, pag. 230, 231.

(10) Hosius had been saying, that Luther calls the Holy Scripture the book of Heretics. Gretserus observes it likewise, Proleg. Exam. Mystici. Pighius, pag. 196, and quotes Luther's words, ex Pighio. Eccl. Domin. 8. pag. Trin.

Note, that cardinal Palavicini (4) pretends to prove by authentic pieces, that what Father Paul advances concerning the ambitious artifices of Simoneta, is false.

[B] Casaubon has justly accused him, &c. . . . Let us follow the progress of this dispute, and begin with the words of this great critic (5): 'Verbo Dei viventes scripto minus etiam tribuit (Scippius in Ecclesiastico, cap. 135. quam sive Pighius, sive alius qui dixit Patrum memoria: Scripturam si auctoritate Ecclesiæ destitueretur, non plus per se valere quam fabulas Æsopi. Quod blasphemum dictum postea defendere ausus est Cardinalis Hosius. — He (Scippius in Ecclesiastico) gives less authority to the written word of the living G O D, than either Pighius, or another, who in the days of our fathers said: That if the Scriptures were deprived of the authority of the church, they would of themselves be of no more value than Æsop's Fables. Which blasphemous saying cardinal Hosius has dared to defend.' The Jesuit Eudæmon-Johannes maintained, that it was a calumny forged by Brentius, and pretended to prove it thus. 'Jam verò quando non memorat, neque quis Æsopiæ bujus fabulæ auctor sit, neque quo loco eam Hosius defenderit, vel ne convinci imposturæ posset, vel quod in aliquo alio rem eam legerat, et auctorem et calumniam ex Hosio detegam: videant deinde lectores, quam bona fide infideles isti fidei patroni disputent. Is igitur lib. 3. in prolegomena Brentii, ipso ferè initio: Magna pars, inquit, libelli [prolegomenorum Brentii] non aliunde conitans, quam è fannis, dictis, convitiis, in quo sic etiam ludit Scripturis, sic eas tractat joculariter: ut verè de ipso dici possit, quod venerabili viro Petro à Soto falso impingit, eum haud aliter Scripturis, quam Æsopi fabulis uti. Non est igitur ea Catholicæ cuiusquam Scriptoris vox: sed calumnia Brentii: quam vir illustrissimus falso in virum doctissimum excogitavit, in auctorem ipsum verè convenire defendit (6). — But since he doth not tell us, either who is the author of this [Æsopic] Fable, nor in what place Hosius has defended it, and this least he should be convicted of an imposture, or that he had read this story of some other person, I shall show both the author of it and the calumny from Hosius himself: and then let the reader judge, how ingenuously these faithless defenders of the faith argue. Hosius therefore in the third book against the Prolegomena of Brentius, near the beginning, says, The greatest part of this book [the Prolegomena of Brentius] consists only of buffoonry, jokes, and reproaches: in which likewise he so plays with the Holy Scriptures, and treats them in so burlesque a manner, that we may truly say of him, what he falsely alleges against the reverend Peter de Soto, that he useth the Scriptures in the same manner one would use Æsop's Fables. This therefore is not a saying of any Catholic writer, but a calumny of Brentius; which our illustrious author shows to be falsely invented against a very learned man, and properly to belong to the inventor himself. Here we find four things. I. A complaint that Casaubon has not marked in what part of Hosius's works he found this. II. That Brentius accuses Soto of using the scriptures as Æsop's Fables. III. That Hosius maintains, that this accusation is a slander with respect to Soto, but most true with respect to Brentius. IV. That these words of Hosius occasioned the scandalous reflection mentioned by Casaubon. The first of these four things is just. The carelessness of those who do not quote the particular chapter in an accusation of importance cannot be too much blamed: great authors are most liable to this fault: they think they shall be believed on their own word, and so will not give themselves the trouble of quoting: they think it enough to say, Plutarch, Cicero, St Augustin, say this. Abundance of readers had rather take it upon trust, or remain dubious, than take the pains to verify it. Tho' Casaubon had no real design to hinder any one from discovering whether his accusation was false or no, yet he has left room for that suspicion: why did he quote in so loose a manner? the second and third things are undeniable facts (7), but they signify nothing to this dispute. The fourth is a notable blunder of the Jesuit, as I shall prove in what follows.

The confidence with which he accuses Casaubon of calumniating cardinal Hosius, raiseth a certain prejudice to the disadvantage of this critic: but when we see Casaubon's apologists stop short, and coldly confess he has no book of Hosius (8), we are inclinable to believe that Eudæmon-Johannes is well founded in his accusation. Can one easily believe that a minister, who undertakes the confutation of Casaubon's censor, should not seek for Hosius's books till he finds them? is it so hard a matter to find them? one therefore suspects that this confession of his want of them is a subterfuge, invented on purpose that he may not be obliged to own the cardinal's innocence. But be in no fear for Casaubon: he charges Hosius with nothing but what is most true. 'Fingamus autem nunc verum esse, (they are Hosius's words (9) in the same book that Eudæmon-Johannes cites) quod tu scripsisse nescio quem narras, nam nomen non ex primis, ac fieri potest ut sit commentum tuum, Scripturas valere quantum fabulas Æsopi, si destitueretur auctoritate Ecclesiæ. Cedo Brentii, num hic minus reverentur de Scripturis loquutus est, quam qui vocat eam librum Hæreticorum (10), cum tamen nullorum sit minus quam Hæreticorum: est enim Catholicorum propria, qui tot seculis in ejus possessione præscriperunt. Et potuit illud tamen pio sensu dici, quem homo pius, qui charitatem habet quæ non cogitat malum, ex iis verbis eliceret. Nam revera, nisi nos Ecclesiæ doceret autoritas hanc scripturam esse canonicam, perexiguam apud nos pondus haberet. — Let us suppose that this is true, which you pretend some body or other has wrote, for you name no body, and possibly it may be an invention of your own, that the Scriptures are of no more value than Æsop's Fables, if you deprive them of the authority of the church. Pray, Brentius, has this person spoke with less reverence of the Scriptures, than he did who calls them the book of Heretics, when indeed it belongs to none less than to them: for it is the property of the Catholics, who have a right to it by the possession of so many ages. And yet these words might have been said in a pious sense, which a good man, who has charity, and thinketh no evil, may draw out of them. For indeed if the authority of the church did not teach us that this is the Canonical Scripture, it would have very little weight with us.'

[C] Mr Moreri has committed some mistakes. I. It was not to Pavia, but to Padua, that Hosius's relations sent him to study. Moreri might have discovered his mistake, if he had known that Lazarus Bonamici, whom he makes Hosius's master, was professor at Padua. Du Saussai (11) supposes, that Hosius being sent into Italy by the advice of Peter Thomici, bishop of Cracow, stopped at Bologna. He should have said that Hosius having studied at Padua some time, went to Bologna, and was there admitted doctor of law. 'Patavii, dein Bononiæ . . . Jurisprudentiæ industriam primo addixerat, & lauream sub

(11) Continuatio de Script. Eccles. cap. xxxii, pag. m. 23.

It has been thought, that this cardinal was the author of an anonymous book, very injurious to the Swiss, which was confuted by Bullinger in the preface to Josiah Simler's tract de aeterno Dei filio (c).

It is certain (d) that he wrote the anonymous piece I am going to mention. He composed it the year 1564, and intituled it Judicium & Censura de Judicio & Censura Ministrorum Tigurinorum & Heidelbergensium de dogmate contra adorandam Trinitatem in Polonia nuper sparso. It has been inserted in the collection of his works (e) and I do not doubt but it is in the editions which the author himself published. I believe the most compleat edition of his works is that of 1584 [D]. It contains a volume of posthumous works, among which there are many letters of Hosius, wherein he frequently repeats the same things, to wit, that Heretics ought to be extirpated, and that their divisions sufficiently show the injustice of their pretended reformation. He had read with great care the books which the Zuinglians and Lutherans had published against one another, and those concerning the violent disputes which had arose among the Lutherans. He is incessantly drawing odious conclusions from them, and he very subtly takes advantages from this, that these new doctors published books in defence of penal laws against those who erred, and that the strongest side in the schisms among the Lutherans, banished, imprisoned, &c. the other.

(c) See Hottinger in Pentate Differt. Miscell. pag. 214.

(d) Mr Crenius, part. XII of his Animadu. p. 65, only says, it is reported.

(e) From page 669 to 707, of the first Tome of the Colonn edition. My copy has in the title the year 1639.

(12) Thuan. lib. lxviii, sub fin. pag. m. 297.

sub ipso Hugone Boncompagno qui S. S. Gregorii XIII nomine dein praefuit, postremo adeptus est (12). — He began the study of the Law at Padua, and afterwards studied at Bologna, and at last received the doctor's degree from Hugh Boncompagno, who was afterwards Pope, by the name of Gregory XIII. This shows the second falsity of Moreri; who says that Hosius received his doctor's degree at Padua. III. He was made bishop of Calvi, at the instance of king Sigismund I. These words of Moreri imply another falsity; for it was Sigismund Augustus who procured him that bishopric. IV. How could Sigismund I. send him to Rome to Pope Julius III. He died in 1548, whereas this Pope was not created till 1550. V. He should not have said, that retiring into Poland after the conclusion of the council, he wrote those admirable works that remain of his: for this signifies, that he wrote no books before; whereas it is certain, that his answer to Brentius was printed at Cologne, in 1558. It is a work of four hundred pages in Folio. His book, intituled, Confessio Catholicae Fidei Christiana (13), was published before that at Mentz. His books of Communione sub utraque specie, de Sacerdotum conjugio, and de Missa vulgaris lingua celebranda, were printed at Paris, in 1561 (14). Du Saussai (15) deserves here a little censure; for he reckons most of these works among the books which Hosius published after the council of Trent. VI. Moreri should not have said in general, that Hosius's books were printed thirty two times before he died. He should, as Mr Bullart does, have made some exceptions. Several of his writings, says he (16), were printed two and thirty times in his life-time, in the principal cities of Christendom, and translated into French, Italian, German, Flemish, Polish, English, Scotch, and Armenian. Mr de la Rochepezoai (17) is wrong in making no exception. See the following remark.

I have not taken notice of what Moreri says about the reasons that obliged cardinal Hosius not to be present at the twenty fourth session. He pretends it was because he disapproved the decision, made concerning clandestine marriages: it is very true, that he did not like that decision, and that he endeavoured three or four times to get it revoked, for which reason he was taxed with obstinacy (18), but it is not certain, that his absence was grounded upon the reason which Moreri assigns. For he assisted at the session before, tho' he disapproved some things which were determined there about the sacrifice of the mass: he made no scruple to oppose them. Why then durst he not do as much as to clandestine marriages? would he not have been seconded by his colleague cardinal Simoneta, and some others? did he not send in writing, his opinion, which was contrary to the decree? did he not declare in writing, that he referred all that to the judgment of the holy father? In a word, his sickness was not counterfeited, and lasted a long time. Thus you have most of the reasons that Palavicini makes use of (19) to refute a story adopted by Father Paul, that Hosius pretended to be sick, that he might not be present at the session, in which the decree for clandestine marriages was to be ratified. There is sometimes reason to say, that the sickness of great men are affected, and only politic grimaces. But historians too speculative, are likewise sometimes mistaken in saying so.

[D] I believe the completest edition of his works is that of 1584. It was printed at Cologne by Maternus Cholin, and makes two volumes in Folio. The first contains the works formerly published, but here you have them as they were last revised by the author. The second volume consists altogether of pieces which had not been printed before, and which were collected by Stanislaus Reticus, who dedicates them to Stephen Battori king of Poland. His Epistle Dedicatory is dated from Rome, September 1. 1582. By the manner in which Mr Crenius speaks (20) of the Treatise intituled Judicium & Censura &c. I conclude that it is not in the Antwerp edition of 1566 in Folio, but I am persuaded that it is in the edition of Venice which the author himself dedicated to Pope Gregory XIII on the fifteenth of August 1573. He had revised and augmented his works for this edition. He dedicates the first Treatise to Henry of Valois king of Poland, and dates the Epistle Dedicatory on the same day with that of the whole volume. The first Treatise is intituled Confessio Catholicae Fidei Christiana. The author had wrote part of it three and twenty years before, and having sent it to Rome by the archbishop of Gnesna, it was so much approved of, that cardinal Otho Truchses, bishop of Augsburg, printed it in his own town of Dillingen. What was wanting being added, the whole work was printed at Mentz by the care of the archbishop of Gnesna. There soon followed other editions. Hosius's name did not as yet appear to it, and was not put to it, till Ruard Tapper desired the author to put his name, because it was usual in Germany to discourage the sale of anonymous books (21). This has been the best received of any of Hosius's works. Pope Pius IV made Paul Manutius reprint it at Rome (22): if there is no hyperbole in the thirty two editions which they mention (23), it must principally relate to this piece. Reticus extends it to all Hosius's works which he had published. 'Ipso etiam Autore vivente bis & trigiesies in praecipuis Christiani Orbis urbibus, Latina, Germanica, Gallica, Flandrica Lingua omnes Hosii Libri typis excusati, in Polonicam etiam & Italicam translati videbantur, & fortasse etiam in Armenicam, sicut ex sermone viri cujusdam in hac urbe illustrissimi accepimus (24). — During the author's own life, all Hosius's works were printed thirty two times in the chief cities of Christendom, in the Latin, German, French, and Flemish languages, and translated into the Polish and Italian, and possibly into the Armenian, as I have been informed by a famous man in this city.' But his Posthumous Works, consisting of a large volume in Folio, being to be excepted, I had reason to condemn Moreri's general expression.

(20) Crenius, Animadu. part. XII, pag. 65.

(13) See the preface of his answer to Brentius's Prolegomena.

(14) Oldoinus, in Athen. Romano, pag. 615.

(15) In Contin. de Scriptor. Ecclesiast. pag. 23.

(16) Bullart, Academ. des Sciences, Tom. I, pag. 70.

(17) In Nomenclatore Cardinalium, pag. 151.

(18) Palavic. Hist. Concil. Trident. lib. xxii, cap. ix, n. 6.

(19) Ibid. lib. xxiii, cap. vii, n. 17.

(21) Taken from Hosius's dedication to Henry of Valois, king of Poland.

(22) See the same epistle dedicat.

(23) See the preceding remark, citation (16).

(24) Stan. Reticus, Epist. Ded. Tom. II, Oper. Hosii, folio 3, verso. Edit. Colon. apud Chollin, 1584.

HOSPINIAN (RODOLPHUS) is one of the greatest authors of Switzerland. He was born at Altorf, a village of the county of Kiburg, in the canton of Zurich, the 7th of November 1547, and at seven years of age he was sent to Zurich to begin his studies. He made a great progress in them, under the direction of John Wolphius (a), his uncle by his mother; and losing his father (b) in the year 1563, he found a most affectionate patron in Rodolphus Gualterus (c) his godfather. He left Zurich to visit the other universities in March 1565, and staid two years at Marburg, where he distinguished himself by his great application to study, and his good conduct. He did the same at Heidelberg the six months he spent there; after which, his superiors recalled him, and he was received into the ministry in 1568. He was obliged to go and preach twice a week in a country church four or five leagues from Zurich. He punctually discharged these duties for eight years together, though he had a great deal of other business upon his hands in that town. For he was made a teacher of the third class in 1569, and Provisor of the Abbatial school in 1571. He was made Provisor of the Caroline school five years after. He rolled this Sisyphæan stone with wonderful patience for nineteen years together [A]. He was made burgher (d) in the year 1569, and married happily the same year [B]. His pastoral labours were somewhat lessened in the year 1576; for they gave him a church but a league from Zurich. The dust of the college did not discourage him from undertaking a noble work, and of a vast extent [C]. As he had bestowed all his spare time on the study of Ecclesiastical History, he formed the ground-work of a design which might shew the Roman Catholics, that they vainly boast of the conformity of their

(a) He was a minister, and published many books.

(b) He was minister at Altorf.

(c) He was a famous minister, of whom we have several Latin Homilies.

(d) Jo civitatis Tigurine rura felicitate ipsi collatum est. Heidegger, ubi infra, citat. (e).

(1) Jo. Henr. Heidegger, in Vita Hospiniani, pag. 8.

(2) Annoque plurimum triginta concorde in matrimonio tenuit. Heidegger, ibid. pag. 9.

(3) Que annum agens 33. sic satis vegeta etiamnum integro judicio & memoria, ex qua non pauca mihi suggestit historiam hanc locupletantia, pollet. Id. ibid.

(4) Id. ibid. pag. 23.

[A] He rolled this Sisyphæan stone for nineteen years.] I take this thought from the author of his life. 'Hanc quoque Spartam ornavit, (says he) (1), quantum potuit, saxumque hoc vere Sisyphium volvit revolvitque, & novemdecim annorum orbe circumegit indefessus athleta pari & industria & successu. — He likewise adorned this profession, and rolled this truly Sisyphæan stone with indefatigable labour for nineteen years, with a success equal to his industry.' What he says a little after, is very judicious: he wonders that Hospinian's genius was not debased by so painful employments. Ferreum certe adamantinumque dixeris qui tot labores exantlare, & simul ingenium à situ & qualore vindicare posset.

[B] He married successfully in the year 1569.] He married Anne Lavater, daughter of Lewis Lavater, then archdeacon of the Caroline church, and afterwards first minister. He was the son of Rodolphus Lavater, burgomaster of Zurich. The mother of Anne Lavater, was the daughter of Henry Bullinger, one of the principal reformers. Our Hospinian lived very happily with his wife above thirty years (2), and had fourteen children by her, whereof Elizabeth the youngest was still alive in 1681. She was widow of Rodolphus Stuckius, and eighty eight years old; and as she had preserved her judgment, and her memory, the furnished materials to him who wrote the life of her father (3). JOHN HENRY HOSPINIAN, his brother, was minister of the church of Bulac, and dean of the chapter of Reinsburg. RODOLPHUS HOSPINIAN, his brother, professor of the Hebrew tongue at Zurich, and deacon of the Caroline church, left two sons, RODOLPHUS HOSPINIAN, who was provost of the chapter of the same town, when Mr Heidegger wrote the life of our Rodolphus, and JOHN HENRY HOSPINIAN, minister of the church of Glattfeld. You will find in Mr Heidegger, several other persons descended from our Rodolphus. Who losing his wife in the year 1612, made reflexions becoming a good Christian, and quickly sought for consolation in a second wife. 'Patienter tamen domesticam illam calamitatem, utcumque acerbam, tulit, memor utique, & mortalem se duxisse, & ad æternam beatitudinem præmississe. Consolabantur etiam mox orbitatem ejus secundæ nuptiæ cum matrona honestissima Magdalena Wirzia, nobilis & eximii viri Conradi Wirzii, Præfeti quondam Vadiwillani, filia, bonis omnibus contracta, & d. XIII. Maji An. M. DC. XII. solenniter celebrata (4). — He patiently bore this domestic and bitter calamity, remembering that he had married a mortal woman, and that she was gone before him to eternal happiness. His widowhood was soon after comforted by a happy second marriage, with a virtuous matron Magdalen Wirz, daughter to that great and good man Conrad Wirz, some time governor of Wädelschwyl which was solemnly celebrated May 13. 1612.' He had experienced, that a wife did no ways take him off from his studies. 'Cujus consortium tantum abest ut, quod Romanentes nostris obijciunt, impedimentum aliquod studiis ejus piis objecerit, ut magno illi contra & dulci ad omne opus bonum incitamento adjumentoque fuerit (5). — Whose society far from being an impediment to his studies (as those of the Romish Church pretend) was a powerful and sweet help, and incitement to every good work.

[C] He engaged in a noble work, and of a vast extent.] It was the history of the errors of Popery. That which gave him the first thoughts of this undertaking, was a conversation which he had in a country inn with his host, who ridiculously believed, that the monastic life was derived from paradise. 'Fassum ali- quando ferunt, cum illa excursionem necessum haberet in hospicio porcuocare, hospitem rusticum non incuriosum crebra secum colloquia miscerem, & de Origine Papatus, vitæ in primis Monasticæ, quam ille pro simplicitate sua ex Paradiso arcescendam ridicule sustinuerit, anxie inquirentem, ansam sibi libros de Origine errorum scribendi præbuisse (6).' (6) Id. ibid. He considered that the Papists, when beaten by the scripture, had recourse to tradition, and wanted their antiquity, and undervalued the Protestants for their novelty. To deprive them of that sanctuary, he traced the original and progress of the Romish ceremonies and doctrines; and shewed by what degrees the truth, which JESUS CHRIST and his apostles had taught, had given place to innovations. 'Impetum conceptu animo suo plane heroicum, & laude nunquam intermorta dignissimum, scilicet illius vetustatis spectum debellandi, Gibeoniticæque artes & fraudes, monitris genuinis errorum, qui paulatim Ecclesiam inundaverant, originibus, detegendi convellendique. Et magnæ quidem molis, immensique laboris opus aggrediebatur, cum de cælesti doctrina, & ceremoniis veræ primitivæ Ecclesiæ, tum de inclinatione & depravatione ejusdem doctrinæ, deque ceremoniarum mutatione, autione & progressu iis seculis, quæ Christum & Apostolos primum, deinde verò Constantinum Imperatorem, imprimis autem Gregorium M. secutæ sunt (7). — He formed a truly heroic design, and worthy of immortal honour, of destroying that spectre of pretended antiquity, and of detecting and rooting out all their Gibeonitic arts and deceits, by showing the true origin of these errors which by degrees have overwhelmed the church. And this indeed was a work of great importance and immense labour, not only treating of the heavenly doctrine and ceremonies of the truly primitive church, but also of the decline and corruption of that doctrine, and the change, increase, and progress, of these ceremonies, first in the ages which followed CHRIST and the apostles, and then in those which followed the emperor Constantine, but especially in those which followed Gregory the great.' He chiefly designed to write about baptism, the eucharist, the churches, seals, faith, orders, monks, the primacy of the Pope, and burials (8). He began also to compose the lives of the Popes, and some animadversions upon Gratian (9). He was about forty one years old, when he laid the plan of this great design.

[D] He

their doctrines with antiquity. He was not able to finish his undertaking; but he published considerable parts of it [D], which procured him a great reputation, and obliged his masters to remove him from the dust of the school, to a more eminent station. He was made archdeacon of the Caroline church the 25th of September 1588. Six years after, he was chosen minister of the Abbatial church; an employment so much the more convenient for him, because it did not divert him so much from his great design. The book he published upon the Eucharist, and that intitled Concordia discors, terribly vexed the Lutherans. They vexed him in their turn with their Answers [E]; to which he did not

[D] He published considerable parts of it. I will here give a list of the books he published. The first was an oration de origine & progressu rituum & ceremoniarum Ecclesiasticarum. He spoke it in an academical assembly, and printed it in 1585. Two years after he published his treatise de templis, hoc est de origine, progressu, usu & abusu templorum, ac omnino rerum omnium ad templa pertinentium. He published a second edition of it in the year 1603, not only with corrections, but also with great additions; for he added to it, a confutation of the arguments which Bellarmine and Baronius had produced in behalf of their party upon that subject, since the first edition. In the year 1588, he published a tract De Monachis, seu de origine & progressu monachatus ac ordinum Monasticorum, equitum militarium tam sacrorum quam secularium omnium. Concerning the origin and progress of monkery and monastic orders, and of all the orders of knight-hood both ecclesiastical and secular. He published a second edition of it in 1609, in which he refuted Bellarmine's book de Monachis, published since the first edition of his work. He was just ready to publish his tract de Origine & progressu jejuniarum, in 1589, when a work of Bellarmine just printed gave him to understand, that this Jesuit promised a book upon that subject. He therefore deferred the publication of it, till he could join a confutation of what Bellarmine should allege. But he having applied himself to other subjects in the mean time, never finished that treatise. These other subjects were the Holy Days, upon which he published two volumes, one in 1592, the other in 1593. The first treats, De festis Judæorum & Ethnorum, hoc est, de origine, progressu, ceremoniis & ritibus festorum dierum Judæorum, Græcorum, Romanorum, Turcarum, & Indianorum. — Concerning the feasts of the Jews and Heathens, that is, concerning the origin, progress, rites and ceremonies of the feasts of the Jews, Greeks, Romans, Turks, and Indians. He reprinted it in the year 1611, with many corrections and additions. The second is intitled, De Origine, progressu, ceremoniis & ritibus festorum dierum Christianorum. — Concerning the origin, progress, rites, and ceremonies of the Christian feasts. He reprinted it in 1612 with large supplements, which served both to refute Bellarmine upon the Romish idolatry, and James Greiser upon Corpus-Christi-day. In 1598, he published the first volume of his Historia Sacramentaria: 'Hoc est libri quinque de Cœnæ Dominicæ prima institutione, ejusque vero usu & abusu in primitiva Ecclesia, nec non de origine, progressu, ceremoniis & ritibus Missæ, transubstantiationis & aliorum pœne infinitorum errorum, quibus Cœnæ prima institutio horribiliter in Papatu polluta & profanata est. — That is five books concerning the institution of the Eucharist, and it is true use and abuse in the primitive church; likewise concerning the origin and progress, rites and ceremonies of the mass, of transubstantiation, and an almost infinite number of other errors, by which the original institution of the Eucharist, has been horribly polluted and profaned in the church of Rome.' Four years after he published the second volume of that history, containing the controversies betwixt those of the Augsburg confession, and the other Protestants, about the Eucharist. The title of it is De origine & progressu controversiæ sacramentariæ de Cœnâ Domini inter Lutheranos & Orthodoxos quos Zwinglianos & Calvinistas vocant exortæ, ab anno Christi Salvatoris 1517, usque ad annum 1602. — Concerning the origin and progress of the Sacramentarian controversy, about the Lord's-supper, betwixt the Lutherans, and the orthodox called Zwinglians and Calvinists, from the year 1517 to 1602. He published in the year 1607 a work intitled, Concordiæ discors, seu de origine & progressu formulæ Concordiæ Bergensis. — The Disfording

Concord, or of the origin and progress of the Form of Concord of Berg. In the year 1619, he published a book against the Jesuits. Historia Jesuitica, hoc est, de origine, regulis, constitutionibus, privilegiis, incrementis, progressu, & propagatione Ordinis Jesuitarum; item de eorum dolis fraudibus, imposturis, nefariis facinoribus, cruentis consiliis, falsa quoque seditiosa & sanguinolenta doctrina (10). — A history of the Jesuits, that is, of the origin, rules, constitutions, privileges, increase, progress, and propagation of the order of Jesuits; likewise of their deceits, frauds, impostures, flagitious crimes, bloody counsels, and false seditious and bloody doctrine. With this he ended his compositions, being resolved to spend the rest of his days in prayers, pious reading, and sacred meditations.

[E] Two of his pieces vexed the Lutherans; and they vexed him in their turn by their answers. The history of the Sacramentarian war betwixt the Lutherans and Calvinists, and that of the Formulary of Concord, shew so much confusion, passion, shuffling and cavilling on the Lutheran side, that it would be a miracle, if these two books had not furiously provoked the Saxon divines. In Saxony they chose a man to answer Hospinian, who was very fit to dazzle the public; a man, I say, who treated his adversaries most contemptuously, and took upon him magisterial airs. There is nothing like this to conceal the weak sides of a cause. Historiæ sacramentariæ pars posterior & concordia illa discors vehementer eos, qui Lutheranorum partium affecla se professi sunt, urebant; qui eorum operum vim chrysippeis sophismatis, & tortuosis argutiis, acerbisque dictis convellere maximopere laborabant. Constat autem, utriusque operis refutandi in Saxonis oris negotium Leonhardo Huttero, Wittebergensi Professori, homini arroganti & prave facundo, datum esse. Et primum quidem An. M.DC.XI. personatus ille, uti prudenter conjectabant, prodiit, larva scilicet assumpta cujusdam Christophori à Vallo, S. Theologiæ Candidati, sub qua adversus ea, quæ Hospinianus in Annalibus Sacramentariis ad annum M.DC.XIX. (11) gesta prodidit, vernacula scriptione ingenii sui libidine procaciter satis exercuit (12). — The second part of the Sacramentarian history, and the Disfording Concord, grievously galled the Lutherans, who endeavoured to ruin the strength of them by sophistry, cavilling, and railing. It is certain that the task of answering them both was laid upon Leonard Hutterus, professor at Wittemberg, a man of an arrogant and petulant wit. And he first appeared in the year 1611, disguised under the name of Christopher à Vallo, student in Theology, as was well conjectured, under this mask he exercised the petulancy and licentiousness of his wit, in his native language, against what is contained in Hospinian's Sacramentarian history to the year 1529. David Pareus no sooner saw this work of Hutterus (13), but he gave Hospinian notice of it, and advised him to answer it in High-Dutch, without waiting till his adversary should finish his Confutation.

Adversus Commentarium tuum alterum de re sacramentaria, nec non Concordiam discordem compertum, mandatum ex aula Saxonica D. Huttero datum, historiam tuam ut refutaret. Laborasse etiam illum ea in re ex domesticis meis studiosius cognovi. His nundinis Lipsensibus prodiit Germanica hæc Historiæ Sacramentariæ consignatio, usque ad annum 29 deducta. Credo vobis non esse visam. Author magna pollicetur, & triumphus est, ut audio, nostris vicinis, &c. Percurri librum. Præter magnifica mendacia nihil video novi. Suaferim ut vestigia hujus scriptoris, qui haud dubie est ille Hutterus, premas illico, neque exspectes, dum tota moles te opprimat. Feceris magnum operæ pretium Germanicè respondendo (14). — I am informed that Hutterus, has received orders from the court of Saxony, to answer the second part of your Sacramentarian history and Disfording Concord. And I am told by some students

(10) Taken from his Life, written by Heidegger.

(11) It is an error of the press: it should be MDXXIX.

(12) Heidegger ubi supra, pag. 22.

(13) Note, that some say, that Christophorus Wilhelmus à Vallo, was Chr. Wil. Walpurgus, a divine of Leipsic. See Mollerus, Iliogoe Hist. Chersonesi Cambricæ, part. III, pag. 133.

(14) Heidegger ibid. pag. 22.

not finish his reply, as knowing that the common enemies of the Protestants were too much diverted by such a scene. He therefore turned all his forces against the Jesuits. I doubt not but the suppression of his Reply was very grateful to some Princes [F]. He lost the dents who lodge in my house, that he has for some time been employed in it. This last Leipzig fair, this German confutation of the Sacramentarian history has appeared, carried down to the year twenty nine. I believe you have not yet seen it. The author promises mighty things, and our neighbours, I hear triumph upon it, &c. I have read over the book; besides impudent falsehoods I see nothing new in it. I would advise you to come as close on this author's heels as possible, who no doubt is the above-named Hutterus, and not to wait till you are oppressed by the whole load. It would be of great use if you would answer him in the German language. Hospinian immediately wrote a reply, but he did not publish it (15). In the year 1614

(15) Non desuit bonæ causæ Hospinianus, utpote qui . . . personatam egregie detrahit, adnotata scriptione vernacula, quæ & historice à se confignate veritatem in arce collocavit, & adversantis vanitatem solidè detexit. Neque tamen responso isthæc, omnibus numeris absoluta, lucem videt. Id. ibid.

(16) Ib. pag. 22:

(17) Sine mora reprimendam exultantem hominis audaciam. Id. ibid. pag. 23.

(18) Id. ibid.

[F] The suppression of his reply was very grateful to some princes.] About the time that Hospinian printed his Concordia discors, Frederic IV, elector Palatine, wrote to the magistrates of Zurich, about a conference, that was proposed betwixt the Lutherans and the Calvinists, to find out ways of accommodation, that might serve for a league between the Protestant princes, against the sanguinary designs of the Jesuits. For this reason Hospinian's book was thought as to that matter, the best he could, in a letter he wrote to Maurice, Landgrave of Hesse (19). He said, that though these conferences serve only to widen the breach, as has been often found by experience; yet he would have defetred the impression of his work, or even condemned it to the obscurity of his closet, if he had known the princes intentions before: 'Li-bri, intempestive editi culpam . . . sic studiose amolitur, ut simul de institutis ejusmodi Colloquiis sententiam graviter proferat hunc ferè in modum: 'Etsi ego de hujusmodi colloquio mihi ipsi nihil boni pulcieri possem, & majoris animorum distractiones & conturbationes, odia item, contentiones, ac dissidia post illud nocentissima vehementer metuam, præsertim si mecum reputem, quæ Marpurgense, Maulbrunnense, Mompelgardense & Ratisbonense colloquia secuta sint; & adversarii palam protestentur, se non discere, sed docere, & ne in minimo quidem articulo sententiam mutare, sed in semel concepta opinione firmiter permanere velle: nihilominus editionem hujus libri vel in aliud tempus rejecissem, ac reservassem; vel, si ex usu ecclesiæ fuisset, prorsus suppressissem, si hoc consilium & institutum illustris Principum vel ante semestre mihi cognitum fuisset, ne illud impedisse accusari meriti possem (20). — He makes an apology for the unseasonable publication of his book, and at the same time with great gravity, delivers his opinion concerning conferences of this kind, in the following words. 'Though I, for my own part, hope for no good from such a conference, but am very much afraid that it will be followed by greater distractions of mens minds, greater hatred, contentions, and dangerous divisions, especially when I consider what were the consequences of the conferences at Marpurg, Maulbrun, Montbelliard, and Ratisbon, and that the adversaries openly declare that they will teach, but not learn, that they will not change their opinion in the least article, but will remain firm in their preconceived notions: yet notwithstanding I would have deferred the publication of this book to another time; or if it had been for the good of the church suppressed it altogether, if I had known the design of these illustrious princes, but half a year ago, that I might give no ground to any to accuse me of hindering it.' The fear he had of displeasing some princes, and exposing some people to great dangers, obliged him not to insert in his work all that he knew (21). 'Fastus est ingenuè, operi illi de Concordia discorde, deesse plurima: nulla equidem sua culpa, sed tum quod ad cognitionem & manus suas plura non pervenerint; tum quod nonnulla dedita opera, omitti consultius visum sit, propter adimonitionem ex aula potente insinuatam, ut in scribenda ea historia caute circumspicteque sgat, si quid secretorum ex cameris Principum, præsertim verò ex oris Saxonis habeat. Fore alioquin, ut res hæc ingenti periculo non careat, propter orthodoxos iis in locis suspectos, ne cum iis ludus Crellianus vel Procerianus (22) ludatur. — He owned ingenuously, that many things were wanting in that book, intitled, 'The Discord-ing Concord, and that through no fault of his, but partly because many particulars never came to his knowledge, and because he had thought it better to omit some things, on account of an advice he had received from a powerful court, that he ought to be very cautious in writing that history, if he had got any secrets from the cabinets of princes, especially from those on the Saxon side. That otherwise it might have dangerous consequences to the orthodox who might be suspected there, and the Crellian and Pucarian game might be played over again.' It is therefore very likely, that he gave over his reply, amongst other reasons, because he feared he should be looked upon as the cause of a Theological War, that might hinder the Protestant states from uniting in their common interests (23). It is very certain, that the princes of the empire, both Lutherans and Calvinists, were well pleased with his silence; for the history of that time informs us, that the controversies of the divines very much embarrassed the princes, and they still at this day cause from time to time the greatest disturbances to the magistrates in several imperial towns. Into what troubles has Hamburg fallen not long ago (24), upon the disputes of the ministers that divided the people, and were the causes of seditious assemblies? These disputes are hardly ever appeased, but by the banishment of him who has the weaker faction: so that, if

(20) Vita Hospin. pag. 21.

(21) In literis ad Wolphangum Amilungum, Ecclesiæ Serevestanæ Pastorem & Superintendentem, die 22. Aug. 1607.

(22) I think it is an error of the press for Pucarianus.

(23) Idem, Heidegg. pag. 21.

(24) Two or three years ago, the Dutch Gazettees spoke of nothing else. I write this in September, 1695.

the use of his eyes for almost a year by a cataract; however, he preached as he used to do. It was happily couched the 18th of September 1613. At seventy six years of age he grew childish, and was not delivered from that miserable condition, but by his death the 11th of March 1626, in his seventy ninth year. His writings had raised such an opinion of his learning, that he was advised from all sides to confute Baronius's annals, no body being thought more capable of doing it (e). A new edition of his works was printed at Geneva in seven volumes in Folio, 1681. [G].

(e) Taken from his Life, written by John Henry Heidegger, and prefixed to the edition of his works, 1681.

(25) Virgil, Georg. lib. iii, ver. 224.

(26) Christianus, redivivus, hoc est, de ortu & progressu recepte a Christiano Electore Saxoniae Ecclesiarum & Scholarum in Saxonia superiore Reformationis Historia, ex actis & originalibus, ut sint optimi Principis defuncti vindictae perennes, fide iter congesta, & tribus libris comprehensa. . . Christianus Redivivus, that is, A History of the Rise and Progress of the Reformation of the Churches and Schools in Upper Saxony, begun by Christian, Elector of Saxony, Extracted from Acts and Original Papers, which may serve for a lasting Apology for that excellent Prince, faithfully compiled in three books. Heidegger, ubi supra, pag. 22.

one may be allowed to use comparisons, it might be said, that these quarrels are like those of bulls, who fight for a heifer; the weakest hides himself, and comes no more in sight.

Nec mos bellantes una stabulare; sed alter Victus abit, longaeque ignotis exulat oris, Multa gemens ignominiam, plagaque superbi Victoris, tum quos amisit inultus amores: Et stabula aspectans regnis excessit avitis (25).

Nor when the war is over is it peace,
Nor will the vanquish'd bull his claim release,
But feeding in his breast his antient fires,
And, cursing fate, from his proud foe retires,
Driven from his native land to foreign grounds,
He with a generous rage resents his wounds;
His ignominious flight, the victor's boast,
And more than both, the loves which unreveng'd he lost.

Often he turns his eyes, and with a groan
Surveys the pleasing kingdom once his own.

Perhaps the reason I have mentioned, induced Hospinian to break off his history of the reformation projected in Saxony, under the elector Christian. He had been furnished with memoirs, which might have provoked his successors. See in the margin the title that was to be given to this history (26); and here follows what Mr Heidegger observes concerning the memoirs he was supplied with: 'Grande scilicet volumen ex Saxonia submissum in haereditatis manibus versatur, quo Christiani Electoris illius Principis & pientissimi

& fortissimi, dicere crebro soliti: Ego nec Calvinianus sum, nec Flaccianus, sed Christianus. Habent Flacciani suum Caelum in quo etiam ipsum orcum collocant: Ephemerides accuratissime texuntur, & instituta ab ipso ecclesiarum Saxoniarum Reformatio, subita & improvisa ejus morte interrupta, plenissime exponitur, ex quibus, aliisque etiam irrefragabilibus monumentis Christianum illum redivivum orbi Christiano, non parum certe pia Principis illius meditatione admiratur, repraesentare statuerat (27). — (27) Id. ibid. A great volume which was sent to him from Saxony, is still in the possession of his heirs, in which the Annals of Christian, that pious and brave elector and prince, who used frequently to say: I am neither a Calvinist, nor a Flaccian, but a Christian. The Flaccians have their heaven, in which they place, even hell itself, are written with great accuracy, together with a full history of the reformation of the Saxon churches, begun by him, and interrupted by his sudden and unexpected death, from which and other unquestionable authorities, he designed to offer his Christianus Redivivus to the Christian world, which without doubt would greatly admire the pious intentions of that prince.

[G] A new edition of his works was printed at Geneva in 1681, in seven volumes in folio. There are none of those tracts in it, to which the author had not put his last hand. His heirs have religiously observed his intention (28), being not willing to communicate them to the public; but have only furnished some remarks, which he added to his works after they were printed. You will find in his Life what pieces he had advanced a good way in, and what he had but made a rough draught of. This is enough to shew his vast learning and prodigious labour.

(28) Neque contentus etiam illa quae inchoata & affecta, quoad nondum iustus ordo, lima & colophon adhibita, ultimaeque manu nec dum perpolita essent, neque ipse superfluis prodire solitus est, cum impia fastidiosa famae nominis sui, neque praeter ejus voluntatem & consilium heredes, cimeliorum istorum cultores, edere voluerunt. Id. pag. 114.

HOSPITAL (MICHAEL DE L') chancellor of France in the XVIth century, was one of the greatest Men of his Time. He was of Auvergne, and of a family of no great distinction; he gradually raised himself [A], and was counsellor in the parliament of Paris, when princeps Margaret, sister to king Henry II, having had the duchy of

(1) Naudé, Comp. d'Etat. chap. v, pag. m. 787.

(2) Thevet, Elog. Tom. VII, pag. 368, Edit. in 12mo. Histoires des, as he went, from the left wall of chancelier de l'Hospital. You will find it in Colomic's Bibliothéque choisie, pag. 53.

(3) Id. ibid. 8. 369.

Id. ibid. as he says is found in the left wall of chancelier de l'Hospital.

[A] He was of Auvergne, and of a family of no great distinction. His father was a Physician, and was employed by the constable Charles de Bourbon. He never forsook him, following him in disguise, partaking of all his misfortunes, assisting him in all his designs, against the king, against the emperor, and against Rome, against the cardinals, and the Pope himself (1). When he accompanied him in his retreat to the emperor Charles, he left in France, all his children, both sons and daughters; who being but young, could not bear the hazards and fatigues of such a journey. Our Michael was then at Toulouse and eighteen years of age, and though he was there with no other design than to study, he was carried away upon suspicion, and shut up in the public prisons, till there was an express command from the king to release him, and give him liberty to pursue his studies, since he was not found tainted with any design that could render him guilty (2). He went to see his father at the time that the constable being returned into Italy, found affairs much perplexed there (3); for Francis I. had laid siege to Milan (4), and because the siege was like to last long, this Physician fearing lest his son, by too great a discontinuance, should make a dangerous breach in his studies, committed him to the care of some carriers, that they might take him along with them, with whom he left Milan, disguised in the habit of a mule-driver; and with great danger of his life passed the river Abdua, and afterwards went to Padua, where the study of the Law had flourished from all antiquity. His father left him in that university six years, and then he recalled him to Bologna, and to Rome; VOL. III.

where he was honoured with a place amongst the judges whom they call auditors of the Rota. He resigned it by the advice of his father, upon the promises made him by cardinal Grandmont to advance him to higher posts in his country; but he was disappointed of his hopes at once, both on one side and the other. For the place of auditor was given to another, and the sudden death of cardinal Grandmont put an end to the hopes that brought him into France. Being thus disappointed, he applied himself to the bar; and after practising there about three years, he married Mary Morin, daughter of the lieutenant-criminal Morin, who brought for her portion, a place of counsellor in the parliament (5), which he exercised about nine years, and then he was sent ambassador to Bologna, for king Henry, where a general assembly of the bishops had been appointed for some reformation. Thevet adds, that he was afterwards chancellor to the dukes of Berry, and then head and superintendent of the king's finances, in his chamber of accounts, and that after the death of king Henry he was elected privy-counsellor (6). Note, that his father, after the constable's death, followed for some time the court of the emperor Charles V (7), and then attaching himself to the service of Renata de Bourbon, sister of his first master, and wife of Antony of Lorraine, spent there the rest of his days (8). Some make him the son of a man, who was born, and lived and died, a Jew in the city of Avignon (9). Varillas, from whom I take these words, says elsewhere (10), that the father of Michael de l'Hospital was a Jew. He is very much subject to this sort of confusion. Mr Teflier assures us, that Mezeraï relates,

(5) Note, that there is a mistake as to the time in Moreti's Dictionary, where it is said, that l'Hospital was counsellor of the parliament of Paris, in 1524, and that his place of chancellor to the princeps Margaret, was given to him after all the others, except that of chancellor of France.

(6) Thevet, ubi supra, pag. 371.

(7) Testam. de l'Hospital apud Colomic, ubi supra, pag. 55.

(8) Belcorius, lib. xxviii, n. 57.

(9) Varillas, Hist. de l'Heres. livr. xxii, pag. m. 170. Duch Edit. He had this from Beaucaire, lib. xxviii, n. 57.

(10) Idem, Hist. de François II, pag. m. 194.

(a) Paquier, Letters, Tom. II, book xxii, pag. 758.

(b) La Planché, Hist. de François II, pag. m. 228.

(c) Dated in May, 1560.

(11) Teffier, Addit. aux Elog. Tom. I, pag. 396. Edit. 1696.

(12) Id. ibid. Tom. II, pag. 413. Edit. 1683.

(13) La Planché, pag. m. 228. Hist. de François II.

(14) In the remark [I].

(15) Thuanus, lib. xxiv, sub fin.

(16) Teffier, Addit. aux Elog. Tom. I, pag. m. 396.

(17) Thuanus, lib. xiii, sub fin. pag. m. 278, observes, that Michael de l'Hospital, president of the chamber of accounts in the year 1544, favoured the design of the cardinal of Lorraine, to make the parliament of Paris sit half a year.

of Berry assigned her, chose him for her chancellor (a). He continued with her in the same post in Italy, after she married the duke of Savoy, and he was at Nice when he was raised to the dignity of chancellor of France, under the reign of Francis II in 1560 (b). It was believed that the Guises procured him that office, and that they did it upon the notion they had, that being obliged to them [B], he would do all they should desire. They were mistaken; for he laid down for his maxim the good of the kingdom, and the true interests of the king his master. It is true, he was obliged to use address [C], because if he had openly opposed the designs of the Guises, he had not been able to remedy the confusions of France. He was forced then to swim betwixt two streams, and by that prudent conduct he turned off some storms, which threatened the kingdom, and retarded some others, and found the means of doing good service to his country, as much as the miserable condition of the times would permit him. He hindered, amongst other things, the introduction of the Inquisition, by consenting to an edict (c) that was much more severe against the Protestants, than he would have desired [D]. It was the edict of Romorantin. There is no doubt but that if he had been relates, that the father of the chancellor was the son of a Physician to the queen of Navarre, wife of Antony de Bourbon (11). He cites (12) page 1156, of the second volume of Mezerai's History of France. I find nothing concerning chancellor de l'Hospital in the second volume of that author: I only find in the twenty second page of the third volume, that he was the son of the Physician to Renata de Bourbon, wife of Antony of Lorraine.

[B] It was believed that the Guises procured him that office, and that they did it upon the notion they had, that being obliged to them, &c. Lewis Regnier, Sieur de la Planché, relates, that after the death of chancellor Olivier, they offered his place to Morvilliers, a pious counsellor and bishop of Orleans . . . a most affectionate servant of their family, and that they cunningly served themselves by his refusal. For thinking they could make better use of Michael de l'Hospital, a man brought up, advanced, and formed by them, they took Morvilliers at his word, and sent in request of the other to Nice, where he was chancellor to the dukes of Savoy. The dukes were therefore made to believe, that the king, to oblige her, made her chancellor his own (13). But other historians say, that the queen-mother was the true author of that choice; being moved to it by the dukes of Montpensier, who thought thereby to give a check to the ambition of the Guises. See the article LONGVIC (14). Thuanus (15) adds, that when they acquiesced in that choice, the affair was already concluded, and that Catherine de Medicis let Michael de l'Hospital know, that it was not at their recommendation, but at her's, that the king had honoured him with that dignity, and that therefore she hoped to see him more zealous for the interest of his prince, and of the queen, his mother, than for that of a family, whose ambition was detested by every body. The same historian observes, that it was more easy for the queen-mother to bring this about, because Michael de l'Hospital was in good esteem with the cardinal of Lorraine. Note, that Mr Teffier is mistaken when he says, quoting Thuanus's twenty fourth book, that Catherine de Medicis obliged Henry II, to make Michael de l'Hospital chancellor of France (16). He should have said Francis II.

[C] He was obliged to use address. We will still make use of la Planché, for our comment upon this text. As for the chancellor de l'Hospital, few people rejoiced at first to see him raised to that dignity, having been so familiar with the cardinal (17), inasmuch that it was thought he would not be so bold as to contradict him in any thing, having had so many favours and preferments from him. But as he knew the genius of the Guises, having for a long time been acquainted with them; so he had the prudence dexterously to prevent their stratagems, if not as he ought, yet at least as well as he could, according to the malice of the times, warding off their most furious blows with a singular industry. For having proposed to himself, as soon as he was established in his post, to steer a right course, like a wise man, and not to favour one party or another, but to serve the king and his country, he was obliged to use a wonderful address to keep those of the house of Lorraine within due bounds. And this likewise he had a mind to perform in such a manner, that they might not perceive, he intended in any thing to contradict or displease them, well knowing, that if they once entertained that opinion of him, he should be able to do nothing to any purpose. Thus with great dissimulation many things passed through his hands, which were thought very dangerous: however he kept a medium, giving hopes to those who loved the public, that all should end well at last, provided they would let him bring it about. Few people understood his intention: but time discovered that he had the service of his king, and the safety of the people at heart, quite other-wise than was imagined. And to speak truth, his prudence cannot be sufficiently described. For certainly, though if he had taken a shorter way, and boldly opposed the evil, he would have been more to be praised, and God possibly would have blessed his constancy: yet as far as may be judged, he alone by his moderate management has been the instrument, which God has made use of to stop the force of these impetuous waves, in which all the French would have been overwhelmed. Nevertheless, outward appearances were against him. In short, when any one minded him of an approaching danger, he had always this saying in his mouth, patience, patience, all will go well (18).

[D] He hindered . . . the introduction of the Inquisition, by consenting to an edict much more severe against the Protestants than he would have desired. Here is the sequel of the Sieur de la Planché's narrative (19). To make short, when the question was about extending the edict for the Spanish Inquisition, knowing that the privy-council and the parliaments had agreed to it, he moderated the matter, by an edict made on purpose, for which he gave no good reasons, that the Guises themselves, who had procured the first edict, were of his opinion, and made the Spaniards approve it, who were desirous that France should be ordered and framed by their model. This happened in the month of May, in the town of Romorantin, and that edict was ever after called the edict of Romorantin. Varillas observes (20) that a moderate a conduct displeased the Calvinists, and did not satisfy the Catholics. The Calvinists took exception, that they had given them their adversaries, and irreconcilable enemies, for their judges

(21); and the Catholics suspected from that time, that the chancellor was of the new religion. . . . They reproached him with going to mass only for form sake; and the mass of the chancellor became a proverb, to signify a mass that people went to, only in obedience to the king. The house of Guise had no better opinion of this magistrate, and repented that they had contributed with the dukes of Savoy to raise him to that high station. They fancied, that this able politician endeavoured to withdraw himself from their dependance, by forming at court a third party with the queen-mother, to keep the balance even between the two others, so as neither of them might supplant the other. This puts me in mind of this passage of Brantôme (22). 'He Eloge du Connétable de Montmorency, was reckoned an Huguenot though he went to mass, but it was said at court, GOD preserve us from the mass of Monsieur de l'Hospital.'

This is the common fate of those, who seek to keep a temper between the pretensions of two opposite parties, that they please neither the one nor the other. But that inconvenience is sometimes a lesser evil, than it would be to comply with the passions of one of the parties; and there are many conjunctures, in which

(18) La Planché, ubi supra, pag. 359, 360.

(19) La Planché, ibid. pag. 361.

(20) Varillas, Hist. de l'Hérésie, tom. xii, pag. 170.

(21) By virtue of that edict, the crimes of Heresy belonged only to the bishops, and all the royal judges were deprived of it.

(22) Brantôme, Eloge du Connétable de Montmorency, tom. II, of his Mémoires, pag. 89.

been sole manager of these things, he would have procured a full toleration for the Protestants. His good offices and management were undoubtedly one of the causes which altered the dispositions of mens minds towards them; this alteration was so remarkable, that the second year of his ministry there were almost as many voices for them as against them in the council which examined the petition they presented to the king [E], desiring the free exercise of their religion. His influence was no less effectual in the restrictions of the edict of July 1561 (d), and in the liberty they had not to observe it (e). The edict of January which they obtained some time after, was doubtless his work: now that edict permitted them public assemblies, and many other privileges. This was the only remedy for the evils of the kingdom; all the dreadful miseries that afflicted it for thirty years arose from the infraction of that edict: and after all these dismal calamities, it was necessary to take the same remedy, and in a stronger dose. It was necessary to grant them the edict of Nantes, which was much more advantageous to the Reformed, than that which chancellor de l'Hospital had procured them. But I confess also that the Romish religion did not run such a risk when the edict of Nantes was granted, as it did when he procured the edict of January [F]. The obstacles that he

(d) The zealous Catholics were displeased with those restrictions. See the end of the remark [E].

(e) See the remark [F], citat. (33).

was

the greatest good that can be done, is to divide the disadvantages, that every one may have his share of them. Our chancellor would have spoiled all, if he had at first undertaken to give full satisfaction to the enemies of the house of Guise. This had been to split against a rock. Prudence would not suffer him to attack that faction, but with a side wind; they had the wind in the stern, and he was not to steer against it. I believe, that many Calvinists, who had more zeal than knowledge of the world, always condemned this chancellor's conduct. They would have had him to declare himself openly and boldly the protector of their cause. But could he have preserved his post three months together, had not he observed that temper? He well understood, that the best way to withstand a tempest, was that which Plutarch makes mention of, speaking of the government of republics. Astronomers tell us, the sun's motion is neither exactly parallel with the rest of the orbs, nor yet directly and diametrically opposite to them; but describing an oblique line, with insensible declination, he steers his course so, to dispense his light and influence, in his annual revolution, at several seasons, in equal proportions to the whole creation. So it happens in political affairs, that if the motions of rulers be constantly opposite and cross to the genius and inclination of the people, they will be stomached as arbitrary and tyrannical; as, on the other side, too much deference and indulgence to the subjects levity and wantonness, has often proved dangerous and fatal; but the gratifying them in reasonable and fair requests, when they are not masterly and insolent, may prove for the honour and safety of the government (23).

(23) Plutarch. in Phocione, init.

(24) Cicero, Orat. pro Plancio, cap. xxxix, pag. m. 610. See also Epist. ix, lib. i, ad Familiares, pag. m. 56.

Tacit. lib. iv,

cero observes, that politicians ought to imitate sailors. An, cum videam navem secundis ventis cursum tenentem fenum, si non ea eum petat portum, quem ego aliquando probavi, sed alium non minus tutum atque tranquillum, cum tempestate pugnam periculosam potius, quam illi salute præsertim præposita obtemporem & paream? neque enim inconstantis puto sententiam tanquam aliquod navigium, atque cursum ex Reipub. tempestate moderari (24). — Should I, when I see a ship holding a steady course with a fair wind, though she doth not steer to the harbour which I once approved of, but to another equally safe and calm, should I, I say, rather, with the utmost hazard, endeavour to strive against the weather, than, especially when I see safety in so doing, to yield to it, and be guided by it? For I do not think it inconsistency for a man to guide his resolutions and his course, as it were a ship, by the seasons of the common-swealtb. Though he had not the good fortune of Lepidus, who kept in the favour of Tiberius, by observing a just medium betwixt sordid flatteries, and a too great stiffness, he deserves the praises that Tacitus has expressed in this manner: Hunc ego Lepidum, temporibus illis, gravem & sapientem virum fuisse comperio. Nam pleraque ab sævis adulationibus aliorum, in melius flexit: neque tamen temperamenti egebat, cum æquabili auctoritate & gratia apud Tiberium vigeret. Unde dubitare cogor, fato & sorte nascendi, ut cetera, ita principum inclinatio in hos, offensio in illos: an sit aliquid in nostris consiliis, liceatque inter abruptam contumaciam, & deforme obsequium, pergere iter ambitione ac periculis vacuum (25).

[E] There were almost as many voices for the Protestants as against them, in the council which examined the petition that they presented to the king. This particular seems to me to be curious; and I fancy, that every body will be pleased to find here the circumstances of that affair. I make use of the commentary which a Catholic writer supplies me with (26). The Huguenots have presented a petition to the king, that they might be permitted to have a separate church from ours. The king sent the petition to the parliament, to advise about it with the lords of the council. There they freely voted on both sides, the one for the Catholic party, the other for the Protestant. The Catholics have carried it by three voices, it being their resolution that people must either follow the Romish church as our ancestors did, or depart the kingdom, with leave to sell their estates. When the voices came to be cast up, there was no small murmur; because the others maintained, that in a matter of such importance, there was no reason that all France should be put into a combustion by reason of those three votes. Because such a banishment could not be executed, and besides that, to undertake, while they continued in France, to bring them over to the Romish religion against their conscience, was very absurd, and amounted to an impossibility. The admiral and several other lords, cannot be silent about it. The duke of Guise, on the other hand, tho' the time seemed to oppose his design, plainly declared, that since it had been so resolved, they must stand to that determination, and that his sword should never rest in the scabbard, when the question should be whether that decree should take effect. Things in this contention passed without conclusion. . . . (27) since that, to content both parties by a sort of neutrality, an edict has been published in July last (28). . . . The sincere Catholics complain of this edict, and say that those of the new or pretended reformed religion, being not to be disturbed in their houses, it is in plain terms to frustrate the first article of the edict, and nevertheless to deliver them from the power of the magistrate: which some time after will give them occasion quite to shake off the yoke from their necks (29).

(26) Paquier, Letters. Tom I, book iv, p. 196.

(27) Ibid. pag. 197.

(28) That is 1561.

(29) Ibid. pag. 198.

[F] The Romish religion did not run such a risk . . . as when the edict of January was made. The Protestants had very nearly got the upper hand, in the beginning of Charles IXth's reign; and if they had, God knows what would have become of the religion that had persecuted them under the three preceding reigns. If the king of Navarre, who had openly declared for them, had been able to discover the snare, that the other party laid for him, he would have continued firm in their communion. There needed no more to have procured them the victory; for he was lieutenant-general of the kingdom, and there had been no difficulty then to have brought over Catherine de Medicis to the reformed religion (30). But he suffered himself to be cheated by imaginary hopes, and had not penetration enough to discover the grossness of the snare; he took the island of Sardinia, a country of exile, a country miserable and disgraced (31): he took it, I say, so well he knew the map, for one of those fortunate islands mentioned in the fables. Being thus grossly deceived by the artifices of the Spaniards, and the cardinal Legate, he abandoned the Protestants (32); and thus see, how little

(30) See the article SOUBISSE (JOHN, etc.) remark [E].

(31) See the remark [G] of the article CHATEL (TANNECUS DU); and Tacitus, Annal. lib. ii, cap. lxxvii.

(32) See the article HENRY IV, remark [L].

was

was to overcome, did not cease after he had sealed it. New ones arose concerning it's being registered in parliament. And it was necessary for him to shew the force of his genius, was wanting to their becoming masters. I will quote a passage, which will shew the interest they had by his favour in the states of Orleans, and the liberty they enjoyed under his protection. They publicly assembled even in the capital city of the kingdom, before they had any edicts permitting them to do so. But it must be noted, that the regent, Catherine de Medicis, agreed in this with the king of Navarre (33).

(33) Beza's History of the Reformed Churches, book iv, pag. 670, and Belarius, lib. xxix, n. 34, pag. 966.

(34) Palquier, Letters, Tom. I, book iv, pag. 218.

(35) That is the king of Navarre.

(36) Id. Ibid. pag. 219.

(37) That common report was true; the most exact historians own it.

(38) That is, the Edict of January 1562.

(34) The Huguenots . . . had all their dependance upon this king (35), as upon one whom they had carried on their shoulders, and to whom they had procured the government of France, by their intrigues and secret practices, in the assembly of the three states. And indeed as an acknowledgment of this, he permitted, by a very great connivance, their preaching with the doors open, not only in Paris, but also at the king's court at St Germain en Laye. Indeed it was difficult for him, to maintain his grandeur, but by means of those who reciprocally were to maintain themselves by his countenance and support. Nevertheless changing his mind he was the first instrument of the Catholics arming themselves against the others. But because these are things unknown to many, and possibly you have not heard how these practices were carried on; you must know that the Pope perceiving the commotions that were among us, sent the cardinal of Ferrara, uncle of Madam de Guise, as Legate into France with most ample instructions . . . (36) We have here also the lord de Charantonneau, son to the deceased chancellor Granvelle. It is said that this ambassador of king Philip is gained by some of our great princes, who are not pleased with this diversity of religions. He, according to the design laid betwixt them, went three or four times in a disguised habit to the king of Navarre, assuring him in his master's name, that as soon as he would take upon him the protection of the church of Rome, he would restore him his kingdom of Navarre, or at least an equivalent in as rich and plentiful a country. As this engine began to work, the legate also came in, promising from the holy see the county of Venaisin, and moreover to procure him from his Catholic majesty the isle of Sardinia, which the Pope would erect into a kingdom, in case the king would not restore to him the kingdom of Navarre. It is said that the constable, and the marshal de St André, did all in their power to make him relish these promises. I will not venture to assure you that this is as true as the gospel: but so much I can tell, that it was the common report (37). Only this I can say, that in an instant his countenance and affections were changed towards the Huguenots: for he forbade the ministers to preach in the castle any more, as they had taken the liberty and permission to do for five or six months before. Even in the assembly of St Germain he opposed the Huguenots as much as he could: but the prince of Condé, the admiral, and others, who then were not the least in favour with the king, opposed him, and carried it with respect to the publication of the edict (38). The same author, in what follows, will show us the prosperity the Protestants enjoyed, even before the edict of January, and whilst Antony king of Navarre favoured them. 'The same day, (that is to say, the twenty ninth of September 1561) the Queen of Navarre in fight of all the people, caused the marriage between young Rohan and the lady Brabantin, niece to Madam d'Estampes, to be celebrated in the form of Geneva, in the borough of Argentueil, by Beza. There were present the prince of Condé and the admiral. That action performed thus, at the gates of Paris, and of St Germain en Laye, where the king resided, not being controuled, mightily encouraged the ministers. And in October following, they actually preached without the walls of Paris, near the monastery of St Antony in the fields, in the presence of eight or nine thousand persons. At their return a tumult was raised, which was easily appeased by the authority of the king of Navarre. They have since proceeded farther. For on All-Saints eve there was another public assembly in the counts of Senigan's house, which was guarded by the provosts of the marshals and their archers, to prevent any popular commotion.

A few days after, not confining themselves to the king's edicts, but infringing that of July, they undertook to preach two sermons, one in the suburbs of St Marcel, in the place called the Patriarch; and the other without St Antony's gate, in a place called Popincourt. It is incredible what crowds of people were present at these new devotions. To which Gaballon, captain of the watch and his archers, served as a guard. L'Aulnay and l'Eslang preached at Popincourt: Malo and Viret at the Patriarch. The Catholic lords seeing a necessity of giving way to the storm, the duke of Guise enraged has retired to his seat of Nantueil, cardinal de Lorraine to his archbishopric of Reims, Mr de Nemoux to Savoy, the constable to Chantilly, &c. (39). See in some other letters of Stephen Palquier's (40), the concurrence at these assemblies, and how they were supported by the secular power. You may also consult Hubert Languet's letters (41), where we find amongst other things (42) that the meetings near Paris had sometimes fifteen thousand people (43), the women in the middle being surrounded with men on foot, and these encompassed by horsemen, and during the sermon the governor of Paris caused the avenues to be guarded by the soldiers, who beat or imprisoned, or repelled some other way, all that endeavoured to disturb the devotion of the assembly.

(39) Palquier, ubi supra, pag. 200, 201.

(40) Ibid. pag. 202, 205, &c.

(41) Lib. ii, pag. 145, 150, 155.

(42) Ibid. pag. 255.

(43) In a letter written the twenty third of January 1562 the Edict was already made, but not registered; he says that there were some assemblies at Paris of about thirty and forty thousand people, and that two or three ministers were obliged to preach in the same place at the same time. Id. pag. 156.

Many people who judge of things only by the event, will say that the Protestants would have been more prudent, if they had affected less haughtiness at that time; for that ostentation of their numbers was looked on as a bravado, which soured their enemies, and put them upon the most violent remedies. We see from a letter of the cardinal Legate, that these haughty steps gave him hopes of a prosperous issue: his letter is dated from St Germain the twenty seventh of February 1562. Here is a passage of it. 'There happened lately a quarrel betwixt those of both religions, in which some remained dead upon the spot: and yet the danger proved greater than the damage. The Catholics in an instant flocked hither to complain of the insolence of the Huguenots; they remonstrated that, according to the express order of his majesty, they had laid down their arms; but that the Huguenots had done the quite contrary. For this reason they earnestly desired that they might be immediately permitted to resume them, to secure themselves from their ambuscades, which made them justly apprehensive that being emboldened by these troops of soldiers, they would afterwards do violence, both to their persons and goods. But the Huguenots likewise failed not to come and excuse themselves, alledging in their vindication: that the jealousies the Catholics gave them by reason of their great numbers, was the reason they did not disarm. The answer of the queen and king of Navarre was extremely favourable to those of our party; for they bad them take courage, and also promised them that they would take great care to provide for their particular security, and for the common repose of their city. So that after such obliging words proceeding from the mouths of their majesties, by which they expressed more tenderness than they ever expected, they went away with all possible satisfaction. On the contrary the Huguenots were astonished, when they were told in very rough terms; that if they would not be more modest, and abstain from such violence, they should be taught better manners. The king of Navarre went still farther: for, even before them, he said to the queen, that her majesty needed only give the command, and that when she pleased, he would find a means to stop the course of their insolence. To this I add this particular, which is none of the least considerable; that not only their majesties but people in general, are extremely scandalized with Beza's walking in Paris, constantly attended by Mr d'Andelot, and a great number of gentlemen following them. However after all, tho' disorders and scandals are for the most part prejudicial; yet sometimes they fail not to produce some fruit, because provoking the patience of the great, they frequently incline them to generous enterprizes. Which makes me believe, that we ought to be the less troubled at this, because it is probable, that, considering the present disposition of genius, and the constancy of his soul, in order to get the better of the scruples, and the ill humour of the parliament of Paris [G]. The speeches he made for toleration, rendered of the minds of the great, such disorders will all at once fall on the heads of those that cause them (44) ? Let us say however to these critics, that it was very natural for those who had groaned near forty years under so hard and cruel an oppression, to use their liberty without restriction, and to overflow like waters at the opening of the sluices. Nay, there were some reasons of prudence that might persuade them to that conduct. They might reasonably imagine, that the court would think itself obliged to treat civilly a party, whose power should be found capable of making itself feared. Lastly, I say, that neither the ministers nor the people could hinder Andelot, and other brave men of quality, to mix with their zeal for religion, some airs of the soldier and gentleman, which courage and custom made natural to them. However it be, the other church escaped narrowly; for if notwithstanding the defection of the king of Navarre, the Protestants maintained the first war very well, what would not they have done under the protection of the lieutenant-general of the kingdom, which would doubtless have drawn after it that of the queen-mother? Languet tells us the good opinion one might have of their forces.

WHY THEN it can be alleged that the Protestants behaved in too ostentatious a manner.

(44) Negotiations, ou Lettres d'Affaires ecrites au Pape Pie IV. & au Cardinal Borromeo par Hippolyte d'Est, Cardinal de Ferrare, Legat en France, pag. 93, 94.

Re patefacta plerique nostrorum venerunt armati ad Concionem, & jam idem quotidie faciunt, & inter reliquos studiosi magno numero. Iis præbent se Duces Dandelotus Frater Amiralii, Princeps de Rohan, & Frater notius Reginae Scotiæ, ac alii illustribus familiis nati, quod, meo judicio, non faciunt sine consensu Reginae: aliter enim graviter peccarent in legis regni. Monmorantio urbis præfecto mandatum est, ut huc inducat, præsidii causa, duas alas equitum, & certum numerum peditum, quibus præerit Dandelotus. Interea autem dum isti milites præsidii expectantur, nobilitas & studiosi funguntur eorum officio, & tota urbs armis perstreptit. Pontificii desperant fere de reliquis urbibus Galliae, sed exultant summam rerum in hoc consistere, ut hanc sibi addictam retineant. Verum ita crescunt hic studia factionum, ut verear, ne eam omnium primam amittant. Quamvis enim à partibus eorum sint plures Cardinales, Episcopi, Abbates, Præbites, Assessores, & alii, qui opibus & auctoritate valeant nostri tamen viribus & ferocia videntur esse potiores, & si ad vim deveniant, totius ipsorum sapientiae nullus erit usus. Mihi venit in mentem factum dictum Ludovici 12 Regis Galliae, cui suscepto bellum adversus Venetos cum quidam dicerent fore periculosum, illud bellum propter eximiam Venetorum sapientiam: ego, inquit, multitudinem stultorum ipsorum sapientiam obrui. . . . Heri hic celebrantur Jubilæum, ex mandato Legati Pontificii: nostri vero convenerunt, (ut existimo) ad quadraginta milia, & præcipuas plateas urbis armatis compleverunt. Tres concionatores tantæ multitudini vix sufficiebant.

(45) Hub. Languetus, Epist. lxx, lib. ii, pag. 207, 208. It is dated from Paris, in March 1562. See also the sixty seventh letter of the same book.

(45) — This being discovered, most of our people came armed to the sermon, and now they do so daily, and among the rest scholars come in great numbers. They are headed by Mr D'Andelot, brother to the admiral, by the duke of Rohan, by the queen of Scots natural brother, and by many others of noble families, and this not without the consent of the queen, as I imagine: for otherwise this would be a high transgression of the laws of the kingdom. Montmorancy, the governor of the city, has received orders to send for two squadrons of horse, and a certain number of foot, hither, to be commanded by D'Andelot, and to serve for a guard. In the mean while till these soldiers arrive, the nobility and the students supply their place, and the whole city is filled with the noise of arms. The Catholics almost despair of the other cities of France, but they think their all depends upon their keeping this city steady in their interests. But our party gains ground so fast here, that I am afraid they will lose it first of all. For 'tho' on their side there are a greater number of cardinals, bishops, abbots, presidents, assessors, and others of great wealth and authority: yet ours seem to have the advantage in strength and keeness: and if it come to trial by force of arms, all their wisdom will be of little use to them. This makes me remember a pleasant repartee of Lewis XII of France, who being to make war with the Venetians, was told by one of his courtiers that it would be dangerous, because, of the singular wisdom of

VOL. III.

Venetians: I, said he, will overpower their wisdom by a multitude of fools. . . . Yesterday the Jubilee was celebrated by order of the Pope's legate: but our party convened to the number of 40000 (as I think) and filled all the principal squares with armed men. Three preachers were scarce sufficient to so vast a multitude.

[G] It was necessary for him to show the force of his genius, in order to get the better of the scruples, and ill humour of the parliament of Paris.] This parliament refused to register the edict of January, and deputed a president, and a counsellor, to make their remonstrances to the king. These two deputies having particularly explained before the king, the reasons that moved the parliament not to receive that edict, the chancellor, by reason of the eminence of his office, and the minority of our king, answered them in this manner: that he did not doubt but all the arguments represented by them, were very weighty; but he desired them to consider, that they had not been forgotten in the great council of St Germain; that the question in hand, was one of those in which there is some difficulty, what way soever we turn our thoughts; and that to speak the truth, there was room to excuse the magistrates, whatever part they took. He granted that the foundation of a common-wealth was the having but one religion; but when things were come to such a height, as was then observed in France, whoever rejects this edict must resolve on one of these two things: either to put all the adherents of this new religion to the sword, or to banish them entirely, with permission to dispose of their effects. The first point could not be executed, that party being too strong both in leaders, and partisans; and though it were possible to do it, if the king's youth were stained with the blood of so many subjects, perhaps when he came to age and understanding, he would require it at his governours hands. And as to the second point, that it was as impracticable: and should it succeed to our desire, we should raise by this conduct as many desperate enemies as exiles. And as to the edict of July, though it had a plausible pretence, it really tended to make men Atheists, by permitting them to absent themselves from the Catholic churches, and yet nevertheless depriving them of the exercise of their own religion. Wherefore to obviate all these mischiefs, it had been thought good to establish two churches in France, till God should please to re-unite us in the same mind: and that this had been the practice heretofore of Galerius Maximian and Constantius, the emperors, to compose the divisions betwixt the Christians and Heathens: remonstrating to them, and praying them to submit to the present necessity; in brief to tolerate this scandal, to avoid a greater evil, and that if we transferred in this, it was in imitation of the neighbouring nations, who in the like necessity had been obliged to do the same. This answer being reported to the parliament, the chambers once more assembled, did not change their opinion (46). This reluctance disturbed the court, and it was again debated with some deputies of Paris what was to be done (47). By a majority of voices, it was resolved that the edict should be maintained, And the prince of la Roche-sur-yon was commissioned to publish it in parliament, with express orders that if they should refuse or delay to do it, he should cause it to be published without a judicial form, assisted only by some particular counsellors, such as he should chuse. This commission was violent; but he being a wise prince, executed it very gently, declaring that the king's intention was founded on the necessity of the time; that the court of parliament might easily know what passed before their eyes in the city of Paris, but they were not informed of the complaints that came daily to the king and council from all parts of the kingdom; intreating them to give their resolution briefly, and without any long discourse, by yes or no, what they would answer. Hereupon it was by common consent resolved that all those who had assisted at the council of St Germain, should have a deliberative voice in that matter as well as others: so that at last it was ordained that the edict should pass. It is true that in the execution, they sufficiently declared,

(46) Polquier's Letters, Tom. I, book iv, pag. 212, & seq.

(47) Id. ibid. pag. 214.

6 N

dered him very much suspected to the Catholics, and odious to the court of Rome [H], and because he was constantly against the civil-war, they would not allow him to assist at the councils of war (f). He appeared very much afflicted, when he saw preparations made on both sides to take up arms after the affair of Vassi: he declared plainly his thoughts upon it, and made a most excellent answer to the Constable, who told him, that that it was by a forced consent: because on Friday the twenty sixth of March an extraordinary day of pleading, it was confirmed with all the demonstrations of constraint; forasmuch as with the edict were published all the orders of the king, a thing not usually done in such publications. Besides, the attorney-general required nothing publicly, but only declared that he had given his conclusions in writing. And therefore it was ordered by the court, that upon the back of the letters it should be wrote, that they had been read, published, and registered, after having heard the king's attorney-general, without approbation however of the new religion; the whole by way of provision, until it should be otherwise ordered by the king. Thus it was this edict passed at Paris (48). This has some connexion with the history of Mr de l'Hospital, and contains some particular circumstances, which are not to be found in the General History; and therefore the reader will have some reason to be pleased that I have related them.

(f) See the remark [H], citat. 20.

(48) Ibid.

[H] His speeches . . . rendered him very much suspected to the Catholics, and odious to the court of Rome. We have seen above (49), in a passage of Varillas, what was said in France by way of jest, of the chancellor's mas. Beaucaire de Peguillon speaking of the assembly of St Germain (50), and reporting the heads of the speech which the chancellor made there, observes that this first magistrate served for an example to the judges who favoured the sectaries, and that he only loved the Calvinists. 'Deinde Regius ministros qui juridicundo præstant & Regia edicta non satis accurate exequuti sunt, excusati: inter quos ille merito accusatus est, qui illis exemplo erat, & nullos, nisi Calvinianos in oculis habebat; quique præclara hac oratione, & multis aliis perverfis machinis ad condendum satis celebratum postea suum Januarii sequentis edictum viam præparavit (51). — Then

(49) In the remark [D], citat. (20).

(50) Held in 1561.

(51) Belcar. lib. xxix, n. 30, pag. 914.

be excuseth the king's judges who do not execute the royal edicts with sufficient care: and amongst them he is deservedly accused, who gave them an example, and loved none but the Calvinists: and who by that notable oration, and by many other wicked arts, paved the way for his edict of January which was afterwards so famous. This historian has the impudence to call this great man an Atheist: here is what he says, when he observes that the cardinal of Lorraine raised him to the dignity of chancellor. 'Interim Olivario Cancellario vita functo Cardinalis Lotharingus prætor doctissimo suorum omnium ac familiarium sententiam, ut Michael Hospitalis homo quidem doctus, sed nullius religionis, aut ut vere dicam atheus, in ejus locum surrogaretur, effecit (52). — In the

(52) Ibid. lib. xxviii, n. 57, pag. 937.

(53) See the Penées diverses for les Cometes, pag. 539, and the Critical Answer to Malmbourg's History of Calvinism, Letter xxi, n. 2, of the third edition.

(54) See the remark [C] of the article FERRIER (ANNAUD).

(55) See the Journal des Savans, Febr. 28, 1680, p. 118, 119, Dutch Edit.

(56) Hist. du Concile de Trente, book v, pag. 438, of Amelot's translation.

the bishop of Valence, and some others that he should name, should be imprisoned (57). I will here add a passage of a letter, which the cardinal legate Hippolytus d'Est wrote to the Pope the fourteenth of June 1562. It is dated from Bois de Vincennes. 'Among other difficulties it is none of the least to keep the chancellor, and many other dignified persons, as your holiness desires, at a distance from the court, for you put in this number both Heretics, and those that are suspected of Heresy. But if all the latter were to be banished the court, would doubtless be deserted, these new opinions having already made such an impression on the minds of the courtiers, that there are few that have not some little tincture of them . . . But to return to the most factious of the court, your holiness is not ignorant how hard a matter it was to get the Chastillons removed . . . But as to the removing of the chancellor which is desired, it is quite another thing: for besides that, he is in a post that will not permit him to be absent from court, except for very important reasons; he cannot as yet either be deprived of his employment, but by the express order of the king, or for some great fault, if he had committed any; nor can it be reasonably said, that he has deserved death, unless it be proved by unquestionable arguments. Now to think to bring an accusation against him to put him upon his trial, is a thing that cannot be done without a great deal of time. Besides, such a process against him would doubtless be ill grounded, since he is seen commonly to go to mass, to confession, and communion, so that he could not be convicted of his not being a Catholic (58). The letter he wrote the next day to cardinal Borromeo, shews that Catherine de Medicis did not relish his proposals of removing some persons; and that she was still more displeased, when he named to her particularly the chancellor, according to the express order he had received from Pius IV (59). Whence it appears that Varillas is in a great error in saying that the Triumviri obliged Mr de l'Hospital to retire, and that the queen sacrificed him to them (60). He will have this pretended retreat to have preceded the declaration of the seventh of April 1562, and that it continued all the first war (61). This is contradicted as well by the silence of other historians, as by the letters of the legate dated the fifteenth of June, and the eighth of July 1562 (62).

They were not mistaken in believing that Mr de l'Hospital approved in his heart the doctrine of the Protestants. Catherine de Medicis did not say any thing but the truth in all the discourse that Mezerei reports. 'She employed all her industry to undermine the credit that he had gotten in the mind of the young king; to whom she taught her confidants to say, that undoubtedly he was a favourer of Heretics, that his wife, his daughter: his son-in-law, and all his family, being of that religion, there was no doubt but that he was of the same in his heart, and that it was only the fear of losing his place, that hindered him from publicly professing Calvinism. Therefore as secret enemies are more dangerous than open ones, he was much more to be feared than the admiral; and that his majesty ought not to suffer him to poison his whole council with these fine maxims of peace, under which, as under the skin of a serpent, variegated with colours most agreeable to the sight, was concealed a most pernicious venom; and which by flattering caused certain death (63). She had no reason to say that Mr de l'Hospital was a dangerous enemy; for if he favoured the Protestants, it was not by any disloyal artifices, but by maxims most conformable to the good of the state, and the service of the king. The integrity of his morals, his experience and his wisdom in the management of affairs were acknowledged by all the world: as also his inviolable affection for the good of the state, the preservation of the laws, and the ease of the people, and his constant courage in resisting the injustice of great men, were highly cried up by all good men (64). Catherine

(57) Ibid. lib. vi, pag. 487, ad ann. 1562.

* He complied in the council with the intentions of the queen, who had privately interested him; but because he wished for a peace against the opinion of the duke of Guise, and the constable, he was ill treated by both, and under pretence of being a man of the gown, he was excluded from the councils of war, where the queen found afterwards that she wanted one of her principal ministers. Duval, Hist. lib. ii.

(58) Negotiations ou Lettres d'Affaires écrites par le Cardinal de Ferrare Legat en France, pag. 224, 225.

(59) Ibid. pag. 247, 248.

(60) Varillas, Hist. de Chart. IX, Tom. I, pag. m, 151.

(61) Ibid. pag. 353.

(62) See the Negotiations du Cardinal de Ferrare, pag. 308.

(63) Mezerei, Hist. de France, Tom. III, pag. 183.

(64) Mezerei Ibid. pag. 256.

that it did not belong to those of the long robe to give their opinions in matters of war: those such men, answered he, know not how to bear arms, yet they know when they ought to be used (g). Cardinal Hippolitus d'Est, Legate à Latere in France, received orders to use all possible endeavours to get him dismissed from court; but he answered the Pope, that he saw no probability of succeeding in that affair (b). He proposed it however to the queen-regent, at which she was very angry. If Varillas had known this, he would not have been guilty of the fault which we shall see below (i). The peaceable counsels of this chancellor contributed more to his disgrace than any thing else. I have given good proofs of it (k). He voluntarily retired, when he perceived that his enemies had exasperated the king against him, and he spent the rest of his life at his country seat (l) in Beauce. He made that retreat in June 1568. A message was sent to him some days after, to deliver up the seals. He returned them very freely, saying, that indeed he was no longer fit for the affairs of the world, which he saw too much corrupted (m). We ought to think it more strange that he maintained his ground seven or eight years in so vicious a court, than to see him disgraced at last. There had been something wanting to the lustre of his virtue and glory, if he had continued chancellor to his death; for under such a reign it was a sort of stain and a very bad sign to be thought proper for that great employment. An honest man was not what those who had then the management of affairs wanted. Let us observe that Mr de l'Hospital did however procure the enacting of several excellent laws [I], and that he neither flattered the subjects nor the prince

(g) Palquier's Letters, Tom. I, book iv, pag. 226. See also Baptista le Grain, book i, of his History of Henry IV, pag. m. 229, 230, where he praises him as much, as he blames those, who excluded him from the council of war.

(b) See citation (58), near the middle.

(i) Citat. (60).

(k) At the end of the remark [II].

(l) Called Vignat, and not Vignan, as Mezerai calls it, pag. 186 of the third Tome of his Great History. He is far from being exact as to proper names.

(m) Brantome, in the Discours of the Constable of Montmorency, Tom. II, pag. 87.

(65) See Spondan. ad ann. 1573, n. 25, pag. m. 745.

(66) Ad ann. 1561, n. 18, pag. 609.

(67) Beza, in Iconibus, fol. V. iii.

(68) See C. S. m. i. Biblioth. choise, pag. 70.

(69) Spondan. ad ann. 1573, n. 25, pag. m. 745.

(70) Hist. du Calvin, pag. 105. See what was answered to him in the General Criticism on his book, Letter xvi, n. 3.

(71) D'Aubigné, Hist. Univers. Tom. I, book II, chap. xviii, pag. m. 129.

(72) Mezerai, Hist. de France, Tom. III, pag. 22.

(73) See Garasse's Doctrine civile, pag. 918, 919.

de Medicis spoke truth, when she said the chancellor's family were Protestants (65). Now this is a good argument, that he disapproved the doctrines of the church of Rome. In the Icones of Theodore Beza, he was painted with a candle lighted behind him, to signify, says Spondanus (66), that he carried a torch to give light to others, and not to himself. The discourse which attends that picture, teaches us, that two reasons moved him to abstain from the public profession of the truth. He feared he should be deprived of the means of serving the good cause, and he hoped the time would come when there should be no more occasion to dissemble. He vainly expected that conjuncture, and afterwards having resolved to declare himself, he could not execute his resolution. He sacrificed himself for others. Beza expresses this very well. Hic . . . ad justum laudis cumulum id videtur defuisse, quod partim se sibi ad pios juvandos adiutum præstaret, si veram religionem aperte præstiteretur, partim vana quadam expectatione delusus, eo luto ex quo erutos omnes optabat, penitus extricare sese quum diu neglexisset, postea volens id præstare non potuit. Sed equis illius memoriam non celebravit, qui, at aliis consuleret, seipsum tandem penè neglexit (67). His will is a proof that he was no Papist in his heart: there is no mention in it of the mass, or purgatory, or priest, or any thing like it; and he observes in it that Christians have no great esteem for funeral ceremonies and burials (68). Spondanus pretends, that this is the language of a prophane person (69), and Maimbourg says that these words are unworthy of a Christian (70). Genebrard had before inveighed against these words in the Funeral Oration of Peter Dances. Note that it has been said, that Mr de l'Hospital had a hand in the enterprise of Amboise. Consider well these words of d'Aubigné: Chancellor Olivier dying at that time in the manner before mentioned, l'Hospital, a man of great esteem, succeeded him, though he had been one of the conspirators, in the business of Amboise. Which I maintain against all that has been written against it, because the original of the enterprise was assigned into my father's hands, in which was his name as length, betwixt that of Andelot and one Spifame: a thing I have shewn to many persons of note (71). Mezerai confutes this by a very weak reason; which is (72), that l'Hospital, as he pretends, had left France in the month of November. But did not he know how many journeys la Renaudie caused to be made? Was it so hard for him to dispatch one of the accomplices to Mr de l'Hospital in Piedmont? However it be I am persuaded that if he signed that conspiracy, he was only shewn the best side of it, and that he did not expect it should ever be executed in the manner it was projected.

Father Garasse, transported with a blind passion of censuring the Protestants, has accused them of calumny, in that they endeavoured to persuade all France, that chancellor de l'Hospital was of their persuasion. He compares them to the Novatians, who published in lying writings, that St Cyprian died in their communion; and he says, that this has been an ingenious malice of wicked men from all antiquity (73). In this he only discovers his own ignorance.

I cannot forbear inserting two observations in this place, which I find in an anonymous piece, which is excellent. They inform us of the causes of this chancellor's disgrace. I do not think, says that unknown author (74), 'that a great minister who is employed in the great affairs of his prince, ought to be silent, whatever may happen thereupon. Otherwise he may be the cause of his master's ruin, as well by his silence as others are by their conspiracies and enterprizes. It is for this reason that I cannot be of their opinion, who think that chancellor de l'Hospital needed not to have opposed so vigorously the resolution which had been taken * * * against the prudent advice of the late constable, to cause the king to depart * * * at the beginning of the second troubles. For since that wife and prudent minister judged, and that very well too as the event shewed, that such a sudden departure, if put into execution * * *, would undoubtedly prevent a reconciliation, and bring things to extremity; it is certain that if he had concealed his opinion, and had not insisted upon it as he did. He would have been guilty of a baseness, unworthy of a man whose virtue alone had raised him to that dignity. For tho' ever since he has been declining, and his enemies, that is to say, the enemies of his virtue, integrity and sincerity, began from that time to conspire together to remove him; yet that was no reason for him to be wanting in his duty, since the end of those who have the honour to be employed in such posts, ought not to be to maintain themselves in them, to the prejudice of their honour and conscience, but to serve well and faithfully. Besides, things taking the course which they took afterwards, a great man of good principles and courage, as this worthy chancellor was, ought to be very well satisfied to be dismissed . . . (75). A good minister and truly virtuous will never give his advice contrary to his judgment, and when he is commanded to speak and give his opinion, he will do it with fidelity and courage. This is what this chancellor did, about the question concerning the bulls, which permitted the sale of church lands, to the amount of an hundred and fifty thousand livres of revenue, for the expropriation of Heretics. For that clause was contrary to the edicts of pacification, the observing of which the chancellor judged necessary for the good of the kingdom: besides, those edicts having been granted in a solemn manner, he was of opinion that they could not be infringed, and that this was one of the effects of the League which was then contriving; and therefore he proposed his opinion, which was followed, viz. to obtain new bulls, without that clause, which was the last stumbling block, and the reason which was urged to render this great man suspected of heresy, and to take away the seals from him, and put them into the hands of a man whom they thought more proper for the time, and soon after all parties made ready for war.

(74) Fragment de l'Examen du Prince de Machiavel, pag. 95. 6e. Edit. 1622, in 12mo.

(75) Ibid. pag. 97, &c.

[I] He procured the enacting of several excellent laws.] Stephen Palquier furnishes me with this reflexion; these are his words (76): 'We have seen in our time, a young king Charles IX, in France, who by reason

(76) Palquier, Letters, book xix, Tom. II, pag. 520, 521.

prince. He was very zealous to maintain and confirm the royal majesty and authority, and he will know how by the gravity of his censures to make the parliaments sensible of their error, in disobeying their king [K]; but on the other hand, he took care that the prince of the weakness of his youth in the beginning, and afterwards by the extraordinary violence of his temper, had no leisure to make laws: nevertheless none of his predecessors made so many good edicts as he: witness that of 1560, in the states held in the town of Orleans, the other that he made at Rouffillon in the year 1563, and the last at Moulins in the year 1566. Those three edicts containing abundance of articles in matter of civil policy, and fine regulations, infinitely exceeding our ancient ordinances. To whom are we indebted for this advantage? To no other than to Michael de l'Hospital, his great and wife chancellor, who, under the authority of the young king his master, was the principal mediator of the first, and the instigator, promoter, and author, of the two others. And I which with all my heart that they had been always observed with the same zeal, as they were introduced. I wonder that Pasquier does not speak of the excellent edicts Mr de l'Hospital procured under Francis II. A historian of that time (77) reckons three, which were extraordinary good and wholesome. I am going to shew in what the first consisted; it was that which regulated the wills, or the donations of widows, who quickly married again. I will make use of the words of an author of that age (78). It was at the solicitation of chancellor de l'Hospital, that many ordinances, edicts, and statutes, were made and published by our kings of France, for the relief of the people, and the preservation of justice. Among others, we have an edict of king Francis II, which gives a check to second marriages, by taken away the liberty they who married again had to give more to the second husband, than to one of the children of the first. The occasion of this edict was this: it happened that a woman of this kingdom extremely rich, fell in love with a young lord, who, because she seemed too old for him, had no inclination to make her his wife. She was so dotingly in love with him, that understanding how greedy he was of money, she made him a donation of all her estate, reserving only what might belong to her children of the first marriage as of their falcidion, or lawful portion. So that for a morsel of bread, they were almost entirely deprived of their mother's inheritance, which was transferred to a second husband. To prevent such frauds, this chancellor introduced in France the ordinance of the emperor Leo, which is mentioned in the law hac Edictali. 6. tit. de secund. nupt. in the fifth book of Justinian's Code, which forbids giving or leaving to the second husband more than to one of the children of the first marriage. It was very just and necessary to renew this law for the interest of the children of the first husband; for there are but too many woman, who desiring to be married again, would deprive them of their rights, to make themselves more agreeable to their new husband. They would supply by their liberalities, what age has taken from their charms: besides, the liberty of disposing of their estates would expose them to be courted by men, who without it would never have disturbed the resolution they might have taken, to edify their neighbours by a virtuous widowhood.

[K] He knew how to make the parliaments sensible of their error in disobeying their king. An attorney could not reprimand a clerk, who has been guilty of a great blunder more smartly than our chancellor did the parliament of Bourdeaux, when Charles IX, held his Bed of Justice there, the twelfth of April 1564, before Basser. The king, said he (79), has found many faults in this parliament, which, as it is of a later erection, being but of 102 years standing, you have the less excuse for forgetting so soon the antient ordinances, which would be excusable in other parliaments that are old; nevertheless you are as much depraved, or perhaps worse than the old ones. . . . I have received many complaints of your dissensions. . . . See here a house ill regulated, and it is you who are accountable for it. The first fault is your disobedience to your king. For although his ordinances are presented to you, you observe them as you please: If you have any remonstrances to make, make them as soon as you will, and he will bear them. You rob him of his royal power, when you will not obey his royal ordi- nances, which is worse than to rob him of his crownlands. I am informed that the ordinance made at the request of the States, is not yet published here. And, addressing himself to the presidents, and the king's counsel, he said, I will now speak to you, that are presidents and the king's counsel, who ought to require and solicit the publication of his edicts and ordinances; and you presidents, you ought to propose them, for you are the king's presidents in the court. I have also notice, said he, that the ordinance about justice is not published. I remember likewise some others, which I will not mention that I may, not be too long: I think said he, that you fancy your selves wiser than the king but your wisdom is limited to judge of processes; do not think your selves wiser than the king, the queen, and his council. He has obtained peace, and at present there is a war betwixt him and the court of parliament. . . . (80) You despise the queen and the king's council. I see that you so much value your own decrees as to set them above ordinances, which when you have received, you interpret as you please: It is not your business but the king's, to interpret an ordinance, even the ordinances that concern the public welfare. I omit the sequel of his discourse, which is still more thundering than what we have seen. Note, that this is but a commentary on what the King had said in few words to this parliament; That he would for the future be better obeyed than he had been; that he would not suffer any of his subjects to take up arms without his leave, and that he would also have his edicts observed (81). There is no doubt (81) Ibid. pg. but Mr de l'Hospital suggested this discourse to him, as also the vigorous declaration made by the same prince some time before, to the deputies of the parliament of Paris. They had made remonstrances to him about the edict of his majority, which they had not registered. 'The king, whose voice and countenance was composed to a studied severity, answered them, that they must obey, that they should meddle no more with public affairs, and that they should rid themselves of this old error, That they were the king's tutors, the defenders of the kingdom, and the guardians of the city of Paris. The deputies having made their report to the court, it was divided (82), and they sent a new deputation to the king, who ordered that the edict should be published and registered without delay, and that all the presidents and counsellors should be present at it, upon pain of interdiction (83). It is easy to perceive, considering the king's age, that he, in that case, only repeated the lesson of Mr de l'Hospital. 'He once made a speech to the parliament with open doors, who would not pass some of his edicts. . . . and complaining of their administration of justice, and of their corruption, and of the refusal of his edicts; it is your your business, said he, with a brave, and as it were menacing, boldness, to obey my ordinances, without disputing and contesting about them; for I know better than you, what is proper and convenient for the advantage and interest of my kingdom. Having as yet no beard, he held this discourse before those old and wise heads, who all marvelled at this bold and grave speech, which favoured more of his generous courage, than of the lessons of Mr Amiot his preceptor (84). Brantome should have added that this discourse was the lesson of Michael de l'Hospital. The prince, who had already disgraced him (85), well remembered the instructions he had received from his chancellor, that it concerned him to humble the boldness of the parliament of Paris, so pernicious at that time to all the kingdom.

In this place I ought to examine in a few words the discourse we daily hear, which lays down as a principle of misery, the suppression of the right, which was heretofore in parliaments of rejecting the edicts, that appeared unjust to them. This was a bank, say they, which kept the people from being drowned under the arbitrary power of the monarch. The breaking of this bank ought to be compared to the blow by which Aeolus shook the mountain, which served for a prison to the winds.

--- Cavum

(77) Louis Regnier Sieur de la Planche, Hist. de François II, pag. 515. & seq.

(78) Thevet. Eleg. Tom. VII, pag. 375.

(79) See the Collection of several Memoirs, printed at Paris for Peter Chevalier, 1633, in 4to, pag. 424.

(82) Mezerai, Abr. Chron. Tom. V, pag. 80, ad ann. 1563.

(83) Id. ibid.

(84) Brantome, Eloge de Charles IX, pag. 33, & 34, of the fourth Tome of his Memoirs.

(85) Without doubt Brantome means the same Speech of Charles IX, mentioned by Mezerai in the year 1571, pag. 239 of the third volume of his Great History.

prince should obey justice and reason. He opposed as much as possible unjust edicts. And if after all he was obliged to seal them, he shewed that it was against his will [L]. One

- - - Cavum conversa cuspide montem
Impulit in latus: ac venti, velut agmine facto, Quà data porta, ruunt, & terras turbine perfiant.
Incubère mari, totumque à sedibus imis
Unà Euræque Notusque raunt, creberque procellis Africus; & vastos volvunt ad litora fluctus.
Insequitur clamorque virum, stridorque rudem-tum (86).

(86) Virgil. Æn.
lib. i, ver. 85.

He said, and burl'd against the mountains side
His quivering spear, and all the GOD apply'd;
The raging winds rush through the hollow wound
And dance aloft in air, and skim along the ground;
Then settling on the sea the surges sweep,
Raise liquid mountains and disclose the deep,
South, east, and west, with mix'd confusion roar,
And roll the foaming billows to the shore;
The cables crack, the sailors fearful cries
Ascend, and sable night involves the skies,
And heaven itself is raviſh'd from their eyes,

DRYDEN.

They imbellish this with many maxims, which have a great appearance of solidity; but they never go farther, they never turn the tables, nor consult experience, nor examine whether any one could answer, I appeal to experience. Now this is the weak side; for it is easy to prove, that France was never so distressed and miserable as when the parliaments enjoyed the full authority of rejecting the edicts and ordinances of the prince, under Charles IX, and Henry III. It is easy to prove also, that the exercise of that authority, was the main cause of the miseries of the kingdom from the year 1562 to 1594. Chancellor de l'Hopital had laid the foundations of the public peace by the edict of the month of January. The church of Rome had no longer reason to fear the danger I have mentioned above (87); the king of Navarre had deserted the Huguenots; Catherine de Medicis no longer thought of pulling off the mask. They would have been contented to have had their fill of preaching; and so the kingdom would have remained in peace, provided the edict of January had been observed. But the Catholics infringed it, and from hence proceeded the first religious war, the root of all the evils that afflicted the state, till the extinction of the League; for all those evils were grafted upon, or sprung from one another, by a well connected train of causes and effects (88). Now to whom must the infraction of this edict of January be principally ascribed, but to the parliament of Paris? Did not they encourage every body to the non-observance of it? They did not register it without defaming it (89), that is to say, not till after three commands, and with such restrictions and clauses, as plainly shewed that it was registered by force, and as a very transient and very mischievous ordinance. Who would have feared after this, to violate such an edict, when they could not but be well assured, that a parliament who judged in this manner, would never trouble themselves to punish those that should break it; Now at that time to be accessory to the infraction of the edict, and to found an alarm for civil war, was one and the same thing. Observe well the words Varillas makes use of in the beginning of his relation of the measures that were taken against the Protestants, a little before the massacre of Vassy. The house of Guise, says he (90), judged by the opposition that the edict of January had met with in the parliament, that it would not long subsist, and doubted not but that civil wars would quickly begin. It may be said in general, that the parliaments of France, by refusing to ratify the edicts of pacification, or by ratifying them with an ill grace, and afterwards by a natural consequence, taking no care that they should be observed, were the chief causes of those long calamities that wasted the state, and had like to have ruined the monarchy root and branch. If Charles V had reigned at that time, France would infallibly have become a province of his dominions, or at least would have been divided into a thousand pieces.

VOL. III. N° LXXIV.

You only alledge, will some say, the bad use the parliaments then made of their right to reject the edicts of the prince. But I answer, are tyranny and most other disorders any thing else but an ill use of good things? It suffices to refuse your reflexions, to tell you, that this bank or barrier you speak of, and which, properly speaking, includes this contradiction, that a state is and is not monarchical, cannot be thought a good remedy, since it has done much more harm than good. What comparison is there between the advantages that accrued from the rejection of some pecuniary edicts (91), and the deplorable misery of the kingdom for thirty years together? These calamities are much less to be imputed to the court, than to the parliaments. The court was grown wise by the instructions of a most able and a most virtuous chancellor. Mr de l'Hopital had persuaded it to prevent, by the edict of January, all misfortunes, and to destroy the root of civil wars. The parliament, instead of seconding him, opposed him, and disappointed the remedy he had found; a remedy which must needs be good, since there was no other (92). The court would have walked in the road the chancellor had marked out, and only left it, by reason of the confusions into which the kingdom fell, through the fault of those who disobeyed the edict; and it was the parliaments that opened a wide path to this disobedience. They therefore are responsible for so many churches profaned, plundered, demolished, of which some are pleased to give long lists to render the Huguenots odious. Nor was it owing to them, that the miseries of the state were not perpetual, even after the destruction of the League. They opposed the edict of Nantes, the only remedy for these intestine confusions: the parliament of Paris would never have ratified it, if Henry IV had not made use of intreaties; but in a tone, that shewed he knew how to make himself obeyed (93). Note, that the speech of Mr de l'Hopital to the parliament of Bourdeaux (94), shews that at that time, when so little account was made of the king's ordinances, the administration of justice was horribly corrupted, and full of hideous disorders. I will conclude with saying, that the government of the people is such a perplexed affair, that the remedies which seem best, are sometimes worse than the disease, and the cause of the greatest disorders I have just now given a remarkable instance of it.

[L] If he was obliged to seal unjust edicts, he shewed that it was against his will. A minister of state, and especially the chancellor of a monarch, ought to do two things, if he would well discharge his duty. One is earnestly to recommend submission and obedience to the subjects; he ought not to speak to them of any thing else: he must not stand arguing with them, whether they have sometimes right to take up arms, or to refuse obedience to the ordinances that they think unjust and burdensome. He must suppose it a thing beyond dispute, that they have not that right. The other thing which he ought to do, is to represent strongly and incessantly to the prince, that the royal authority does not dispense him from an absolute submission to justice, and that it has no right or privilege to depart from reason, equity, and promises, &c. Mr de l'Hopital punctually acquitted himself of both these duties. He took the part of the king before the subjects, and the part of the subjects before the king. He repressed with great vehemence, those who made any attempt upon the royal authority. See (95) the censures that he made, or that the king made to the parliaments, according to his advice. See also (96) what he answered to the deputy of the parliament of Dijon. But you will now see with what integrity, with what constancy, he resisted the unjust proposals which were suggested to the prince. He withstood them by his arguments, as far as was possible; and if his remonstrances did not hinder the conclusion of the affair, he shewed that he had no ways consented to it. Ab, SIR, what a foul and venomous tail is it in an edict, when the ratification of it is decreed with these words, by the express command of the king, often times repeated, which only produce a condemnation from the wise and good, against the injustice of it, supported only by the commands, which the chancellors are frequently forced to seal against their

(91) The ninth of September, 1578, the parliament registered only two pecuniary Edicts, out of the twenty-two that were laid before them. See Faucher de Lendel's Fautes, pag. 88.

(92) Optimum remedium quia unicum.

(93) See Matthieu, Histoire de la Pair, liv. ii, parat. 1, n. 7, pag. m. 210, & seq.

(94) I have quoted it above, citat. (79).

(95) In the foregoing remark.

(96) In the article BEGAT.

One of the occasions in which he discovered his great presence of mind, was when the demands of the English ambassadors were examined in the king's council concerning the restitution of Calais. He answered their first reasons, and replies with so much force, that he had manifestly the victory (n), and gave occasion to the king his master to flatter himself, that by retaining that place, he did not infringe the treaty of peace of Cateau. His vigilance, as great as it was, could not secure him from the artifices of a secretary, who was a wicked man [M]: which gave him a great deal of trouble. It has been observed, that his face resembled Aristotle's [N]. Some attribute to him the (n) See Touanus, lib. xii, pag. 840, 841, ad ann. 1567, & Varillas, Histoire de Charles IX. Tom. II, book vi, pag. m. 39, & seq. See also Tom. I, pag. 256.

their opinion, in which are seen these odious and shameful words: Notwithstanding all the remonstrances made and to be made, which we hold as heard and understood, and for which we will not have it delayed. That is to say, in spite of reason, by a malignant counsel, an unjust will, and a rash determination, by the rebuke of virtue, the toleration of evil; and the hatred of honour, and by an affected ignorance, and the contempt of what is good. Wherefore that he might not participate of that shame, the good and most worthy chancellor de l'Hospital commonly wrote these words with his own hand upon the back of the letters, Me non consentiente, that is to say, I have been forced to seal them against my opinion; as he did to the letters about the reception of the powers of the cardinal of Ferrara, sent legate into France by Pope Pius IV, and the court of parliament reading these words indorsed by the chancellor, joined with him, and would never ratify these powers (97). President de la Place will inform us more particularly of what concerns this last passage. 'Now for as much as among other articles decreed in the states, it was ordered, that the benefices of the kingdom should be conferred by the ordinaries in every diocese, and no longer by the Pope, and that no dispensations should be received; there was great difficulty in admitting the power of the said legate: the chancellor remonstrating, that he could do nothing against what had been so unanimously resolved and concluded by the said states. But notwithstanding, the said legate giving to understand, that he being related to the house of France, it would be a great reproach and dishonour to him, to be the first legate refused in it, and offering not to use the said power, and to return immediately after the ratification of it, the chancellor was commanded to seal the letters; which he did after many alterations betwixt the legate and him, writing with his own hand under the seal of the letters, these words, Me non consentiente, that is, without my consent: which being seen by the said court, were refused with a declaration, that they could not, and ought not to receive them (98). Some historians say that at last the legate, in spite of the chancellor's opinion, got his powers received in the council of state; in which he was allowed a place (99). Every one knows the transcendent power of the Guises, under Francis II, yet they were not able to make the chancellor sloop. He was the only one that refused to sign the Arrêt for putting the prince of Condé to death (100).

(98) La Place, Commentaires de l'Etat de la Religion & Republique, livr. vi, fol. m. 214, verso, ad ann. 1561. See concerning that legate, the book on the origin of cardinals, pag. 265, & seq. Duch Edit. 1670.

(99) Le Grain, ubi supra, book i, pag. 213.

(100) Id. ibid. pag. 109.

(101) Languet, Epist. xii, lib. II, pag. 157.

Languet has preserved a smart repartee, which the chancellor made to the legate. The later was so bold as to tell him, that he did not know what was the duty of his place. I have endeavoured at least, said the chancellor, to learn it; but you who possess several bishoprics, have never thought of getting yourself instructed in the episcopal duties. 'Solut Cancellarius pertinacissime resistit, & dixit in ea re fieri summam injuriam Regi Puero, ac Regni Gallici Jura, & Majestatem prostruit, nec se passurum, ut Regio Sigillo sibi Concredito, ad eam rem abuteretur. Ad quæ incandescens Ferrariensis dixit eum ignorare quæ essent sui muneris & Officii: Ego vero, inquit Cancellarius, hoc saltem egi, ut id intelligerem, sed tu ne quidem cogitasti unquam quod sit Officium Episcopi, cum tamen aliquot Episcopatus possideas. Tandem victus aliorum importunitate tradidit eis Regium Sigillum, sed tamen voluit instrumento permissionis inseri, se contradicente hoc esse permittum (101). — The chancellor alone opposed it with the utmost vehemency, saying, that this was doing an injury of the highest nature to their sovereign, as yet a child, and a prostitution of the laws and majesty of France, and that he would never suffer the seals which were entrusted to him to be abused to such a purpose. Upon this the legate, incensed, told him that he did not know the duty of his place and office. I have, replied the chancellor, at least been at some pains to learn it, but you never so much as thought what is the duty of a bishop though you possess several bishoprics. At length, being overcome by the importunity of others, he gave them the seal, but obliged them to insert in the instrument, that the permission was granted contrary to his opinion.'

Here is a passage of Bodinus. 'It is very certain that the laws, ordinances, letters-patents, privileges and grants of princes, have no force but during their lives, if they are not ratified by the express consent, or at least by the permission of the prince who takes cognizance of them . . . Which was the reason why Mr de l'Hospital, chancellor of France, refused to seal the confirmation of the privileges, and exemption from taxes for St Maur des Fosses, whatever command he had to do it; because they bore a perpetual exemption: which is against the nature of personal privileges, and diminishes the power of the successors, and cannot be given to any corporations, but for the life of the prince who grants them; although the word perpetual be inserted (102).'

[M] His vigilance . . . could not secure him from the artifices of a secretary, who was a wicked man. I will relate upon this, what I have read in a book, intitled, La Fortune de la Cour. — The Fortune of the Court. Chancellor de l'Hospital was blamed, for that being naturally very severe in expediting justice, and stern to those that came to solicit him; yet he was otherwise with respect to his domestics, and especially to his secretary Bouvaut, who put upon him as often as he pleased; which he continued to do, till a complaint was brought to the council, on occasion of a very indecent letter: the chancellor was ashamed to be so over-reached, and was obliged to turn away, with a thousand reproaches, a servant whom he had before much loved (103). The author tells another thing, which has no reference to my text, yet I will transcribe it, being a remarkable passage. 'He was in like manner severely reprimanded by the late Mr de Montpensier, in full council, for that being almost inexorable to pass the grants which the king made of sums which were any way considerable, yet he had some days before received from the treasurer fifty thousand livres; and he was greatly reproached for it, though it was certain that the king himself, of his own desire, had pressed him to take them (104).'

[N] It has been observed that his face resembled Aristotle's. Beza affirms this in very strong terms.

Ut ex antiquissimo numismate apparuit, summum illum omnium Philosophorum principem Aristotelem sic ore toto retulit, ut alterius ex altero imago expressa videri posset (105). Thevet refutes it. 'And as to the likeness, says he (106), which Beza seigns, betwixt Aristotle and our chancellor; if he means in the features and lineaments of the face, there is no man that compares the true picture that I have given of Aristotle, above, with that of the chancellor, which he has got drawn to the life, but will discover at first sight, that there is a great difference. But Stephen Forcadet gives us some circumstances, which make for Beza. He says, that as Charles IX was visiting the towns of his kingdom, a statue was dug up, bearing the name of Aristotle, which perfectly resembled Michael de l'Hospital. He adds, that he made verses upon it, which pleased the chancellor. I transcribe his words at large, because they contain the praises of this great man, and that my dictionary ought sometimes at least to resemble those compilations, wherein are collected the judgment of the learned upon famous persons. Here follows then what Stephen Forcadet relates (107): 'Legis pervigil & excellens custos Cancellarius: qualem re ipsa se præbuit, dum viveret, ideoque à fato maxime laudabilis vir Michael Hospitalis, cui Musæ statuam libentissimè ponerent, nisi Jurisprudencia, simulque Philo-

(102) Bodin, de la Republique, lib. i, cap. viii, pag. m. 131, 132.

(103) La Fortune de la Cour, pag. 347. That book was printed at Paris, in 1642, in 8vo. See Sorel's Bibliothèque Française, pag. 414. Edit. 1667.

(104) Id. ibid. pag. 350.

(105) Beza, in Iconib. ubi supra.

(106) Thevet, ubi supra, pag. 367.

(107) Stephanus Forcatulus de Gallor. Imperio & Philosophia, lib. vii, pag. m. 1086, 1087.

the comparison of the apes; and probably they do in that what is common enough, not only among babblers in conversation, but also among writers; I mean, they ascribe to one what belongs to another [O]. He made a noble will, which was printed, in which he shewed, among other things, the inclination he had to peace [P], and his indifference for funeral ceremonies [Q]. He died the thirteenth of March 1573, being about sixty eight years of age [Q]. He made his only daughter his heiress, whom he had married phia hoc decus præripisset. Idque non ambigere significatum est superioribus annis, Carolo IX Rege suam Galliam opidatim lustrante, cum forte eruta fuit, & e sinu terræ altius effossa: statua inciso Aristotelis titulo, quæ apprimè M. Hospitalium lineamentis ac figuram referebat, ut nec sibi ipsi magis sit ille similis, sicut nec animi dotibus ab insigni Philosopho multum differt. Unde bene ominari cæpi de componendo turbulentæ Reipublicæ statu, quia Gallorum Cancellarius Regi maximo intus Magni illius Alexandri doctorem effigie exaquasset. Nos itaque Hospitali humanissimoque viro, honoris gratia, tunc versiculos dedicavimus comiter supra expectationem accipiendos:

(1) See, above, the remark [H], citat. (68).

Quisquis Aristoteli doctum te contulit, idem Blandius docto fertur Aristoteli.

(108) Qui non vultu tantum Aristotelis os, quod ex utroque imaginum ubique profuturum comparatione constat, sed Solonis . . . referbat. Thuan. lib. lvi, pag. 43.

(109) Brant. Memoir. Tom. II, pag. m. 78, in the Elogij upon constable Montmorency.

(110) Montagne, Essays, book ii, chap. xvii, pag. m. 576, 577.

(111) Menage, Modi di dire Italiani, pag. 29, at the end of his Etymologies of the Italian tongue.

(112) You will find them translated into Latin, apud Vossium de Scient. Mathem. pag. 237.

(113) Costar, Suite de la Défense de Voiture, pag. 189.

(114) His French name was Guetiere, as I find it in Guichenon's History of Breffe, pag. 36.

(115) Jacobus Gutherius, de jure Manium, lib. ii, cap. xxvi, pag. 351, Edit. Lips. 1671.

(116) Fatalité de Saint Clou. I have mentioned that book in the article of HENRY III, citat. (89), and at the end of remark [R].

(117) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mémoires de Castelnau, Tom. I, pag. 522.

Thuanus confirms what Beza says (108). Note, that Brantome speaks of another resemblance: Chancellor de l'Hospital, says he, (109) had all over Cato's mien, a great white beard, a pale face, a grave countenance; so that one would have said upon the sight of him, that he was the true picture of St Jerome, and so several people said at court.

[O] Some attribute to him the comparison of the apes, and probably they . . . give to one what belongs to another. They transfer to our chancellor a thought of his predecessor. Read these words of Montagne (110): 'I have found the shortest and easiest way . . . to rid myself of this desire, and to fit still . . . judging impartially of my strength, that it was not capable of great things. And remembering that saying of the late chancellor Olivier, that the French were like apes, who go leaping up a tree from branch to branch, and never leave off, till they are come to the topmost bough, to shew their breach when they are there (§ a).' Mr Menage (111) cites these words of Montagne, after having quoted some Greek verses (112), in which Scaliger made use of the same thought against Lydiat, and the Latin verses which Salmasius made against Petavius, which turn upon the same comparison. Costar intimates that chancellor Olivier said this in a speech, but I can hardly believe it. 'Chancellor Olivier, says he (113), made no scruple publicly to compare the French to apes, who leap from branch to branch, and shew their breach when they are at the top of the tree.' I will shew, that an advocate in the parliament of Paris, ascribes that comparison to chancellor de l'Hospital. This advocate is little known, but by the name of Gutherius (114), which may be translated five or six different ways, without departing from the analogy, by which the French have latinized their names.

This by the way. The passage is as follows. Sæpe ego audivi à fori nostri principibus viris, Michaelem Hospitalium Franciæ Cancellarium, cui nulla ætas habuit parem, solum dicere, multos, qui ad honores à fortuna pelluntur, simiarum esse simillimos, quæ alto-rem arborem natiæ, eoque descendunt, ut cum ad summum arboris fastigium evaserint, foliis vento fridentibus operæ totæ posterora tantum prætereuntibus ridiculè ostentant (115). There are a thousand instances which prove, that the same thought is commonly ascribed to different persons. I will only cite one which has some affinity with the reign, under which Mr de l'Hospital was chancellor. 'Mr Villeroi was told one day, that he was the fittest man to write the history of Charles IX, as having had a hand in every thing, and for that reason that he ought to write it. I am too much obliged, answered he, to that prince, and I love his memory too well to write his history (§ β); meaning that the truths he should be obliged to relate, would disgrace that king (116).' This is what is said by the author of the book, intitled, La Fatalité de St Clou; but Mr le Laboureur (117) relates this as Morvillier's answer. And I had rather follow this last tradition.

[(§ a) The edition of Montagne's Essays in 16mo, printed at Lyons by Francis le Febvre 1595, has suppressed this as injurious to the French nation. It is however no more so than that of Livy, l. 10. Gallorum prima prælia plus quam virorum, &c. a saying which Rabelais has ventured to put in the mouth of one of the generals of Gargantua's army, in a speech which he makes in full council, and before his master. REM. CRIT.]

[(§ β) This repartee which in Matthieu, History of Lewis XI, pag. 571. edit. of 1610. is related of a certain lord to one Mr de Tinteville, who had said to him, that none could write his late master's life better than he, was probably originally spoke by chancellor Morvillier, whom Lewis XI had affronted, by disowning some severe words, which he had charged him to deliver in his name to the count of Charolois. REM. CRIT.]

[P] He shewed in his will . . . the inclination which he had for peace. In that last act of his life, he was desirous to claim honour on account of a thing of which Cicero boasted in a full senate. 'Quo quidem in bello, said that great Roman orator, semper de pace agendum, audiendumque putavi; semperque dolui, non modo pacem, sed orationem etiam civium pacem, efflagitantium repudiari; neque enim ego illa, nec ulla umquam secutus sum arma civilia: semperque mea consilia pacis, & togæ sociæ, non belli, atque armorum fuerunt . . . Quod quidem meum consilium minime obscurum fuit, nam & in hoc ordine, integra re, multa de pace dixi: & in ipso bello eadem etiam cum capitis mei periculo sensi (118).

During that war I always was for treating of peace, and giving ear to peaceful counsels; I always grieved, that not only peace but even the ardent prayers of our citizens for it were rejected; neither did I ever join in these or in any other civil wars: and my counsels always were on the side of peace and justice, and not on that of war and arms. That such were always my sentiments can be unknown to none, for when matters were still entire, I frequently spoke for peace in this august assembly: and even during the war, I declared my self on the same side with the hazard of my life. There is hardly any thing in this, but what Mr de l'Hospital might have said; but here is what he wrote in his will (119): 'I can say for myself, that though arms have been taken up four times, and battels have been given as often, I have always advised to a peace, not reckoning any thing so prejudicial to a country, as a civil war, nor any thing more advantageous than a peace, upon what condition soever (120).'

Afterwards speaking of the enemies which that maxim drew upon him, and of the miseries which France was plunged into, &c. he adds (121): 'I gave place to arms, which were the strongest, and retired into the country with my wife and family, and little children, begging but one thing of the king and queen at my departure: that since they had determined to break the peace, and to prosecute those with war, with whom they had concluded a peace but a little before, and since they removed me from the court, because they understood I was always contrary, and had an ill opinion of their design: I requested them, I say, that since they did not acquiesce in my counsels, yet at least, when they had satiated and glutted their heart and their thirst with the blood of their subjects, they would embrace the first occasion of peace that should offer itself, before things were reduced to extremum ruin; for whatever might be the issue of that war, it must necessarily be very pernicious to the king and the kingdom.'

[Q] He died about sixty eight years of age. He begins his will thus (122): 'I have always been in doubt concerning my age, because my friends said 52, they have heard my father speak variously about it, who sometimes said that I was born before the war began against the Genoese, and at other times main-

(118) Cicero pro Marcello, cap. 70.

(119) Testament of Michel de l'Hospital, apud Colomies, Bibliothèque, pag. 60.

(120) See Pasquier's Letters, Tom. I, book x, pag. 62, & seq. where he represents the miseries of civil wars.

(121) Testament. &c. ibid. pag. 62.

(122) Ibid. pag. 52.

* John de l'Hospital.

married to Robert Hurault, and he left his library to Michael Hurault, the second of his grand-sons, who has been well known by the name of Mr du Fay [R]. I might have added a great many more things; but I have omitted them, because they may be found in Moreri, or in the Additions of Mr Teiffier to the Elogies of Thuanus, or in Thevet's Elogies, or Brantome's Memoirs. The later, who was a man of the sword, has succeeded better in the praises of this chancellor (p), than all the professed writers that I have read; tho' I confess, that Thuanus and Scævola Sammarthanus, have wrote very handsomly in his praise. Ronfard's ode, (q) designed as an elogy upon this chief officer of justice, has been looked upon as an excellent one; but in certain respects I find nothing that comes up to Brantome's description. It shews Mr de l'Hospital to have been a man that might be opposed to the most eminent and generous men of the gown in ancient Greece and Rome. I shall cite in my remarks for many other passages, that not to be too tedious, I wave what Brantome has written. I only intreat my readers to consider two things: the first is, what he observes upon the dispute which the chancellor maintained with the utmost resolution, against the cardinal of Lorraine, who demanded that the council of Trent should be received (r): the other concerns the undauntedness that Mr de l'Hospital expressed after the Paris massacre, when he had reason to fear, that the murderers had received orders to do execution in his house (s). I will add this one thing more. A famous author (t) having defined the force of the soul to be 'a certain temper and disposition of mind, always equal in itself, constant, stable, heroic, able to see, to hear, and do all things without disturbance, confusion, or astonishment, adds, that this is much the same with Juvenal's description of it in six fine verses of his tenth Satire (u). Chancellor de l'Hospital (he goes on) (x), who was possessed of this strength of mind, as much as any that went before, or came after him, described it still in fewer, though in much bolder words, which he even chose for his device; Si fractus illabatur orbis, Impavidum ferient ruinæ (y). See the margin (z). Shall I forget the services which he did even after his death? Is it not just to observe, that the state-maxims by which he regulated his conduct, were of very great use to France, because he left some disciples, imbued with his wise principles, who in due time opposed the Leaguers, and rendered their pernicious enterprizes abortive [S]? I shall add something to the remark which relates to Mr du Fay, his grand-son (aa) [T].

(p) It is inserted in the elogy of the constable of Montmorency.

(q) It is the tenth of the first book. Richelet, who commented upon it, says it is a masterpiece of poetry. See also Pasquier, in the twenty second book of his Letters, pag. 758.

(r) Brant. Memoir. Tom. II, pag. m. 85. See in Parillat, Hist. de Charles IX, book vi, pag. m. 5, & seq. the particulars of that dispute at large.

(s) Brantome, ibid. pag. 87, 88.

(t) Naudé, Coups d'Etat, chap. v, pag. m. 784.

(u) Fortem polce animum mortis terrore vacantiem, &c.

(x) Naudé, ibid. pag. 785, 786.

(y) Ubi supra, pag. 53.

(z) He left it in 1523.

(aa) In the second Tome, in the Elogy of the constable Montmorency.

(ab) It is not in Colomieu's edition.

(ac) The 12th in edit. Colomieu.

(ad) Thuan. Histor. lib. Ivi, in fin. pag. 43.

(ae) Sammarth. in Elog. lib. i, pag. m. 60.

(af) See Sammarthanus, Elog. lib. II, pag. m. 177, & seq.

(ag) In the fifth chapter of the first book, and in the ninth chapter of the second.

(ah) It was inserted in the third Tome of the Memoirs of the League, pag. 1, & seq. with this title, Excellent & libre Discours sur l'estat present de la France.

(ai) Fragment de l'Examen du Prince de M. Chivalier, pag. 83, & seq.

the mischief he may do. First of all, he suffers himself to be deceived, and then he himself deceives his master, for in point of devotion, the wisest of men are often imposed upon. Many think that they are very pious and devout, if they are grossly ignorant of what concerns religion, and refer themselves to those whose business it is to teach it; some of whom being practised upon, lead them a fine dance. We have spoken of the great misfortunes into which several great princes, who were otherwise prudent men, have fallen for want of understanding this cabal. We will speak a word of some of their ministers. . . . There were two sorts of them; for those who had been bred up under the discipline of chancellor l'Hospital, observed maxims, which were not only consonant to piety and Christian moderation, but useful for the preservation of the peace, and maintenance of the king's authority. The others, on the contrary, whether it was out of conscience, without much knowledge, or to make a separate party, adhered so much to the externals of religion, that they thought it better to let the kingdom fall into a combustion, than to suffer the least accommodation in matters of religion. Now what followed from this diversity of opinions, was, that the later proved very instrumental in forming, raising, and fortifying the League, the other in destroying it and preserving the kingdom, which the contrary party had brought to the brink of destruction.

[T] I shall add something to the remark concerning Mr du Fay, his grand-son. He composed several books concerning the affairs of those times. They ascribe to him the Anti-Sixte, Anti-Espagnol, and the Francophile contre les Conspirations du Roi d'Espagne, du Pape, & des Rebelles de France (134). Mr Baillet, from whom I have this, doth not give us any character of the first of these three pieces, and I do not know whether he means a book of which I have seen an edition printed at Cologne by Herman Jolin (135) in 1586 in 8vo. It is intitled, Moyens d'abus, entreprises & nullitez du rescrit & bulle du Pape Sixte V du nom en date du mois de Septembre 1585, contre le Serenissime Prince, HENRY DE BOURBON, Roy de Navarre & HENRY DE BOURBON Prince de Condé, par un Catholique, Apostolique, Romain: mais bon François, & très-fidèle Sujet de la Couronne de France. — A proof of the abuses, incroachments, and nullities, of the rescript and bull of Pope Sixtus V, dated September 1585, against

(y) They are Horace's words, Od. iii, lib. iii, and signify, If the world should be overturned, the ruins of it would strike me fearless, and undaunted.

(z) The vigor which the court of France showed in 1563, against the Pope, who had cited the queen of Navarre, &c. and who was obliged to revoke his Monitory, was owing to Mr de l'Hospital, and the constable of Montmorency. See Thuanus, lib. lxxii, pag. m. 32, 33.

(aa) In remark [R].

(134) See Baillet, in the Recueil des Anti, arts xxxiv.

(135) I believe this is supposed.

against the most serene prince, Henry of Bourbon king of Navarre, and Henry of Bourbon prince of Condé by a Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman: but a true Frenchman and faithful subject of the crown of France. With regard to the second of these three pieces, Mr Baillet says as follows. The Anti-Espagnol 'has been printed at different times with some alterations. That which appeared 1594 in 12mo, is intituled L'Anti-Espagnol & Exhortation de ceux de Paris qui ne se veulent faire Espagnols, à tous les François de leur parti, de se remettre en l'obéissance du Roi Henry quatrième, & de se delivrer de la Tyrannie de Castille. — The Anti-Espagnol, and Exhortation of such Parisians as are not willing to become Spaniards, to all the Frenchmen of their party, to return to their obedience to king Henry IV. and to deliver themselves from the tyranny of Castile. It is the fourth and last of these excellent discourses on the state of France, published in 1695. But that which was afterwards revised was published under the title of L'Anti-Espagnol, ou brief discours, du but où tend Philippe Roi d'Espagne se meslant des affaires de France. — The Anti-Espagnol, or a brief discourse concerning the ends of Philip king of Spain, in meddling in the affairs of France. It is inserted in the fourth volume of the Memoirs of the League published in 1604 by Samuel du Lis (136). There is an edition which preceded both these, printed in 1590 in 8vo, and intituled only, Copie de l'Anti-Espagnol fait à Paris. — A copy of the Anti-Espagnol written at Paris. My edition of the fourth volume of the Memoirs of the League is printed in the year 1595: the Anti-Espagnol is inserted there at page 230. If Mr Baillet has seen an edition in 1604, it is not the first. What I am going to cite may serve for a supplement to a remark in the article of GREGORY VII (137). It is that wherein I say, that it is not a sure way to judge of princes by the pieces which are published against them during the heat of factions. It is ordinary for all factions to produce Libels. He who wrote the Anti-Sixte would not have stopped there, had he not been expressly ordered so to do by the king, long before he had the happiness to be reconciled to the Church. His majesty who never loved these turbulent and furious spirits, commanded that satirical piece to be suppressed. But it was not possible to do it; and if it is preserved to another age, it will serve as a sword and buckler to the enemies of the church, who will rise out of the ashes of these people, to attack the head thereof, as is their custom (138).

(136) Baillet, Recueil des Anti, Art. cxxix.

(137) It is not mark [O].

(138) Flor. de Remond, l'Anti-Papelle, cap. xvi, n. 3, folio. 466.

HOSPITAL (FRANCIS DE L') created marshal of France, the twenty third of April, 1643 (a), was called before that time Mr du Hallier. Moreri, copying Father Anselme, gives an ample account of his genealogy, and mentions his exploits and dignities; but he does not take notice of a thing which I have read in a State of France [A]. I shall relate it here. I will also give a supplement to an observation I have made above, concerning the first wife of marshal de l'Hospital [B].

(a) Anselme, Hist. des Grands Officiers, pag. 266.

I said

[A] Mr Moreri doth not take notice of a thing which I have read in a State of France. Which is that marshal de l'Hospital, 'was originally of Calabria, of a very illustrious family, having had many alliances with the kings and queens of Naples. But the love his predecessors had for Charles of Anjou, second king of Naples, engaging them in his interest against the kings of Arragon and Castile, they were forced to seek a sanctuary in France, when these Spanish princes resumed the sceptre of that kingdom (1). Since Father Anselme has not mentioned this, he must either have not known it, or have judged it uncertain. He begins the genealogy of that family, with one Francis de l'Hospital, who lived in 1314, and 1338 (2); and in another book (3) he goes no higher than Francis de l'Hospital, chamberlain, &c. to Charles VI in 1404, and fifth grandfather to him, who is the subject of this article. Note that the author of the notes upon Gabriel Naudé's Coups d'Etat, is very much out in pretending (4), that our marshal de l'Hospital was descended from the chancellor of the same name.

[B] I will give a supplement concerning the first wife of marshal de l'Hospital. We have seen elsewhere (5), that he made no scruple to marry Charlotte des Effars, mother of several illegitimate children, some of king Henry IV, and others of cardinal de Guise. I forgot when I made that remark, what I had read in the notes upon the Amours of Henry the Great. But since I now remember it, I must give my readers a new circumstance of the victory Mr du Hallier obtained over matrimonial scruples. You will see, that Charlotte des Effars was a bastard herself, and that after the death of cardinal de Guise, she was mistress to another prelate. Henry IV loved also Charlotte des Effars, natural daughter of the baron de Sautour in Champagne, and of the lady Dheny, by whom he had two daughters. She had attended the countess de Beaumont Harlay in her embassy to England; then she was mistress to cardinal de Guise, who had several children by her, the count de Romorantin, the abbot de Chailly, the Chevalier, Madam de Rhodes, &c. Afterwards she was mistress to Mr de Vic, archbishop of Auch, three years; then she married Francis de l'Hospital, count de Rofnay, baron de Bein, marshal of France (6). Father Anselme tells us, that she was married to him about the year 1629, and that her husband married again the twenty eighth of August, 1633, to Frances Mignot, by whom he had a son, who died a few days after he was born (7). Moreri observes, that the adventures this Francis Mignot are very singular. This has been left out in the Paris edition of 1699. Marshal de l'Hospital's stars were not fortunate in that respect.

Father Anselme (8) observes that Charlotte des Effars died in the year 1651. We should conclude from this that our Francis de l'Hospital got his marriage dissolved; for he married another wife in 1633 (9). I do not know how this came about, neither do I know whether we have any account of it in any book. I believe many of my readers will imagine that he discovered the false step which he had made after he had committed it, and that hoping to repair it, he commenced a suit against his wife. Possibly he did not find her so rich as he imagined. It is probable that he fancied that a lady who had been mistress successively to a king of France, and two archbishops, must needs be immensely rich, and that if a person of quality is allowed to marry a maid of mean birth, who brings him the treasures of a Financier, he ought not to be condemned for putting his affairs in a very good condition, by marrying a lady who had gained a great fortune by her galantries. If he reasoned in this manner, and found afterwards, that the fortune of the lady was not sufficient to repair either her want of youth or reputation, what he had to do but annul the contract? however the lady obtained the great thing desired by persons of her sex, she got a husband, she entered the harbour notwithstanding so many storms and shipwrecks. It is very likely she owed this to the opinion of her being rich. Let us conclude with some verses of Regnier.

(8) Hist. Generale de la Maison Royale, pag. 156.

(9) See the marginal note at the end of this remark.

Je ne suis point adroit, je n'ay point d'éloquence
Pour colorer un fait, ou destourner la foy,
Prouver qu'un grand amour n'est sujet à la loy,

Desbaucher une fille, & par vives raisons
Luy monstrer comme Amour fait les bonnes maisons,
Les maintient, les esleve, & propice aux plus belles
En honneur les advance, & les fait Damoiselles.

Et pour le faire court
Dire qu'il n'est rien tel qu'aymer les gens de court
Allegant maint exemple en ce siecle ou nous sommes
Qu'il n'est rien si facile à prendre que les hommes,
Et qu'on ne s'enquiert plus s'elle a fait le pourquoy,
Pourveu qu'elle soit riche, & qu'elle ait bien dequoy,
Quand elle auroit suivy le camp à la Rochelle,
S'elle a force ducats elle est toute pucelle.

6 P

L'honneur

(a) Etat de la France, printed in 1657, pag. 92, 93.

(2) Anselme, Palais de l'Honneur, pag. 414.

(3) Idem, Hist. des Grands Officiers, pag. 232.

(4) Page 905.

(5) Above, remark [B] of the article GUISE (Lew. de, &c.)

(6) Observations sur l'Histoire des Amours du grand Alexandre, pag. 299.

(7) Anselme, Hist. des Grands Officiers, pag. 266.

VOL. III.

I said in the second edition of this Dictionary, that Father Anfelm has not observed that the family of this mareschal was originally from the kingdom Naples, as another writer, whose words I quoted, had observed. I shall confirm this, below, by the testimony of one author more, and shall show that the marquis de L'HOSPITAL, one of the most profound mathematicians of the XVIIth century, was of the same family with this mareschal of France [C].

L'honneur estropié, languissant, & perclus, N'est plus rien qu'un idole en qui l'on ne croit plus (10).

*I am not artful, have not eloquence,
To colour o'er a fact, virtue supplant,
And prove that mighty love is subject to no law.*

*A girl debauch, and by strong reasons shewn,
That love makes families illustrious,
Raises their fame, and, to the fair propitious,
Advances them to th' rank of gentlewomen.*

*And to cut it short,
Say, 'tis an honour to intrigue with courtiers,
Alledging many examples of this age;
That nothing's easier to be had than men;
And that a woman's whole concern shou'd be
To enrich her coffers with the spoils of love:
What tho' the camp she follow to Rochelle,
If she has store of gold, she's still a maid.*

There are both truth and hyperboles in the expressions of this satirist. See the margin (11).

(11) See the remark of the article ESSAYS (CHARLOTTE DEN), and you will find the mareschal's second marriage was posterior to the death of his first wife, &c.

[C] I shall confirm this . . . by the testimony of another author, and will show that the marquis de L'HOSPITAL, one of the profoundest Mathematicians . . . was of the same family with this mareschal of France.] The count of Saint-Melme, who died December 4, 1701, 'was of the family of L'Hospital, much more illustrious on its own account (since its origin is lost in royal and consular families) than famous for the eminent posts and high dignities which in has enjoyed for more than four hundred years in France, that it has been settled there. It is originally, of Naples, and bore the name of Gallucy, which it quitted for a French one, which was that of the estate of L'Hospital which one Gallucy, the head of that family in France, bought upon his arrival there (12). You will observe that the count of Saint-Melme is descended (13) from ALOLÉ DE L'HOSPITAL, Sieur de Choisy, captain of the forest of Orleans, elder brother of CHARLES DE L'HOSPITAL, Sieur de Vitry, from whom the mareschal of France is descended. These two brothers were sons of HADRIAN DE L'HOSPITAL and Ann Rouhault daughter of Joachim Rouhault mareschal of France. He swore fealty to the king at Paris November 27, 1498. The count de Saint-Melme was lieutenant-general of the king's armies, gouverneur, bailif, and particular judge in Eyre of the forests of the county of Dourdan, first master of the horse to Gaston of France duke of Orleans; gentleman of Honour, and first master of the Horse to the duchess Dowager of Orleans (14), and afterwards to the great duchess of Tuscany (15). You will find an eulogy of him in the book which I quote (16). He was married to Elizabeth Gobelin, daughter to Mr Gobelin counsellor of state, and intendant of the armies, and left behind him two sons. The eldest is the marquis DE L'HOSPITAL, author of the Analyse des infiniment petits, or Analysis of infinitely small quantities. The younger is the count DE L'HOSPITAL, who enjoys the same post with the grand duchess of Tuscany which his father held (17). The marquis de L'Hospital, author of the Analyse des infiniment petits, and one of the greatest Mathematicians of our age, died at Paris February 2, 1704, aged forty three years. See his eulogy in the Memoirs of Trevoux (18), and in the News from the Republic of Letters (19). He had married Mademoiselle Roulleau de la Chenelaie, with whom he lived in so strict an union, that he even communicated his genius for the Mathematics to her. He has left four children by her, one son and three daughters (20).

(12) Mercure Galant, of Jan. 1702, pag. 170, 171. See also the News from the Republic of Letters, June 1704, pag. 621, &c.

(13) Anfelm, Hist. des Grands Officiers, pag. 232.

(14) Wife to Gaston of France.

(15) Mercure Galant, Jan. 1702, pag. 169.

(16) Id. ibid. pag. 172, &c.

(17) From the Mercure Galant, ibid. pag. 179, 180.

(18) In the addition to the month of February, 1704, pag. 24, &c., of the edit of France. See also June 1704, pag. 1014, &c.

(19) June 1704, art. II.

(20) Journ. Trevoux, June 1704, pag. 3016.

(a) So he writes his name at the beginning of his books. Many write it Hotomanus, or Hotomanus.

HOTMAN (FRANCIS), in Latin Hotomanus (a), was one of the most learned civilians of the XVIth century. He was born the twenty third of August, 1524, at Paris, where this family, originally of Silesia [A], had flourished for some time. At fifteen years of age he was sent to Orleans, there to study the civil-law, and he became capable of a doctor's degree in three years. His father, a counsellor in the parliament who had already designed his employment for him, caused him to return home, and entered him at the bar; but the young gentleman was quickly disgusted with the wranglings of the court, and engaged deeply in the study of the Roman law, and polite learning. He relished the new opinions, for which so many were put to death in the kingdom; and finding that he could not make profession of them at Paris, he went to Lyons in the year 1547, where he published a book. This was the second work that he put to the press [B]. Seeing that he had nothing to hope for as a subsistence from his father,

(1) Born at Emmerick, in the duchy of Cleves, according to Mr Baillet, in the Anti. art. cxxxi.

(2) Thus I correct the fault Loderici VI, in Hotomanus's Life, of the Leipsic edition, 1686, and in that of Amsterdam, 1700.

(3) Redimendo Francisco Regi ad Titium esopio, ingentem pecuniam vim solut fide sua curaverit summo Gallie bono, summa sua cum laude. Erud. Novellus Dicitur, in Vita Fr. Hotomanni, pag. m. 208.

(4) Id. ibid.

[A] His family was originally of Silesia.] There are several families of the name of Hotman in Breslaw, the capital city of Silesia, from which are descended several others, settled in Lusatia, in Misnia, in the country of Cleves, &c. LAMBERT HOTMAN (1), went into France to bear arms in the service of Lewis XI (2), and married advantageously at Paris. JOHN HOTMAN, his eldest son was so rich, that he disbursed vast sums for the ransom of Francis I (3). PETER HOTMAN, the last of Lambert's eighteen children, was chief justice in Eyre, and afterwards counsellor in parliament of Paris, Our FRANCIS HOTMAN was his eldest son (4). The Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary says, that HENRY HOTMAN, born at Cleves in the year 1466 was the first of that name who came into France, and that he came with Engilbert duke of Cleves, who was the first duke of Nevers.

[B] It was the second work which he put to the press.] For he had already published a little book de gradibus cognationis, which was very much esteemed. 'Pene puer libellum de gradibus cognationis adjuncto diagrammate publicavit à doctissimis viris in precio habitum, & mox à quodam haud ignobili Jurisconsulto probatum, ita ut eum suis in Institutiones commentariis vehementer commendatum infereret (5). — When very young he published a book on the Degrees of Affinity, which has been greatly esteemed by the learned, and was soon after so valued by a Civilian of no mean rank, that he published it in his Comment on the Institutes, with great praises.' His second work was a Commentary ad titulum Institutionum de actionibus. The beauty of the stile, and the knowledge of the Roman Antiquities, that shined in that piece, gave him a great reputation (6). Mr Teissier (7) should not have applied that fine commendation to the little book concerning the degrees of Affinity. Had he more attentively consulted the work he quotes (8), he would not have taken the one for the other.

La Croix du Maine will tell you, that the French translation, which Hotomanus made of Socrates's apology, written by Plato, was printed in the year 1549, at Lyons, for Sebastien Gryphius in 8vo.

(5) Idem, Neveletus, in Vita Hotomanni, pag. 210.

(6) Jurisconsultus etiam magis gratum ob Latine sermonis elegantiam, & Romanitatis exquisitam scientiam. Id. ibid.

(7) Addit aux Eloges, Tom. II, pag. 115.

(8) Hotomanni's Life, written by Nevelet.

[C] He

ther, he went to Laufane [C], where the magistrates of Bern made him professor of the Belles Lettres. He published some books there, and married a French gentlewoman (b), who had fled thither upon account of religion. His merit was so well known in all parts, that the magistrates of Straßburg offered to make him professor of the civil-law; and whilst he was discharging that office, he was sought after by the duke of Prussia, and the landgrave of Hesse. He did not accept those invitations; but he did not cease to go to the court of the king of Navarre, at the beginning of the troubles. He went twice into Germany to desire succours from Ferdinand in the name of the princes of the blood, and even in the name of the queen-mother (c). The speech he made at the diet of Francfort is extant. Being returned to Straßburg, he yielded to the persuasions of John de Monluc, to go and teach the civil-law at Valence [D]; which he did so successfully, as to restore the reputation of that university. Three years after he went to profess it at Bourges, being invited thither by Margaret of France, sister to king Henry II; but five months after he repaired to Orleans to the heads of the party, to whom his counsels were of notable service. The peace which was made a month after, did not deliver him from the fear of a new storm; for which reason he retired to Sancerre, and there waited for better times. It was there he wrote an excellent book de Consolatione (d). He returned afterwards to his professorship at Bourges, where he had like to have lost his life, during the massacre of the year 1572. Having the good fortune to escape, he left France, fully resolved to return thither no more, and betook himself to Geneva. He there read lectures of civil-law, and published some books with that strength against the persecutors, that he had great promises made him, to oblige him to write no more in that strain: but he hearkened not to those propofals [E]. Some time after

(b) She was a native of Orleans, and her name was Claudine Aubelin. Petrus Neveletus, ubi infra, citat. (23).

(c) See, below, citat. (23).

(d) His son got it printed after his father's death.

[C] He went to Laufane.] Mr Tessier says that Francis Hotman, after he had left France, retired to Geneva, and lived some time in Calvin's house (9). I believe he is in the right, tho' the life of Hotman, which he cites, does not mention it. Nevelet seems to have suppressed a thing, which he should not have omitted. It is not very probable, that the magistrates of Bern should have offered a professor's chair, in the academy of Laufane, to a young man of twenty three years of age, who lived at Lyons. But it is probable, they made this offer to him, if we suppose, that he lived at Geneva, and had got the love of Calvin. Thus you see the want of exactness that is found in the best books; because commonly good authors are those, who love to shorten a narration. They do not always take notice, so that by this contrafection they sometimes strangle it.

(10) Horat. de Arte Poet. ver. 25, 26. Brevi esse laboro, obscurus fio (10). This may have been the case of Nevelet; or we may say, that not having found in the memoirs that were given him, the journey from Lyons to Geneva, he thought Francis Hotman left Lyons, only because he was chosen professor of the Belles Lettres at Laufane (11). But let us not decide on the most probable side; for as there were already at Laufane many eminent refugees, who both knew and loved the merit and piety of Francis Hotman (12), they might easily obtain from the magistrates of Bern an invitation to him, while he was at Lyons. Mr Tessier observes, that it was by the mediation of Theodore Beza, that the town of Laufane offered Hotman a professorship of the Belles Lettres. I believe he is mistaken, and that he had better have ascribed it to Calvin's interest; for Hotman was professor at Laufane, before Beza went thither to profess the Greek tongue (13), and it is certain that Beza stood in need of Calvin's good offices to obtain that professorship. Is it likely a man should procure a professor's chair for another, in a town, where he is not, and where he cannot settle himself but the interest of others? Mr Tessier, no doubt, believed, that Beza was professor of the Greek tongue at Laufane before Hotman was invited thither. Thus you see how important it is in the narrative of this sort of things, to consult well the dates and the niceties of Chronology.

(11) In urbem Equitum . . . ad humanorum que dicuntur litterarum professorum honorificè Senatui Bernensi Reipub. evocatus, cujus in ditione urbs illa se contulit. Neveletus, ubi supra, pag. 211.

(12) Id. ibid.

(13) Erant Laufane tunc temporis doctrina & pietate viri insignes Petrus Viretus Ecclesie Pastor . . . Franciscus Hotmanus eloquentie Professor. In Vita Theodori Beza, apud Melchior. Adam. pag. 205.

(14) Thuan. lib. xix, pag. 378, ad ann. 1590.

not understood by the French translator: he thought they signified that Hotman taught the civil-law, sometimes at Valence and sometimes at Bourges (15), which is not the meaning, for he taught no longer at Valence, when he once had left it. The translator should therefore have said, that the dukes of Berry invited him twice to Bourges, as may be seen in the body of this article. Those who see in Hotman's life his successive removals from one town to another, will make no great account of the memoirs that Thuanus was supplied with, since he says, that after the massacre of the year 1572. Hotman went to Montbeliard, and from thence to Basil. He should have said, that he went to Geneva, and from thence to Basil, and then to Montbeliard, afterwards to Geneva, any lastly to Basil.

[E] He published at Geneva (16) some books with that strength against the persecutors, that they made him great promises . . . but he gave no ear to these propofals.] This is what is said of it by the author of his life (17), 'Ad Allobroges igitur iterum tanquam in portum se refert, scriptisque aliquot eruditius contra fidem immò, per fidem ipsam cæcorum innocentiam constanter tuetur: & quidem adeo efficaciter, ut qui mollem putabant futurum ejus in tanta calamitate animum, prolixis sollicitationibus hortarentur ab istiusmodi scriptiois genere abstinere: ret: quibus ille hoc tantum reposuit, Nunquam sibi propugnatam causam quæ iniqua esset, nunquam quæ jure & legibus niteretur, desertam prætorum spe vel metu periculi: opprimi enim in bona causa melius, quam male cedere. Non modo non excusandum parricidium, ultro etiam defendendam causam innocentium. — He therefore once more returned to Geneva, as to a safe port, and there, in several books, boldly defended the innocence of those who were massacred against all faith, or rather for their faith: This he did in so strong a manner, that some who imagined that his spirit must needs be sunk by his great distress, made him large offers if he would give over writing on that subject: to whom he answered, That he never had defended an unjust cause, and never had deserted a just and honorable one, either for hope of rewards or fear of dangers, that it was better to be oppressed in a good cause, than basely to quit it. That these cruel murders were not only not to be defended, but that we ought openly to defend the cause of the innocent.' A little after he speaks of the book, de regni Gallie statu, which Hotman published about that time under the title of Franco-Gallia. It is a commendable work in point of learning, but very unworthy of a French civilian, if we believe even many Protestants concerning it. Mr Tessier speaks thus of it: His book intituled Franco-Gallia, drew upon him, WITH REASON, the censure of the true French-men. For in that work he endeavours to prove (18) that this kingdom which is the most flourishing in Christendom, is not successive, as the inheritances of

(15) See the elogies taken out of Thuanus by Mr Tessier, Tom. II, pag. 136, Edit. 1696.

(16) Mezerai is in the wrong to say, in his large History, Vol. III, pag. 293, that Hotmanus was a fugitive in the Palatinate, when he published his Franco-Gallia.

(17) Pag. 221.

JUDGMENT concerning the book called the Franco-Gallia. It is a translation of Thuanus's Latin words, lib. lviij, pag. 43, ad ann. 1572. private

(c) Taken from his Life, written by Petrus Neveletus Dufchius, of whom we shall speak in the remark [O]. It is one of the ten Lives of Cicerone, reprinted at Leipzig, by Leickherus, in 1686. I make use of that edition.

after he removed to Basil, where he taught the civil-law. The plague obliging him to leave it, he retired to Montbeliard, where he lost his wife. He went afterwards to Geneva, where he wrote a book in defence of the rights of the king of Navarre [F]; after which he returned to Basil and died there the twelfth of February 1590. He had refused to go to Leyden, where he was offered a professor's chair. He had time to put his works in order, for a new edition (e), which did not appear till a long time after his death, in three volumes in folio (f). They do not contain all that he had published [G]. Of all his writings, his Franco-Gallia, which he so much valued (g), is least approved

(f) They were printed at Geneva by the care of James Leclius, in 1599.

(g) See the remark [E].

private persons are, and that antiently our princes owed the crown to the suffrages of the nobility and the people: so that as antiently the power and authority of electing kings belonged to the states of the kingdom, and to all the nation assembled in a body: so it was the states who deposed them from the government. Hereupon he brings in the examples of Philip de Valois, John, Charles V. Charles VI. and Lewis XI. But that which he principally insists on, is to show, that as women have ever been judged incapable of governing the kingdom, they ought also to be excluded from all public posts, and administration (19). Add to this passage of Mr Tessier the judicious words of Bongars, taken from a letter to Thuanus (20). 'I will freely confess to you de Franco-Gallia vellem parcius, and I wish I could do it more gently, both because the book is not seasonable, and also because it seems to me that the good man is grossly mistaken in that dispute. Grief (21) gave some colour to the work when it was first printed: and we suffer many words to escape us in an extrem trouble, which we should blush to hear repeated when the passion is over: I write to you my thoughts about it, not knowing what judgment you make of it. I am sorry I did it not sooner. I know well that the good man was well pleased with that piece: he shewed it by the repeated impressions of it. It is a distemper, with which many of our people, and too many are tainted, who would willingly have our monarchy reduced to an anarchy. If there be any evil in a thing, it doth not follow that it must be destroyed (22). Bongars, you will say, has hit the mark: Hotman was in a passion against his country when he wrote that book, and not content to revenge himself on the present rulers, he endeavoured to discharge his resentment upon the monarchy itself, and the whole body of the nation; and that with so little judgment, that he furnished the Leaguers with powerful arguments for the exclusion of Henry IV: for, according to his principles, the Catholics of France had a full right to elect the duke of Guise, king of France to the prejudice of the princes of the blood. A passionate writer, you will add, is not capable of thinking of the future, his thoughts are only intent upon the present; he considers not that the times may change, and that the doctrine which this day suits the interest of our cause, will one time or other be as favourable to our enemies. This was manifest in France under Charles IX, and Henry III. Each party was obliged to confuse itself, as Montagne has finely observed: See the remark [I]. It is certain that if Catherine de Medicis had embraced the reformation, and established it all over France, Hotman would have written a fine book to prove that the regency of women was a very good thing, and agreeable to our fundamental laws. With what strength would he not have refuted the Papists, who should have written against this queen? The strongest reason that the Protestants of France alledged to justify their taking up arms, was what Catherine de Medicis wrote to the prince of Condé. They therefore acknowledged the authority of this woman. Did not Hotman himself sollicite succours in Germany in this queen's name? Ab his paullo post, immo & ab ea quæ tum minorem annis Regem regnumque administrabat, in Germaniam bis missus est de Regis regni rebus legatus, & auxilium a Cæs. Ferdinando ordinibusque Germaniæ rebus ruentibus petere iussus. Exstat diſſa tum ab eo in comitiis Imperii Francofordienſibus oratio (23). We shall see elsewhere (24) that he is accused of dealing unfairly in his Franco-Gallia, and we will endeavour to say something in defence of this learned man.

[F] . . . And wrote a book in defence of the rights of the king of Navarre. It was that of the right of the nephew against the uncle (25). The League had put into the head of Cardinal de Bourbon, uncle

to the king of Navarre, to set up for the lawful successor, and an Italian civilian was employed to write a treatise of the right of the uncle against the nephew. Francis Hotman learnedly confuted him. We will cite Father Maimbourg: Antony Hotman, says he (26), advocate-general to the League in the Parliament of Paris, wrote the treatise of the uncle against the nephew to succeed to the crown. But it happened to a very lucky and pleasant adventure, that the civilian, Francis Hotman brother to the advocate, having read this book, which was dispersed in Germany, where he then was, maintained with great strength, reason, and learning, the right of the nephew against the uncle; and in a learned piece he published on that subject, he manifestly exposed the weakness and false reasonings of his adversary's treatise, without knowing that it was his brother, who had not put his name to it. There are many mistakes in these words. I. It is not true that Francis Hotman wrote against an unknown author. He wrote against one Matthew Zampini, of Recanat, an Italian civilian. 'Id Matthæus Zampinus Racanensis de trivio J. C. à federatis pecunia subornatus, edita consultatione probare conatus fuerat, quam Fr. Hotomannus magni nominis nostra ætate J. C. contraria consultatione itidem edita confutavit' (27). — Matthew Zampini, a mercenary lawyer, being hired by the Leaguers, endeavoured to prove this, in a treatise which he published, and which was answered in a book written by Francis Hotman a famous civilian. II. And consequently it is not true that he wrote against his brother. III. It is not true that he wrote this book in 1589 (§ 2): it was about the year 1585, as Thuanus observes: which agrees with Nevelet, who makes him then sixty years old. IV. He was then at Geneva, and not in Germany. V. Antony Hotman was not one of the advocate-generals of the League in 1589, and was not so till two years after (28), when John le Maître, who discharged that employment with Lewis Hitt. de France, d'Orleans, was promoted to the office of president au Mortier. President Brissonius was already dead. VI. It was Antony Hotman who wrote against his brother Francis Hotman, and not the later against Antony Hotman. 'Postea & peculiari libro quem consultationi à Francisco fratre pro Navarro editæ . . . opposuisse videri voluit, (Antony Hotmanus) rationes amplificatæ' (29). — Afterwards these reasons were laid down more at length in a particular book, which he (Antony Hotman) would have the world think that he wrote, in answer to a treatise which his brother Francis had published in favour of the king of Navarre.

[§ 2] I have a treatise intitled: Ad Tractatum Matthæi Zampini J. C. Recanatensis, de successione prerogative primi Principis Franciæ; Ornatisimi viri P. C. A. F. civis Parisiensis, & Regii Consilarii, Responsio. It is in 8vo, and consists of eighty pages printed by the heirs of Wecheliuss, 1589. Francis Hotman was a Parisian, and likewise he was counsellor of state to the king of Navarre, who came to the crown of France, by the name of Henry IV. Hotman being still alive. So this may be his book, REM. CRIT.]

[G] The edition of his works doth not contain all that he had published. The burlesque pieces which he wrote against Matharel, and Papyrius Masso, were left out, as also the book he published at Geneva in the year 1553, under the name of Francis de Villiers, Ad Remundam Rufum defensorum Rom. Pontificis contra Carolum Molinæum de statu primitivæ Ecclesiæ, &c (30): the Nullitatis protestatio adversus formulam concordie (31), which he published under the name of Johannes Palmertus; and the Apology of this last book, in which he disguised himself under the name of Johannes Franciscus Alaphis Salaffi V. D. M. (32). His Anti-Tribonianus, printed in French in 1603, the Latin version whereof was printed

(26) Hist. de la Ligue, livr. iv, pag. m. 567, ad ann. 1589.

(27) Thuan. lib. lxxxi, init ad ann. 1585.

(28) Mesmeri, Hist. de France, Tom. III, pag. 999.

(29) Thuan. lib. xci, sub fin. See also Mesmeri, ubi supra, pag. 708.

(30) Epitome Bibl. Gesneri, pag. m. 239.

(31) See Placcius de Pseudon. pag. 233.

(32) Placcius ibid. pag. 153.

(19) Tessier, Additions aux Eloges de Mr de Thou, Tom. II, pag. 139.

(20) It was written from Straßburg in 1595, upon occasion of Hotman's Life, written by Nevelet.

(21) The original has it la dote, I believe it should be la doteur.

(22) Lettres de Bongars, pag. 651, at the Hague, 1695.

(23) Nevelet. in Vita Hotomanni.

(24) In the remark [H].

(25) Vexatam illam rebus ita postulantibus & magnis viris hortantibus tractavit controversiam, de successione inter patrum & fratrum filium, atque universum de jure successionis regni in regno Gallie. Nevelet, ubi supra, pag. 224.

approved, and has persuaded some persons, that he was the author of the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos [H], which is a book intirely agreeable to republican notions. Some time after, his own maxims were retorted upon him [I]. It is hard to avoid this inconvenience

(33) Baillet, in his Anti. art. cxxxi.

(34) Lib. lxxxii, pag. 33, ad ann. 1585.

(35) De scriptis Adefotis, pag. 84, Edit. 1686.

(36) Neque unquam postea induci potuit, ut in patria consistendum sibi iudicaret: non Adegevenus ipse Ducis literis inflexus, non promissis, non denique cum ab eo Magister supplexum apud se libellorum dictus esset: hoc sepe usurpans: Fraseria Neptunum accusat, iterum qui naufragum facit. Nevelet ubi supra, pag. 321.

* Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mémoires de Castel. Tom. I, pag. 773.

(a) Mary Stewart.

(b) Queen Elizabeth.

(c) Margaret, duchess of Parma, natural daughter to Charles V.

(d) Catherine of Austria, sister to Charles V, widow of John III, king of Portugal, and regent during the minority of Sebastian, her son.

(e) Catherine de Medicis.

† Medicam.

‡ Tendis.

(f) An allusion to the name of chancellor de l'Hôpital, to whom Catherine de Medicis, principally owed the regency.

(37) Pag. 90.

(38) Εὐρυκίου Ἀντιόχου: καὶ Φίλων, says the Scripture in the Acts of the Apostles, chap. ix, ver. 1, concerning Saul.

(39) Barclay, lib. iii, contra Monarchomachos, cap. i, pag. 311.

at Hamburg in 1647, was also left out. Concerning this book, see the curious Mr Baillet (33). Lastly, his Brutum Fulmen was left out, which is not a burlesque piece Thuanus says. It is a very serious work, in which Hotman refutes the Bull which Sixtus V published in 1585, against the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé. Postea, says Thuanus (34) & in censuram illam scripsit Franciscus Hotmannus J. C. joculari isto stilo, libroque Brutum Fulmen titulum fecit, quo & de B. Francisci & B. Dominici vita ac moribus veteres historiarum, ab obsoleto devotis viris scriptæ ridicule discutuntur. — Afterwards Francis Hotman, a civilian, wrote against that Bull, in a burlesque stilo, and intitled his book Brutum Fulmen, in which he, in a very ludicrous manner, criticiseth the ancient accounts of the lives and actions of St Francis and St Dominic, written by weak and superstitious men. There is nothing less than this treated of, in that tract of Francis Hotman. Decker has been in this deceived (35) by Thuanus, but he has committed a fault of his own: He will have this learned civilian to have left France on account of that piece; which is false. Hotman quitted France in 1572, fully resolved never to set foot in it again (36). The Brutum fulmen was published in 1585, as Decker observes against Goldastus, who places the edition of it in the year 1586. I have said nothing of the tract de regno vulvarum, which d'Aubigné ascribes to our Hotman in the third chapter of the first book of the Confession de Sanci: I know not what it is (38).

[(38) The following epigram was in every body's hands, about the year 1561, * occasioned by the greatest part of the kingdoms of Europe, being then governed, or at least administrated, by women.

Vulva regit Scotos (a), hæres (b) tenet illa Britannos,

Flandros & Batavos, nunc notha vulva (c) regit.

Vulva regit populos quos signat Gallia portu (d)

Et fortis Gallos Italia vulva regit (e).

Hic furiam furis, vulvam conjungite vulvis,

Sic natura capax omnia Regna capit.

Ad Medicem † artem incertam Gallia faucia tendit ‡

Non uti Medicis est medicina tibi.

Non credas Medicis, vena qui sanguinis hausta

Conatur vires debilitare tuas.

Ut Regi, matricæ suæ sis fida Deoque,

Ut uter consilio Gallia docta meo,

Et pacem tu inter proceres non ponito bellum,

Hospita (f) -lis Artus rodit agisque tuos.

This possibly is the pretended book de regno vulvarum, ascribed by d'Aubigné to Francis Hotman. This lawyer was a Latin poet, and his Franco-Gallia which he published about twelve or thirteen years after, proves that he did not approve of female administrations. REM. CRIT.]

[H] He has been thought to be author of the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos. When I mentioned this work in the project of this Dictionary, I said (37) that the error of those who ascribed Junius Brutus's book to Francis Hotman was a small one. * Hotman, continued I, left France for his religion, and tho' he was not like those who fly from persecution breathing out threatenings and slaughter (38), as fiercely as the persecutors themselves, yet he nevertheless complained and murmured in his retreat. He wrote a book intitled Franco-Gallia, to shew that the French monarchy is not what it is thought to be, and that of right, the people are the true sovereigns in it. This was the reason that made it believed that he was the author of Junius Brutus's work; besides, there are many maxims of the Franco-Gallia scattered in it. Barclay refutes only this last reason, which seems to him plausible enough, and pretends to shew the weakness of it by something that is still more plausible; which is, says he (39), that Brutus makes use of several arguments, which Hotman laughed at and refuted, and falls in to such childish errors as to the civil-law, that such a man as Hotman could not be capable of. This is more obliging to this learned civilian, than what has been said by Boeclerus. I wish, says he, Hotman had not so obstinately appeared among the authors, who found an alarm against kings, and by their private authority convert them into tyrants with such quirks and cavils, and not only corrupt sound Philosophy, but also the Holy Scriptures. I wish he had not given this bad example to others in his Franco-Gallia, and that he had not falsified history more than once, in order to offer intente to his prejudices with too servile a complaisance. The Greek Phrase of Boeclerus has much more emphasis in it, Εἰς τὸ δὲ λαλεῖν τῇ ὑποθέσει, etiam historiam non semel corrumpit (40) . . . (41) I cannot forbear saying that Boeclerus does very much abuse Hotman, who, to repeat it once more, was none of those who, like some English Catholics of the last century, leave their country for religion, in a menacing manner, throwing about fire and flames, vomiting a thousand imprecations, thundering out Maranathas, and endeavouring to re-enter it with sword in hand, or by the help of the most exterminating armies; in a word, desiring a return, preceded, as the departure out of Egypt was, by all plagues of Pharaoh, not excepting the passage of the destroying angel. Hotman contented himself with smart strokes of the pen, and with touching upon some things which were not pleasing. It is true, that without thinking of it, he laboured for the League (42), and forged weapons for Bellarmine: It is also true that his blows were like those of the Parthians (43); I mean, that, in the condition of a fugitive, he fought better than he would have done had he not retreated. But his writings are far from deserving to be branded in the same manner with many others, that have been published in the like circumstances. For example, the English Catholics have in vain made satires and bitter invectives against queen Elizabeth (44); this is all lost paper, of which wise men make no manner of use in any party. However it be, the appearances were a little against Hotman, as to the book of Junius Brutus, and, as I have already said, it was a very small error to make him the author of the Vindiciæ contra Tyrannos.

V O L. III.

[I] His own maxims were retorted upon him some time after. It was by accident, and by a very common fate which changes the interests of parties, that Hotman's work was subject to the inconvenience I speak of. The revolutions of France so changed the scene, that the maxims of each party were reciprocally metamorphosed into their contraries. Montaigne pleasantly ridicules the Catholics. See, says he (45), with what horrible impudence we toss about divine reasons, and how profanely we reject them, and lay hold of them again, according as fortune has changed our situation in these public storms. This important proposition, whether it be lawful for subjects to rebel and arm against their prince for the defence of religion, was warmly maintained the last year by a certain party, and as warmly denied by the other party: but see now who maintains the affirmative, and whether arms rattle less for this cause than for that. We burn those people who say, truth should submit to the yoke of our necessity; but does not France do worse than say so? &c. As long as the world is a world, there will be every where ambulatory doctrines, dependant on times and places: true birds of passage, which are in one country in the summer, and in another in the winter: wandering lights, that, like the Cartesian comets, illuminate successively several vortices. Whoever pretends to set up for a censor upon this occasion, will be looked on as a morose critic, and a native of Plato's common-wealth. And so Hotman ought not to be responsible for the advantage, the famous advocate of the Holy-League found means to draw from his Franco-Gallia. They cannot complain, (it is Lewis d'Orléans who speaks this in the name of the English Catholics) that they are dealt with as they deal with others. Follow their councils, tread in the paths they have traced out to establish themselves, and you will establish your selves, and involve them in shame and confusion. In their Franco-Gallia, which is

6 Q

(40) In Grot. de Jure Belli & Pacis, lib. i, cap. iv, pag. m. 275.

(41) In the Preface, pag. 92.

(42) See the following remark.

(43) Navita bofferum Pœnus perhorrescit. . . Miles fugit & celerem fugam Parthi. Horat. Od. xiii, lib. iii.

(44) See the article ELIZABETH, remark [K].

(45) Essais, book ii, cap. xii, pag. m. 193. Mazarin makes the same observation, pag. 792, of the third volume of the History of France.

(b) Nevelet.
ibid. pag. 229.

(i) In his Anti, art. cxviii, &
cxix.

venience in writing upon some subjects. He was well paid for his Brutum Fulmen [K] by the king of Navarre. He was one of those who would never, consent to drawing of their pictures (b), but his was drawn when he was in his last agony. He left two sons and four daughters. JOHN HOTMAN, Sieur de Villiers, his eldest son, is thought to be the author of the Anti-Chopinus, a burlesque piece, and of the Anti-Colazon, which is an apology for his treatise of the ambassador, in which he was, as they say, the plagiarist of Charles Paschal. See Mr Baillet (i). Moreri has not been guilty of many faults [L].

I wonder that a thing was forgotten in the life of Francis Hotman, which is very glorious for him, viz. that at the age of twenty three years he read public lectures in the schools of Paris [M]. The author of his life has also omitted, (and I do not wonder at

(46) Advertisement des Catholiques Anglois, pag. 74, 75. Edit. 1537, in 8vo.

(47) Matagonia de Matagonibus, Monitrice aduersus Isologiam sive Antifrancogalliam Antonii Matharelli. It is a piece of Hotman's in a Macaromic style.

(48) Quod dicit Francogalliam compositam ab auctore bene potio in aliquo conoplio, & eum exomuisse scriptum plenum furoris & insanie, video multos auctoris amicos, dictum istud appellare meretriciam impudentiam flagris & carcere dignam. . . Ubi ululom iracundiam anti signam? Ubi vox nulla perturbationi animi in toto libro non potius scilicet & moderate narrationis? Id. ibid.

(49) Mont. Sat. I, lib. i, vers. 24, 25.

(50) Matagonis Monit. ibid.

(51) Peter Vissor Cayer, avint-propos de la Chronologie novenaire,

* one of the most detestable books that ever saw the light, and was compoed to put all France in a flame, they say, that it is lawful to choose a king to ones own taste. Tell then the Heretics that the king of Navarre is not to your taste, and therefore let him keep in his Bern, till you desire to have him. Thus they ought to be whipped with their own rods, that they may know that the powerful hand of God chastizes them, with their own wicked counsels, and pernicious writings (46). That book of Hotman is at the bottom a fine piece, well written, and full of learning, and so much the more vexatious to the contrary party, because the author contents himself to cite matters of fact, as he himself represents to his censurers. 'Cur vel Massonus, says he (47), vel Matharellus Francogallia scriptori & simplici historiarii narratori ita terribiliter irascitur? Nam ut dicit Sylva nup. lib. i. num. 10. quomodo potest aliquis ei succedere qui est tantum relator & narrator facti? Francogallia enim tantum narrationi & relationi simplici, vacat, quod si aliena dicta delectur, charta remaneret alba. — Why is Masso, or Matharellus, so very angry with the writer of the Franco-Gallia, who only barely relates facts? for as the Sylva Nuptialis says, how can any body be in a passion with a person who is only a relater of a fact? for the writer of that book doth nothing but relate, and if his quotations from other writers were taken away nothing would be left but clean paper.' He was reproached as if his book looked like the production of a drunken, furious, and mad-man: to which he answers, that nothing could be more unsufferably impudent than this assertion, since he had constantly preserved in that book the character of a moderate and sedate relater (48). This is a wonderful advantage in such sort of books. For the rest, tho' this answer be written in a burlesque style, yet it contains a thousand things that ought to be understood seriously. Ridentem dicere verum quid vetat (49)? such is, for instance, what he says to his adversary, that it is not sufficient for him to have brought in his accusation, and given bail de Lite prosequenda; but that it is farther necessary he should expressly engage to submit to the law of retaliation, in case he should be convicted of calumny. Sed adhuc requiritur tertius ut se expresse obliget ad poenam talionis, in casu quo probetur calumniator; quod probatur per L. ult. C. de calumniat. & omnes Canonistas, sed maxime per Hieronym. de Zanetinis in repetit. cap. i. Exir. de accusat. De quo si sumus concordet, & Matharellus se subijciat talioni in casu quod calumniae convincatur, totum negotium nostrum bene vadit, nisi forte &c (50).

If we believe a historian, who had been a minister, that piece of Hotman did not please all the Protestants, nor displease all the Catholics of France, and was not written without some relation to the cabal of mareschal d'Amville. A little after, says he (51), the duke of Alençon, his majesty's brother, retired from court with several lords, who had been gained by the said mareschal d'Amville; and taking the name of malecontents, they joined with the Huguenots. Some of which began to write in another strain than formerly: and Hotman the Civilian, in his Franco-Gallia, undertook to prove, that the people of France had formerly a supreme authority not only to elect their kings, but also to set aside the sons of their kings, and to choose strangers: he says upon that subject many things, praising the people that curb the licentiousness of their kings and bring them to reason. After treating of many other matters, he falls upon the regency of queens, the mothers of kings. This he did because the queen-mother had been declared regent till the return of the king of Poland her son: in short, he alledged our ancient histories right or wrong, according to his passion. This book was agreeable to some Protestants, and to some united Catholics, who were fond of innovations, but not to all. D'Aubigné gives the same plan of this book; but he says it was published (52) in 1573. While Charles the IXth was alive. Thuanus (53) and Mezerai (54) who give the same plan of it, place it, the one simply under the reign of Charles IX, the other, before the departure of the king of Poland. Which overthrows Cayer's hypothesis; viz. That the regency conferred on queen Catherine at Charles IXth's death, was one of the grievances of Francis Hotman. It is certain his work was printed before the queen was declared regent by the edict of the 30th of May 1574. But he foresaw perhaps that it would be so, and it is very likely he had her in view in what he said against a female regency. He remembered the mischiefs that princess had caused in her former regency. This great civilian who had quitted the post of counsellor in the parliament of Paris for his religion, had done better to answer his adversaries seriously and modestly (55), than to use a burlesque stile. See what Mr Baillet says of it, pag. 336. Tom 2. of his Anti.

[K] He was well paid for his Brutum Fulmen. We will begin our comment with these words of the author of his Life. 'His meritis premium dederit cum intelligeret Henricus tum Navarra Rex ultro codicillos ad eum misit Senatoria in Confessorio suo dignitatis: cujus tamen eum fructum non tulit, quem beneficium Princeps voluerat: ac opinor in tantis rerum omnium angustiis factum, ut ex annuo quod debebatur salario, vix ad eum quidquam, sicut audio pervenerit (56). — Henry IV, who was then king of Navarre, understanding that by these services he had deserved some mark of distinction, of his own accord sent him letters appointing him one of his counsellors of state, from which dignity however he did not reap the fruit, which that generous prince intended; for I am informed, that, by reason of the public necessities of these times, he received little or nothing of the salary annexed to it.' Bongars, to whom Nevelet dedicated Hotman's Life, made an observation upon this place (57). 'There is another passage. Having said, that the king had upon his writing the Brutum Fulmen, given him a place of counsellor of state, Cujus tamen eum fructum non tulit quem beneficium princeps voluerat (58). — But that he had never reaped the fruit from it which that generous prince intended. I assure you, Sir, the king never bought a book so dear as that: it was paid far above it's worth. You will tell me, that I should have given my advice upon these passages sooner; but it often happens, (and to me but too frequently) that we never consider but when it is too late. I wrote my thoughts to Mr Hotman about the first (59). I do not touch upon the second, he might possibly be offended at it, not knowing how the matter went.' Note, that Nevelet does not speak there of the Brutum Fulmen, as Bongars supposes, but of the book against Zampini de successione inter patrui & fratris filium. (56) Nevel. ubi supra, pag. 225. (57) Lettres de Bongars, pag. 61, at the Hague, 1695. (58) These words are very incorrect in the edition of Bongars's Letters, which I quote. I insert them as they ought to be. (59) That it, what concerns the Franco-Gallia. See, above, the words of Bongars in the remark [E], citat. (22).

[L] Moreri has not been guilty of many faults. I. He supposes falsely, that Hotman was saved by his scholars at Bourges, at another time beside that of the massacres; that is, of one event he makes two. II. The year of his death is not well fixed; it should have been 1590, instead of 1591. III. He should not impute that mistake to Spondanus, by citing him under the year 1591. n. 22. for it is under the number of the preceding year that he speaks of Hotman's death.

[M] At the age of twenty three years, he read public lectures in the schools of Paris. I prove it by these at it,) certain things which Baudouin had published against him, and which would horribly stain his memory, if they were true [N]. One could not give any credit to them,

[60] Pasquier, Letter to Mr. Leyfel. It is in the nineteenth book of his Letters. The words that I quote, are at page 501, of the second Tome.

these words of Stephen Pasquier (60): 'I assure you, that one of the most fortunate things that I think I met with in my youth, was that on the next day after our Lady's assumption in the year 1546, Hotman and Baudouin began their first Law lectures in the schools of this city of Paris: the former at seven of the clock in the morning, reading the title de Notionibus; the latter at two of the clock in the afternoon, reading the title de Publicis Judiciis, before a great number of auditors. And that very day I began to study the civil-law under those two learned men.'

[N] Certain things which Baudouin has published . . . would horribly stain his memory if they were true.] Baudouin assures us, that Hotman was excommunicated at Strasburg for adultery. Argentinae propter adulterium excommunicat sodalem tuum Hotmannum (Petrus Alexander) (61). These words are addressed to Beza. The author had already mentioned this with more circumstances, and had added, that Hotman also lost his canonry and his academical office.

Recitata tunc quoque nostris fuit causa tui Hotmanni, nempe propter quod facinus illic aliquando primum fuisset excommunicatus abs suo Gallo concionatore Petro Alexandro, te quidem propter antiquam societatem submurmurante, sed assentiente tamen tuo finis parente, at certe avo Gulielmo Farello, saepius illum jurisperditum appellante. Addebant & complura ejusdem generis quae pervulgata erant per Joannem Infantium, testem valde idoneum, & cujus non solum opera, sed & opibus quandiu opus habuisti, tam liberaliter es abusus, ut fidem ei detrahere vix audeas. Altera causa fuit exposita cur tuus ille Hotmannus (cujus causa non est abs te se juncta) ut antea Ecclesia, sic deinde schola & suo Canonatu pulvis esset: tandemque quid in eo Sturmius ipse gravissime accusaret narratum est, & perfecta Sturmiana adversus eum terribilis expositio, quae profecto non modo de istius flagitiis, sed & de vestrae conjugationis mysteriis narrabat nimis multa (62). — At the same time we were told the story of your friend Hotman, to wit, the crime for which he had been there first excommunicated by his own French minister, Peter Alexander, and that you indeed murmured at it, on account of your ancient friendship with him, but that William Farel, who if he is not your father is certainly your grandfather, consented to it, and gave him the name of jurisperditus. They likewise told us a great many things of the same nature, which they had from John Infantium, a very proper evidence, and to whose interest and purse you so liberally abused in the time of your necessity, that you dare not call his authority in question. We also were informed, for what reason your friend Hotman (whose cause and yours are pretty much the same) who had formerly been thrown out of the church, was also deposed from his canonry and his academical office: and last of all what things even Sturmius accused him of, and we read Sturmius's expositio against him, which indeed contained not only a history of his crimes, but too many of the mysteries of your cabal. All these things had preceded the year 1562. Baudouin a little after (63) relates, that having known Hotman at Paris, as a person who loved learning, he had advised him to go and see Geneva; that he received him in his house at Strasburg, with all civility, as an old friend, when Hotman retired thither, after having desired his good offices for a law professorship, and expressed a great dislike to his teaching at Laufane (64), and that he quickly perceived he harboured a viper in his bosom, since Hotman endeavoured all that was possible to ruin him by secret practices. Here is one of his tricks: having by his fraudulent contrivances, moved Duarenus to send him an invective against Baudouin; he dispersed it all over the town, taking care however, that Baudouin should not know it. He was at last obliged by Sturmius to go to him, and bear his reproaches, and he expressed an extreme regret for his conduct. A fragment of the letter which Sturmius writ to him (65) is produced, in which he accuses him of using a great many knavish arts to supplant Baudouin. His plot succeeded; for he made Baudouin weary of Strasburg. So that he went to seek another post (66), and Hotomanus succeeded him. All this is to be found in Baudouin's third answer to Calvin. He had already in the second alleged this letter of Sturmius, and he had drawn many things out of it to Hotman's disadvantage. He had mentioned a passage of it, which contains a reproach of an execrable perjury. Hotman, the very day that he received the sacrament, protested to Sturmius, that he wished the sacrament he had received might be turned into a devil, if he denied falsely what he denied (67). And yet, adds Sturmius, he denied a thing that was most true. Baudouin mentions this as a proof, that his adversary, who undertook to dispute about the eucharist, made no great account of it, and he takes this occasion to reproach him, that he had been excluded from the eucharist in Germany for adultery. Etiam de mysterio Cænæ Dominicæ disputat, & me cum sua Gallica (ut vocat) Ecclesia non idem sentire narrat, qui ab ea propter Clodianum facinus in Germania excommunicatus aliam quæcunque illi fortasse patuit mensam occupavit. Vis scire quanti faciat totum istud mysterium tuus Myrtagogus? Audi Sturmium (68). — He likewise disputes concerning the mystery of the Eucharist, and pretends that I do not agree in my sentiments about it with his church of France (as he calls it) from which he being excommunicated in Germany for the crime of Clodius, embraced the next table that chance offered to him, to which he could procure admittance. Would you know what regard this explainer of mysteries of yours has to that whole mystery? ask Sturmius. Here is another passage of this second answer of Baudouin (69). 'Nonne ille est qui . . . Silegium se esse finxit, cum in Germania negaret se esse Gallum ut in aulam Austriacam irrepere? Nonne ille est qui cum tuam (70) Ecclesiam clam fugeret & scholam, in qua tamen docuit aliquot annis Grammaticam, deposita Jurisconsulti persona, venit in Germaniam tuam ad Sturmium literis instructus quæ Sturmium fefellerunt? Nonne ille est cujus (ut nunc dicebam) vitam perdidit, nequitiae, sceleris, & omnium maleficiorum plenam ipse Sturmius nuper descripsit? . . . Nonne ille est magnus ardellio, qui cum in Germania Principes miris modis est ludicatus, huc & illuc discurreret, modo in Gallia tumultuatur, modo ad Rheni ripas adversus Regem suum milites cogit? Nonne ille est quem Sturmius . . . ostendit etiam Galliae Principibus plus quam proditoriè maledicere, ejusque lingua nullum veneficium magis veneficum esse ait & probat? Nonne ille est qui superioribus annis in Germania pinxit sive suum sive tuum tumultum Ambrosianum, & Tigrim (71) peperit, & ejus generis formulas quotidie concepit novus magister libellorum, non (ut jactabat) supplicum sed simolorum? Denique nonne est ille tenebrio qui ad me aliquando scripsit, αποστρέφειν ἐν τῷ οὐν ὁρῶν (72). — Is it not he . . . who pretended to be a Silfian, when he was in Germany, denying that he was a Frenchman, that he might insinuate himself into the Austrian court? Is it not he who having fled from your church and school, where, laying aside the character of a civilian, he for some years taught grammar, came into Germany, many with your letters of recommendation to Sturmius, by which Sturmius was deceived? Is it not he whom Sturmius himself (as I said before) accuses of perfidy, treachery, and all manner of crimes? . . . Is it not that busy body, who after having in the most unheard-of manner deceived the princes of Germany, now wanders about, sometimes raising seditions in France, at other times on the banks of the Rhine, levying troops against his sovereign? Is it not he whom Sturmius . . . proves to have slandered even the princes of France in a worse than treacherous manner, and whose tongue he says, and proves it too, is more venomous than poison itself. Is it not he who some years ago described his or your tumult at Ambrose, and brought forth the tyger, and who is daily hatching such seditious libels, and not humble petitions as he pretends? In fine, is it not that scoundrel who once wrote to me, that in these times one ought to seek darkness.'

(67) Baudouin. Respons. altera ad Joann. Calvin. pag. m. 176.

(68) Id. ibid.

(69) Id. ibid. pag. 181, 182.

(70) These words are addressed to Calvin.

(71) It is a libel, which I speak of in the article GUISE, (FRANCIS), remark [I].

(72) That is to say, in these times one ought to seek the shades.

Now this is the reason why I have made a distinction between what we find in Baudouin's second and third answer. Beza has confuted the second, but has said nothing against the third; and therefore the third is not of so great consequence against our civilian; for it

(61) Respons. ad Calvin. & Beza pro Francisco Baudouin, folio 77.

(62) Ibid. fol. 70, verso.

(63) Ibid. fol. 86.

(64) Alterum Baudouini ex non diffimili errore peccatum fuit quod Hotmanni tui Laufanne Jansenius & in credendis, quos in tuo ludo Grammaticam docebat, peris defatigati, & ex eo carcere liberari misere cupientes, & commendatione Baudouini ad aliquam juris professionem redire literis temere crediderit. Ibid.

(65) Ib. fol. 87.

(66) He went to Heidelberg.

(k) In 1700, in 4to.

(l) See the Fa-mular Oration of Scipio Gentilis, apud Witte, Me-
mor. Juriscons.
pag. 33.

(m) Novelles de la Repub. des Lettres, March
1701, pag. 268,
&c.

them, without believing that it is a much easier thing to become very learned, and a great enemy to the persecuting religion, than to become a tolerably honest man. I will speak a word or two concerning the author of Hotman's life [O]. The book which was printed at Amsterdam (k), intitled, Francisci & Joannis Hotomanorum. Patris ac Filii & clarorum virorum ad eos Epistolæ, might furnish me with a great many additions for this article, both concerning the application of our civilian to the search of the Philosophers stone (l), which proved very prejudicial to him, and upon several other particularities of his life; but I think it better to refer my readers to Mr Bernard's journal (m). The extract which he gives us of this work, leaves nothing wanting. You may also consult the first volume of Observationum Selectarum ad rem litterariam spectantium printed at Hall in the year 1700.

it may be presumed, that if Beza had confuted it, he would have justified him. We must therefore give greater attention to the reproaches contained in the second, because they may be compared with the piece in which Beza refuted it. We must judge from that confutation, what grounds Baudouin went upon. I find that his adversary advances nothing to the clearing of Hotman; he only says, that the reproaches of being ignorant of the Latin tongue, and of being an Atheist, will not at all disturb Hotman, who will not vouchsafe to give any answer as to the last head. 'Magnum tibi certamen superesse video. Nam quæ tibi obijcit magnam inficitiam arguunt, quæ tamen (ut ajunt) refellere non possis. Illa verò quæ regeris cujusmodi sunt quæso? Latine scilicet nescit, ut eum oportuerit ad Latinam epistolam scribendam alterius operam requirere. Crimen autem atheismi, etsi omnium est gravissimum, ille tamen, ut opinor, ne responso quidem dignum putabit. Quid enim hoc aliud est quam latrare (73). — You have now got a very heavy task upon your hands. For the things which be objected to you, argue a very great ignorance, and yet (as I am informed) you are not able to disprove them. But what is it you accuse him of? That he indeed is so ignorant of Latin, that he was obliged to make use of another hand to write a Latin letter. As for the crime of Atheism, tho' it is the greatest of all others, yet I believe he will not think it worthy of an answer. For what is this but to scold and slander.' Here is nothing relating to the accusations which are transcribed, and which are contained in the 176, 180, 181, and 182 pages of Baudouin's second answer. All that Beza has said for Hotman, concerns the 175th page, where we find, 1. that Hotman appropriated to himself an epistle dedicatory that Sturmius had wrote: 2. that he then praised the very same works of Duarenius, which he had vilified formerly in writing against Rufus for du Moulin. 3. That an elegant master of Cicero's Atheism, is not fit to be a catechist. 'Nostris magister Latinitatis priusquam de meis scripturibus garriat, suarum oblitus respondeat Sturmio & aliis, à quibus accusatus est quod suo nomine ediderit epistolam abs Sturmio scriptam, eamque institutionibus præfixam tanquam suam vendiderit Duci Saxonie. . . Oportet istius tui patroni incredibilem esse, non jam dicam impudentiam, quia latitat, sed nequitiam, cum quidem posteaquam edito libello de sacerdotiis adversus Rufum pro Molino, profecit illos Beneficiarios commentarios (Duareni) nunc eos se adorare fingat. . . scilicet religionem nos docebit elegans magister Ciceronianæ ἀθεΐας' (74).

(74) Id. ibid.
pag. 175.

(75) Beza, ubi
supra, pag. 234.

I am very certain, that all my readers will agree in comparing these passages of Baudouin and Beza together, that nothing could be more disadvantageous to Hotman, than to answer, as Beza has done. Silence would have done him infinitely less hurt. To complete his misfortune, Beza published (75) a letter of Sturmius, wherein he disowns all that could be cited from him to the disadvantage of Calvin and Beza; but as for Hotman, there is nothing like it.

Languet, a true Refugee, and a very honest man, having seen Sturmius's accusations against Hotman, made very sensible reflexions, and altogether worthy of a good man; it was with the utmost sorrow that he saw, that his countrymen behaved themselves so ill in Germany, and that some men, who, under pretence of religion, endeavoured only to satisfy their vanity, did more injury to the Protestant religion, than the king of Spain and the Pope; however, he could not believe that Hotman could so far forget himself, as to be guilty of such infamous actions. These are his words: 'Hæc sunt levia, si conferantur cum turpibus factis nostrorum hominum in Germania, & quidem eorum qui ornati sunt eruditione, & religionis specie, infirmarunt se in amicitiam bonorum virorum, qui ipsi summa beneficia exhibuerunt. Ut alios omittam, nuper vidi accusationem Sturmii adversus Hotmanum, quæ, si vera est, miseret me Sturmii, & pudet alterius; sed talia sunt, ut mihi videantur vix posse venire in mentem erudito viro. Quidam mecum egerunt, ut ipsius accusationis capita ad te perferberem, sed à talibus ministeriis ego planè abhorreo, cum præsertim sciam, te nec voluptatem nec utilitatem ex iis percipere posse, & ad me nihil pertineant, nisi fortè infamiae pars in me redundet, eo quod à nostris hominibus talia perpetrentur in ipsa Germania. Hæc sane tanto dolore me afficiunt, ut nesciam an ex ulla re majorem unquam senserim. Video ubique eorum ambitionem, qui prætextu Religionis sua quarunt, magis obesse ipsius religionis progressui, quam Pontificem Ro. Regem Hispaniæ, & omnes ipsorum ministros; sed de re odiosa nimis multa scribo (76). — These are trifles, if compared with the base actions of our countrymen in Germany, and even of those who are men of learning, and pretend to religion; who insinuated themselves into the friendship of good men there, from whom they received the greatest favours. Not to mention others, I have lately seen an accusation of Sturmius against Hotman, if the things alleged in it be true, I pity Sturmius, and am ashamed of the other; but they indeed are of such a nature, that I can hardly believe that a scholar could be guilty of them. Some people have desired me to write the particulars of that accusation to you, but I have a great aversion to such a task, especially since I know that you can neither reap pleasure nor profit from it, and that I have no concern in them, except that I may possibly share in the infamy, arising from such things being done by our countrymen in Germany. I must own those things grieve me so much, that I do not know that ever any thing grieved me more. I see that the ambition of those who under pretence of religion seek only their own advantage, doth more hurt to the progress of religion every where, than both the Pope, the king of Spain, and all their emissaries; but this is too much on so disagreeable a subject.' The letter out of which I have taken these words is dated from Paris, the eleventh of December, 1561. Another letter of his, dated from the same place the twenty third of January, 1526, informs us, that the duke of Guise, who was gone to see the bishop of Strasburg at Saverne (77), had entered a process against Francis Hotman, for defamatory libels, and that several people affirmed, that it was on that account he had undertaken that journey. Languet could not believe that so inconsiderable a motive had obliged the duke of Guise to go to Saverne; but I make no doubt, that he thought it was a shameful thing for Hotman to be prosecuted as a writer of libels.

(76) Languet,
Epist. lxxv, lib.
ii, pag. 186, 187.

(77) Id. ibid.
Epist. lxxvii, pag.
197.

[O] I shall say a word or two concerning the author of Francis Hotman's life. His Latin name, Petrus Neveletus Desjebius, signifies Peter Nevelet, lord of Osche. The title of that lordship, and that of advocate in the parliament of Paris, are given him in Pasquier's letters (78). He was son to a sister of Peter Pitheus, as appears by a letter that uncle writ to him, which was printed at the end of Quintilian's Declamations, in some editions, Isaac Nicolas Nevelet, his son, published Æsop, and other ancient fabulists, with notes, in 1610. This was the first fruit of his studies, and he dedicated it to his father.

(78) See the eighth book of Pasquier's Letters, pag. 497,
of the first Tome.

HOTTINGER

HOTTINGER (JOHN HENRY), one of the most famous writers of the XVIIth century, was born at Zurich the tenth of March 1620. The progress he made in his first studies, gave such promising hopes, that the trustees of the schools resolved to send him to study in foreign countries at the public charge. He began his travels the twenty sixth of March, 1638, and went to Geneva; from whence, after a stay of two months, he proceeded into France. He afterwards saw Flanders and Holland, and chose Groningen for the seat of his studies; but his desire to perfect himself in the Oriental languages engaged him, a year after, to remove to Leyden (a), to be tutor to the children of professor Golius, the most knowing man in those languages of any in the world. He made a great progress in Arabic by Golius's assistance, and by the instruction of a Turk. He would have attended the ambassador (b) of the States to Constantinople, in 1641, in quality of chaplain, if the magistrates of Zurich would have consented to it; but they chose rather to recal him that they might employ him for the reputation and good of their colleges. They permitted him to go over to see England before his return to Switzerland; and upon his return (c), they made him professor of Ecclesiastical History; and a year after they gave him two other professorships, that of catechetical Divinity, and that of the oriental languages. He married at twenty two years of age (d), and commenced author at twenty four [A]. He was so well pleased with that character, that he continually published a great many new books [B]. This was no difficulty to him; for he was extremely laborious

(a) In the year 1639.

(b) William Boissel.

(c) In the year 1642.

(d) See the remark [F].

[A] And began to set up for an author at twenty four.] It was not for a small enterprize, but to attack upon a very crabbed subject, one of the most learned men that was then in Europe. For he undertook to confute Father Morin's Dissertations upon the Samaritan Pentateuch (1). We may therefore apply to him these verses of the Chaplain déçu:

Mes pareils avec toi sont dignes de se battre,
Et pour des coups d'essai veulent des Henrys quatre.

My equals worthy are I engage with thee,
And on four Henrys wou'd their courage prove.

This work, which he intituled Exercitationes Anti-Morinianæ, was very grateful to the Protestants, whether because of the learning of the author, or by reason of the subject, which could not be more favourable, since Hottinger defended the Hebrew text of the Bible, whose authority Father Morin invalidated as much as he could. Mr Simon judges this work to be one of the best that Hottinger published; and so it might be said, that his first essay was his masterpiece. Let us quote Mr Simon's passage at large: it is not very advantageous to the memory of this Swiss doctor. 'If Hottinger had observed some moderation in his works, and had not so much insisted on trifles, we might find something useful in them, for the understanding of the literal sense of the Scripture. But as he almost constantly wrote for a party, and composed his books with too much haste, he is apt to fall into frequent mistakes. One of his best works upon this subject, is that which he wrote against the Samaritanæ Exercitationes of Father Morin, but neither is he altogether exact in that work (2). Mr Simon, in another piece, has criticised this book of Hottinger; but lightly, and without any real design of prejudicing him. These are his words (3): 'Joannes Henricus Hottingerus, qui statim à Libri sui limine cujus hæc est inscriptio, Exercitationes Anti-Morinianæ de Pentateuchæ Samaritano ejusque ædenticæ æuthenticæ, Morinum appellat Monachum qui communem Monachorum sortem superet. Ille de Samaritanis & eorum codicibus discribit, putatque Samaritanos à Judæis Pentateuchi sui exemplar hausisse; sed conjecturis tantum, non autem firmissimis rationibus, ut ita sentiret adduci potuit; istud minus accuratum esse probat exemplis aliquot Pleonasmorum, vocum vel mutatarum in alias vel omisfarum, similibusque erroribus quos profert, & ex quibus confici posse arbitratur, non magis credendum esse Samaritanis Pentateuchum suum jactantibus, quam Ebionitis verum & solum Matthæi Evangelium Hebræum venditantibus: qua in re profecto gravissime hallucinatus est Hottingerus, qui tam veneratione antiquitatis Pentateuchum Samaritanum cum adulterato Ebionitarum Evangelio comparare audeat. Morinum etiam imperitiæ arguit Hottingerus, quasi Rabbiorum quorundam quos laudaverat mentem hæud affectatus fuisset. — John Henry Hottinger, V O L. III.

(1) Printed in 1631, and not in 1632, as it is said in Father Morin's Life, pag. 22, edit. Francof.

(2) Simon, Histoire Critique du Vieux Testament, livr. III, chap. xix, pag. m. 474.

(3) In Vita Joh. Morini, pag. 36, 37.

in the very beginning of his book, intituled, Exercitationes against Morin concerning the authenticity of the Samaritan Pentateuch, calls Morin a monk, learned above the common rate of his fraternity. In this book he treats of the Samaritans and their copies, and thinks that the Samaritans derived their copy of the Pentateuch from the Jews; but he must have been induced to think so rather from conjectures than strong proofs; he shows the inaccuracy of it, by producing some examples of pleonasm, omissions, or changes of words, and such like errors, from which he thinks it may be proved that we are no more to believe the Samaritans when they boast of their Pentateuch, than the Ebionites pretend of being possessed of the only genuine Hebrew gospel of St Matthew: In this Hottinger has been guilty of a gross blunder to dare to compare the Samaritan Pentateuch, which is of such venerable antiquity, to the spurious gospel of the Ebionites. He likewise accuses Morin of ignorance, pretending that he had not understood the sense of some Rabbies whom he had cited. Mr Heidegger is in the right to observe, that Father Morin's silence was a glorious thing to our Hottinger; but I question whether he understood the thought of Father Merfenne

(4): 'Liber toti erudito orbi charus, acceptusque fuit. Constat Morinum diu adhuc supersitem librum accepisse & legisse, neque contra mature ausum. (5). Et Merfennus, cui Hottingerus librum adjunctis literis misit, id solum respondit, nec sibi Hottingeri juvenilem ardorem satis probari, nec Hottingerum Morinum penitus nosse. Quasi videlicet juveni intergram non fuerit senum deliria taxare, & ipse Morinus interiore animi sui notam in vulgus edito libro non patefecerit. — This book was received with great applause by all the learned world. It is certain that Morin, who lived a long time after, received and read it, but never dared to write any thing in answer to it. And Merfennus, to whom Hottinger sent a copy of his book, together with a letter, only answered, that he did not approve of Hottinger's youthful heat, and that Morin was not thoroughly known to Hottinger. As if, forsooth, it were not lawful for a young man to find fault with the dreams of old men, and as if Morin had not sufficiently shown to the world his intention in publishing that book. Father Merfenne seems to mean nothing else, but that Hottinger did not well know Father Morin. I doubt not but the sense of his answer was this, 'the heat of youth has carried you too far, and if you knew the real merit of Father Morin, you would not have treated him in that manner.' Do you pretend to confute this, by saying, that Father Morin has discovered the bottom of his heart by his work? I grant he discovered that his design was to raise the credit of the vulgar Latin, and to enervate the authority of the original text; but is not this the general interest and design of the Romish controversialists? Hottinger did not very well know Father Morin, since he took him for a monk.

[B] He continually published new books.] If you would see an exact list of all the books he published, from the year 1644, to the year 1664, read his Bibliotheca Tigurina (6), you will there find the history, & seq.

(4) Jo. Henr. Heideggerus, in Vita Hottingeri ad annum, 1644.

(5) The following words of Hottinger bear relation to this: Non displicuerat hæc primitivæ viri eruditæ, qui hinc inde novo Morini consilium finem impostum publicis testabantur scriptis. Hottinger, in Bibl. Tigurina, pag. 122.

(6) Pag. 122, and

rious, and had a prodigious memory. Nevertheless, there is reason to wonder, that a man charged with so many academical functions, and who had so many avocations through visits, and a vast correspondence by letters [C], could be able to compose so many volumes. He had new professorships given him in 1653 (e), and was admitted into the college of the canons. Two years after he was lent for three years to the elector Palatine, who was desirous to make use of him to re-establish the reputation of the university of Heidelberg. Before he went thither, he took his doctor of Divinity's degree at Basil (f). He arrived at Heidelberg in August, 1655, and was very well received. Besides the professorship of Divinity of the Old Testament, and of the oriental languages, he was made governor of the Collegium Sapientiæ, and promoted to the dignity of ecclesiastical counsellor. He was rector of the university the year following, and composed something concerning the re-union of the Lutherans and Calvinists. This he did to please the elector, who was fond of it; but he met with the same obstacles which had put a stop to the like design so often before [D]. Hottinger accompanied and chronological catalogue of his works, and another catalogue, where they are ranged, according to the order of the subjects. The author of his life has likewise placed all his works in a chronological order. The number of them is astonishing.

(e) Artium Rhetorologicarum ordinarius, & Theologie Vetus Test. atque controversiarum extra ordinem Professor designatus. Heidegger, ubi infra, citat. (g.)

(f) He took it the twenty sixth of July 1655.

[C] He had many avocations through visits, and a vast correspondence of letters. Non publicis tantum his, quibus districtus fuit, curationibus vigilantissimè vacavit, & quotidie calamus in exarandis, quos in publicum mitteret, libris exercuit: Verum etiam amicorum, peregrinorum & hospitum, qui ipsius videri & audiendi gratiâ huc commearunt, desideris satisfecit. Erat enim ipsius domus plena semper & frequens concursu splendidissimorum hominum. Quoties aliquid abditum quærebatur, ille thesaurus, ille delubrum adibat. Ex omnibus, quæ ei obvenirent, negotiis miro vigore & industria se explicavit. Neque etiam deficiebat ad subita extemporali facultate. Veniebant omnium Ordinum, omnium ætatum viri: percontabantur de arduis, de dubiis quæstionibus, quarum ille pondus præsentis semper animo exceperat. Quid molestiam epistolaram & scribendi ad amicos hic recenseam; quo nonnumquam solo perire sibi diem sæpe querebatur? Quotidie aut Galli, aut Germani, aut Belgæ, aut Angli, aut Sueci, aut Dani, aut Itali ad ipsum Epistolas missivæ de literis, de casibus Ecclesiæ, de Civiliū rerum momentis, de aliis, quibus ille gnæviter & promptissime respondit (7). — He was not only vigilant in the duties of his public professions, and constantly employed in preparing books for the public, but likewise abundantly satisfied the desires of his friends, who came from all parts to see and converse with him. For his house was always full of the best company. In all matters of difficulty he was always consulted as an oracle. He extricated himself on all occasions, with a wonderful strength and application of mind. And he had such a quickness of parts as was never to be surprised. He received visits from men of all ranks and ages, and was consulted about the most sublime and difficult questions, to all which he answered to the greatest satisfaction. Not to mention the labour of writing to his friends, which alone, as he used to complain, consumed whole days. For he received letters daily from the learned in France, Germany, Holland, England, Sweden, Denmark, and Italy, concerning the state of learning, and matters both relating to church and state, all which he punctually answered. Some pages after there is a list of all those who corresponded with Hottinger by letters; their names fill up above two pages. Amongst the strangers that visited him, we must not forget the deputies of the Janseuists; for he had many conversations with them when they passed by Zurich, in 1653, in their return from Rome to Paris. A relation of these conversations has been found amongst his papers, and lately published (8).

(8) At the end of the Historia Janseuismi, published by Mr Leydecker at Wirtz, in 1695.

[D] He met with the same obstacles to that re-union which had put a stop to the like design, many times before. According to Mr Heidegger, these obstacles are the animosity of parties, and a certain itch of the mind, which is fed with these disputes, as a camelion with the air. Confiliis de pace Reformatos inter & Lutheranos faciendis, à Serenissimo Principe, tum temporis saxonum illud magna contentione volente, implicitus, aliquot disputationes Irenicas ad ventilandum proposuit, non eo tamen eventu, quem calidis votis boni omnes præceperunt. Obstabant eadem, quæ antehac, impedimenta, odia parum pia partium, & ingeniorum, quæ rixis haud secus quam Chamæleon vento pascuntur, scabies (9). — He assisted the elector with his counsels, towards bringing about an union betwixt the Calvinists and the Lutherans, which that prince then earnestly endeavoured to effectuate; and proposed some Irenical disputationes to pave the way towards it, which had not the success which all good men wished for. The same obstacles which had formerly put a stop to the like pacific endeavours now rendered these fruitless. I mean the unrelenting bate of the parties against each other, and a sort of itch of some peoples minds, which is nourished by contention as the camelion is with air.

Mr Spanheim observes, that the pacific design of the elector Palatine was overthrown by a violent book of Danhawerus, a Lutheran professor of Strasburg. Quæ liter etiam hoc sæculo in Colloquio Lipsiæ, anno 1631, ubi ad tria capita dissensus omnis rediit; tum sub Carolo Ludovico, Electore Palatino, Heidelbergæ quum profiterer, ejus pacificum institutum intervertit præcipuè J. Conr. Danhawerus, A. 1658, scripto virulento Teutonico, Reformatorum saltem, ad lapidem Lydiam exasum, &c (10). It is certain, that the re-union of the Lutherans and Calvinists had been brought about long ago, had it depended only upon the princes; but because that affair depends on the divines, it never yet could take effect, and probably never will. It is not I who judge thus of these gentlemen, generally speaking (11), but it is one of themselves, and he amongst them who can speak best of it by experience. He says, that the business of the re-union ought to be principally committed to secular persons, and not to ecclesiastics (12), the divines, adds he, are very much addicted to their own sense, and have but little equity for those that differ from their opinion. . . . They should not dispute concerning the truth of the doctrines; for disputes rather create new wars, than appease the old ones. Disputants do not seek for concord, but victory: they who find themselves worsted, grow more haughty and enraged. In an assembly where a re-union is treated of, the divines should be reduced to the bare plain function of advocates: they should be heard, but should not be judges; that quality ought to be left to statemen, and it would be necessary, that the divines should even take an oath, that they will submit to the sentence that the political judges shall pronounce (13).

Hoc opus per manus præsertim Virorum Politicorum, non autem ecclesiasticorum est tractandum & inchoandum. Theologi sunt suorum placitorum tepidissimi, parum placitis alienis æqui (14). . . . In colloquiis quæ de pace ineundâ habebuntur, de veritate dogmatum nullo modo erat disputandum. Pugnæ non dirimunt bella, sed faciunt. In illis disputationibus non queritur pax, sed victoria. Nul- lus se victum unquam fatebitur, & si sentiat se de- jectum aut prostratum, tantum abest ut ad concordiam fiat priorior; contra ferocior evadit iratus & indignans, quod res ipsi male cedat (15). There is no description, that this author was more capable of succeeding in, than in this.

It must not be forgotten, that in the year 1666, Tobias Wagnerus, chancellor of the university of Tübingen, wrote against Hottinger's book about the re-union, in his Inquisitio Theologica in Acta benetica nostra potissimum tempore inter Theologos Augustanæ Confessionis & Reformatæ Ecclesiæ à Reformatis re-

(9) Heidegger, ubi supra, fol. D. 2.

(10) Frid. Spanheim Elercho Controvers. pag. 333, Edit. 1694.

(11) So all these phrases ought to be understood; they do not concern any particular person, and they leave room for exceptions.

(12) See the bishop of Meaux's reflections upon all this at the end of his Histoire des Variations, in the addition.

(13) Theologi sunt advocati, loquuntur; Politici audiunt, & sunt iudices sub auctoritate principum. At ante omnem disputationem Theologi obtemperant, nec quidquam adversus pacem molituros. Petrus Juratus, de Pace iuranda, pag. 263.

(14) Id. ibid. pag. 262.

(15) Id. ibid. pag. 263.

accompanied this prince to the electoral diet of Francfort, in the year 1658, where he conferred with Ludolfus upon very important matters [E]. He was not recalled to Zurich till the year 1661, for they had the complaisance to prolong the term, for which they had lent him to the elector Palatine. He was immediately on his return chosen president of the commissioners, who were to revise the German translation of the Bible. The civil war that arose in Switzerland, in the year 1664, occasioned his being sent into Holland upon affairs of state. The university of Leyden offered him a professorship of Divinity in the year 1667; but not obtaining leave of his superiors, he refused it. They were not discouraged with this refusal, but insisted at least to have him by way of loan, and then the magistrates of Zurich having consented to it, in complaisance to the States of Holland, who had interested themselves in this affair, he accepted the offer. As he was preparing all things for his journey, he unfortunately lost his life the fifth of June, 1667, upon the river that passeth through Zurich (g) [F]. He often refused the professorships that were offered him [G]. The most violent adversaries that wrote against him were Leo Allatius, Abraham Ecchellenfis, and Father Labbe [H]. Mr Arnauld had a fling at him; but

was

(g) Taken from his life, written by John Henry Heidegger, and prefixed to the ninth Tome of Hottinger's Ecclesiastical History.

(16) Heidegger, in Vita Hotting.

(17) Id. ibid. fol. F.

(18) Id. ibid. fol. D. 4.

(19) See the above note.

(20) See the above note.

(21) See Hottinger's Biblioth. Tigur. pag. 138.

(22) Heidegger, in Vita Hotting.

(23) Id. ibid. fol. E.

(24) Id. ibid. fol. C 2.

fusitata (16). Hottinger defended himself, not in a book written on purpose, but by the by, and occasionally. It was in a synodal dispute, where he proved, that the reformed church was not schismatical (17).

[E] He conferred with Ludolfus at Francfort upon very important matters. Every body knows, that Job Ludolfus had acquired a wonderful knowledge of Æthiopia. He and Hottinger concerted measures for sending secretly into Africa some persons that understood the oriental languages, and that might exactly inform themselves of the state of Christianity in that part of the world. Agitata præterea inter eos sunt secretoriæ confilia de mittendis Principum auctoritate & impensis in Africam juvenibus uno vel duobus, in Orientalium idiomatibus & rebus paulò jam provectoribus, qui Africanarum, imprimis Æthiopicarum Ecclesiarum arcana paulò penitus indagarent, & novis monumentis ibi collectis copias nostras augerent (18). I believe this was the chief subject of the letters which they wrote to one another, after the diet of Francfort; but I make no doubt that they began to speak of it at Francfort.

[F] He unfortunately lost his life . . . upon the river which passeth through Zurich. He went into a boat with his wife, and three of his children, his brother-in-law, one of his friends, and his maid, to go and make a lease of an estate which he had two leagues from Zurich. The Boat running against a stake, which the swelling of the river hid from their sight, overfet. Hottinger, his brother-in-law, and his friend, saved themselves from the danger by swimming; but they went again into the water, when they perceived the danger the rest of the company were still in. Then it was that Hottinger lost his life: His friend and his three children (19) had the same destiny: his wife, his brother-in-law, and his maid were saved (20). His wife was the only daughter of John Henry Huldric, minister of Zurich, a very learned man (21). He had many children by her, for without reckoning those three that were lost with him, and those that died before, he left four sons and two daughters.

[G] He had often refused the professorships that were offered him. The magistrates of Deventer earnestly solicited him in 1661 to come and supply the place of Henry Diek, professor of Divinity, who, by reason of his great age, was declared emeritus (22). The Landgrave of Hesse invited him to come to Marburg to profess Divinity there, and ordered Felix Platerus, a Physician at Basil, to negotiate that affair. He was also founded by the magistrates of Amsterdam, and Rotterdam, 1695, those of Bremen (23).

[H] The most violent adversaries . . . were Leo Allatius, Abraham Ecchellenfis, and Father Labbe. See how the rage of the first is described in his life (24). Quorum in numerum refero imprimis Labbeum Lojoltum miserum & rancidum, nec noc morosum illum & tristem Senecionem Chium, Allatium, qui vel solo illo libro contra Hottingerum furis inspirantibus & mentem ac calumiam flectentibus scripto, apud bonos omnes cognomen Leonis conturbavit ac decoxit, & Canis pluiquam Epirotici jure meritoque obtinuit. Quæ enim, malum, hæc feralis infamia est, quis furor, quæ canina rabies, leviter si bi contradicentem, & contradictionem argumentis talibus, quibus si error infulset, hominis tamen non

pecoris eum fuisse apparuerat, munientem, non æquo animo tolerare, non tomentis, malagmatis, & lenibus remediis curare, sed probris veluti de plaustris congestis non cumulare sed obruere, & eidem convitia ac maledicta atrocissima non modio nec trimodio, sed toto horreo admetiri? Quæ obscenitas ad nomen ita alludere, ut castæ aures & purus animus abhorreat? Canem hæc, non Leonem generosum, non hominem, nedum Christianum obolent. Puerit Allatius, ille Gigantum frater, paulo in Græcorum, imprimis eorum, quæ hæcenus inedita nobis fortuna invidet, monumentis versator. Habuerit senex ingenium (25) ad corrumperendum & detorquendum, ad dolos ac fallacias intruendum, ad parasitandum denique subactius. Hæc enim sola lusus ipsi propria & eximia esse potest. Quanquam hominem in Græcia natum, Græcum idioma calluisse paulò exactius, mediocri in laude ponendum mihi videtur. Sed fuerint hæc, quæ dixi, in eo summa. Quo pacto ille affurget ad gloriam Hottingeri, qui, præterquam quod veritatis & Orthodoxiæ studio ductus sub signis Christi militavit, etiam excelluit non in vernaculo sibi idiomate, sed in Hebræico, Chaldaico, Syriaco, Arabico, Coptico, Persico, in quibus singulis Allatius non tantum nihil vidit, sed Talpa Tiresia cæcior fuit? Olim Chiis in senatu Attico data est licentia vomendi. Credidi igitur lecto Allatii Chiis libro, quod tot convitia in Hottingerum nostrum non jactavit, sed vomuit, gentis suæ antiqua licentia eum uti voluisse. — In which number I, in the first place, reckon, that wretched disciple of Loyola, Labbe, and that old snarling Grecian Allatius, who, if it were only on account of the book which, being instigated by the Furies, he wrote against Hottinger, has forfeited the generous name of Leo among all good men, and has deservedly instead of it, got that of the Epirotic cur. For what fury, what brutal rage, could tempt a man to attack a person who had only gently opposed his opinion, and had supported his objections by such arguments, as showed that he was no contemptible adversary; what fury, I say, could tempt him, instead of taking this in good part and modestly, replying, to load, nay to overwhelm him with all manner of ribaldry, and scurrilities? Then his obscene puns on his name, are such as must create abhorrence in chaste and pure minds. These are more like to the snarling dog, than the generous lion; the man and far less the Christian. Tho' we should allow that Allatius was more versed in the Greek authors, especially in those which are as yet unpublished, tho' we should allow that he had a genius more apt for trick, and cunning, and parasitical arts: for these are the only things in which he is peculiarly excellent: and I should imagine that here can be no great merit in a Greek's being well versed in the Greek idiom; allowing him, I say, to excel in all these things, how will this put him on a level with Hottinger, who, besides his having been a champion for truth and orthodoxy under CHRIST's banners, excelled not only in his native language, but likewise in the Hebrew, Chaldaic, Syriac, Arabic, Coptic, and Persian, languages, in all which Allatius is as blind as Tiresias. The Athenians antiently gave the natives of Cbio the liberty of vomiting, and on that account, I, upon reading this book of Allatius of Chiis, fancied that he had not thrown but rather vomited these reproaches upon Allatius, making use of the ancient privilege of his countrymen.

(25) See Mr. Claudé's words in the following remark.

was taken up by Mr Claude [I].

(26) In Eneside Disert. Philologico-Theolog. printed in 1662.

(27) In the preface to Etymolog. Orientalis, five Lexici Harmonico-Pentagloti, published in the year 1661.

(28) Heidegger, in Vita Hotting.

'countrymen.' Hottinger defended himself in few words (26): as for Echellenis, he put him in mind (27) of the blunders, of which he had been convicted, and he shewed him some others. 'Præfatus est illi libro de gradibus studii Philologiae, inserta simul Apologia brevi adversus Abrahamum Echellensem, qui Præfatione in Catalogum librorum Chaldaeorum, Hebed Jesu Metropolitæ Sobensis, traduxit Seldenum, Hottingerum nostrum, Calixtum, Ludovicum de Dieu, Constantinum L'Empereur, Salmasium, eo potissimum nomine, quod Orientalibus studiis intenti, germanam tamen verborum significationem, ut plurimum non deprehendant, ambigua & obscura pro certis & luculentissimis statuunt, atque interim ea, quæ in clarissima luce versantur, quod ipsorum commenta radicibus extirpent, omnino prætereant. Verum non aliam defensionem tum sui, tum virorum horum doctissimorum, quos eadem accusatione involverat adversarius, Hottingerus paravit, quàm in memoriam revocatis Echellenis errorum plaustris, quæ ipsi à contribulibus Flavignio, Gabriele Sionita, Johanne Morino objecta sunt; nec non ex proprio ingenio demonstratis notoriis sphalmatis, quæ ille in tractatu Arabico-Latino, Synopsis propositorum sapientie Arabum Philosopherum inscripto, adversus genium Arabicæ linguæ admittit (28). — He wrote a preface to the book concerning the degrees of the study of Philology, and therein inserted a short apology for himself against Abraham Echellenis, who, in a preface to a catalogue of the Chaldaic books of Hebed Jesu, Metropolitan of Seba, translated Selden, our Hottinger, Calixtus, Lewis de Dieu, Constantine L'Empereur, and Salmasius, accusing them that notwithstanding their application to Oriental learning, they had for the most part mistaken the genuine signification of words, and laid down ambiguous and obscure matters as certain and evident truths: tho' they at the same time passed by many things which are of the clearest nature, because they entirely ruined their hypotheses. Hottinger contented himself here instead of all other defence of himself, and of these learned men, whom his adversary had involved in the same accusation with putting Echellenis in mind of the numerous blunders which had been objected to him by those of his own tribe; to wit, by Flavigny, Gabriel Sionita, and John Morin; adding likewise some notorious mistakes which Echellenis had been guilty of in his treatise in Arabic and Latin, intitled, Synopsis propositorum sapientie Arabum Philosopherum, against the genius of the Arabic tongue.'

[I] Mr Arnauld had a sting at him, but was taken up by Mr Claude. I relate this history (29) chiefly upon the credit of Allatius, who took a particular care to inform himself of it, and who being a Greek by nation, is more credible than Dutch or Swiss ministers, and than Hottinger amongst others, who is one of the most passionate and unsincere writers I ever read. These are Mr Arnauld's words (30); and this is Mr Claude's answer. 'Why would Mr Arnauld have us rather believe Allatius than Hottinger? The first has all the characters of a passionate writer, who is always misrepresenting things; the later, on the contrary, whatever Mr Arnauld may say, has all the marks of a man of sincerity, who speaks things as he knows them. The first is more polite and more elegant I confess; but the other has more sincerity. Allatius says of his own head whatever he pleases; Hottinger brings his witnesses.'

(29) V. that of Cyril Lucar, patriarch of Constantinople.

(30) Perpetuus Defensor, liv. iv. chap. vi. pag. 561. Brussels, in 12mo.

(31) Réponse à la Perpetuité de la Foi, liv. iii. cap. xii. pag. 467.

HUARTE (JOHN) lived in the XVIth century, and acquired great reputation by a book which he published in Spanish, and has been translated into diverse languages, and frequently reprinted [A]. He treats there of the trial of wits, proper for the sciences, and lays down many things which make one presume that he did not follow the common road of Physicians; but was able to make many discoveries by his profound meditation, and careful study of the antients. However, it is not prudent to depend entirely, either on his maxims, or on all the authorities he alledges; for he is not to be trusted on either of these heads (a), his hypotheses also are frequently chimerical, especially when he pretends to teach us the formalities necessary to be observed, in order to beget children of a fine genius. There are many things in that part of his book which are contrary to modesty, and which have been too grossly translated by Gabriel Chappuis. He is not to be excused for giving as an authentic piece, a pretended letter of the proconsul Lentulus from Jerusalem to the Roman senate, containing a portrait of JESUS CHRIST, a description of his stature, of the colour of his hair, the qualities of his beard, &c. There has been a criticism published on this author [B]. He was accounted a Spaniard, but was born in a town of the French Navarre (b).

(a) See L'Apolo-gie de Costar,
pag. 213, 214.

(b) At St Jean de Peid de Port.
See Du Verdier, Biblioth. Franç.
pag. 432.

[A] He acquired great reputation by a book, which he published in Spanish, and has been translated into diverse languages and frequently reprinted. It was translated into Italian by Camillo Camilli. This translation was dedicated by Nicolo Manaffi to Frederic Pandasius, professor of Philosophy at Bologna (1). The epistle dedicatory is dated from Venice, the first of March 1582: the edition which I use is printed at Venice press Aldo 1590 in 8vo. This book was translated into French by Gabriel Chappuis in the year 1580. The title of his version is, Anacrisis ou parfait Jugement & Examen des Esprits propres & naiz aux Sciences, &c. (2). that is, 'An Anacrisis or perfect judgment and trial of wits, proper and born for the sciences: wherein by wonderful and useful secrets, drawn both from true, natural, and divine Philosophy, is shown the difference of the gifts and abilities of men, and for what sort of study each man's genius is proper: so that whoever shall read this book with attention, may discover the property of his own genius, and will be able too choose that science in which he shall make the greatest progress.' There is a better French translation than this, it was printed at Amsterdam by John de Ravestein in 1672. The translator's name is Francis Savinien d'Alquié. It contains the additions which John Huarte made to the last edition of his book: they are considerable both in quantity and quality; but the new translator could not insert them in their proper places, and was obliged to give some of them at the beginning and some at the end of the book. I know the Latin version only by means of the Catalogue of the Bodleian Library. It was printed in the year 1622 in 8vo, and translated by Æsch Major.

[B] There has been a criticism on this author. It is intitled L'Examen de l'Examen des Esprits. The name of the author of it is Jourdain Guibelec. Let us insert this passage of Sorel (3). 'The Spanish author of the trial of wits has been admired by some (4), and condemned by others. I shall not insist on what they reproach him with, to wit, that he ascribes so much efficacy to corporeal qualities, that one would think the soul depends upon them, and would hinder us from believing it to be immaterial and immortal. He sufficiently defends himself on this head, by replying, that the soul of man acts only according to the disposition of the organs; nevertheless it is still thought, that he has too much subjected this spiritual substance to gross and corporeal parts; and that the comparisons which he has drawn from brutes, and even the most imperfect of them, such as insects, are dishonourable to so noble a creature as man; that it is likewise ridiculous to attribute aridity to ants, and such insects, because they are wise, and from thence to draw a consequence that prudence must be found in dry constitutions: for by what art has he been able to discover whether there is more humidity

(3) Sorel de la Perfection de l'Homme, pag.
327.

(4) Anthony Zara (who wrote a book of the Anatomy of Wits and Sciences) Peter Charon, and others, receive the doctrine of this Spaniard, almost without contradiction.
Ibid. pag. 335.

* humidity or aridity in the brains of flies, which seem to be very humid? How likewise has he observed the difference betwixt the brains of bees and common flies, the first of which are reckoned very wise and the other quite the contrary? We shall not find any great difference in their brains upon dissection, and if he says that the one have dry brains and the others humid, it is because he has observed that the one are prudent, and the others imprudent, and not because he has judged of their prudence or imprudence, by their aridity or humidity . . . Some also object to the author of the Trial of Wits, that he has not well established the temperaments for each faculty of the soul, and that he ought not to ascribe the judgment alone to aridity but likewise the memory, and that these two faculties are not incompatible. Thus there are many things objected to several of his propositions, which have given occasion to a French Physician, to write a Trial of his Trial, wherein he strongly refutes the greatest part of his doctrine. He treats it according to his fancy in a book as large as the other (5). Sorel afterwards, makes some remarks against the doctrine of the author of the Trial of Wits, I shall insert the following. Some have enquired into the means of putting the natural faculties in good condition. And in order to judge the better of them, they are not satisfied with observing men in themselves, by their external marks; but have even carried their enquiries as far as the causes, to wit, to the time and place of their birth, and above all to the parents who begot them, who are the real sources of the temperament, and have a great influence in making use of one humour or another. This being allowed, in order to make their doctrine the more acceptable, they have pretended at the same time to prescribe remedies for the bad qualities which they discovered, or to give assistances to the acquisition of the good. And in order to seek the perfection of men in their remotest origin, they would provide for their happy birth, and direct that they who bring them into the world should use all manner of precautions to beget them with all the qualities which they desire they should have. Some Naturalists have enquired of what temperament and what age a man and a woman ought to be, in order to marriage, and how they ought to nourish and govern themselves, that they may have children of good constitutions. The author of the Trial of Wits has added to this, the manner of procreating them of such temperaments, as shall render them fit to make progress in the liberal arts and sciences. Both the one and the other lay it down as a rule, that great care ought to be taken in marriages, that a man of a very hot constitution should be joined to a woman of a more moderate temperament, who has that humidity which he wants in order to form a perfect temperament. But it would be a very difficult matter to make such enquiries, because a great many other things are necessary to an agreeable match, which are principally regarded: it is ordinarily thought that as to bodily qualities, it is enough if the married persons are not infirm or deformed. As to the manner of living of married people and the time of generation, and other observations which are prescribed, in order to have sons or daughters, and even to have them born with constitutions, proper for particular professions, tho' all these I say do not succeed so exactly as we may promise to our selves, yet they must needs be attended with good consequences. Some men less circumspect enjoy these advantages without all this care: but that proceeds from the great vigour of their constitutions (6).

It cannot be doubted that John Huarte has laid down some general maxims which are very true; such as, for example, that it is advantageous to employ all persons in those professions, for which they are most fitted by nature; that there are many who would have succeeded in the study of the Law, if they had not been set apart for the study of Physic; that great inconveniences flow from the small regard, that is had to natural dispositions in the choice of employments: but it is very difficult to prevent this disorder. The expedient which the author proposed to Philip II, king of Spain, would not be attended with all the advantages which might be imagined. As I observe, lays be (7), that the mind of man is so narrow and limited, that it is hardly sufficient for one thing, I have always been of opinion that one can never be perfectly master of two different arts, and that we must of necessity be ignorant of one of them; this made Plato say, in his book concerning laws, Nemo ararius simul & lignarius faber fit; duas enim artes, aut studia dus, diligenter exercere humana natura non potest. (No man can be both a good Smith and a good Carpenter; for human nature cannot excel in two arts or studies): So I think that wife and knowing men ought to be appointed to examine the genius of children in their youth, in order to oblige them to follow that science, which best suits them, without leaving it to their own fancy, lest they should make a bad choice of one less advantageous or less useful. By this means your majesty would have the most exquisite artists, and the most finished works in the world in your dominions, and persons who most happily join art with nature. I could wish likewise that all your universities should use the same methods, and that as they do not permit the scholars to pass from one faculty to another, till they are well skilled in Latin; so they would likewise appoint persons to examine whether a scholar who wants to study Logic, Philosophy, Physic, Divinity, or Law, has the genius which each of these sciences requires in order to succeed in it: for besides that it is a great injury to the public, for a person to exercise an art of which he is ignorant, so it is a great presumption for a man to labour and rack his brain about a thing in which he can never acquit himself with honour. What he says elsewhere would be still more embarrassing and doubtful in practice: 'In a well ordered commonwealth there ought to be marriage-makers, who should know, by the rules of art, the qualities that persons who marry should have in order to a marriage's being happy for both parties. Hippocrates and Galen began to labour in this science, and have given rules how to distinguish betwixt a fruitful and a barren woman, and betwixt a man fit for propagation and one who is unfit. But concerning these matters they have wrote but little, and not so distinctly as they ought, at least, as is necessary for the present purpose (8).

(6) Sorel, de la Perfection de l'Homme, pag. 335, 336.

(7) Huarte, epistola de . . .

(8) Huarte, Examen des Esprits, chap. xv, fol. m. 207.

HUGUES (JAMES) a divine and canon, born at Lisle in Flanders, printed a book at Rome in 1655, of a most singular kind, considering the chimeras with which it is filled [A]. He dedicated it to Pope Alexander VII, and in his Epistle Dedicatory are several ridiculous applications.

[A] He printed a book of a most singular kind, considering the chimeras with which it is filled. Here follows the title of it. Vera Historia Romana, seu Originis Latii vel Italiae ac Romanae Urbis à tenebris longæ vetustatis in lucem productæ. Liber primus qui primordia Europæ ac Latii primævi Annales demonstrat atque urbis conditæ. Romæ, typis Francisci Monetæ, M.DC.LV. The true Roman history, or the origin of Latium or Italy, and of the city of Rome, brought to light out of the darkness of remote antiquity. Book the first, which contains an account of the first peopling of Europe, and the annals of ancient Latium, and of the building of Rome. It contains 284 pages in 4to (1).

A passage which I am going to cite from the Memoirs of Trevoux will give some idea of this extravagant production. According to James Hugues 'there never existed such persons as Janus, Æneas, or Romulus: all that has been said of them is taken from the predictions of I do not know what Sybil, who, in the prophecies which she delivered concerning St Peter, had given this saint the names of these heroes; and according to the prophetic style, had made use of the past time instead of the future. The book of the origin of Rome, composed by this author, is full of visions as extraordinary as this is (2).

(2) Father Tournemine, in a Memoir inserted in the Journal of Trevoux, February 1744, pag. 335, 336, of the Trevoux edition.

HUNGARY (MARY, Queen of) sister of the emperor Charles V, was married in the year 1521 to Lewis king of Hungary, who unfortunately lost his life at the battle of Mohatz in the year 1526. His widow was made governess of the Low-Countries in 1531, and shewed a great deal of courage and prudence in that post [A]. She exercised it till the abdication of Charles V, whom she followed into Spain, where she died the eighteenth of October 1558. She loved magnificence exceedingly [B], and was extremely fond of hunting [C]. It is said she endeavoured to moderate the punishment of the Protestants [D]. She understood Latin (a). There was a personal hatred betwixt her and Henry II, which occasioned many ravages. They ruined in their turns even the country-seats of each other. Mary began this sort of hostilities, to revenge herself for some songs that had been made against her honour in France [E]. Henry knew how to return these injuries [F]. He passionately desired to make her a prisoner

(a) See remark [H].

[A] She shewed a great deal of courage and prudence in her government.] Consult Brantome who tells you, 'that this queen of Hungary was very useful to the emperor, and that she proved so very serviceable to him, that one cannot tell how he could have done without her, and that he so depended upon her in all the affairs of her government, that when the emperor himself was in Flanders, he referred all the affairs of the Low-Country to her, and the council was held under her and in her palace. It is true that she, being a great politician, informed him of all that passed in the council when he was not there; which was a great pleasure to him. She carried on glorious wars there sometimes by her lieutenants, sometimes in person, always on horseback, as a valiant amazon (1).' What he says (2) of the speech she made on the day of the abdication, is very curious. We have here a proof, that women are capable of reigning well.

(1) Brantome, Dames Galantes, Tom. II, pag. 91.

(2) Ibid. pag. 95.

(3) Id. Memoirs, Tom. II, in the Elgy of Henry II, pag. 23.

(4) Memoires des Dames Galantes, Tom. II, pag. 92.

[B] She loved magnificence wonderfully.] Brantome says (3), that when Philip II went to take possession of the Low-Countries, the most sumptuous entries that can be imagined were made for him; but he adds, 'the queen of Hungary surpassed them all in her houses at Bains and Marimont.' He afterwards describes 'the siege of a place, which that queen represented to divert the emperor and all his court, in her fine house of Marimont.' He says in another book (4) 'that he feasted at Bains the emperor Charles and all his court, when his son king Philip came from Spain to Flanders to see her, where the magnificence was so great that nothing was so much talked of then as las fiestas de Bains, as the Spaniards called it: I remember likewise, that in the journey to Bayonne how great forever the magnificence was, in running at the ring, combats, masquerades, and expences that were seen, yet all was nothing if compared with las fiestas de Bains, as some old Spanish gentlemen, who had seen them, reported.'

[C] . . . and was extremely fond of hunting.] She accompanied her husband every where, even when he went a hunting, for which she had a wonderful passion; being afterwards regent of the Low-Countries for her brother the emperor Charles V, she often quitted her agreeable palaces of Mechelen and Brussels, to live in the country at Marimont and in her houses near the forests; where from morning till night she diverted herself with hunting. For which reason the Flemings called her the Huntress, and painted her like Diana: she communicated that inclination to her niece Margaret of Austria, duchess of Parma, who has been also governess of the Low-Countries. She had inherited a passion for the laborious exercises of hunting from her grandmother by her father's side, Mary duchess of Burgundy, wife of the emperor Maximilian I, who being a hunting, (with which she almost every day diverted herself) fell from her horse, and died to the great grief of the Flemings and the emperor her husband, who lost also his second wife Blanche Sforza by the same misfortune (5). This seems to be the translation of these words of Strada: Capiebat ut studio summo Gubernatrix, plane ut Venatricem vulgo appellarent, habitaque venatricis expingerent: neptem videlicet Mariæ Burgundæ, quæ ab infestis feris nunquam desistit, donec inter venandum equo excussa vitam amisit, suo non tam suo, quam Maximiliani mariti, cuius et uxor altera, Blanca Sfortia, in venatione equo decidit, obiitque. Ejusmodi autem studium arripuit tam avida, in eumque laborem duravit adeo membra decennis nondum puella (6), ut amittam per saltus camposque sequeretur impavida (7).

(5) Hilarion de Coëte, Elog. des Dames Illustres, Tom. II, pag. 561.

† 1482.

† 1496.

(6) That is, Margaret, natural daughter of Charles V.

(7) Strada, de Bello Belg. lib. i, pag. m. 45.

[D] It is said she endeavoured to moderate the punishment of the Protestants.] When to appease the malecontents of the Low-Countries, the court of Spain promised them the suspension of the Inquisition in the year 1566; it was added, that the imperial laws which condemned Heretics to death, should be mitigated, as they had been in the year 1550, at the request of the queen of Hungary. 'Immo sic Cæsarem facturum fuisse si viveret, quando ipse ob similes difficultates anno millesimo quingentesimo quinquagesimoque, potestante Mariâ Hungariæ Reginâ ejus sorore, eadem pœnas quas ante statuerat, emendare ac lenire non inutile aut indecorum arbitratus est (8).'

(8) Fam. Strada, Decid. I, lib. v, pag. 217.

[E] She began these sort of hostilities to revenge herself for some songs that had been made against her honour in France.] Here is what we find in Brantome upon this subject (9). 'I have heard say, that the chief reason, that moved the queen of Hungary to burn Picardy, and other parts of France, was the insolence of some babblers and story-tellers, who spoke commonly of her amours, and sung every where the Barbançon of the queen of Hungary, which was a very coarse ballad, and fit only for the mouths of such rude reifiers.' By this we see that the people are fated to bear the punishment not only of the follies of their sovereigns (10), but also of many others. I shall set down a passage which does not seem to be full enough. 'There was a great hatred between Henry II, and the queen of Hungary, the occasion whereof I do not know; but only that the French soldiers had made songs of her, and of Barbançon the finest lord of her court (11).' It was an easy thing to supply what is wanting in this discourse; it was but saying that this queen set on fire several places of Picardy, even without sparing the royal palace of Folembray. By this we understand the reason of their personal hatred on both sides. Mary doubtless believed, that Henry applauded these songs, and the personally hated him for it. Henry on the other side took the burning of his house of pleasure for a personal affront. I know not what we are to believe of the gallantries of this princess; I only remember what Brantome says (12), 'that she was very handsome and agreeable, and very amiable, although she appeared somewhat manly; but as for love, she was not the worse for it, nor for war, which she made her principal exercise.'

(9) Dames Galantes, Tom. II, pag. 338.

(10) Quidquid delirant reges, plebsunt Achivi. Horat. Epist. II, lib. I, ver. 14.

(11) Mezerai, Hist. de France, Tom. II, pag. 1090.

(12) Dames Galantes, Tom. II, pag. 90.

If you desire to know when she made these ravages in Picardy; you need only cast your eyes on the following words. 'Whilst the emperor her brother was besieging Metz, she came with the count de Reux into Picardy to make a diversion, and so hinder the king from succouring the besieged, where she made a great havoc, and burnt Noyon, Nesle, Chauny, Roye, Folembray, a royal palace, built by king Francis I, and laid above seven or eight hundred villages; she laid siege to Heiden and took it (13).'

[F] Henry knew how to return these injuries.] Having taken Marienburg and Dinant, and razed Bouvines, whose inhabitants were either hanged or put to the sword, he passed the Sambre, and ruined Hainault, and burnt Mariemont, a country-seat built by the queen of Hungary; and the pretty town of Bains (14), with the magnificent palace she had built there, adorned with infinite pictures, ancient statues, and works of graving and sculpture. The ancient town of Bavets, of whose antiquity and greatness, the old chroniclers have told a thousand stories, suffered a like desolation. These burnings and destructions were very far from the temper of Henry II; but he thought himself in honour obliged thus to revenge the ruin of his castle of Folembray, and the affront

(13) Hist. de Coëte, ubi supra, pag. 567.

(14) He built a new town there.

prisoner [G]. Erasmus dedicated a book to this princess, in which the Printers maliciously made a very strange fault [H]. Father Hilarión de Coste has committed some small errors of Chronology [I]; and has not been well copied in every thing by Moreri [K]. I pass over in silence the scandalous reports concerning the amours of Charles V, with the queen of Hungary [L], the mother, as they pretend, of Don John of Austria.

(15) Mezerai, Hist. de France, Tom. II, pag. 1090, ad ann. 1554. See also Lewis Guicciardin, Description du Pais Bas, pag. 468.

(16) Brantôme, Dames Galantes, Tom. II, pag. 92.

(17) Id. ibid. pag. 93.

(18) Ibid. pag. 94.

(19) Brantôme here seems to be guilty of an anachronism: The ravages that queen made in Picardy preceded the destruction of her fine palace of Binche. Besides, we find no trace under the government of Mary, after the year 1554. She was no more government, when the ravages were concluded the fifth of February 1556.

(20) Farnian, Strada, Dec. I, lib. ix, pag. 577, ad ann. 1578.

(21) Dames Galantes, Tom. II, pag. 306.

(22) Brantôme is in the right. Hic puerulus à Victoria Caesar est appellatus, quum illa mater exhorum ab exercitu nuncupata esset. Treb. Pollio, in Tringita Tyrannus, n. 24. See also n. 30.

(23) Erasmi. Epist. xxxi. lib. xix, pag. 846. See also Epist. xx, lib. xxvi, pag. 1432.

(24) Idem, Epist. xxi, lib. xxvi, pag. 1434.

must know they were vexed they had not received the new-years gift they expected from the author. Hereupon the greatest toper of them all undertook to be revenged, and found a means for it, which vexed Erasmus heartily, and which cannot be translated into another language. We must therefore be contented with the original. 'Nuper cum inter imprimentes excusores aliquot conqueſti fuissent me sibi xenia nondum perſolviſſe, exortus eſt inter eos quidam cæteris violentior, qui proſtiteretur ſe pœnas à me exacturum, ni darem: atque id proſectò veteratò tam egregie effecit, ut aures nummis trecentis redimere eam ignominiam voluiſſem. Cum enim in Vidua mea, quam ſereniſſimæ Hungariæ Regiæ dedicaveram, ad laudem cuiusdam ſanctiſſimæ ſceminæ inter alia liberalitatem illius in pauperes reſerrem, hæc verba ſubjuxi: Atque mente illa uſam ſemper fuiſſe, quæ talem faminam deceret. Unde ſcœleſtus ille animadvertens ſibi vindictæ occasionem oblatam eſſe, ex mente illa mentula fecit. Itaque volumina mille fuere impreſſa (25).'

[I] Father Hilarión de Coste has committed some small errors of Chronology. I. He says (26) that our queen of Hungary was born at Bruxelles the thirteenth of September, 1513. Which is false and impossible, since the arch duke her father died in 1506. There is 1503, and not 1513, in Moreri's Dictionary. II. The ceremonies of that princess's marriage were not performed at Buda in the year 1521, to the 1607, great content of Uladislav (27), king of Hungary, for Uladislav died in 1516. III. Queen Mary did not live continually at Lintz in Austria (28), during the years 1527, 1528, 1529, 1530. I have cited (29) Erasmus, who assures us, that in 1529 she retired into Moravia. IV. She did not govern the Low-Countries twenty eight years (30), but twenty four (31), namely, from 1531 to 1555. The author I consulte contradicting himself confesses, page 569, that this government lasted but twenty five years; but he has committed many faults there. V. He supposes that the queen of Hungary reigned her government into her brother's hands in October 1557, mark, [H], citate. It was the twenty fifth of October, in 1555. VI. He supposes that Margaret of Austria, governess of the Netherlands, died in 1532. It was in the year 1530. In the elogy of this princess (32), he makes her be born the tenth of January, 1480, and to die the first of December, 1532, aged fifty one years (33). Is this to have skill in numbers? VII. He supposes that the queen of Hungary began her government of the Low-Countries in 1532. It was the year before. VIII. He supposes, that when she resigned this government to her brother, she made a long speech to the people. This is not the name that should be given to that assembly, before which Charles V renounced his kingdoms.

[K] . . . and has not been well copied in every thing by Moreri.] Hilarión de Coste had said that the queen of Hungary died 'as she was ready to depart, in order to return into Flanders . . . where she desired to end her days, because she was very much beloved and honoured by that people (34)'. Moreri, instead of keeping within those bounds, says she died 'at the very same time that she was about to go and re-assume the government of the Low-Countries.' He has been a more faithful transcriber of one of the faults of this monk: he says after him, that this queen governed the Low-Countries twenty five years, till 1557, when she went over into Spain. I have already said, that she governed them but from the year 1531, to the twenty fifth of October, 1555, and I add, that she went into Spain in the year 1556. Moreri should not have said that she married Lewis Jagellon, king of Hungary, when she was very young; for she was eighteen years old when the nuptials were celebrated. Moreri's expression would make one believe that she was younger. It is known that the daughters and sisters of kings are sometimes married before they are ten years old.

[L] I pass in silence the scandalous reports concerning the amours of Charles V, with the queen of Hungary. I Read above, the end of remark [A] of the article Don

Don JOHN of AUSTRIA, and join to it these words of Gabriel Naudé. 'The same emperor . . . covered all those disgraces with the veil of piety, and religion, shutting up himself in a cloyster, where he had likewise the conveniency of doing penance, for a secret sin he had committed in begetting a bastard son, who was also his nephew (35).' Lewis de Coups d'Etat. Mai very justly condemns this writers boldness in affirming such a thing. See page 765, and 766, of his re. marks upon Naudé's Coups d'Etat.

HUNGARY (ISABELLA, queen of) sister of Sigismund Augustus king of Poland, was a princess of great merit. She was married, in the year 1539, to John Zapolihá Vaivod of Transylvania, who had been elected king of Hungary in the year 1526, and who strenuously disputed that crown with Ferdinand of Austria, brother of the emperor Charles V. She was delivered of a son the seventh of July 1540. Her husband was so pleased with it, that he drank at table to such excess, as occasioned his death the twenty first of the said month [A]. Isabella finding that she was not able to keep the crown for her son, which Ferdinand would deprive him of, implored the protection of the Ottoman Porte, from whence she received so great succours, that Ferdinand's army which besieged Buda was cut in pieces. Solyman came in person into Hungary to bring Ferdinand to reason. He caressed Isabella's little child [B], and alledged very honourable excuses for his not visiting her [C]. But he quickly discovered his wicked designs; he made himself master of Buda, and forced Isabella to retire to Lippha (a). This was a cruel mortification to that princess, who was fond of dominion. The hopes of seeing him restore the kingdom of Hungary to her son, when he should come to age; those hopes I say, grounded on the promises of Solyman, were but a poor consolation. She expressed a great deal of constancy in that unhappy trial, and comforted herself as well as she could, with the title of regent of Transylvania, which Solyman had left her; but as he made George Martinusius her co-adjutor, she met with a thousand causes of vexation in her regency. It was but a name; the authority being intirely in the hands of this monk George (b). An open rupture ensued, the consequences whereof compleated the ruin of Isabella's authority; for her adversary, supported by Ferdinand, introduced a fine army, commanded by a very cunning Italian (c), who managed things so dexterously, that he engaged this queen to give up Transylvania to king Ferdinand, in the year 1551, after which he retired to Castovia. It was in her passage thither, that she wrote some Latin words upon a tree, which are mentioned by historians [D]. She was a woman of a restless disposi-

(a) The fifth of September, 1541.

(b) So George Martinusius was called.

(c) Jo'n Baptista Castaldi, marquis of Cassano, who had been educated in the house of Francis d'Avalos Marquis de Pescara. Hilar. de Coste, Elog. des Dames, Tom. I, pag. 644. Delectus est Joann. Baptista Castaldus Pidenae Comes, & ob res recentior egregie gestas (nam in bello Germanico castrorum praefecti summa cum laude nonnulli observati) Cassini Marchio à Caesare creatus. Thuanus, lib. ix, pag. 180.

[A] Her husband drank to such excess, as occasioned his death. He was gone into Transylvania to suppress a sedition which the favourers of Ferdinand had raised there. Stephen Mailats, the most obstinate among them, was retired to the castle of Fogaras to wait for the succours which Ferdinand sent him, under the conduct of Nadafdy. The king besieged him in it, and took him after a long siege. In the mean time there comes a courier, who brought him the news of the birth of a son which God had given him. This news being agreeable to all that want to have children, and especially to persons far in years; we may imagine that John received it very joyfully: It made him fall into an excess, drinking like a Hungarian, and this excess increasing his distemper, he died at Saffebes a few days after the birth of his son, in the fifty third year of his age (1).

[B] Solyman caressed Isabella's little child. I will use here the words of the author I have cited in the foregoing remark. 'Solyman sent presents to the young king . . . intreating the queen to let him see her son, assuring her it was only to engage his children to love him the more. At the same time the deputies were ordered to tell her, that if he did not visit her, it was for fear his visit might injure her reputation. The queen thanked the grand-seignior for his civility, and wavering in her mind, whether she ought to send her son or not. George Martinusius told her, that she could not refuse it. Being then overcome by necessity, she put him into a cradle worthy of such a child; and ordering the nurse and some other matrons, and many Hungarian lords to accompany him, she sent him to the camp. Solyman desirous to do him honour, received him with a troop of horse, saw him, caressed him, and made his children do the like (2).' Hilarion de Coste, in his eulogy on our queen Isabella (3), is very particular about these things. 'Solyman, says he, sent the young king three hories of an extraordinary beauty, with trappings adorned with gold, pearls, and precious stones, and also very rich plumes, and vestments of cloth of gold. He also sent to the principal lords and barons chains of gold, and rich Turkish robes. . . . The queen put her son into a gilt and very rich coach, with his nurse and some ladies, who had dressed that little prince to advantage, that he might be more agreeable to him. . . . The Ottoman prince sent some troops of horse nobly equipped, and some bands of janizaries to meet him, and give him an honourable reception and entertainment. As soon as these troops had saluted the king of Hungary, they placed him in the midst of them, to conduct him with that pomp to the emperor, who, as soon as he saw this little prince, expressed a great affection for him, and received him very tenderly, both as a vassal of the Ottoman house, and as the son of John, king of Pannonia, whom he had greatly loved and honoured, having protected him against Ferdinand, king of Bohemia, and the emperor Charles V. He commanded his sons, Bajazet and Selim, who were then in his camp, to do the like. They were the sons of the beautiful Rose, or Roxelana.' This author pretends (4) that Solyman had a 'mind to know whether this child was a son or a daughter; for there was a report spread in the Turkish army, that it was the later, and that for this reason Isabella Jagellon had him brought up secretly.'

[C] Solyman refused to see her, and alledged very honourable excuses for it. I have already said, that he assured this princess, 'that the reason of his not seeing her, was the injury that his visit might do her reputation.' This was a very honourable procedure, for it is certain, that an interview betwixt Solyman and this queen, would have occasioned much obloquy in the world. Hilarion de Coste makes him alledge other excuses, which are not probable. 'They (5) also told this princess, that Solyman had no less respect for her, than for her son, as well for her own merit, as for being the daughter of Sigismund, king of Poland, whom he called his father; and that if his law permitted him to visit her, he would not have failed in it: which was the reason he could not invite her into his tents, and he intreated her to send only her son with his nurse (6).' If Solyman's religion had forbidden him to receive Isabella in his tents, would it have permitted him to receive the young prince's nurse, and the ladies who accompanied him (7)?

[D] She wrote some Latin words upon a tree which are mentioned by historians. Thuanus observes in relating this, that she was a learned woman (8). 'Quae (Regina) statim, ne privata in eo regno, cui summo cum imperio praefuisset, diutius viveret, convalescit rebus suis

(35) Naudé, Coups d'Etat, chap. iv, pag. m.

(4) Hilar. de Coste, ibid. pag. 632.

(5) That is, the deputies of Solyman, who brought the presents to the young king.

(6) Ubi supra, pag. 632.

(7) Ibid. pag. 633.

(8) She was a learned Italian. Hilarion de Coste, ubi supra, pag. 644. made a speech in that language, to make her son resign her kingdom.

(1) Discours Historique & Politique sur les Causes de la Guerre d'Hongrie, printed with some other curious pieces at Cologne, 1666, in 12mo, pag. 237, 238. See also Hilarion de Coste, Elog. des Dames Illustres, Tom. I, pag. 629.

(2) Discours Historique & Politique, &c. pag. 242.

(3) Ubi supra, pag. 631, & seq. 242.

tion; she staid but little at Cassovia. She went from thence into Silesia, and then into Poland, to Bonna Sforza her mother, and Sigismund Augustus her brother. She kept intelligence with the grandees of Transylvania, to attempt the regaining that country. She had recourse again to the protection of Solymán, and used to many arts, that she returned into Transylvania, in the year 1556. There she maintained herself till her death, and kept the authority as much as she could [E], without imparting it to John Sigismund her son. The bigots vainly endeavour to excuse that conduct [F]. She died at Alba Julia the fifteenth of September 1558 (d).

(d) I have taken the matters of fact contained in this article, from Hilarion de Coste, Eloges des Dames Illustres, Tom. I, page 622, & seq.

fuis per montes asperos Cassoviam versus iter direxit. Cum propter angustias viarum inter silvas decurrere cogeretur, cum auriga currum traduceret, ipsa retro in Dacliam respiciens, pristini culminis, è quo dicerat, memor altum corde suspirium duxisse dicitur, & cum aliud non posset literata femina, inscripto arbori nomine, hæc addidisse, SIC FATA VOLUNT, eoque relicto iusti doloris monumento, rursus currum conscendit, institutum iter persequitur (9). — The queen not caring to live any longer in a private station, in a country where she had enjoyed the sovereign authority, having gathered all her effects together, set out for Cassovia, thro' a very mountainous country. And being obliged to alight from her chariot, because of the badness of the roads, among the woods, while the driver was disengaging the chariot, she looked back towards Transylvania, and remembering her former grandeur from which she had fallen, fetched a deep sigh, and, being a learned lady, carved her name on a tree, and under it SIC FATA VOLUNT, so fate decrees; and leaving that monument of her just grief, mounted her chariot, and proceeded in her journey. Hilarion de Coste deserves to be copied, by reason of the particulars to which he descends (10). As that virtuous but unfortunate princess . . . was going to Cassovia through the troublesome and difficult roads of those countries, she was forced in an ugly passage to light from her coach. Whilst the coachman was buſied in getting out the coach from that bad place, which was near a wood; this heroine, being as learned as she was valiant, looked back on Transylvania which she had left; and remembering the honours she had received there, and the condition she was in, could not forbear fetching a deep sigh, and leaving on the bark of a tree these three words, shewing thereby her just grief, and knowledge of the Latin tongue: SIC FATA VOLUNT: so fate will have it; as it is related by Thuanus, and many other historians (11).

The wretched parent, with a pious haste,
Came running, and his lifeless limbs embraced.
She sigh'd, she sobb'd, and, furious with despair,
She rent her garments, and she tore her hair,
Accusing all the gods, and every star.

DRYDEN.

Probably our princess thought to leave on the bark of this tree, a monument of the injustice she believed she received from heaven, and to acquaint all the passengers with the courage she had to complain of it.

[E] She kept the authority as much as she could, without imparting it to her son. This may be proved by the remonstrance that Henry II ordered to be made to this princess. John James de Cambrai, dean of Bourges, ambassador of this prince, had assured her as he went to Constantinople, that she should receive from France all the succours she could desire (15), (16) Hilar. de Bathori on an embassy (16) . . . to thank the most christian king for his favour and good affection. Bathori was well received by Henry II. and sent back with Peter Francis Martinez into Transylvania, where they assured queen Isabella, on the part of his most christian majesty, of the alliance he would make with her by the marriage of one of his daughters with her only son king John Sigismund, who was seventeen years of age; upon condition that he should be bred up, and educated like a prince, and she should not suffer near him so many women and men of mean birth, who are not fit to be entertained near young princes, and that she would admit him to the knowledge of her affairs. Petrouitz, and most of the lords of Isabella's council, approved the reasons of the most christian king in her majesty's presence, and said aloud to the ambassador of France, that they had already remonstrated this to the queen their mistresses; she began then to suspect that embassy, and thought those lords had given this advice to the king of France. She consulted her mother, who made her this answer. 'Daughter, keep always the power in your own hands, do not give so much authority to your son; which you will lose as soon as you marry him to the daughter of so potent a monarch as that of France. Isabella following the unhappy counsel of queen Bonna her mother, rejected the alliance of the French king, and ever after had an aversion for those who advised her to let the king her son see the armies, and to give him an insight into the affairs of the kingdom, and to send him to Waraden. She gave the command of all her armies to Michael Bellassa, an imperious man; which was not agreeable to her subjects, who desired that she would make choice of a commander more tractable and human (17).'

[F] The bigots vainly endeavour to excuse that conduct. As there is no passion but they justify at the expence of religion, they made use of this admirable cloak to conceal our Isabella's ambition. Here are the words of a Monk, who cites Florimond de Remond; 'the authors, who have written in favour of this virtuous princess, say, that she did not look with a kind eye on the great lords of Hungary and Transylvania; particularly, Petrouitz was odious to her, because of his professing Luther's heresy; and that under pretence of giving him light into the affairs of his state, they designed to remove him from the queen, his mother, to make him more easily quit the true and old religion, for a new and false one. Which he did after the decease of the queen, his mother (18).' Father Maimbourg says (19), that John Sigismund durst not declare for the Heretics in his mother's life-time; but that was not the only reason, but also because Solymán had written to the queen, that new sects should not be suffered to be introduced

(9) Thuanus, lib. ix, pag. 182, col. 2, ad ann. 1551.

(10) Hilarion de Coste, ubi supra, pag. 643.

(11) Natalis Comes, P. Martieu, Artus Thomas.

(12) We give this period such as the Monk Hilarion de Coste has it.

(13) Hilar. de Coste, ibid. pag. 645. In Thuanus, lib. ix, pag. 182, she speaks thus to her son: Quando tua fortuna non tollit ut regno paterno legibus iure gentium tibi delato uti frui posses, fatorem iniquitatem que nulla vi nostra aut humana industria corrigi potest, æquo animo feramus necesse est.

(14) Virgil. Ecl. v, vers. 23.

Cum complexa sui corpus miserabile nati,
Atque Deos atque astra vocas crudelia mater (14.)
VOL. III.

(17) Hilar. de Coste, ubi supra, pag. 658.

(18) Id. ibid. (19) Maimbourg, Hist. de l'Armenie, Tom. III, pag. 345. Dutch Edit.

(20) Id. ibid.
ad. ann. 1555.

introduced into the kingdom, for fear of disturbing the peace of it, by dividing mens minds upon so nice a point as that of religion (20). . . . But the queen dying soon after, and Selim, who troubled not himself about these disturbances of religion, succeeding her Father, Solyman, who died of an apoplexy at the siege of Ziget, the Lutherans, the Calvinists, and Arrians, returned into Transylvania, and, under the protection of Petrouitz, took more liberty than ever (21).

(21) Id. ibid. ad
ann. 1566.

(a) From hence comes the Latin surname Aquiburgensis, which he takes.

(b) See the epistle dedicatory of the Celsars of Cuspinian Basil Edit. 1501.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Kong, in B. Muth. pag. 418.

HUNGERUS (WOLFGANG), a Civilian of the XVIth century, was born at Waserburg (a) in Bavaria. He was professor of the Civil-Law in the university of Ingolstadt, chancellor of Frisingen, and assessor in the Imperial chamber at Spire (b). He wrote an apology for the emperors Frederic Barbarossa, and Lewis of Bavaria, but being a good Catholic he thought it was more prudent to suppress it [A], than to publish it in an age such as that in which he lived. He died of a distemper which continued several years (c), by which the public was deprived of several useful works which they might have expected from so learned a man. His death is placed in the year 1555 (d). The notes which he wrote on the Celsars of Cuspinian, were printed at Basil in 1561. They correct and clear up many things which had been either falsely or confusedly advanced in that History of the Emperors, and in some other books. The abridgment of Gesner's Bibliotheca, gives us a Wolfgang Hungarus, different from our Hungerus: this is a mistake, and shows that the smallest change of the letters in proper names, multiplies writers without reason. We find the titles of some other works of this Civilian in the same abridgment [B].

[A] He composed an apology for the emperors . . . but he thought it more prudent to suppress it. As he lays all the blame upon the Popes, there is no doubt but the Protestants would have taken advantage from his book. However, let us set down what he says himself: 'Nos certe pro utriusque optimis Imperatoribus Baioario & Enobarro elucubrata Apologia integra, luce ipsa clarius ostendimus, & fabulam illam de Ludovico Baioario vanam, falsam & tralaticiam esse: & Enobarum non tam de verbis quam rebus ipsis contendisse, atque in summa longe alias fuisse summis Pontificibus in hos Imperatores odiorum causas: & quæcumque tandem eæ fuerint, saltem negocia ipsa controversa à Pontificiis ea animorum impotentia, fastu & acerbitate tractata, ut horum Imperatorum ubique major modestia, mansuetudo, humanitas, adeoque innocentia, pietas & iusticia eluceat: utcumque insignis ille Theologus Albertus Pighius Campensis, Pontificiorum hector Li. 5. ca. 14. & 15. Ecclesiasticæ hierarchiæ, causam hujus Ludovici ita proposuerit atque explicarit, ut universam eam damnet. Sed voluisse ipsum eo in argumento, ac præsertim libr. 6. Romanorum Pontificum auriis aliquid dare, jam pridem etiam Catholicum veritatis amantissimum Theologum, virum Ecclesiasticum, doctrina & vitæ sanctimoniam, nuper dum viveret, cum primis spectatum, scio pronunciasse: & ubi necesse sit, ipsius censuram autographam eæ de re in medium proferre possum. Neque vero nostrum ex capite isti apologiæ nostræ hoc gloriose arrogamus, sed potius concordi ex calculo amicorum aliquot, tam ecclesiasticorum quam laicorum qui Catholicæ in religione iuxta nobilem versantur, & Ecclesiæ statum ac fœdis & perniciosi abusu & vitiorum monitis repurgatum, sartumque & tectum (ut ajunt) jam pridem pio zelo, sed hæcenus frustra optant, ac super ea apologia ipsis exhibita consulti, etiam scripto sua singuli candide & libere exposuerunt iudicia. Attamen & sponte nostra, & præcellentis cujusdam amici benevolenti monitu, hoc tempore domi retinere eandem quam in publicum edere maluimus (1). — In an apology which I wrote expressly in vindication of these two excellent emperors, Lewis of Bavaria, and Frederic Barbarossa, I have demonstrated in the clearest manner, that the story concerning the emperor Lewis, is false, groundless, and trifling: and that Barbarossa did not contend merely about words, but about things of consequence, and in fine, that the hatred of the Popes against these two Emperors arose from quite different causes: and whatever these were that the controversy was managed on the side of the Popes with such fury, bawdiness, and bitterness, that in the whole of it we may observe much more modesty, meekness, humanity, and therefore more innocence, piety and justice on the side of these emperors: however, that famous divine Albertus Pighius of Campen, the champion of the other side, in the fifth book of his Ecclesiastic Hierarchy, has set forth and commented on the case of the emperor Lewis, in such a manner as absolutely to condemn him. But I know that a very ingenious Catholic divine (who while he lived was famous both for learning and piety, and whose opinion in this matter, I can, if needful, produce in writing under his hand) declared that Pighius, in that whole argument, and especially in the sixth book, designed to flatter the Popes. Neither do I here, on my own judgment, pretend to have proved these things in the said apology, but on that of some of my friends, ecclesiastics as well as laici, all professors of the Catholic religion, as I likewise am, who have long, but as yet in vain, wished that the church being purged from many scandalous and dangerous abuses, and immoralities, may be restored to its primitive purity, they, I say, being consulted about the said apology which I showed them freely and ingeniously, gave me each his approbation of it in writing. Yet of my own free choice, and by the advice of a very worthy friend, I have determined rather to keep it by me than to publish it presently.'

[B] The title of some other works of Hungerus.] We see that he corrected and published a new edition of Bartholomæus Bologninus super Authent. habita. C. ne filius pro patre; and that he translated from the Italian and Spanish into German, a book intitled, Excitatorium Alicorum, de officio Alici ut gratiam Principis consequatur & conservet (2). This version, printed at Strasburg in 8vo in 1582, is no doubt the translation of a book of Guevara (3). We see in the Bibliotheca Classica of Draudius (4), Wolff. HUNGERI Linguae Germanicæ Vindicatio contra exoticas quasdam, quæ complurium vocum & dictionum mere Germanicarum, Etymologias ex sua petere conati sunt (5), at Strasburg 1586 in 8vo.

(2) Epitome Gesneri, pag. m. 824.

(3) See remark [G] of the article GUEVARA, citat. (19).

(4) Pag. 1377. Edit. Francof. 1625.

(5) This word is a solecism here.

(1) Hungerus, Annot. in Celsars Cuspiniani, pag. m. 186, col. 2.

(a) In the year 1576.

HUNNIUS (GILES) born in a village of the country of Wirtemberg, the twenty first of December 1550, was one of the most famous divines of the Augsburg confession. He studied Divinity at Tubingen, under James Andreas, under Brentius the son, and under two other professors; and he grew so learned in the five years he spent in that university, that he was thought capable of professing Divinity at Marburg, at twenty six years of age. He very well answered the opinion they had entertained of his learning: for upon some lectures and sermons that he made at Marburg (a), the landgrave being resolved to retain him, recommended him in a very honourable manner to the duke of Wirtemberg, to be promoted to his doctor's degree. Hunnius returned to Tubingen, where he was admitted doctor of Divinity a few months after his marriage, the sixteenth of July, 1576. During the first six years of his professorship, efforship, he published no books against the Calvinists; but otherwise he was continually at war with them [A], and did not spare them in his Academical Disputations. At last he wrote against them [B] in the year 1584, and got such a reputation, that, in the year 1592, he was invited into Saxony to reform the electorate. He was made first professor of Divinity at Wittenberg, first minister of the church of the castle, and a member of the ecclesiastical senate. He applied himself with an extraordinary diligence, to find out those who were not good Lutherans [C]; and as he was very successful in clearing the country of them, he was invited to do the same in Silesia [D]. He was made superintendent of the church of Wittenberg in the year 1595; and the same year, he had a sharp combat to maintain against Samuel Huberus about Election and Predestination [E]. He was one of the principal opponents against the Jesuits Gretzer and Tanner, in the conference of Ratisbon [F], in the year 1602 (b). He died the

(b) Most authors say, that conference was held in 1601.

(1) Apud Melchior. Adam. in Vit. Theolog. pag. 727.

[A] He was continually at war with the Calvinists. Read what is said of it in his funeral oration (1). 'Quas autem & quam serias, quamque frequentes velitationes in Hassia tam Cassellii, quam Marburgi, jam cum clanculariis, jam cum apertis hostibus, quos Sacramentarios Lutherani vocant, subire coactus fuerit; quæ & quam grava certamina, ob sanctissimum Religionis Christianæ articulum, de personâ Christi, ejusque ad dextram Dei sedentis adoranda majestate sustinuerit: id Deo, rerum omnium inspectori ac judici notum est: neque fugit id multos pios & cordatos homines.

— What warm and frequent wars he was forced to wage in Hesse, both at Cassel and Marburg, sometimes against secret, sometimes against open enemies, whom the Lutherans call Sacramentarians; what sore attacks he sustained on account of that sacred article of the Christian religion, concerning the person of Christ, and his adorable majesty, sitting on the right hand of God: These, I say, are known to God, the witness and judge of all things: neither are they unknown to many pious and worthy men.

[B] At last he wrote against them. The same orator will inform us, that Hunnius did not confine his exploits to the Sacramentarian war: He attacked also the followers of the Latheran Illyricus. 'In publicum potest scriptis suis progressus sub annum octogesimo quartum, Danæum imprimis, Ursinum, Pezelium, Grabium, & alios oppugnavit, editis libellis de personâ Christi, ejusque ad dextram DEI sedentis divina majestate: de altarum abrogatione. Postea & Flacianorum cohorti bellum sacrum indixit, edito libello de substantiâ peccati originis (2). — Afterwards, about the year fifteen hundred and eighty-four, he published some books concerning the person of Christ, and his divine majesty, sitting at the right hand of God: and concerning the Abrogation of altars. Wherein he attacked, above all, Danæus, and also Ursinus, Pezelius, and Grabius. Afterwards he denounced a holy war against the Flacians, in a book concerning the substance of original sin.'

(2) Apud eundem ibid.

[C] He applied himself to find out those who were not good Lutherans. This was a kind of Inquisition, which deprived a great many honest men of their employments and country; for the refusing to sign the Formula that Hunnius and his colleagues proposed, was enough to pass for a Calvinist, and they found no mercy. The Jesuit Contzen (3) makes himself merry in describing this Inquisition; and observes that Hunnius wrote an apology for it. 'Quin & Egidius Saxonica visitationem contra Calvinistas defendit; refutationem enim scriptis Calvinisticis libelli, quo visitatio illa exagitata fuit (4).' The violences that were then exercised upon those who were suspected of Calvinism, are horrible, as Holsperian has described them (5).

(3) Contzen, in Jubilo Jubilorum ad ann. 1592, 1593.

(4) Id. ibid. pag. 304.

(5) Historiæ Sacramentariæ, part. altera, pag. 674, & seq.

[D] He was invited to do the same in Silesia. This is witnessed by Melchior Adam. 'Fridericus IV Lignicensium & Brigenfium in Silesia Dux, Hunnii potissimum opera ac studio usus, Ecclesiarum Lignicensium per Silesiam reformationem suscepit atque perfecit: ejecto inde Leonhardo Krentzhemio, Lignicensium tunc Superintendente; cui Calvinismi crimen impingebatur (6). — Frederic IV, duke of Lignitz and Brieg, in Silesia, began and completed a reformation of the churches of Lignitz, in Silesia, by the means and study of Hunnius above all others; and ejected Leonard Krentzheim, then superintendent of Lignitz, who was accused of Calvinism.'

(6) Melchior Adam, ubi infra.

[E] He disputed against Samuel Huberus about Election and Predestination. This man had been minister of a village near Bern; and having examined the acts of the conference of Montheliard (7), he found four articles in Beza's doctrine, which he thought repugnant to the scripture: I. That Jesus Christ did not die for all men. II. That most men are excluded from the promises of grace. III. That the cause of the damnation of the reprobate, is the sole good pleasure of God, who created them on purpose to shew in them the power of his anger. IV. That no body can know whether baptism regenerates children. He had the courage to contradict these four articles: but he was expelled for his boldness; Musculus and Gryneus having successfully procured his expulsion. He retired into the country of Wirtemberg, where he obtained a church, after having embraced the Augsburg confession. Being made known to the elector of Saxony, by some books he published, he was invited to Wittenberg to profess Divinity. His earnestness in refuting the Swiss Protestants about the doctrine of Predestination, made him run into another extremity, so far as to teach publicly, that God has elected all men to eternal life. Hunnius and his colleagues admonished him of his error, and as he did not abandon it, he was expelled. He went from thence to Ratisbon, where he had conferences with some divines; he continued obstinate in his errors, and published some books at Spire to maintain them. This was the fourteenth schism of the Lutheran church (8). Such was the man that our Hunnius had to deal with. He was so happy as to triumph over his enemy, for he got him deprived of his place; but he exposed himself to some suspicions of herodoxy, and was obliged to write in his own justification. Read in the margin the words of Calixtus (9), and what follows. 'Postem se & fidem purioris doctrinæ hyperaspisen, adversus inanes Huberi phantasias eo tempore præliit Hunnius, dum partim monendo, partim scribendo, errantem Huberum in viam revocare auduit: quod ipsa res loquitur, & monumenta hac de controversia bene multa edita, cum primis verò ille tractatus Hunnii de providentiâ & prædestinatione filiorum Dei, satis luculenter testatur. Dissidio autem illo Huberi remotione sopito, prodit anno nonagesimo septimo epistola: qua variorum errorum, de cæcâ Domini, de baptismo, de libero arbitrio, de personâ Christi, de æternâ prædestinatione fuit insinuat. Hanc igitur Hunnius eodem anno refutavit: ut & eos qui in Anhaltinis ecclesiis altaria, imagines, organa musica, hostias, & alias ceremonias abrogant (10). — At that time Hunnius showed himself a bold and faithful defender of the purer doctrine, against the vain cavils of Huberus, while partly by admonition, partly by writing, he endeavoured to bring back Huberus into the path of truth. Of this there can be no doubt, and the many pieces which he published concerning that controversy show it plainly, especially his treatise concerning providence and the predestination of the sons of God. But these divisions being healed by the removal of Huberus, there appeared in 1597 an epistle in which he was accused of diverse errors concerning the Lord's Supper, Baptism, Free-will, the Person of Christ, and Eternal Predestination. This therefore Hunnius refused that same year, as also those in the churches of Anhalt, who abrogated altars, images, organs, hosties, and other ceremonies. I add these last words, to shew, that Hunnius was not against altars and images, and many Romish ceremonies, which were detested by other Lutherans.

(7) Between Theodo e Beza, and John Andreas.

(8) Taken from Micraelius, Synag. Hist. Eccles. pag. 872.

(9) Post annum superioris faculi octogesimo Egidius Hunnii fallor, primus vel certe inter primos præcipuum præfatum & ante Augustinum in primitiva Ecclesia receptam sententiam revocavit, & in Ecclesiâ Scholasticâ nostris reducti; non tamen sine difficultate, contradictione & insinuatione Pelagianismi. Calixtus, Consider. Doct. Reform.

(10) Hutterus, apud Melchior, Adam. in Vit. Theol. pag. 729.

[F] He was one of the principle opponents . . . in the conference of Ratisbon. I am sure that most of my readers will be glad to be freed from the trouble of consulting the year following, the fourth of April (c). He was fruitful both in books and children [G]. Some of his sons made themselves known by their works [H], but one of them turned Roman Catholic [I]. There is no book in which our Hunnius has discovered

(f) Taken from Melchior Adam, in Vitis Theolog. pag. 723, & seq. who has given us an Abstract of Hunnius's Funeral Oration, made by Leonard Hotterus.

(11) Matthieu, Hist. de la Paix, liv. iv, ad ann. 1601, pag. m, 334.

(12) Matthieu is mistaken. Cayet, Hist. de la Paix, pag. 290, is not more in the right when he says, that the divines of the duke of Bavaria were Hunger and Tanner, doctors of the Faculty of Paris, and Gretser a Jesuit. Tanner had been a Jesuit ever since he was eighteen years of age, and consequently he was not doctor of the Faculty of Paris.

(13) Matthieu, ubi supra, pag. 235.

(14) Ibid. pag. 236.

(15) Baillet, article xxi, of the Anti-

consulting another book, to know in general what this conference was: wherefore, I put down here, what Peter Matthieu says of it (11). 'Maximilian count Palatine of the Rhine, and duke of Bavaria, and Philip Lewis also, Palatine of the Rhine, and count of Veldents and Sponheim, cousins, and united by blood, but very much divided in the union of the mind, which is religion, resolved, in order to re-unite themselves in the same belief, and to bring their subjects to the same confession and profession of faith, to assemble at Ratisbon the greatest and most famous divines of Germany of both religions, that by an amicable conference they might clear the difficulties, that were the cause of that unhappy schism. The dispute was only upon this thesis, whether the holy Scripture be a sufficient rule for things necessary to salvation. The Catholic disputants were four professors in Divinity of the university of Paris (12), one of which was a Jesuit. For the Protestants there were fifteen divines, as well of the Palatinate of the Rhine, as of the duchies of Saxony, Brandenburg, and Wittenberg. . . . The presidents were the two princes, and the speakers Gretzerus a Jesuit, and Heilbrun a minister (13). . . . The conference took up fourteen sessions, in which they largely and warmly discoursed of the power of a judge, but not very clearly, since that verbal dispute was followed by many apologies in writing.' I infer here this marginal note of Peter Matthieu. 'Upon this dispute of Ratisbon, says he, besides the acts and registers of the sessions, day by day, we have a book with this title: Analysis Dialectica Colloquii Ratisbonensis, anno 1601. de norma & iudicio omnium controversiarum fidei Christianæ habiti.'

This historian's thought upon these verbal disputes, is pleasant enough. 'When I consider, says he, the little advantage that has been reaped from these disputes in several parts of Europe, and that the holy Scripture is the field in which every one thinks he has a right to fight; I cannot chuse but wish there was some severe prohibition against this vulgar treatment of it: and it would be well if it were taught like Epicurus's atoms, Pythagoras's numbers, Plato's ideas, Aristotle's entelechia, and the figures of the cabalists: that no body might come at the knowledge of it, but by those that are capable of understanding it. Whilst every one pretends to be skilled in it, it happens, that from the same flower, the faithful, like the bee, gather honey, and the disobedient, like the spider, gather poison, and many grow mad and beastly upon the beast of St John's Revelation.'

Add to this passage the words of Mr Baillet. 'This conference was like those battles, wherein the victory is not determined by the number of the slain. Each party pretended to have come off with advantage; and relations were made of it on both sides, and treatises in Latin and High-Dutch, above twenty in number. Amongst these writings I have found one in the vulgar tongue, concerning the triumph over the Jesuits, printed at Tubingen, a Lutheran town, in 1603, in Quarto, and another in Latin, composed by Hunnius, and published at Wittenberg in Saxony, the same year, in the same size, with this title, Epistola consolatoria cum notis. . . Hunnius endeavoured to revenge his party, by an Anti-Tanner. . . and an Anti-Gretser (15). He had read the historical relation which Father Tanner had made; but he was not satisfied with an account so little favourable to his party. To prevent the effects he feared from the reading of it, he made a counter-relation, that is, a history of the conference of Ratisbon, in his own way, which was published in 1602, at Wittenberg in Saxony. Father Tanner thought he ought not to let that piece pass unanswered; and not content with reprinting his relation in Latin and German, at Munich in Bavaria, he published, besides, some reflexions upon that of Hunnius, intitled, Examen Narrationis quam biflorice Relationis nomine insignitam de Colloquio Ratisbonensi edidit Ægidius Hunnius Prædicant, at Munich, 1602, in 4to. It was against this last work that Hunnius wrote his Anti-Tanner, which he printed the same year at Wittenberg.' Father Tanner published a reply, in which he made a defence of his first consultation. . . . and some remarks upon the death of it's author (16). It appeared at Munich in 1603, in 4to, intitled Apologeticus pro compendiaris relatione de Colloquio Ratisbonensi 1601 adversus Anti-Tannerum cum Appendice de morte Ægidii Hunnii. Mr Baillet observes, that Father Gretser could not forbear making reflexions upon Hunnius's Anti-Gretser. They were printed at Ingolstadt some time after, and inserted afterwards among some of his works, with this title, Admonitio de Anti-Gretsero (17). This Jesuit published something else against the same antagonist. Labyrinthus Critico-Hunnianus, hoc est, Disputatio de Hunnio Prædicante, genioque Lutheranæ semetipsam contraditionibus implicate & jugulante in aliquot articulis fidei 1602, & Responsum ad Theses Hunnianas, de Colloquio Pontificiis jucundo (18), una cum sex digressionibus contra ejusdem Hunnii calumnias, 1602 (19). Note, that the two Bibliographers of the Jesuits, ascribe to Father Tanner a book, intitled Labyrinthus Critico-Hunnianus, printed at Munich, in 1612. May not one think there is some mistake in the matter (21). Would two Jesuits have made use of the same title, writing against the same adversary?

[G] He was fruitful both in books and children.] There is an edition of his works in five volumes. 'Primus varios tractatus de articulis fidei, alter polemica, tertius & quartus commentaria in Matthæum, Johannem & omnes pene epistolas Canonicas, quintus disputationes & orationes varias continet. Edidit etiam vernacula lingua post illam Evangelicam & Epistolicam. Homilias in VI Prophetas, Threnos & Catechismum, confessionem de persona Christi & id genus alia (22). As to his conjugal fecundity, we are assured in his funeral oration, that he received from heaven the benediction promised to the faithful by the psalmist (23):

His wife like a fair fertile vine,
Her lovely fruit shall bring;
His children like young olive plants,
About his table spring. (24).

[H] Some of his sons made themselves known by their works.] NICOLAS HUNNIUS, professor of divinity at Wittenberg, and afterwards super-intendant of Lubec, published, Epitome credendorum: Examen errorum Photinianorum: Capistrum Lancelotto impatiunt: Necessaria defensio de Papa Antichristo: Refutatio Weigelianæ Theologiæ: Apostasia Ecclesiæ Romanæ: Pellis ovina papistica: Innocentia Lutheranorum: Fundamentalis dissensus Lutheranorum & Calvinianorum: Necessaria Admonitio contra theosophos (25), novellos Prophetas, nomine ministerii Lubecensis, Hamburgensis, & Lunaburgensis, and some other tracts. He died in the year 1643, being fifty eight years old. His brother GILES HUNNIUS died the preceding year, being super-intendant general of Altemburg (26).

[I] One of them turned Roman Catholic.] He was a civilian, and his name was HELFRICUS ULRICUS HUNNIUS. He published at Cologne, in 1633, a book, in which he pretended to shew, that even by the confession of some learned Protestants, we are obliged to restore to the church of Rome, what was taken from her in the time of Luther's reformation. Voetius has been reproached with stealing from this book, his authorities and arguments, against the canons of Utrecht. 'Iterato noto, pellucet illud centonem, magnam partem confarcinatum esse ex duodecim consiliis Lutheranorum. . . . simul editis per Helfricum Ulricum Hunnium, J. C. filium Ægidii Hunnii, celebris quondam Theologiæ Doctoris & Professoris in Academia Wittebergensi qui pellectus ossa Antichristiana, cum turpissimè defecisset ad Pontificios, atque secundum fatum Apostatarum, negligenter ab iis, qui exemplo diaboli Matth. iv. 9. plurimos sectatores sibi colligere solent, per myrticam illam vocem: Hæc tibi dabo: Coloniz Agrip-

(16) Ibid. Art. xxxvii, n. 1.

(17) Ibid. Art. xxi.

(18) It is an error of the press for the index. Father Southwell has kept the word index.

(19) Alegambe, Biblioth. Script. Societ. Jesu, pag. 200.

(20) An error of the press for Criticus.

(21) See Mr Baillet, article xxi, of the Anti-

(22) Micraelius, ubi supra, pag. 760.

(23) Inde divine benedictionis vestigia, tum in re familiaris, tum in eo pontificum deprehendit: quod juxta promissum Psalmi, videt filios ac filias, sicut plantationes olivarum, in circuitu mensæ sue. Apud Melchior. Adam. ubi supra, pag. 730.

(24) Psalm cxxviii.

(25) See Mollen, Itaque ad Hist. Chersonesi Cimbricæ, part. III, pag. 469.

(26) Taken from Micraelius, ubi supra, pag. 760.

discovered more prepossession and violence, than in that which he intitled, Calvinus Judaizans [K]. He accused Calvin of so many crimes in point of Heresy [L], that pinæ anno 1633 evulgavit duodecim illa Responsa, seu, ut ipse pariter vocat, Præjudicia, inscripta Abbatii Fuldensi, eum in finem, ut evinci posset, Lutheranos (per errorum summum iis conjungit Calvinistas, quum neque Matthæus Welsenbecius, neque Hieronymus Treutlerus, prout fingit Hunnius, unquam vixerint in communione eorum, qui Calvinistæ audiunt) esse αὐτοκατακρίτους, atque dictante propria conscientia, debere restituere bona Ecclesiastica, à se invasa, occupata, direpta, ac prophanata, ut loquitur famelicus Apollata in titulo. Verum esse quod dico, quivis cognoscat, si intuerit Consilium Theologicum comparare cum hisce Responsis; ubi aut Hunnius, aut ejus Typographus erravit in citandis authoribus, maxime juris Canonici textibus, pariter (respicio primam editionem) errant Architecti hujus, Κατ' ἀντίρροπον, Consilii Theologici; quod adeo impudens, ut pag. 25. speciatim in hunc Hunnii tractatum digitum intendant (27). — I once more observe, that this poor compilation is for the most part taken from the twelve councils of the Lutherans . . . published together by Helfricus Ulricus Hunnius, a Civilian, and son to Giles Hunnius, formerly a famous professor of Divinity, in the university of Wittenberg; who being allured by the bait of Antichrist, basely went over to the Papists, and being, according to the common fate of Apostates, neglected by them, who, after the example of the devil, Math. iv. 9. use to make most proselytes by these mystic words, all these things will I give unto thee, published at Cologne, in 1633, these three Answers, or, as he also calls them, Prejudices, dedicated to the abbot of Fuld, intending therein, to prove that the Lutherans (by an egregious blunder, he joins the Calvinists to them, tho' neither Matthew Welsenbecius, nor Jerom Treutlerus never lived in the communion of those who are called Calvinists, as Hunnius pretends) are self-condemned, and ought, according to their own principles, to restore the ecclesiastic possessions, which they have invaded, possessed, robbed, and prophaned, as this hungry apostate expresses himself in his title page. Any body may be convinced of the truth of what I alledge, by comparing the Theological Council with these answers: wherever either Hunnius, or his Printer, has committed an error in quoting of authors, especially in the texts of the Canon-law there (I mean in the first edition) the compilers of this pretended Theological Council likewise err; which is so impudent, that, pag. 25, he particularly points to this treatise of Hunnius. Mr Baillet, whom nothing can escape, was not ignorant of the change of this man's religion; but he did not know that he was the son of the author of the Anti-Gretser. Let us see what he says. 'When the Protestants, who alledge against us the Anti-Hunnian, and the Resolutio Anti-Hunniana of Valentini Bullen, a Lutheran, reckon still Hunnius amongst those of their communion; either they give us reason to believe, that they have confounded Nicolas Hunnius, a Lutheran, who died in 1643, with Helfricus Ulricus Hunnius, the German civilian, converted from Lutheranism to the church of Rome, who lived at the same time with the other Hunnius; or they are willing to conceal his conversion, either because they take it to be false, or of a short duration. However it be, Val. Bullen printed against him his Anti-Hunnian, at Leichen, in the year 1633, in 8vo, with this title, Resolutio Anti-Hunniana seu Responsio ad calumniosam Resolutionem tertiam præjudicialium Quæstionum H. Ulr. Hunnii. He shews in that work, that he is persuaded there was no dissimulation in his renouncing of Lutheranism, and he sufficiently discovers, that he had read his book of the twelve unanswerable arguments of the Catholic religion; which came out at Cologne, in 12mo, 1632 (28). Our Ulricus Hunnius published at Gießen, a tract de Transfatione, in 1615, four books variæ resolutionem Juris Civilis, at Francfort, in 1620, and a dispute de homicidio & ejus pœna, at Marburg, in the year 1625. [K] He intitled one of his books, Calvinus Judaizans (29). I am not satisfied with the knowledge I have hitherto acquired concerning the history of this book, and it's consequences; but I think I may say, and I hope Mr Baillet (30) will not take it ill, that it did not come out in 1575. Hunnius was then but twenty five years old; and if he had signalized himself at that age by such a work, the author of his Funeral Oration would not have failed to observe it, and would not have said, that it was about the year 1584, that Hunnius began to write against the Calvinists. The Jesuit Contzen (31) places the impression of Calvinus Judaizans in the year 1593, and I believe he is in the right. That which perplexes me, is to see in Pareus's life, that in the year 1595. Giles Hunnius disturbed the peace of the church, by accusing the Calvinists, and John Calvin by name, of judaizing. I set down the passage somewhat at large, because we find in it some strokes of our Hunnius's character in his adversary's judgment: 'Repertus est anno deinceps 1595 turbulentus quidam Gracchus, qui pacem Ecclesiæ livido calamo inquietare paravit, ægre ferens, Evangelicorum Principum animos à tribunali Ecebolorum concionibus abhorre, unionemque ac concordiam Christianam ferio meditari: quam proinde non alia fabrica melius se dirumpere posse speravit, quam si immuni isto convicio gravaret Ecclesiæ Reformatas, criminatus eas Judaizare, ac CALVINUM primipilarem Ecclesiæ Reformatarum Doctorem, Judaicis glossis pleræque oracula Veteris Testamenti detemere. Accusatio hæc tametsi non communem causam Ecclesiæ Orthodoxarum tangeret, propriæque eam spectaret, cujus Episcopus fuisse Calvinus, tamen quia per illius latus cæteræ omnes in capita CHRISTO unitæ petebantur, propudiosis istis calumniis CLYPEUM Veritatis Catholicæ de sacrosancta Trinitate operuit, Ecclesiæque Orthodoxas, & CALVINUM Electum DEI organon fortissime asservit: adeoque in fumos dissipavit Judaica & Arianica illa cymbala (32). — In the year 1595, there appeared a seditious fellow, who prepared to disturb the peace of the church by his pen, taking it ill, that the Protestant princes highly disapproved of the tribunitial assemblies of the Ecebolians, and thought seriously of an union and agreement among Christians: the best way to prevent which, he thought, was to load the Reformed churches with the grievous accusation of judaizing, and to charge Calvin, the leading doctor of the Reformed churches, with adulterating many of the sacred oracles of the Old Testament by Jewish glosses. This accusation, tho' it did not affect the common cause of the orthodox churches, and particularly respected that of which Calvin was bishop, yet, so far as all the rest, united in CHRIST their head, were struck at thro' his sides, he opposed to these base calumnies the Clypeus Veritatis, &c. shield of Catholic truth concerning the Holy Trinity, and strenuously defended the orthodox churches, and Calvin, the chosen instrument of GOD; and thus he baffled the charge of 'Judaism and Arianism.' In reading this conclusion, would not one think that the controversy was intirely laid asleep by Pareus's answer? And yet it is not true. Hunnius replied; and so did his adversary. Huterus relates that in 1598 Hunnius published two books against Pareus, who had written for Calvin (33). Pareus returned to the charge, and wrote a book that he printed at Neustadt in 1599, in 8vo, intitled Orthodoxus Calvinus oppositus Pseudo-Calvinus Judaizanti. It was reprinted forty two years after at Geneva (34). This I learn from Mr Baillet, who thereby brings me into a new perplexity; for I infer from the preface of Calvinus Orthodoxus (35) that Pareus composed and published it in 1594. He says (36) that Calvin had been dead thirty years, and that this Apology should have come out at Francfort at the spring fair, if the authority of the superiors had not retarded the impression (37). He adds, they have changed their mind (38), and approved my publishing this book. This plainly shews that Calvinus Orthodoxus was printed in 1594, and yet the author tells us in the last pages that Samuel Huberus had been banished from Wittenberg, which, according to Melchior Adam, did not happen till the year 1595 (39).

[L] He accused Calvin of so many crimes in point of Heresy. Here is the summary of his Calvinus Judaizans, as Pareus gives it (40). 'In ipso libri titulo Calvinum ex Ariano Judæum, vel certe ex Arianizante Judaizantem facit, & amarissimè passim infestatur, quod

(27) Martinus Schoockius, Exercitat. Variar. pag. 52. Editio 4to.

(28) Baillet, article Ixxix, of the Anti.

(29) Here is the whole title: Ægidii Hunnii Calvinus Judaizans, hoc est, Judaicæ glossæ & corruptelæ quibus Johannes Calvinus Illustriora Scripturæ Sacre loca, & testimonia de gloriosa Trinitate, Deitate Christi, & Spiritus Sancti, cum primis autem vaticinia Prophetarum de adventu Messiae, natiuitate ejus passionem, resurrectionem, ascensione ad celos & sessionem ad dexteram Dei detestandum in modum corrumpere non abhorruit.

(30) Art. Ixvi, n. 1, of the Anti.

(31) In Jubilo Jubilorum, pag. 307.

(32) Philippus Pareus, in Vita Davidis Parei, pag. m. 51.

(33) Duobus libris D. Pareo respondi, qui Calvinus patrocinium susceperat. Apud Melchior Adam, pag. 729.

(34) Baillet, art. Ixvi, n. 1, of the Anti.

(35) It is the title of the book in the Geneva edition, 1641.

(36) Pref. pag. 4.

(37) Ib. pag. 14.

(38) Ib. pag. 15.

(39) In Vita Hunnii, pag. 729.

(40) Pareus, in Prefat. Calvinii Orthodoxi, p. 9.

that he might have feared to be treated as Servetus was, if he had lain at Hunnius's mercy.

There are some things in the remark, in which I mention the Calvinus Judaizans, which ought to be rectified [M].

quod mera ambitione, studio, perverso, ludo aleatorio, verutia veteratoria, temeritate defultoria, Scripturas sacras à sensu proprio ad peregrinum insectat, quod eisdem tetrìs corruptelis, glossis impiis, proditoriis elusionibus & plenìs Judaicæ perfidiæ nequitiaque strophis, ad suam & aliorum perniciem horribiliter alio detorqueat: quòd testimonia de Deo uno & trino stropharum suarum spinis intricet, quòd Scripturæ locis æternam Deitatem Christi confirmantibus caliginem Judaicam offundere non reformidet quòd illustrissima vaticinia Prophetarum de Messia Judaicis perversiõibus involvat, in fraudem Christianæ religionis adulteret, & ad perfidiam Judaicæ infidelitatis, Arianæque impietatis retundendam strophis nefariis hebetet, inutiliaque reddat: quod evangelistarum, Apostolorumque sacrosanctas explicaciones nequitur eludat: ipsos Apostolos sub ferulam censoriam revocet; flagellet: quod Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum, veterum & recentium piis interpretaciones altissimè despiciat & irrideat, ipsosque sexagenarios de ponte præcipitet, &c. Passim etiam non acerbis modo sarcasms surdo illudit, sed & conviciatur virulentissimè, appellans acutum Diaboli instrumentum, Censorem, Aristarchum, Dictatorem Apostolo Paulo doctorem, зүтөдсаяхтов Scripturæ interpretem, Doctorem superciliosum, præstigiarium Judaicarum architectum, colubrum, angelum & Spiritum tenebrarum ex abyssi puteo emergentem, & quæ alia hujus generis infinita sunt maledicentiæ ejus emblemata, vel potius convicia, lectu sanè & auditu horrenda. — In the very title of the book, he makes Calvin from a Arian a Jew, or at least from an Arianizer a Judaizer, and every where bitterly inveighs against him, as one who, thro' meer ambition, a perverse bent, gamester-like, with wicked subtilty, and defultory rascals, wrest the sacred scriptures from their genuine sense to a foreign one; as one who, by base corruptions, impious glosses, treacherous elusions, and turnings full of Jewish perfidy and malice, terribly perverts their meaning to his own, and the destruction of others; as one, who perplexes the proofs of the one true God; as one, who is not afraid to throw Jewish darkness over the passages which confirm the Eternal Divinity of Christ; as one, who obscures by Jewish perversions the most illustrious prophecies concerning the Messiah, adulterates them to the prejudice of the Christian religion, and, to blunt the edge of Jewish infidelity, and Arian impiety, wickedly turns the force of them, and renders them useless; as one, who impiously eludes the sacred explanations of the Evangelists and Apostles, and censures the Apostles themselves; as one, who has a high contempt for, and laughs at the pious interpretations of the ecclesiastical writers, both ancient and modern, &c. He not only bitterly scolds at him every where, but even slanders him most virulently, calling him a sharp instrument of the devil, a censor, an Aristarchus, a dictator, more learned than the apostle Paul, a self-taught interpreter of scripture, a supercilious doctor, an architect of Jewish witchcrafts, a serpent, an angel and spirit of darkness emerging from the abyss of Hell, and a thousand other slanderous appellations, shocking both to hear and read. Note, that he declares, that if he does not give a demonstration of John Calvin's Judaism, he never desires to be believed upon any thing else (41). One cannot forbear asking this question: was he persuaded of what he said, or was he not? Christian charity obliges us to say he was; for otherwise we must take him for the most wicked man alive. Let us say then, that he spoke according to his persuasion, and conclude from thence, that in hot constitutions like his, zeal is a sort of drunkenness, which so disorders the mind, that a man sees every thing double, and the wrong way (42). The priests of Bacchus, who fell upon their own son, whom she took for a wild boar (43), whilst he looked on the ceremonies of the feast without any faith, or rather with contempt, is an image of the giddiness which seizes the zealots. Pareus ascribes all this outrage of Hunnius to the devil; it is the devil, says he (44), who employed Hunnius as a proper artist to write such calumnies. En vero tandem, Christi-ane Lector, extremæ improbitatis Satanæ exemplum. Quasi enim hæcenus Nestorianismis, Arianismis, Turcismis, Paganismis, Atheismis, & id genus impurissimis sputis suis Ecclesias nostras parum conspurcarit: nuper easdem etiam JUDAISMI stercorebus petulantissimè conspergere est aggressus, confilato per idoneum artificem libello mendaci juxta & maledico, qui titulo CALVINI JUDAIZANTIS circumfetur. — Behold, Christian reader, an instance of the extreme malice of the devil. As though it were to be bad not sufficiently defiled our churches with Nestorianism, Arianism, Turcism, Paganism, Atheism, and the like; he has lately endeavoured to throw upon it Jewish filth, by the means of a lying and slanderous book, drawn up by an artist fit for the purpose, and banded about under the title of Calvin turn'd Jew. The design was, according to Pareus, to extirpate the Calvinists, that the Ubiquitarian doctors might be in great repute. Hinc Pseudo-Calvinus Judaizans cujus hoc est argumentum & scopus. Calvinus est Judaizans Arianizans: Ergo & Calvinistarum Ecclesiæ (quas vocant) sunt tales: ergo extirpandæ: ergo cessabunt Ubiquitatis facere negotium: ergo stabit Ubiquitas: ergo in pretio erunt Ubiquitarii Doctores. Hæc est Satanæ Dialectica (45). — Hence the False-Calvin turn'd Jew, of which this is the argument and scope. Calvin both Judaizes, and arianizes; therefore the churches of the Calvinists (as they are called) are such; therefore to be extirpated; therefore they will cease to disturb Ubiquity; therefore Ubiquity will maintain its ground; therefore the Ubiquitarian doctors will be esteem'd. This is the devil's Logic.

[M] There are some things in the remark [K], which ought to be rectified. The two passages in that remark, in which I supposed, that Lipenius is not mistaken in placing under the year 1594, the edition of Hunnius's Anti-Pareus, must be thrown out. At present I am of opinion, that Mr Baillet was not wrong in saying, that we ought to correct that date of Lipenius; for I have a copy of the Anti-Pareus, the title of which bears, that it was printed at Frankfurt, ex officina Paltheiana, in the year 1598. The title of the book, such as I have given it from Mr Baillet, is imperfect, and in such a manner as to render it obscure; but here it is entire: Anti-Pareus: hoc est invita refutatio venenati scripti a D. Davide Pareo, Heidelbergensi Theologo, editi in defensionem strophorum & corruptelarum quibus Johannes Calvinus illustrissima Scripturæ testimonia de mysterio Trinitatis, necnon oracula Prophetarum de Christo, detestandum in modum corrupt. Scriptus per Agidium Hunnium. Hunnius declares, that being sufficiently taken up with other matters, he should not have so much as cast an eye on Pareus's book, if the advice of his friends, and the vanity with which his silence inspired his enemies, had not determined him to reply (46). It is thus he excuses his not replying sooner. Now it being certain, that the book, which he refutes, is that which David Pareus intituled Calvinus Orthodoxus, it follows that this work of Pareus was not first published in 1599, and is not a Reply, as Mr Baillet thought it was. Let us now affirm, that it appeared either in 1594, or 1595.

Note, that Hunnius complains, that Pareus accuses him of having maintained, that John Calvin was an Arian. He declares that he had acknowledged the very reverse, and that he had only shewn, that the sense, which Calvin gives to several passages of the Bible, is favourable to the Arians. I am going to cite a distinction which he makes use of. I am of opinion, says he, that Calvin had no intention to favour Arianism or Calvinism, but the spirit (47), which suggested to him these false glosses, aimed at that end. Bæo autem, Calvinus ipse strophis suis non hoc sibi habuerit propositum, ut Judæorum Arianorumque causam proderet, sed tantum ut interpretationis novitate & insolentia sibi præ cæteris doctoribus, veteribus & recentioribus, samam nominis conciliaret: Tamen spiritus, qui has ei glossas & elusiones suggerebat, hunc sibi scopum præfixum habuit absque controversia, ut nimirum ambiguus & lubricis hisce strophis unum post alterum de Trinitate testimonium, aut de Messia ora-

(41) Hac lege disertè se adstrinxit (pag. 6.) ut nisi Calvinum Judaizantem ad oculum demonstret, nolit sibi ulla unquam in re posthac fidem adhiberi. Id. ib. pag. 16.

(42) Eumenidum veluti demens vidit agmina Pentheus Et solem geminum & duplices se ostendere Thebæ. Virgil. Æneid. lib. iv, vers. 469.

(43) Ille aper in nostris erat qui maximus agri, Ille mihi ferendus aper. Ovidius, Metam. lib. iii, sub. fin.

(44) Pareus, in Pseus. pag. 3.

(46) Hunnius, in Prolegomenis ad Anti-Pareum.

(47) That is, the Devil.

(48) Huanus, in Prolegomenis ad Anti-Pareum, pag. 30. I mark the page, tho' the Prolegomena are not paged.

culum redderet incertum, atque sic hominum animos paulatim a petra certitudinis dejectos in dubitationem fluctus conjiceret (48). — Be it granted, that Calvin did not intend by his subtilties to favour the Jews or Arians, but only, by the novelty of his manner of interpreting, to raise his own character above that of other doctors, both ancient and modern: Yet the spirit, which suggested to him these glosses and elusions, had doubtless this design, namely, by these ambiguous and subtle distinctions, to weaken, one after another, the evidences for the Trinity, and render the prophecies concerning the Messiah uncertain, and thus to plunge the minds of men, cast down gradually from the rock of certainty, into a sea of doubts. Here is another passage, in which he says, that the devil discovers all his malice in Pareus's book. He expresses it very grossly. Cum igitur hoc Parei scriptum ita compositum sit, ut in eo Satanas non dicam Diabolicæ suæ malitiæ vestigia quædam ostendat, sed impurum suum podicem (salva venia) denudatum lectoribus conspiciendum exhibeat, dubitavi, fateor, effecisse quicquam operæ impendendum tam flagitiosi scripti refutationi: donec vel tandem & inimicorum infulsis gloriationibus, & inprimis amicorum crebris admonitionibus excitatus, hunc quoque laborem, quamlibet molestum, ad vindicandam gloriam dei, & sacrosanctam veritatem ipsius, suscipiendum mihi & exantlandum esse duxi (49). — As therefore this work of Pareus is so drawn up, that Satan does not shew some footsteps only of his devilish malice, but (if I may say so) exposes his filthy buttocks to the reader's view, I was in some doubt, I own, whether so vile a piece deserved an answer: till at last, roused by the empty boastings of my adversaries, and especially by the repeated advice of my friends, I determined to undertake and go through with this toil, to vindicate the glory of God, and his sacred truth.

(40) Id. Ibid. pag. 3.

HUTTEN (ULRIC DE) a gentleman of Franconia, was born at Steckelberg (a) in the year 1488. He studied first at Fulde, then at Cologne, after that at Francfort upon the Oder, where he was admitted Master of Arts in 1506, in the first promotion that was made in that university newly erected. As he had a genius for Poetry, he began that way to set up for an author: it was in the year 1513 [A], when he published a work intitled, Vir bonus. The year following, prince Albert of Brandenburg making his first entry into Mentz, of which he was archbishop, occasioned his writing a second piece. Hutten made a large panegyric upon him in verse, in which he included ingeniously that of all Germany. He had a cousin named JOHN DE HUTTEN, who was marshal of the court to duke Ulric of Wirtemberg, and who was killed by this duke in the forest of Beblingen in the year 1515. Our poet waiting for an opportunity to express his resentment against this prince with sword in hand, published several pieces against him (b). He was then in Italy [B], where he had given many proofs of his courage [C], in the war that the emperor Maximilian maintained nine years in that country. At his return into Germany (c) he was so recommended to this emperor by Conrad Peutinger, that this prince gave him the poetical crown [D]. From that time Hutten caused himself to be painted, armed, with a crown of laurel on his head, and was infinitely pleased with that equipage. He went soon after to the court of the elector of Mentz, where he composed a dialogue, intituled Aula, in 1518. A little after he went to the diet of Augsburg with the elector his master, who received there a cardinal's cap. In that diet complaints were made against the duke of Wirtemberg; nor was the murder of the marshal of his court forgotten. These complaints produced no great effect; but at last this prince having seized the imperial town of Reutlingen in January 1519, a league was formed against him in Suabia, which did not lay down their arms, till he was driven out of all his dominions, which he did not enter again, till fifteen years after. Our Hutten bore arms in that war. Luther's cause appearing to him to be good, he warmly embraced it, and published Leo X's bull against Luther in

(a) It was the seat of the family, which subsists still, and makes a figure.

(b) See the list of them in the remark [B].

(c) In 1517.

[A] It was in the year 1513. He was therefore twenty five years old when he began to set up for an author: Moreri is mistaken then, and did not know how to copy Melchior Adam, when he says that Hutten at eighteen years of age published several works in verse.

[B] He was then in Italy. I have followed the chronology of my author Melchior Adam; but I ought to caution my readers, that I suspect it a little. I do not believe that all the pieces, that concern the death of John Hutten, were published before Ulric Hutten's return into Germany. I find in Gesner's Bibliotheca, that the collection of all these writings was printed in the castle of Steckelberg, in 1519 in 4to. It contained Ulrichi Hutteni super interfectione propinqui sui Joannis Hutteni equitis à Wirtembergensi Duce Ulricho deploratio, heroicis versibus. Ad Ludovicum Huttenum super interfectione filii consolatoria Oratio. In eundem dialogus, cui titulus Phalarismus. Apologia pro Phalarismo, & aliquot ad amicos epistolæ. Ad Franciscum Galliarum regem epistola, ne causam Wirtembergensem tueatur exhortatoria. Inferuntur etiam epistolæ aliquot ad amicos. I see moreover that Melchior Adam cites a speech of Ulric Hutten against the duke of Wirtemberg, which was not composed till 1519, that is, two years after the author's return from Italy into Germany: have I not reason then to question the exactness of Melchior Adam? What he quotes out of this speech, is too curious to be omitted. We learn from it, that John Hutten was digged up near the forest where he was killed, whilst the confederates were at war with duke Ulrich of Wirtemberg. It was four years after the murder was committed, and yet the corps was not corrupted; it bled when it was touched, and the face was still to be known. Ulric Hutten draws from hence a proof of his cousin's innocence (1).

[C] . . . he had given many proofs of his courage. Those which he gave in the war, were doubtless inferior to that which he gave on a particular occasion. He went from Rome to Viterbo, at a time that an ambassador of France had made a stop in this last town. There happened a quarrel, in which Hutten, forsaken by his comrades, had five Frenchmen upon him at once, and put them all to flight, in spite of the wounds he had received. He made an epigram thereupon, in which he says, quingue Gallos à se prostigatos, which may be seen in Melchior Adam.

[D] The emperor Maximilian . . . gave him the poetical crown. He owned himself indebted for that honour to Peutinger's good offices, and expressed his acknowledgments of it in one of his books (2). He says also that that crown was made in Peutinger's house by his daughter Constantia, whose virtue and beauty he very much extols. Illam ajo coronam, in Vita Juriscon. illam lauream quam tuante domi tuæ, accurate con-textente & adornante filia tua Constantia, omnium quæ illic sunt puellarum & forma & moribus præstantissima, apparaveras. For a poet who loved the fair German, as sex, like Hutten, this was a subject for new words, and a great many thoughts; and it had been a great chance if the fair Constantia Peutinger had not been praised in many epigrams.

(1) Rem admittendum, & cuius prope nullius fides capax sit, videlicet. Quæ tum iam annuum defunctum corpus non consumtum, non putrescentum, totum adhuc faciem cognoscibilem: quin etiam sanguine commaduit attatum. En igitur innocentie testimonium! Deposuitum Ellipse, inde ad patrum senilium delectum. Hutten, in Orat. contra Melchior. Adam. in Vita Juriscon. pag. 27.

(2) Præfatione ad Principes German. ut Bellum Turcicum inferret, apud Melchior. Adam. in Vita Juriscon. pag. 15.

[E] He

(d) They are in the second Tome of the Works of Luther, pag. 53, & seq.

(e) That Letter is in the second Tome of the Works of Luther, Edit. Witt. pag. 302.

(3) Act. & Script. Lutheri, ad ann. 1519.

(4) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Jurisconsult. pag. 39.

(5) Dated from Basil the twenty first of January, 1523, lib. iv. Epist. pag. 968, apud Melchior. Adam. pag. 21.

(6) That Letter is the eighth of the ninth book, pag. 949.

(7) It is very likely he means the pox by scabies.

in 1520, with interlineary and marginal glosses (d), in which he turned the Pope into ridicule. The liberty wherewith he wrote against the disorders of the court of Rome [E], extremely provoked Leo, and induced him to command the elector of Mentz to send him to Rome bound hand and foot. Hutten retired from that court [F], and went into the Low-Countries to that of Charles V; but he staid not long there, having notice that his life was in danger. There is some probability, that he retired then into the fortrefs of Ebernburg; for there he wrote in 1520 his complaint to the emperor, to the electors of Mentz and Saxony, and all the states of Germany, against the attempts that were made upon him by the Pope's emissaries. It was from the same place he wrote to Luther, in May 1521 (e), and sent out several pieces in favour of the reformation. It is not well known, when he left this castle; but it is certain, that in the month of January 1523, he was gone from Basil [G], where he thought to find a safe retreat; but he found himself exposed to great dangers there. Erasmus having excused himself from receiving his visit, for fear of heightening the suspicions that were raised against him, and for fear of something else, which he afterwards confessed [H], found himself attacked soon after by a passionate piece of Ulric Hutten. He answered it [I]. Hutten had doubtless replied, had he lived long enough; but he died in an island in the lake of Zurich the twenty ninth of August 1523 [K]. He was a little man of [E] He wrote against the disorders of the court of Rome. Amongst other works, he published an historical tract in High-Dutch upon the continual disobedience of the Popes to the emperors. At the end of it we find that Maximilian I, who had been deceived by Leo X, used these words. 'This Pope has already basely cheated me, and I can truly say, that no Pope since I have been in the world has been a man of his word; but with the grace of God I hope that this will be the last.' Cochleus (3) says, that before Luther had been spoken of, Ulric Hutten had published many things against the vexations, which Germany suffered from the Popes, and that in 1519, he made a little treatise called Trias Romana, of a very ingenious invention, which rendered the court of Rome extremely odious.

[F] Hutten retired from the court of the elector of Mentz. I do not find in his life that the elector of Mentz ever caused him to be arrested, as Moreri affirms; but only that he banished him from his court, exclusus itaque aula & urbe Moguntina (4), and that he forbade all people to sell and read his books under pain of excommunication.

[G] In the month of January 1523, he was gone from Basil. This appears from these words of a letter of Oecolampadius (5): 'Sunt hic ex sacerdotibus & theologis qui de me pessime loqui cupiant, nec desunt ubi clam conveniunt. Tantum machinati ut Hutteno non fuerit diutius tutum hic agere, unde & nudius tertius hinc discessit, quorsum autem nescio. — There are here some of the ministers and divines who may desire to have me ill spoken of, and who sail not to do so when they meet privately. Such were their contrivances, that it was not safe for Hutten to stay here any longer, on which account he went from hence three days ago, but whether I know not.'

[H] Erasmus refused . . . his visit for fear . . . of something else, which he afterwards confessed. Writing to Melancthon in September 1524 (6), he tells him that he would willingly have received his visit without caring much what people should say of it; and that the reason of his refusing Hutten's visit, was not so much for fear of rendering himself odious, as on another account, which was that he would have found himself obliged to lodge in his house that boaster a bounding with poverty and itch, who sought only a nest to abide in, and who borrowed of every body he met with. So that the interest of his purse had more force upon Erasmus on that occasion than that of fame.

Quod Hutteni colloquium deprecabar non invidiæ metus tantum in causa fuit: erat aliud quiddam quod tamen in Spongia non attigi. Ille egens & omnibus rebus destitutus querebat nidum aliquem ubi moraretur. Erat mihi gloriosus ille miles cum sua scabie (7) in ædes recipiendus, simulque recipiendus ille chorus titulo Evangelicorum, sed titulo duntaxat. Sletstadii multavit omnes amicos suos aliqua pecunia. A Zuinglio improbe petiit, quod ipse Zuinglius mihi suis literis perscripsit. Jam amarulentiam & glorias hominis nemo quamvis patiens ferre poterat. — That I shunned an interview with Hutten, my regard to my reputation was not the only cause, there was indeed another which I have not touched upon in my Sponge; he being poor and destitute of all things, sought only a nest where he might remain, this boasting soldier with his scabs, was to be received into my house, and received under the name of one of the Evangelists, though but in name only. He borrowed of all his friends at Sletstadt what he could, he saucily importuned Zuinglius, as Zuinglius himself wrote me word. Since then the bitterness and vain glory of this man could not be born well by a person of the greatest patience. You see then that our Hutten did not put Erasmus in any fear on account of his being a good Lutheran, but considering him as a slippery officer, who would take up his winter quarters with him. There is no doubt but his visits that were attended with borrowing of money, proved ungrateful to many, who were professed Protestants.

[I] Erasmus answered it. This answer is inscribed to Zuinglius, and intitled Spongia Erasmi adversus aspergines Hutteni. Erasmus there sincerely confesses, that he requested Hutten not to come to see him, unless some important reason obliged him to it; but he shews that his request was so softened, and that afterwards he made so many proposals to that friend, that any reasonable man would have been satisfied with them. The worst is, he writ to Mark Laurinus, dean of Bruges, that if Hutten had come to see him, he would not have refused to discourse with him (8). He adds, that the reason which hindered them from seeing one another, was, that Hutten could not be without a stove, and that Erasmus could not endure one. By this instance we see, how liable the most honest men are not to say always in their letters things as they know them. Hutten was desperately enraged against Erasmus, and heaped up many disabbling reproaches. Erasmus justified himself the best he could. After Hutten's death, a Physician named Otho Brunfels, replied to Erasmus for him.

[K] He died in an island in the lake of Zurich. He was also buried there, and after some years a gentleman of Franconia got this distich engraved on his sepulchre.

Hic eques auratus jacet, oratorque disertus
Huttenus, vates carmine & ense potens (9).

A knight, an orator renown'd,
Here earth doth room afford,
Hutten, for various conquests crown'd
Gain'd by his wit and sword.

The worst of all is, that he died of the pox. If Varillas was the first that had said it (10), I should not be concerned for it: but I find this particular in Gerner's Bibliothecæ: and who after this can chide but deplore the extravagance of man? Hutten running from place to place for religion, Hutten persecuted for his great zeal, carries the pox with him wherever he goes, and dies of it at last. What a disagreeing medley is this! He published a book in Latin in 1519, concerning the wood Guaiacum, and the venereal disease. At that time, he could treat of it like a master, for in all appearance, he had not got that distemper since his abjuration of Popery. For the rest, Mr Varillas reckons

(8) Fuit hic Huttenus paucorum dierum hospes interim nec ille me adit, nec ego illum; & tamen si me convenisset non repulsem hominem à colloquio. Erasmi. Epist. vii. lib. xiii.

(9) Gerner. in Biblioth. folio 342.

(10) Hist. de l'Hérésie, liv. ii.

(f) Taken from his Life in Melch.
Adam, in Vitis Jurisconsultor.
Germaniæ, pag.
13, & seq.

(g) See the fourth volume of Observationum Selectarum ad Rem Litterariam Spectantium, printed at Hall, 1701, pag. 169, 170.

(b) Ulr. Hutten.
in Phalarismo,
fol. A iii.

ting humour. ' Ut virum magni facere & admirari propter doctrinæ eruditionem & præstantiam ingenii, sic ab illius natura vehementem & excello animo, & voluntate ad novas res propensa . . . nonnihil timere Philippum Melancthonem licuit animadvertere.' Camerarius (15) who tells us this, adds, that Ulric Hutten was very passionate, and that by his look and discourse one might discover the inclination he had to cruelty. He applies to him what was said of Demosthenes; for he says that Hutten would have overturned all Europe, if his strength could have seconded his designs and enterprizes. Judge of his humour by this specimen. Having heard that the Carthusians had made use of his printed picture in the house of office, he fined them two thousand pistoles (16). This was to make them pay dear for the little consideration they had for the laurel that crowned that image. Mr Varillas (17) says, that Luther caused it to be placed in the front of his books. I have elsewhere (18) mentioned how Ulric Hutten threatened the nuncio, and so I can easily believe that he wrote to the elector of Mentz, If you burn my books, I will burn your towns (10).

[M] He is thought to be the author of many libels. (2) (2) Ac
Of these amongst others; Dialogus Philalestis civis U- Ju topienfis. Oratio ad Cbristum pro Julio secundo Ligur- Ju pentifice (20). Bullidica (21). Prædones: Momus: Ca- Ge ralus: Pictatus & superstitionis pugna: Conciliabulum Theologistarum adversus bonarum literarum studio-rum perniciem. Vadij & Pasquilli de depreato Ecclē- (22) Bib sie statu. Huttenus captivus, Huttenus illustris, au- tak thore S. Aylardi Corallo Germano (22). A burlesque epigramme, intitled Nemo, was fathered upon Erasmus, (23) (23) h but it was Hutten that made it (23): he declared he (23) (23) mar was the author of it, and was angry that he should be (23) (23) Ac robbed of it. Some affirm that he is the author of the Epistola (24) (24) pag.
Epistola Obscurorum Virorum (24). That fiction (24) (24) (F) would be more tolerable than another that is imputed (24) (24) (F) to him: it is STRENGTHED that he forged the letter which (24) (24) ricle he published in the name of the universities of Paris, Oxford, and Prague (25). If he had lived thirty five years longer (26), with what a deluge of books and libels, would not he have overflowed Europe? (26) (26) (26) Lib
(25) (25) Eccle
(26) (26) pag.

(26) Melchior Adam and More-ri, place his birth in the year 1488, and his death in the year 1523, and yet they say, that he lived thirty six years.

ne Dominice contra Jesuitas. See also Refutatio
duorum Librorum Rob. Bellarmini de Missa: Triump-phus de regno Pontificis: Ilias malorum regni Pontificis-Romani, seu Historica Differatio de injussumo Pontificis Romani in Ecclesia Dei dominatu: Abbe in Jacobum Gregorium de Imperatorum, Regum, ac Principum Christianorum in sedem Apostolicam Romanam in-vencientia per Nicolaum Clemens (4). I omit the titles of many other books both in High-Dutch and Latin. His Calvinista Adulco-Politicus, which was printed at Wittemberg in the year 1615, shall be cited in the following remark.

[B] What he said of the martyrs of the Geneva confession] The elector of Brandenburg had alledged amongst other things, in his edict of toleration, the vexations and punishments which the Calvinists had undergone

1) Taken from izelius, in mplo Honoris
rato, pag. 37

(b) Taken from Spizelius, in Templo Honoris
referato, pag. 32,
& seq.

be confessed that he ran into extreams. That humour of his exposed him to several vexatious disputes, in which he was forced to bear the strokes of slander [C]. He died in the year 1616. He must not be confounded with him that published a Polyglot Bible [D].

undergone from the common enemy; but our Hutterus said against it, that the Arians, the Anabaptists, and the Anti-Trinitarians, might make use of the same argument to obtain a toleration. He maintained, that the Calvinists had not suffered death for believing that the blood of JESUS CHRIST would save them, but for refusing to obey the Pope, whom they called Antichrist. Scripterat quondam in Edicto Serenissimus Elektor Brandenburgicus, non excludendos esse à Christiana communione Reformatos, qui idem sentiunt in fundamento fidei, in Evangelio cum Lutheranis laborant, certant, luctantur, eoque nomine à communi hoste innumeros cruciatus sustinuerunt, sustinentque, quique etiam sanguinem pro confessione illa largissime profuderunt. Cornua illi obvertere aulus Hutterus in Aulico-Politico cap. 2. pag. 176. &c. ubi regerit, à Papiſtis etiam Anabaptistas, Arianos, Antitrinitarios, alioſque supplicio affectos esse: causam supplicii nostrorum non fuisse, quòd crediderint, se per Christum servatum iri, sed quòd Romanum Pontificem non agnoverint Pastorem universalem sed Antichristum, ejusque jugum detrectaverint ferre (5). The Swisſs divine, who supplies me with this passage, judiciously observes, that this method of disparaging the martyrdom of the Calvinists might equally be employed against the Lutheran martyrs. This he says, after having observed that a divine of Strasburg makes use of the same cavil as Hutterus. 'Gemella his effutivit Dannenhawerus, Argentinenſis Theologus, Colleg. Decalog. p. 394. ubi Reformatorum Martyrium larvatum vocare, & cum Judæorum, Ethnicorum, Arianorum sub Athalaricho Gothorum Principe religionis causa occisorum Martyrio comparare non erubuit. Certè μὴ θεοεία talis etiam Lutheranæ Ecclesiæ Martyrii veri palmas laudemque præcideret (6). — To this purpose, Dannenhawerus, a divine of Strasburg, published two pieces, wherein he does not blush, to call the martyrdom of the Reformed Masked, and to compare it with the martyrdom of the Jews, Heathens, Arians, put to death under Athalaricus, prince of the Goths, on account of religion; certainly such a fraudulent construction would also cut off from the Lutheran church, the honour and praise of true martyrdom. Can we sufficiently admire the effects of prepossession? Is it not a deplorable thing, that a Popish missionary can object to the Protestants, that the martyrdom of their brethren is looked upon as a false martyrdom by some Lutheran doctors. See one of the remarks (7) of the article WESTPHALUS (JOACHIM). Note, that Pappus calls those slanderers, who accuse the Lutherans of looking upon the Calvinist martyrs as the martyrs of the devil (8).

[C] His humour exposed him to several disputes, where he was forced to bear the strokes of slander. He is compared in his elogy, to the prophets and apostles, who were persecuted for the truth; and it is affirmed that he answered calumny only with silence and contempt. I will not dispute about these matters, being not sufficiently acquainted with them; but I will say in general, that there are some doctors so passionate, so morose, and violent, that they get enemies, not because they maintain orthodoxy, but by reason of their rude way of maintaining it. Their adversaries take their revenge by personal reproaches, and publish the most vexatious truths of them, and convict them of many scandalous things; and they know not how to justify themselves. What must they do then? Why, they value themselves extremely for their patience; they compare themselves to the prophets and apostles, and to JESUS CHRIST himself. 'Being persecuted, say they, like them for the truth, we open not our mouth, when the enemies of the truth abuse us.' Moliere should have inserted this in some scene of his Tartuffe, for it must be well observed, that these gentlemen are never silent, when they have scandals to publish against their neighbour, or when they can alledge any thing plausible for their justification. Be it how it will, our Hutterus's panegyrist crowns him with this fine elogy. 'Sicuti verò summis quibusque Viris non omnia omnino ex animi fluxere sententia, sed cruces, calumniae & persecutiones variæ illos exercuerunt, ita Hutterus certissimo hoc fideliū Dei Servorum characterē nequitiam caruit, quippe quo ab omnipotente Deo, Prophetæ, Apostoli, & sinceri Ecclesiæ Doctores olim sunt signati . . . Idem proſus nostro fatum; quod æquo & patienti pertulit animo, magisque de abstergendis calumniis, suis antecessoribus impatiens, quam famæ & existimationis propriæ vindicatione fuit sollicitus, haud ignorans, omnes injurias oblivione melius, quam commemoratione sanari, & inimicorum calumnias contemptu potius quam lingua esse vindicandas (9). — But as all things have not altogether succeeded according to the wish of every great man, but crosses, calumnies, and various persecutions have exercised them; so Hutterus did in no wise want this most certain mark of the faithful servants of GOD, as being that with which the prophets, apostles, and true doctors of the church were of old, sealed by Almighty GOD . . . The same was wholly the fate of ours; which he bore with an equal and patient mind, and was more sollicitous to wipe out the reproaches levelled at his predecessors; than to vindicate his own fame and reputation, knowing that all injuries are better cured by oblivion than remembrance, and that the calumnies of foes are to be repented with contempt, rather than the tongue.'

[D] He must not be confounded with him that published a Polyglot Bible. His name was ELIAS HUTTERUS. He first published a Bible in four languages, Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and High Dutch, at Hamburg, in the year 1597. Afterwards he added to it the Italian, French, Sciavonian, and Saxon. His New-Testament was printed in the year 1600, in twelve languages, which are the Syriac, Hebrew, Greek, Latin, German, Bohemian, Italian, Spanish, French, English, Danish, and Polish. He reduced them to four in the edition of the year 1603, namely, Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and German. This Polyglot Bible is very scarce. There is a collection of letters, containing the judgment of learned men about this work (10).

[A] His family is very antient, and has produced many very considerable persons. He descended from CORNELIUS DE HUYBERT, and Joan de Haemſtede. The family of Haemſtede, is descended from Witte de Haemſtede, natural son to Floris earl of Holland and Zealand, lord of Friesland, &c. and from a daughter of the lord Heudeſ, a very considerable house at that time. That lady had too much complaisance for count Floris, but it was under the promise of marriage. JACOB and HERMAN de HUYBERT, sons of Cornelius, commanded the fleet, that carried the archduke Philip and his wife

into Spain in the year 1506. These two august persons were on board these two brothers: the fleet, which was very numerous, met with a dreadful tempest in the channel; several ships were lost in fight of the archduke, and yet by reason of some difference betwixt him and the king of England, he would not consent to put into any English port. But when the two brothers HUYBERT represented to him the extrem danger they were in, and that it was absolutely necessary to make into Weymouth haven, he and his queen submitted to their advice and good conduct. Then it was that he gave them this motto WAECKT

HUYBERT (PETER DE) lord of Burgh, Crayefstein, &c. made himself famous by the great services he did the Republic of the United Provinces of the Netherlands, and particularly to the province of Zealand. His family is very antient, and has produced many very considerable persons [A]. He was born at Middleburg the first of August

[A] His family is very antient, and has produced many very considerable persons. He descended from CORNELIUS DE HUYBERT, and Joan de Haemſtede. The family of Haemſtede, is descended from Witte de Haemſtede, natural son to Floris earl of Holland and Zealand, lord of Friesland, &c. and from a daughter of the lord Heudeſ, a very considerable house at that time. That lady had too much complaisance for count Floris, but it was under the promise of marriage. JACOB and HERMAN de HUYBERT, sons of Cornelius, commanded the fleet, that carried the archduke Philip and his wife

into Spain in the year 1506. These two august persons were on board these two brothers: the fleet, which was very numerous, met with a dreadful tempest in the channel; several ships were lost in fight of the archduke, and yet by reason of some difference betwixt him and the king of England, he would not consent to put into any English port. But when the two brothers HUYBERT represented to him the extrem danger they were in, and that it was absolutely necessary to make into Weymouth haven, he and his queen submitted to their advice and good conduct. Then it was that he gave them this motto WAECKT

(5) Heideggerus, Differtat. Select. Tom. II, pag. 352.

(6) Heideggerus, ibid.

(7) The remark [H].

(8) Nullo modo eos habemus pro martyribus Diaboli quemadmodum accusamus. Joh. Pappus, Epit. Histor. Eccles. pag. m. 49.

(9) Spicellus, ubi supra, pag. 35.

(10) Taken from Hortengier, Bibliotheca quadrupartita, lib. i, cap. 34, pag. 141, 142.

August 1622, and was elected counsellor of that town the twenty fourth of March 1646.

He gave such proofs of his capacity, that the province of Zeeland deputed him to the assembly of the States-General, and then to the first conferences (a) that were held between the deputies of the king of Spain, and those of the United Provinces, after a long and bloody war of eighty years, and gloriously terminated at Munster the thirtieth of January 1648. He was sent in quality of ambassador extraordinary to the king of Sweden, the king of Poland, and the elector of Brandenburg, during the famous war in which the Swedes invaded Poland, and made so many conquests upon the king of Denmark, that they forced him to give up to them three fine provinces on the other side of the Sound. In March 1659, he was chosen secretary of state for the province of Zeeland, and in May the same year was named plenipotentiary for the treaty of peace, which was concluded between Sweden and Denmark (b), by the mediation of France, England, and the United Provinces in 1660. The ability and fidelity that he shewed in those illustrious employments, gave such satisfaction, that, in March 1664, he was raised to the dignity of great pensionary of Zeeland. The instructions of that post import, amongst other things, that they shall maintain, on all occasions, and at all times, the rights and pre-eminences of the state, and the laws and privileges of the province, against all those that should attempt to violate them: whereby this becomes a very delicate as well as laborious employment. Nevertheless he discharged the duties of it twenty three years and an half with a general applause, and to the great satisfaction of his masters, who deputed him, the twenty seventh of September 1687, to the great council of state, expressed, in his commission, that they were very well satisfied with his long and faithful services, of which they should ever preserve a grateful remembrance. We must not forget that he was created plenipotentiary of the United Provinces in the year 1667, for the treaty of Breda (c). He died at the Hague the seventh of January 1697. He was always observed to have an unshaken zeal for the religion established by the laws of the state. He was its defender on all occasions, and could never suffer any alteration to be made in it, either in the doctrine or discipline (d). I shall speak of his three sons in the remarks [B]. His sons buried him in a chapel of the church of Burgh in Zeeland, and caused an epitaph to be engraved on his tomb (e), which may be seen below [C].

(a) The conferences held at Muenster, in 1652, and 1653.

(b) The king of Sweden had begun a new war, and conquered all Denmark except Copenhagen.

(c) That treaty, which was made by the mediation of Sweden, put an end to the war between Charles II, king of England, and the United Provinces.

(d) Taken from a Memoir communicated to the Bookeller.

(e) He himself caused this tomb to be made, and besides his large contributions towards the repairing of the church wherein he is buried, he directed the building of it, which passes for a good piece of architecture.

WAECKT HUYBERTS. That is to say, WATCH HUYBERTS. The emperor Maximilian, and the archduke Charles, to express their great satisfaction for the services they had done to the king of Castile, their son and father, on the thirteenth of March 1513, honoured the three brothers JOHN, Jacob, and Herman DE HUYBERT, and their posterity with the privilege of wearing a sword, permitting to each of them to have three domestics that should wear it likewise: which was a very great honour at that time. John and Herman were sent, the nineteenth of December 1512, to Henry VIII, king of England, by Margaret, archduchess of Austria, then governess of the Low-Countries: It was about some negotiations, which she was pleased to trust them with. The emperor Charles V being in the town of Ziriczee, lodged in the house of LIVIN JACOBSEN DE HUYBERT, who was overseer of the Dikes. The three brothers settled in the same town, and built each of them a house, which are still the largest and most considerable buildings of Ziriczee (1).

Juan Christoval Calvete de Estrella makes honourable mention of this family: y no poco nombrados, says he

(2), eran los Huybertos de Cirixea por su valor y riqueza, that is, The Huyberts were very famous for their valour and their riches.

The author of the supplement to the chronicle of the abbot of Ursperg mentions him who conducted the archduke Philip into Spain: the name he gives him does not agree with the memoir which I have quoted: however, here is what he says. 'Carolus Quintus rediit in Hispanias, Johannes Cornelius nauta navigatione decem dierum ab Anglico littore vehit. Hic nauta regem Philippum illustrissimi Augusti patrem, ultima navigatione in summa tempestate in Hispanias vexerat, & reginam Danorum una cum principe Ultrajectino in Daniam vexerat. Vir dives & peritissimus rei nauticae (3). — Charles V returned by sea to Spain. John Cornelius, a sailor, conducted him thither in ten days from the English coast. He had formerly carried king Philip, the emperor's father, to Spain, in a great storm, and had likewise before had the honour of conducting the queen of Denmark, together with the prince of Virecht, into Denmark. He was a very rich man, and eminent for his skill in navigation.'

[B] I will speak of his three sons. The eldest is ANTHONY DU HUYBERT, lord of Cruyningen, counsellor in the sovereign court of justice. The second is JOHN DU HUYBERT, lord of Nootgawe. He took to arms, in which his good conduct and valour advanced him to the post of lieutenant-general of horse (4). The third has been counsellor in the council of Flanders, and at present is one of the directors of the East-India Company (5).

[C] His sons . . . caused an epitaph to be engraved on his tomb, which may be seen below. It contains, in very noble expressions, an abstract of his life and the character of his soul.

(4) His Britannic majesty raised him to that post after the peace of Ratis.

(5) Taken from the above-mentioned Memoir.

D. M.

Vir. Nobiliss. & Amplissim.

PETRI DE HUYBERT.

DOMINI DE BURG. ET CRAYSTEIN.

antiqua. & multis. imaginibus. clara. familia.

Zeelandica. oriundi.

Natus. est. Middleburgi. propter. ingenii. praestantiam. oris. facundiam. & industriam. singularem. invigilanti. bono. publico. in. senatum. illius. urbis. cum. vix. adolevisset. est. cooptatus. omnium. expectationi. cum. satisfecisset. post. pacem. Monasteriensem. ad. conventum. Mechlinensem. controversiis. non. decisis. inter. Hispanos. & Batavos. componendis. dein. ad. Reges. Sueciae. Poloniae. Daniae. & Elect. Brandeb. missus. fuit. publice. gravissimis. de. rebus. iisque. confectis. ex. sententia. Reip. redux. a. Praepot. Ord. Zeeland. perspecta. ejus. fide. & prudentia. delectus. fuit. ut. iis. esset. a. secretis. post. advocatus. perpetuus. Reip. Zeeland. est. factus. summo. omnium. consensu. dehinc. ab. Unitis. Belgis. Abligatus. fuit. ad. Pacificationem. Bredanam. tandem. ne. tantae. prudentiae. fructum. soli. caperent. Zeelandi. passim. sunt. eum. adscribi. Consilio. communi. ord. Societorum. septem. populorum. ut. omnium. utilitatibus. serviret. ad. has. dignitates. illum. evehit. non. ambitio. populi. & potentium. sed. testata. cunctis. incredibilis. vigilantia. in. obsequiis. stationis. suae. munitis. summa. consilii. praesentia. in. celeriter. inveniendis. quae. tempora. Reip. exigebant. mira. dexteritas. in. efficiendis. quae. in. rem. sapienter. consulatur. singularis. sagacitas. in. arduis. & impeditissimis. negotiis. explicandis. & ingens. robur. animi. in. iis. libere. oppugnandis. qui. rectae. sententiae. de. Rep. ejus. saepe. auctor. fuit. adversabantur. portas. nec. fecit. nec. fovit. in. omni. varietate. rerum. & Reip. vicissitudinibus. statum. & dignitatem. suam. tenuit. illibatam. satur. vitae. delectus. bonis. omnibus. & valde. desideratus. O. D. VII. Janvar. An. Ch. CIO. IIO. XCVII. Aetat. LXXV. mortuissimi. liberi. P. C.

T O

(1) Taken from a Memoir imparted to the Bookeller.

(2) In the description of the journey of Don Philip, prince of Spain, through the Netherlands, in the year 1548, printed at Antwerp, 1552, in fol. pag. 263.

(3) Paralipomena ad Abbat. Urspergen. apud Anton. Matthaeum. Veter. avi Analect. pag. 249.

HUYBERT.

TO
The memory of
PETER DE HUYBERT,
Lord of Burg and Craystein.
Of an ancient and noble family in Zealand.

He was born at Middleburg, and admitted, while very young, into the senate of that city, on account of his great genius, eloquence, and singular attention to the good of the public. After he had satisfied the expectations of all men in that station, he, after the peace of Munster, was sent to the congress at Mechelen, in order to settle all controversies remaining betwixt the Spaniards and Dutch. He was afterwards sent in the quality of ambassador, to the kings of Sweden, Poland, Denmark, and to the Elector of Brandenburg, to treat of matters of the highest importance; and after happily terminating all that, he was, on his return, in consideration of his eminent fidelity and prudence, chosen secretary by the states of Zealand, and afterwards, with universal approbation, perpetual Pensionary. Some time after he was sent by the States-General, in quality of ambassador, to the treaty of Breda; and last of all, that the Zealanders alone might not enjoy the fruits of his wisdom, he was allowed by them to accept of a place in the council of state of the United Provinces, that he might there be a common good to the whole common-wealth. To all these high honours he was advanced, not by courting the favour either of the people, or of the nobles, but by his universally known and admirable vigilance, in performing the duties of his charge, his great presence of mind in contriving the most proper expedients in all exigencies of the state, and singular dexterity in executing what he had so wisely counselled. His great sagacity in unravelling the most arduous and perplexed affairs, and great strength of mind in opposing those who were enemies to such resolutions as were entered into for the public good, of which he was frequently the author. He neither formed nor encouraged parties; and in all vicissitudes of affairs and changes in the state, he preserved his state and dignity unblemished. Being bewailed by all good men, he died VII January, An. Cb. CIO. IOC. XCVII. in the LXXV year of his age, his sorrowful children erected this monument.

JACCETIUS.

I.

JACCETIUS (FRANCIS CATANEUS) was born at Florence on the sixteenth day of November, 1466. He was the disciple of Marfilus Ficinus, and he made so great proficiency by the lessons of this learned master, that he became one of the best Platonists of his time, and an excellent orator. He succeeded the same Ficinus in his professorship of Philosophy, who judged him excellently well qualified for it, even so far, as to believe, that nature had produced him for that purpose. He published several books [A], and died at Florence in the year 1522. He was buried in the church of the Holy Cross, in the tomb of his ancestors, and he left thirteen sons [B]. Benedetto Varchi made his funeral oration: his life was most elegantly written by Euphrasynus Lapinus (a). His true Italian name Diaceto, has received a thousand alterations from the writers who speak of him or of his posterity [C]. There is another FRANCIS CATANEUS JACCETIUS, who is an author [D]; but I think he is known only by the name of Diacetius, or Diacetius. I believe the count de Châteauneuil, who married one of Catherine de Medicis's maids of honour, was descended from our Francis Jaccetius [E]. That maid was call'd Madam d' Atri, and has been both well and ill spoken of (b).

[A] He published several books.] These are the titles of some of them: De pulchro libri tres. De amore libri tres. Paraphrasis in Politicum, & Theagenem Platonis, & in Aristotelem de celo & meteoris. Enarratio in Platonis symposium. Oratio in funere Laurentii Medices. Epistole variae, &c. An edition of his works in Folio, was printed at Basil, in the year 1563. Mention is made of it in Gesner's Bibliotheca, under Franciscus Cataneus Jaccetius. The catalogue of Oxford and König speak of it only under the word Cataneus. Ghilini calls this author only Francisco Cataneo (1). He has very well paraphrased what Pocciantius said of him, and adds nothing besides.

[B] He left thirteen sons.] I make no doubt one of them was the person I speak of in the article of MACHIAVEL (2) and whose miserable end has been described by Pierius Valerianus in this manner: • Jacobus Jaccetus juvenis & Græcæ & Latine egregie peritus, pangendi carminis auctor non illepidus • Florentinam cathedram obtinebat; sed infelici suo • fidere conjurationis in Julii Cardinalis Medices cædem certo die patrandam conscius fuit; qua patresfacta, captus ipse, & tam nefandis scelus convictus • Senatus Florentini judicio securi percussus est (3).

James Jaccetus, a youth perfectly well • skilled both in Greek and Latin, a graceful author • in composing verses, was promoted to a professorship • at Florence, but, by the malice of his stars, was an accomplice in a conspiracy to compass the murder of • Julius Cardinal Medici, upon a certain day; which coming to light, being apprehended and convicted • so horrid a wickedness, he was, by judgment of the • senate of Florence, beheaded. Paul Jovius, who gives him no other title but that of a poet (4), is to be censured. I fancy that Brother Angelus de Cataneis Diacetus (5), who after he had gone through all the dignities of the Dominican order, was made bishop of Fiesoli, in the year 1566, was one of the thirteen sons of our Jaccetius. He died the fifth of May, 1574, being eighty one years old (6). He is called in his epitaph (7) Angelus Cataneus Diacetus.

[C] His true name Diaceto, has been very much altered by the writers that speak of him or his posterity.] See the remark [C] of the article MACHIAVEL, and note, that the reason why I make Diaceto his true name, is because I have found this word in the subscription of a letter (8), which our Jaccetius's grandson wrote to Varchi the ninth of September, 1561, upon sending him two copies of a book of his grandfather (9). He had received four from Venice. The edition pleased him as to the character, but he found it uncorrect. Michael Pocciantius has not been altogether exact, having written that name Franciscus Cataneus Diacetus (10). Note, that the author of the notes upon the book, intitled, La Confession de Sancti, informs me (11), that Carolus Zensobii de Ghiaceto unus ex Decemviris Balia Florentina civitatis, signified in that quality with fr. . . . of Cosmo de Medicis, in a contract made at Florence, in 1453, which he saw amongst the archives of Lorraine. This shews, that the ancient name of this family was not Diaceto. It is very probable that Diaceto was made by joining the article and the name together. I have spoken in another place (12) of the life of one Paul Ghiacetti.

[D] There is another FRANCIS CATANEUS JACCETIUS, who is an author.] Michael Pocciantius calls him Franciscus Cataneus Diacetus, and says, that he was canon of the cathedral of Florence apostolical protonotary, doctor of the civil law, and bishop of Fiesoli, and that amongst other works, he composed in Italian, the life of Jesus Christ, that of the Holy Virgin, and of St Dominic, and of some bishops of Fiesoli, several sermons, and the epistles and gospels for all the year (13). Ughelli calls him Franciscus Cataneus Diacetus, and says, that he was the successor of Angelus de Cataneis Diacetus his uncle, in the bishopric of Fiesoli, in the year 1570; that he sat amongst the fathers of the council of Trent; that he wrote some tracts De auctoritate Papæ & Concilii, de superstitione artis magicæ, &c. that he discharged all the duties of a good prelate, and died the fourth of November 1595 (14).

[E] The count de Châteauneuil . . . descended from our Francis Jaccetius.] Mezerai, speaking of the exploits of the king's troops against the League, observes, that Sanci made himself master of Châteauneuil in Champagne, in the year 1589, at the sollicitation of the lord of the place. It was, adds he (15), a Florentine, named Lewis Dijaceti, who, as many others of his nation, had got vast wealth by farming the imposts and customs of the king.

JANSENIUS (CORNELIUS) bishop of Ipres, was one of the most learned divines of the XVIIth century. He was born near Leerdam [A] in Holland, in 1585.

He

[A] He was born near Leerdam.] In a village called Accoy, as Mr Leydecker observes. Fallant, says he VOL. III. No LXXV.

(1) operis posthumi editores quando referunt eum na- (1) Leydecker, tum esse Leerdami medico Bataviæ oppidulo, sed tan- de Vita & Morti, de Vita & Morti, Janicini, pag. 29
6 Y

(1) Ghilini, Teatro, Tom. II, pag. 28.

(2) In the remark [C].

(3) Pierius Valerianus, de Litteratorum infelicitate, lib. II, pag. 77.

(4) See the article MACHIAVEL, remark [C].

(5) So he is called in the third volume of the Italia Sacra of Ughelli, pag. 340.

(6) Id. ibid.

(7) Ughelli, ibid. bas it.

(a) Ex Michael. Pocciantio, de Scriptor. Florentinis, pag. 67, 68.

(b) See the notes upon the Confession of Sancti, pag. 459 & seq. Edit. 1699.

(8) Balisus has inserted it in page 198, of his Lettere Storiche Politiche et Erudite, printed in Poeszoli 1685.

(9) Viz. his book de Amore.

(10) Mich. Pocciantius, de Scriptor. Florent. pag. 67.

(11) Page 461, of the edition of 1699.

(12) In the remark of the article FONTIUS.

(13) Pocciantius ubi supra, pag. 72.

(14) Ughelli, ubi supra.

(15) Mezerai, Hist. de France, Tom. III, pag. 784, Edit. 1685.

He has been often reproached as if his family had been Protestant, and he had for some time professed that religion [B]; but this is not true. He went to study at Louvain in 1602, and he pursued his studies with so much application, that he fell sick (a), so that he was advised to remove to another place for the benefit of the air. He went from thence to Paris, where he found John du Verger de Hauranne (b), with whom he had entered into a strict friendship at Louvain. Upon the recommendation of this good friend, he was made tutor in a good family (c); and being a learned man, he quickly became acquainted with some illustrious persons. Some time after he went to Bayonne, to his good Friend, who had retired thither. They studied together with an extraordinary application [C], and got so far into the esteem of the Bishop of Bayonne, that he procured a canonship in his Cathedral for du Verger, and the direction of a college for Jansenius (d). The bishop being raised to the archbishopric of Tours [D], invited du Verger to Paris; and then Jansenius being parted from his friend, and being not sure of the protection of the new prelate, left Bayonne, and returned to Louvain, where he was made principal of the college of St Pulcheria; a post which he disliked, because it did not allow him time to apply himself as much as he desired to his studies, which was also the reason why he would not undertake to teach Philosophy (e). He was admitted doctor of Divinity in the year 1617 (f), and taken into the number of the ordinary professors, and he acquired such a reputation, that the university sent him twice into Spain [E] upon matters of importance.

(a) Valer. Andr. Deseleur, Bibl. Belg. pag. 154.

(b) He who made himself so famous under the name of the abbot of St Cyran.

(c) Leydecker, ubi infra, citat. (g), pag. 8.

(d) Ib. pag. 10.

(e) Ibid. pag. 12.

(f) Valer. Andr. ubi supra.

si viri natalibus jam magno. Etenim sciant ejus Af-seclæ eum in Comitatu quidem Leerdamensi natum, non tamen in oppido LEERDAMO (Lingerdamo alias, quod ad Lingam fluvium sit situm) sed in quo-dam Pago, quod Urbiculae subest, & ACCOY appellatur: sic Nepotes & Consanguinei, qui ibi ad-huc degunt, testantur, superstitie humili Domuncula, in qua primum lucem adspexit. — For he is known to his followers, that he was indeed born in the county of Leerdam, but not in the town of LEER-DAM (alias Lingerdam, because it stands by the river Linga) but in a certain village which is under the little town, and called ACCOY: so testify his posterity and relations, who live there still, the little cottage being as yet remaining in which he first saw light. We must not seek a mystery in his calling himself Leerdamensis (2), for he called himself so, according to the usual custom of taking the name of the town, in whose territory one is born. This may be proved by a thousand instances (3).

[B] He has been reproached as if he had for some time professed the Protestant religion. A Jesuit of Bordeaux, called Moles du Bourg, published a little book (4) in the year 1658, in which he said (5) 'that the father of Cornelius Jansenius professed the Heresy of the Calvinists, though his son being of age, declared himself a Catholic.' Father Labbe had published the same thing before him (6): 'Principes corum exitit CORNELIUS JANSENIUS qui gente Hollandus, patria Leerdamensis, inter hæreticos educatus à puero, tum Lovanii, &c. — The chief of them was CORNELIUS JANSENIUS, who, being a Dutchman, a native of Leerdam, was from a child educated among the Heretics then at Louvain, &c.' Father Hazart renewed the same calumny in a Flemish book, intitled, The triumph of the Popes of Rome, which he published at Antwerp, in 1681.

His father, says he, was a Calvinist; and as for himself, being grown, he made an outward shew of being a Catholic (7). When he was persecuted as a slanderer, he alleged, amongst other reasons, that he was not the author of this reproach, since he published it only after Moles du Bourg (8). It has been evidently proved in the Cases which I quote, that this is a very false charge. Here is a passage of Mr Leydecker, which contains some particulars, that are not in the Cases. 'Parentes habuit honestos, Pontificiæ Religioni addictos, licet Evangelica lux Belgio affunderetur, quibuscumque modicæ opes. Ut male Hazardus Jesuita in Historiis Eum Patre Calviniano natum retulerit, il-lum falsi postulantibus, qui id non ferrent, Nepotibus.
Pater appellatus fuit vernaculo nomine JAN OT-TIE (9), fabrilis opere victum queritans, Mater autem LYNTJE GYSBERTS, ceu referunt super-stites, unde hic Filius CORNELIUS JANSEN di-ctus est, antiquo vulgi in Belgio more, at Latina vel erudita terminatione, CORNELIUS JANSENIUS (10). — He was descended of honest parents addicted to the Romish religion, though the light of the gospel had then shone in Holland, and who had a small estate, so that Hazart the Jesuit unjustly reported his father was a Calvinist, for which he was sued in an action of scandal by his relations who would not bear it. The father was in the language of his country, called JAN OTTIE, gaining his livelihood at Carpenter's work, the mother LYNTJE GYS-BERTS, as those who know them give out, from whence his son was named CORNELIUS JANSEN, after the antient custom of the vulgar in Holland, but in the Latin, or learned termination, CORNELIUS JANSENIUS.'

[C] They studied together with an extraordinary application. It was at Mr d'Hauranne's house, who was afterwards abbot of St Cyran, that Jansenius spent the five or six years that he was at Bayonne, applying himself to the reading of the holy fathers and St Augustin, so assiduously, that he appearing to be of no strong constitution, Mr Hauranne's mother used to say to her son, that he would kill that honest Fleming, by making him study so hard (11).

[D] Being raised to the archbishopric of Tours. According to Mr Leydecker (12) this archbishopric became vacant by the cession of Sebastian Galigai, brother (13) of the marquis d'Ancre: Vacante Cathedra per spontaneam Sebastiani Galigai Florentini, infelicis Marchionis Ancrei fratris, cessionem.

[E] The university sent him twice into Spain. His enemies gave out a great many lies hereupon. They said, 'that he fled from Spain, just as he was going to be taken by the Inquisition for venting his new doctrine there (14).' This is what Father Hazart has asserted after Moles du Bourg. Here is the answer that is to be found in the Cases (15).

His ignorance (16) of Mr Jansenius's affairs, plainly shews, that it is a calumny forged at pleasure.
He speaks of his journey to Spain, as if he had made but one, whereas he has made two: one in the year 1624, and the other in 1625. This would have perplexed the Jesuit of Bordeaux; for if he had fixed his story to the first voyage of Jansenius, the falsehood would have been visible, because Jansenius would have taken care, not to return thither a second time.
And if he had fixed it to the second, it would have been visible another way; it being certain, that so unlucky an accident would have ruined all his negotiation, and that he would have returned in disgrace to Louvain: instead of which it is most true, that he returned gloriously, having obtained of his Catholic majesty, all that the university of Louvain desired, to put a stop to the enterprizes of the Jesuits. Lastly, an author, who deserves so little credit upon other accounts, is not at all to be credited about a thing which of itself is scarce credible, when in the same place he advances three other manifest falsities against the same person. This is what this Jesuit of Bordeaux has done; the first is, that Jansenius's father was a Calvinist, &c. a calumny, the falsity whereof is unanswerably proved in the first and third Case. The second is, That Jansenius being returned to Louvain, after the excursion he had made into France, obtained, by his intrigues, under the notion of a poor Dutch Catholic, a pensioner's place in a college, in which a distribution of some money was made for the maintenance of such poor scholars. An impudent

(2) Jansenius patria fuit Batavus, atque ut ipse scribit, quasi in honore id poneret, Leerdamensis. Unde verò iste error? an quod, &c. Id ibid. & pag. 3.

(3) See the remark [A] of the article CASTEL-LAN.

(4) Intituled, Histoire du Janseanisme, contenant sa conception, sa naissance, son accroissement & son agonie.

(5) See the Factums, or Cases, of Jansenius's relations, in the eighth Tome of the Morale Pratique, pag. 317.

(6) In præfatione Triumphæ Catholicæ Veritatis, printed at Paris, 1651.

(7) See the Cases of Jansenius's relations, pag. 307.

(8) Ibid. pag. 317.

(9) It is observed at the beginning of the first Case, that he was called John Otto Accoy.

(10) Leydecker, de Vita Janseni, pag. 3.

(11) The Cases of Jansenius's relations, pag. 410.

(12) De Vita Jansenius, pag. 10.

(13) Or rather brother-in-law; for the marquis d'Ancre's name was Concini, and his wife's name Galligai.

(14) Cases, pag. 420.

(15) Pag. 451.

(16) That is, of Moles du Bourg.

† Valer. Andr. in Fastis Academicis, pag. 393.

importance. The king his master made him professor of the Holy Scripture in 1630, in the university of Louvain; and five years after he preferred him to the bishopric of Ipres. A book, that Janfenius published against France [F], mightily contributed to his getting this dignity. He enjoyed it but a short time; for he died the sixth of May, 1638. He had been above twenty years upon a work, in which he explained St Augustin's System concerning the Doctrine of Grace. This book, published after his death, has raised great disturbances in the church of Rome [G], and found a great deal of work for the Popes. The † Fasti Acad.

pag. 138.

'impudent lie, confuted by the public acts 4; for as soon as he returned to Louvain in the year 1617, he took his degree of doctor of Divinity, and was made president of the college of St Pulcheria: Lovanianum revocatus novo Collegio D. Pulcheriæ præfatur.' The third is an infamous calumny, viz. that this pensioner stole money from the college to pay the pension of the abbot of S. Cyran's two nephews. I. The abbot of S. Cyran had but one nephew at Louvain. II. If Janfenius was only pensioner, how could he dispose of the college money? III. This pretended theft is an horrid calumny, dispersed in many of the Jesuits libels, of which they have been convicted in the sixteenth Provincial letter, in these words; I will tell you, &c.

It has been said a thousand times, that there is no fiction but is grounded upon some truth. And this may be said of that story of Moses du Bourg; for it appears by a letter of Janfenius, that the Spanish inquisition made some informations against him after his departure. The words of his letter are these (17): 'They write to me from Spain, that the Inquisition has been set on against a doctor of Louvain, who had been in that kingdom; and that they have applied themselves to a doctor of Salamanca, in whose house he lodged, who is the first doctor of that university, called Basil de Leon, to take information against him as an Hollander, and consequently an Heretic: but he answered them so much to the advantage of this doctor, as put them out of countenance (18).'

(17) Dated the thirty first of December, 1627.

(18) Cases, pag. 462, 463.

(19) Bibl. Belg. pag. 154.

I shall conclude this remark with the words of Valerius Andreas (19). 'Brevi quoque tempore eam de se opinionem apud Academicos omnes excitavit, ut præ Janfenio alius magis idoneus non fuerit iudicatus, qui nomine ejusdem Academiæ bis Legatus in Hispanias mitteretur. Ubi quæ prudentiæ ac dexteratate sese gesserit, tum apud Regem Catholicum, tum in Academiis Salmanticensi ac Vallesolanæ, felicissimus utriusque Legationis eventus docuit. — Also in a short time he raised that opinion of himself, amongst all the members of the university, that none was reckoned so fit as Janfenius, to be sent ambassador in the name of the same university into Spain, where with what prudence and dexterity he behaved himself both with the Catholic king and the universities of Salamanca and Valladolid; the most happy event of both embassies is a proof.' Consult Mr Leydecker (20) concerning the subject and success of these Spanish voyages.

(20) Pag. 23, & seq.

(21) In the year 1635.

(22) Leydecker, de Vita Janfenii, pag. 94, & seq.

(23) Pag. 92.

(24) Opportune suam operum offerebat P. Rosæus, vir eruditissimus Sanctiæ Consilii Præfatus, cujus ante meminimus, supradictato volumini suo argumento, quo vel penitentiam ageret, vel famam falsi accusaret. Iste autem erat Mars Gallicus, stylo quidem Janfenii ornatus, cujus tamen materia ipsius opus, eruditionem & ingenium excedebat. Leydecker, de Vita Janfenii, pag. 93.

[F] A book that Janfenius published (21) against France. It is written with great strength of argument, and intitled Alexandri Patricii Armacani, Theologi, Mars Gallicus, seu de justitia armorum & fœderum Regis Galliarum libri duo. It contains the most malicious and odious outcries, against the continual services which France did to the Protestants of Holland and Germany, to the great prejudice of the Catholic religion. The Hollanders are there called rebels who enjoy a republican liberty by an infamous usurpation. They have answered that reproach a hundred times, and Mr Leydecker has not forgot to answer it solidly (22). He tells us (23), that there was a report that Janfenius being consulted by the duke of Arschot, and the archbishop of Mechlen, after the loss of Boileduc, and Maelricht, advised them to shake off the Spanish yoke, and to canton in the way of the Swiss. It was discovered, that he had given that counsel, and he was in great pain about it. Hereupon the president Rose taught him an expedient to come off: he advised him to write against France, and gave him the plan of the Mars Gallicus (24). Mr Leydecker alleges a letter of the Nuncio Fabio Chigi. 'Et ne mentiri viderentur, literas produxere Fabii Gighii, Nuntii Apostolici (qui deinde Alexander VII. fuit) ad F. Barberinum, Cardinalem, datas Coloniae 25. Martii, 1641. ubi hæc scripta; Cardinalis Richelieu admodum stomachatur in Janfenium, *quod cum Rosæo Martem Gallicum conscripserit. Nimirum hæc literæ adhuc in Collegio S. Officii Romæ asservantur (25). — And that they might not seem to tell a lie, they produced the letters of Fabio Chigi apostolic Nuncio, (who afterwards was Alexander VII.) to F. Barberini cardinal, dated at Cologne the twenty fifth of March 1641, where these words were written, Cardinal Richelieu is very angry with Janfenius, because he wrote the Mars Gallicus with Rose, these letters are still kept in the college of the Holy Office at Rome.' The Jesuits failed not to exasperate the court of France against the followers of Janfenius, as being a man who had defamed the nation and their monarchs, almost from the first to the last. Mr Leydecker cites a long passage out of a book which he believes to be Father Annat's (26); but in all probability it was written by Father Vasseleur (27), I will only set down so much of it as concerns the ingratitude that Janfenius was reproached with. Ante omnia Janfenio exprobat ingratus in Galliam animum, quæ ipsi valetudinem, quam recipere non posset in patria, concreto & pingui cælo, restituerat puro & salubri; quæ victum, cum egeret, præbuerat, tum domesticæ Præceptorii Lutetiæ Parisiorum, tum ludi publici Magistro Bajonæ; quæ notitiâ Virorum illustrium atque doctorum animum fecerat ad majora, aditumque & viam muniverat. Quin in Galliis quod beneficii loco sine dubio numeravit, magnam adeptus erat librorum Calvinianorum copiam, quorum de fontibus hausit Augustini interpretationem, & invenerat homines à Calvini disciplina non alienos quibuscumque liberiores de Gratia sermones contulerit (28). — But above all he taxes Janfenius with ingratitude towards France, which had by its pure and good air, restored him to health, which he could not obtain from the gross and thick air of his own country, which had in his necessity given a livelihood to him, both as a domestic præceptor at Paris, and a master of a public school at Bayonne, which by an acquaintance with illustrious and learned men, had formed his mind to greater things, and added strength to his interest. Nay, in France, with no doubt, he regarded as a benefit, he got a large quantity of Calvinistical books, from which fountains he drew his interpretation of St Augustine, and found men not averse to the doctrine of Calvin, with whom he had more free conferences concerning Grace.'*

Let us admire the vicissitude of human affairs. Janfenius was rewarded with a mitre for having confounded France upon her entering into alliances with Protestant states; and at present (29) the court of Spain would doubtless give a good prebend to a doctor of Louvain, who should write as strong a book for the justification of such a league, as that book was which Janfenius wrote against France: so true it is, that one may attain to the same end by quite contrary means, and that what is good at one time may become very bad at another (30). The confutation of a book may deserve the reward that was given for the book itself. What a pretty scene would it be for unprejudiced people; should they see a doctor of Louvain made a bishop for solidly confuting our Cornelius's Mars Gallicus?

Naudé (31) makes him the author of the Admonitio (31) Naudé, (32), and of Mysteria Politica, two works, says he, that had wonderful effects against the designs of Lewis XIII. I believe he is mistaken. [G] This book . . . has raised great disturbances in the church of Rome. It has given birth to an infinite number of other books, some of which contain all that can be said on both sides upon the subject, by men of great acuteness, subtilty, and learning; but after all, a man is not one jot the wiser than he was before; which will ever be the fate of disputes of this kind: the more they are handled, the more they are confounded, and give the reader occasion to say, Fecisti Phorm. Act. II, probe, incertior sum multo quam dudum (33). — Very well,

(25) Ibid.

(26) Ib. pag. 89.

(27) It is ascribed to him, page 3, of Sebastian Mabre-Cramoisy's Catalogue, printed in 1678. The Janfenius suspected, was proved in 1680, by Sebastian and Gabriel Cramoisy.

(28) Autor libri cui titulus, Janfenius suspectus, apud Leydeckerum, pag. 89.

(29) I write this in the year 1695.

(30) See remark [I], of the article HOTMAN.

(31) Naudé, (32), and of Mysteria Politica, two works, says he, that had wonderful effects against the designs of Lewis XIII. I believe he is mistaken.

(32) See, above, remark [F] of the article BOUCHER (JOHN).

(33) Terent. Fecisti Phorm. Act. II, probe, incertior sum multo quam dudum (33). — Very well,

The followers of Janfenius's doctrine have been call'd Janfenists, and the Jesuits have been their greatest adversaries. Perhaps the shuffling and foul play that attends controversies of this nature, was never so notorious as in this [H]. This doctor engaged in controversy with the Protestants [I]; but he left them the field of battle. We have some other works written by him [K]. I have not said that the court of Room proceeded against the epitaph of this bishop [L]. Consult Mr Leydecker's book lately publish'd.

It

well, I know less now than I did before. It has been said, that the doctrine of grace is a sea that has neither shore nor bottom. Perhaps it had been better to compare it with the Faro of Messina, in which there is always danger of running upon a rock, by endeavouring to avoid another: Incidit in Scyllam cupiens vitare Charybdim. The whole controversy comes at last to this. Did Adam sin freely? If you answer, yes: then, it will be replied, his fall was not foreseen: if you say no: then it will be replied he was not culpable. You may write an hundred volumes upon either of these consequences, and at last you must be forced to own either, that the infallible foresight of a contingent event, is an inconceivable mystery; or that the way how a creature sins, though it acts in a necessary manner, is wholly incomprehensible. I desire no more: for to what purpose is it to write so many books, since you must own one of these two incomprehensible mysteries?

[H] The shuffling and foul play was never so notorious as in this. Those that have never so little penetration see plainly that in the dispute about Liberty, there are but too sides to be taken: one is to say, that all the causes distinct from the soul, which concur with her, leave her the power of acting, or not acting; the other is to say, that they determine her in such a manner to act, that she cannot do otherwise. The first opinion is that of the Molinists; the other is, that of the Thomists, Janfenists, and the Protestants of the confession of Geneva. Here are three sorts of people that oppose Molinism, and who at the bottom must be of the same mind; and yet the Thomists have contended might and main, that they were no Janfenists, and the Janfenists have maintained with equal heat, that upon the point of liberty they were not Calvinists. There are no artifices or ill-grounded distinctions, but what have been made use of to colour that pretence; and all this with design to avoid the dangerous consequences they foresaw, would follow their confessing any conformity, either with the Janfenists, or the Calvinists. On the other hand, there is no sophistry but what the Molinists have made use of, to shew, that St Augustin did not teach Janfenism, as being unwilling to own, that their doctrine is contrary to that of this great saint. Thus the Thomists refusing to confess their conformity with people called Heretics; and the Molinists, to own themselves against a doctor, who has been always reckoned orthodox in his opinions, have plaid an hundred tricks, without a grain of sincerity in their conduct.

[I] He engaged in controversy with the Protestants. Here follows the substance of that dispute (34). The States-General made an edict in 1629, by which they prohibited the public exercise of the Romish religion in Boisseduc, and appropriated the ecclesiastical revenues of the mayorality of that town to the use of the Protestant religion, which they caused to be preached there by four ministers. The latter having notice that many virulent slanders were secretly scattered against their doctrine, published a manifesto to declare, that they taught nothing but the pure gospel, and to exhort their adversaries to propose in public what they had to object. This was only answered in a piece (35) that Janfenius was the author of. Gisbert Voetius, one of the four ministers who preached in Boisseduc, made some remarks upon this work (36), which were confuted by a new book of Janfenius (37). The author of the remarks replied, and confuted his adversary in a great book, published in the year 1635, and intitled desperata causa papatus. Janfenius did not reply, but one of his friends replied for him, this was Libertus Fromondus. His book (38) was printed at Antwerp in the year 1636, and refuted by Martin Schoockius, professor of History and Eloquence at Deventer, who intitled his answer desperatissima causa papatus. It was printed in the year 1638. Mr Leydecker says this was the end of that dispute (39). But I find in the Bibliotheca of Valerius Andreas amongst Fromondus's works, a piece intitled Sycophanta: epistola ad Gisbertum Voetium, printed in 1640. And since the first impression of this article, I have seen a letter, in which this professor of Utrecht is taxed with being mistaken. * Falleris, ô Præclare, * secus res habet . . . Fromondus . . . ultimo ictu prostravit adversarium, nunquam quod sciam refutatus (40). — Thou art mistaken great man, the thing is of another sort . . . Fromondus . . . with the last blow struck down his adversary, and as far as I know has never been refuted.

Janfenius had another war to maintain, which we may call a Protestant one. For Theodorus Simonis (41), a wavering Catholic, who wanted a master, came to Louvain to desire him to explain some doubts about the infallibility of the Pope, the adoration of the Eucharist, and some other points. Janfenius, being hampered with this man's objections, told him one day that he would no longer dispute vivâ voce, but in writing, perceiving he had to do with a Catholic, who would quickly go into Holland, and boast that he had vanquished him. Simonis, who had much ado to bring himself to dispute in writing, resolved upon it at last. But after each of them had wrote twice upon those subjects, Simonis found himself besieged with soldiers in his lodgings, and threatened to be punished as an heretic. The secretary of the duke of Arschot, cried out against him, and said there was wood enough in his master's forest to burn that Heretic. But he who examined Simonis, in the name of the archbishop of Mechlen, having reported that he had found him a good Catholic, and firmly resolved to continue so, the prisoner was set at liberty, and Janfenius was obliged to pay the expence of the soldiers, &c. Simonis, two years after turned Protestant, and published a book (42) intitled, De statu & religione propriæ papatus adversus Janfenium (43). I have lately read, that this man having left Lutheranism, to embrace Popery, turned Lutheran again, and at last Socinian. He was made principal of the Socinian college of Kiffelin, in Luthuania (44). He understood Greek very well, and translated Comenius's Janua Linguarum into that language.

[K] We have some other books written by him. An oration de interioris hominis reformatione. Tetrateuchus sive commentarius in IV Evangelia. Pentateuchus sive Commentarius in V libro Moysi. The answer of the Louvain divines, de vi obligandi conscientias quam habent edicta regia super re monetaria, and that of the divines and civilians, de juramento quod publica auctoritate Magistratui designato imponi solet, are Janfenius's works (45). Mr Leydecker (46) complains that in Moreri's dictionary, the harmony of the gospels is ascribed to our Janfenius, whereas it ought to be attributed to another Janfenius, bishop of Ghent. I have not found this in Moreri. The error, wherewith Mr Arnauld (47) taxed George Hornius of believing that our Janfenius was bishop of Ipres, and afterwards of Ghent, is corrected in Mr Leydecker's edition (48).

[L] The court of Rome proceeded against the epitaph of Janfenius. The tenth of December, 1655. * Francis de Robes (49), of the family of the counts of Annap, bishop of Ipres, caused the tomb-stone of his predecessor Cornelius Janfenius to be taken away silently by night, on which were written the praises of his virtue and learning, and particularly of his book intitled Augustinus, importing that this most faithful interpreter of St Augustine's most secret thoughts, had employed upon that work a divine wit, an indefatigable labour, and all the time of his life; and that the church would receive the fruit of it upon earth, as he did the reward of it in heaven. Words that were injurious to the Bulls of Pope Urban VIII, and Innocent X, who had condemned that book. The destruction of this grave-stone was made by an express order of Pope Alexander VII, and with the consent of the archduke Leopold, governor of the Low-Countries, notwithstanding the resistance of the chapter; which went so far that one of the principal (40) Epistola Christiani Philireni ad Jacum Palaeologum, pag. 5.

(41) He was a native of H. . .

(42) Printed at Leyden, in 1638.

(43) See the History of all this at large in Mr Leydecker, pag. 68, & seq.

(44) See Mollerus, l'églogue ad Historiam Chersonesi Clusice, Part. III, pag. 108.

(45) Taken from Valerius Andreas, pag. 155.

(46) Pag. 2.

(47) Morale Præfatione, Tom. III, pag. 130.

(48) In Notis ad Hist. Ecclesiast. Hœnli, pag. 517.

(49) Mr Leydecker, pag. 155, calls him, Johannes Roblesius.

(34) Leydecker, de Vita Janfenii, pag. 57, & seq.

(35) Intituled Alexipharmacum, printed in the year 1630.

(36) Intituled, Philonius Romanus correctus.

(37) Intituled, Notarum spongia, printed in the year 1631.

(38) Intituled, Causæ desperatæ Gisb. Voëtii adversus Spongiam, . . . Cornelii Janfenii Crisis ostensa.

(39) De Vita Janfenii, pag. 64.

It is a very good book (g).

(g) It is intitled, De Historia Jansenismi Libri VI. quibus de Cornelli Jansenii Vita & Moribus, nec non de ipsius & sequacium Dogmatibus differitur. At Utrecht, 1695, in 8vo.

(50) St Romanus, Journal Chronologique & Historique, Tom. II, pag. 612.
(51) Ubi supra, pag. 132, & seq.
(52) Page, 135.

such a thing. Let us add this curious particular: The last time the most Christian King was at Ipres, an hospitaler nun who had assisted him (53) in his last sickness, and who spoke of him as of a saint, related with tears in her eyes to some lords of the court, that she held him by the arm when he wrote his will, and she intreated them at the same time to beg of the king that he would cause the injury to be repaired, which had been done to so holy a man in taking away his tomb-stone (54).

(53) That is, Jansenius.

(54) Morale Pratique, Tom. VIII, pag. 462.

J A P A N. This is a name of a great country situated eastward of China, and divided into several islands. There is so much said of it in Moreri's Dictionary (a), that I have but few things to observe. Nor will I collect all that he has omitted; but confine myself to some points of the Theology of those islanders. The monarchy of Japan is divided into two states, the ecclesiastical and the secular. The first is composed of the Bonzes, and the second of the nobility and commons: The name of Bonzes is common to all the ministers devoted to the service of the gods which the Japanese worship. They profess celibacy [A], and . . . have a Pontiff, whom they call Jaco or Xaco, who has authority over all the rest, and judges of the affairs of religion, and determines what ought to be practised concerning the worship of the gods, and believed concerning the nature of them. He elects the Tundes, who dispose of things less important, and represent in some manner our bishops (b) . . . The Japanese have two sorts of gods. The first are the demons, whom they worship under several figures, not in hopes of receiving good from them, but for fear of being hurt by them. The second sort are the kings, the conquerors, and the learned, whom they have placed in the number of their gods. The chief are Amida and Xaca [B] . . . They reckon a dozen sects, or a dozen religions in Japan; and every person is at liberty to chuse which he pleases: which occasions no divisions; because, say they, understandings have no tie of relations or kindred like bodies. Amongst these sects there are three principal ones. The first hopes not for a life after this, and knows no other substance, than what strikes the senses . . . The second, which believe the immortality of

(a) Especially in the edition of 1699.

(b) Journal des Savans, July 18, 1680, pag. m. 402, in the Abstract of the History of the Church of Japan, by the abbot de T.

[A] The Bonzes profess celibacy. But they do not always observe it very exactly. They abstain from flesh and fish, shave their beards and hair, and conceal their debaucheries under the appearance of an austere life (1). Their greatest profit is the burying of the dead. The people being persuaded, that in the other life the souls of their relations may fall under some necessity, spare nothing to procure them the comfort, which the Bonzes promise them by means of their great alms. They use another artifice to enrich themselves, viz. to borrow money, which they promise the simple people to pay again in the other world with great interest; and borrowing it in this manner, they say among themselves, that the term is worth the money (2). They who would draw a parallel betwixt the east and the west, would find it defective as to the article of these debts payable in the other world; but then celibacy ill-observed, cheats hid under the appearances of a rigid morality, the profit of burials, and the assistances sent to souls separated from the body, would afford them a great many comparisons. I am persuaded that many people in reading Mr Cousin's (3) extracts, could not chuse but say inwardly to themselves, thus it is with us. It would be very curious to see an account of the west written by a Japanese, or a Chinese, who had lived many years in the great cities of Europe. They would pay us in our own coin. The missionaries, who go to the Indies, publish relations, in which they particularize the falsities and frauds they have observed in the worship of these idolatrous nations. But whilst they ridicule them for it, may they not fear that it should be replied to them, Quid ridet? mutato nomine de te fabula narratur (4). — Why dost thou laugh, changing the name, the story is told of thee, or that they should be upbraided as they deserve, who wink at their own faults, and discover with the utmost sagacity the vices of others?

Cum tua pervideas oculis mala lippus inunctis,
Cur in amicorum vitii tam cernis acutum,
Quam aut aquila, aut serpens Epidaurius? at tibi contra Evenit, inquirant vitia ut tua rursus & illi (5).
VOL. III.

*When thou art blind and senseless to thine own,
How dost thou see thy friend's disease so soon:
That scarce a serpent can so quickly spy,
Nor any eagle hath so good an eye.
Well then, go on, pursue thy mean design,
As thou dost find their faults, so they will thine.*

CREECH.

[B] The chief are Amida and Xaca. The first is represented under several monstrous figures. In one of his temples which is at Iedo, he is carried on a horse with seven heads. The finest of his temples is near Meaco, and is five hundred feet in length. There are in it a thousand idols of massy gold. As for Xaca, or Xaca, the Bonzes tell a thousand impertinent stories of him. They say that he was born eight hundred times in different species, before he was born of a woman, and that when he was born, he came out of his mother's sides, eating his way with his teeth. The truth is, that Xaca was a sophister, who persuaded people every thing he had a mind to. His mother, when she was big with child of him, dreamed, that a white elephant came out of her mouth: for which reason the elephants of that colour are had in veneration in the Indies, in China, and Tonquin, at Siam, and Pegu. They are served in vessels of gold, and the great lords go in crowds to visit them, and pay them the same honours as they do to kings (6). One of the three principal sects of the Japanese, is that of the worshippers of Xaca. They live in common, rise at midnight to sing hymns, and meet every evening to hear the discourse, which their superior makes to them upon some subject of morality; then he gives them some points to meditate upon. Sometimes he represents to them a dying man, and relates the reproaches, that the soul and body make to one another in this last moment. The meditation lasts an hour. When it is over, every one gives the superior an account of the thoughts which came into his mind, and of the resolutions he has taken (7).

(6) Journal des Savans, ubi supra, pag. 495.

(7) Ibid pag. 436.

6 Z

[C] These

(c) Ibid. pag. 474.

(d) See the remark [B].

(e) See Possévin. Biblioth. Select. lib. x, cap. ii, pag. m. 410, Tom. I.

(f) See Possévin. ibid. cap. iii, pag. 415.

(g) See the Journal des Savans, ubi supra, pag. 499.

of the soul, and another life, is followed by the best sort of people, and is called the sect of the men of the most high God. The third is that of the worshippers of Xaca (c). The Bonzes may be compared to our Monks (d). Some authors say (e), that the most general division, that can be made of the sects of the Japonese, is to divide them into such as make profession of adhering to appearance, and such as seek reality which does not strike the senses, and which they call truth. They who adhere to appearance believe another life after this [C], for the eternal recompence of good men, and the eternal punishment of the wicked; but those who seek the internal and insensible reality, reject heaven and hell, and teach things that have a great affinity with Spinoza's opinion [D]. They symbolize with the Epicureans, in taking from God the government of the world as a thing contrary to the supreme tranquillity, which, according to them, is his whole felicity. Nay, they go farther than Epicurus; for they deprive God of understanding and reason. They fear doubts that these qualities would disturb his repose, as they experience, that reasoning is attended with some fatigue (f). The Christian religion which Francis Xavier, and afterwards several other missionaries, preached to the Japonese, found no greater obstacles than what the Bonzes raised against him; not so much by their disputes and arguments, as by a method usual with ecclesiastics; I mean, by having recourse to the secular power, and by their care of exciting the kings and the people to the maintenance of the old religion, and the persecuting the followers of the new (g). It must however be confessed, that the Japonese priests entered into a conference with the Christian

(8) In omnem aeternitatem vivent leti admodum felices & sua sorte contenti. Possévin. ibi infra.

(9) Eo quod formae sint naturae detestabiles, excretae & imundae. Id. ibid.

(10) Id. ibid.

(11) Taken from Possévin. Bibl. Select. Tom. I, lib. x, cap. ii, pag. m. 410, 411.

(12) Id. ibid. pag. 411.

(13) Ibid. pag. 429, & seq.

(14) Figuræ carnis, rationis, naturae experti, vitam agentis otiosi, quietis & tranquillitatis plenum. Possévin. ibid. pag. 411.

[C] Those that adhere to appearance, believe another life after this.] It appears that their opinion is that of Amida, Xaca, and Fotoque. They say that in the four cardinal points of the world, there are certain countries, where the inhabitants are in a plenary satisfaction, which makes them enjoy a supreme felicity; that Fotoque made all the laws of Japan, and that they who observe them, shall no sooner leave this life, but they shall go into those places, where they shall be born again, and Fotoque shall transform them, and give them 32 figures, and 80 qualities, with which they shall live eternally in a perfect beatitude, well satisfied with their condition, and very joyful (8). The women shall not be admitted into those countries; but those who shall be saved for having observed the laws of Fotoque, shall be transformed into men: for without that, they could not receive the reward of their good life, they being of their own nature, say they, unclean and execrable (9). As for the transgressors of Fotoque's laws, they shall go from this life into certain infernal places, and they shall suffer six sorts of punishments, which shall never have an end. This is the general doctrine of the followers of appearance. The other sect say thereupon what they think fit, but these agree in this center of unity, and their opinion is that of the ignorant and the vulgar. Et quomodo de hisce rebus una quæque Japoniorum secta loquatur, ut vult, communi tamen consensu quicunque extrinsecam rerum faciem sectantur, in hoc, quod diximus, conveniunt, & hanc opinionem rudes & vulgares homines amplectuntur (10). I borrow all this from the Jesuit Possévin (11), who did not think himself obliged to refute the doctrines of this sect; for since they profess, says he, to stick only to appearances, what they say has no reality nor truth, it is at best but a phantom, or the surface of truth. The Bonzes themselves manifestly confess, that the whole system of Camus and Fotoque was built, or rather forged, in favour of the ignorant, and of weak minds: Nam (ut ipsimet Bonzii, qui sua sententia Magistri & Doctores sunt, aperit fatentur) istam de CAMI & FOTOQUE disciplinam propter rudes & infelices rerum homines, capti, & ingenio imbecillos esse compositam, vel potius confictam, non quod aliquid eorum, quæ in ipsa docentur verum sit (12). Possévin however confutes the doctrines of this sect in his fifth chapter (13).

[D] Those who seek . . . reality, reject heaven and hell, and teach things that have a great affinity with Spinoza's opinion.] They neglect externals and apply themselves only to meditations; they cast off all discipline that consists in words, adhering only to the exercise, which they call SOQUXIN SOQUXUR, that is, the heart. They maintain that there is but one principle of all things, and that this principle is found every where, and that the heart of man, and the internals of other beings, do not differ from this common principle, and return to it, when they are dissolved. It exists, say they, from all eternity, being one only principle, clear and luminous, and incapable of increase or diminution: it has no figure, and does not reason, it lives in idleness and a perfect repose (14). They teach, that they, who in this life have very well known this principle, shall obtain the perfect glory of Fotoque and of his successors; and that they who arrive not to this high degree of knowledge, must be born again several times, and go from place to place, but in the other world they shall be all absorbed in this common principle of all things. They say also, that knowledge does not differ from ignorance, that good and evil are not two beings, and that the one is not separated from the other (15). Possévin reduces this system to these four points. I. That there is but one principle of all things, that this principle is most perfect, that it is wise but understands nothing, and takes no notice of the affairs of this world, since it lives in perfect repose, and like a man that is very attentive to one thing, and neglects all others. II. That this principle is in all particular beings, and communicates its essence to them, so that they are the same thing with it, and return to it when they have an end. III. That the heart of man does not differ from this common principle of all beings, and that when men die, their hearts perish, and are consumed; but that the first principle, which gave them their life, subsists still in them: from whence it follows, that there is neither heaven nor hell, rewards nor punishments after this life. IV. That man may in this world raise himself to the condition and supreme majesty of the first principle, for as much as by the force of meditation he may perfectly know it, and so arrive to the supreme tranquillity which that principle enjoys in itself; that this is all the good that man can acquire, and that till he has obtained it by meditation, and a perfect knowledge, he is tormented with perpetual inquietude: he often passes from one hell to another, and finds rest nowhere. It is very certain, that in this are several things, which Spinoza has not taught: but otherwise it is manifest, that he has taught as well as these Japonese priests, that the first principle of all things, and of all beings, which compose the universe, are but one and the same substance; that all things are God, and that God is all things in such a manner, that God and all things that exist, make but one and the same being. One cannot sufficiently admire that so extravagant a notion, and so full of absurd contradictions, should insinuate itself into the mind of so many people so remote from one another, and so different in their humours, education, customs, and genius. Possévin (16) brings many arguments against the hypothesis of these Bonzes, and confutes it principally by the contradictions it contains; and first he observes, that they have but very few doctrines about the nature of the first principle; that they say nothing upon it with any perspicuity, that they cannot resolve questions, and answer the objections proposed to them, nor confirm their opinions, and that their only shift is to say, that it does not concern men to enquire into the nature and power of the first principle (17). Omnia unico verbo patant se dissolvere, dicentes hominum non interesse hujus principii vim, & naturam perquirere inquirendo aut disputando: quod totum manifeste constat ex ignorantia profectum & natum (18). Note, that (19) Ibid. pag. 419, 420.

(15) Taken from Possévin, ibid.

(16) Possévin. ubi supra, Tom. I, pag. 412, 413.

(17) This is a gross contradiction, which Possévin should have charged them with, for since the greatest happiness of men proceeds from the perfect knowledge of the first principle, it may have of the first principle, it may have of the first principle, it may have of the first principle.

(18) Possévin. ubi supra, pag. 412.

(19) Ibid. pag. 419, 420.

[E] The

Christian priests, and made some objections against them, which shew they wanted no wit (b). They could not hinder the Christian religion from making great progress in a little time; but at last they drove the emperor to such violence as wholly extirpated it in Japan, and very much enlarged the Martyrology [E]. Father Possévin has very sharply censured the laws of the Japonese legislator [F].

(b) See the Histoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans, September 1691, pag. 8, & seq. in the Extract of the History of the Church of Japan.

[E] The violence of the Japonese very much enlarged the Martyrology. Read the Ecclesiastical History of Japan, written by the Jesuit Francis Solier, and the history of the church of Japan, by the abbot of T (20).

(20) It was printed at Paris, in two volumes, in 4to, in the year 1689.

(21) Journ. des Sçavans, July 25, 1689, pag. m. 507.

This abbot admires the depth of the judgments of God, and wonders that he has permitted the blood of so many martyrs to be shed, without making use of it, as in the first ages of the church, as of a fruitful seed for the production of new Christians (21). Without taking the liberty of enquiring into the reasons the divine wisdom may have for permitting at one time, what it does not at another, it may be said that the Christianity of the XVIIth century had no right to hope for the same favour and protection of God, as the Christianity of the three first centuries. The latter was a gentle, meek, and patient religion, that recommended to subjects submission to their sovereigns, and never aspired to raise itself to the thrones by the way of rebellion; but the Christianity which was preached to the infidels in the XVIIth century was no such thing: it was a murdering and sanguinary religion, used to slaughter for five or six hundred years. The Christians had contracted a very long habit of maintaining and aggrandizing themselves, by putting to the sword all those that resisted them. Fire, and hanging, the dreadful tribunal of the Inquisition, cruades, and bulls exciting subjects to rebel, seditious preachers, conspiracies, and assassinations of princes, were the ordinary means they made use of against those that submitted not to their orders. Could they promise to themselves the benediction that heaven granted to the primitive church, to the gospel of peace, patience and gentleness? The best choice the Japonese could have made was to be converted to the true God; but having not a sufficient knowledge to renounce their false religion, there remained nothing to chuse but an active, or a passive persecution. They could not preserve their ancient government, nor their ancient worship, but by ridding themselves of the Christians, who sooner or later would have ruined both, and as soon as they had been capable of making war, would have armed all their proselytes, would have introduced into the country, the soldiers, and the cruel maxims of the Spaniards, and by killing and hanging, as in America, would have brought all Japan under their yoke. Thus considering things only by political views, we shall be obliged to own, that the persecutions the Christians suffered in that country were a prudential means to prevent the overthrow of the monarchy, and plundering of the state. The ingenuous confession of a Spaniard justifies the precaution of those infidels. It gave a specious pretence to the Bonzes to exercise their hatred, and to solicit the extirpation of the Christians. Being asked by the king of Tossa, how the king of Spain became master of so great tracts of land in both the hemispheres, he too honestly answered, that he sent Monks to preach the gospel in foreign nations, and that after they had converted a good number of Pagans, he sent his troops, which joining with the new Christians, subdued the country. This indiscretion cost the Christians dear (22).

(22) Hist. des Ouvrages des Sçavans, Sept. 1691, pag. 13, & 14.

[F] Father Possévin has sharply censured the laws of the Japonese legislator. The first fault he finds with them is, that they command idolatry, and particularly the worship and adoration of Camus and Fotoque. He very well represents the enormity of idolatry, and sets it in the highest degree of injury done to God. He proves this by the example of rebellions; for he says, the greatest crime that can be committed against a prince, is to take away his power, and to confer it on another. Sicut nullum crimen in Regem ac Principem potest gravius admitti, quam eum à suo regno pellere, è regie dignitatis gradu deicere, & alium in summum regie amplitudinis fastigium evehere: ita summa est in Deum injuria, summum in eum scelus admittitur, cum divinus honor, & cultus qui ipsi soli debetur, in alium transfertur, ipsi detrahitur, alii tribuitur (23). As no greater crime can be committed against a king or prince than to expel him from his own kingdom, to degrade him from his royal dignity, and to raise another to his throne, so it is the highest injury against GOD, and the greatest wickedness is acted against him when divine honour and worship which are due to him alone, are taken from him and given to another. The second defect of those laws is, that whilst they severely forbid the Bonzes the use of women, they allow pederasty; they forbid them the former as a filthy and abominable thing, and approve the other practice as honest and holy. In Bonziis omnem cum sæminis concubitus, ut rem sædam, turpem, & detestabilem dominant: at usum puerorum permittunt, imò in eisdem Bonziis coitus cum pueris approbant, ut rem bonestam & sanctam (24). Possévin shews by many reasons that pederasty is a most horrid crime. The third fault is, that forbidding to kill certain beasts consecrated to Camus and Fotoque, they permit men to kill one another, and even to be their own murderers. They not only suppose it to be an action acceptable to those deities, but also the true way to deification; hence it is that great numbers of the Japonese kill themselves either precipitating themselves into the water, or burning, or burying themselves alive, or throwing themselves headlong from the top of a rock. Many also rip open their bellies upon slight occasions; and many mothers kill their own children. Possévin shews the foolishness of such conduct (25). The last fault he censures is, that the laws of Japan declare, that by the mere invocation of NAMUAMIDABUT, or by crying FORENGUELIO, men expiate all sorts of sins without any need of repentance. The Japonese, continues he, make no mention of satisfactory pains, or good works; they pretend that these things are injurious to the merit of XACA and AMIDA, who have been sufficiently afflicted for the crimes of men, and have fully expiated them by their sufferings. This doctrine opens the way to sin; for there being nothing easier than to make an invocation, or a cry, men are sure of easily avoiding all the punishments they have reason to fear, after they have given up themselves to the greatest crimes. Possévin (26) does plainly shew the enormity of that doctrine, and the pernicious effects that result from it.

(23) Possévin Bibl. Select. Tom. I, libr. 2, cap. vi, pag. 435. See thereupon, Pénées diverses sur les Comètes, pag. 347, 350.

(24) Possévin, ibid.

(25) Possévin ubi supra, pag. 436.

(26) Id. ibid. pag. 437.

There is no reader that can be afraid of being mistaken in condemning such a doctrine; but if he ventures to affirm, that the doctrine of the Bonzes is exactly such as Possévin represents it, he may justly be afraid of making a rash judgment: for after all, we ought never to condemn others upon the testimony of their enemies; it is fit to be informed, whether they own that their doctrine has been faithfully represented. It would not be a faithful representation of it, if one should insist upon the literal sense of some laws, without any regard to the interpretations of the doctors: for at this rate, the most reasonable religions might be charged with abundance of absurdities. There are some harsh things in the Scripture, which it would be wrong to consider as the laws of the Christians; for they take them not in the literal sense, they explain, and soften them by other passages, and according to the analogy of faith. We should know whether the Bonzes do not the same thing with respect to some laws of their legislators. I make no difficulty to believe what is said of the tricks and hypocrisy of those idolatrous priests; but I think it probable, that they cover their doctrines as well as their conduct with an outward severity; and perhaps we ought to impute but to some of them, what Possévin charges upon the whole body of their sects. Some Monks have taught, that the most wicked wretches have been saved by the bare invocation of the Holy Virgin. The extravagance of those, who talk of the treasure of indulgences, and who say that the merits of the saints, and their works of supererogation, supply the want of repentance in many men, would afford good chapters for a relation that a Japonese traveller should publish. Were it not an unjust thing, should he relate all this as so many articles of the Christian faith? Once more, I would know what the Bonzes would answer to this question; do you teach what Possévin imputes to you? I should be glad also to see a history written by them of the establishment of Christianity in their islands, and having read those of Francis Solier and the abbot de T. of its extirpation. And if they should write it, after it would still be very proper to compare them together.

JARCHI, or JARHI (SOLOMON) a famous Rabbi, who lived in the XIIth century [A]. His true name is Ifaaki (a). 'Nevertheless, because of that pretended name Jarhi, some believe that he was of Lunel in Languedoc; but he was of Troyes in Champagne, as R. Ghedalia, and the greatest part of the Jewish Chronologers affirm His books are much esteemed by the Jews [B], and he may be said to be their great author.' They sometimes join to the Books, which they call the five volumes, the Commentaries of Raschi, who is their great author upon the Bible, because he is very much skilled in their divinity and traditions (b). Mr Simon, who says all this, had done well to observe, that Rabbi Raschi is the same with Rabbi Jarchi or Ifaaki. He is also called Ijaacites. See the margin (c).

(a) Simon. Hist. Critique du Vieux Testament, pag. m. 545.

(b) Id. ibid. pag. 514, col. 2.

(c) I give the article of this Rabbi at the word ISAACITES.

(1) Simon, Hist. Crit. du Vieux Testament, pag. 545.

(2) See Konig, Bibl. pag. 423.

(3) Idem, but note that Konig, ibid. pag. 406, who after Hottinger places Maimonides in the XIIth century, differs from most authors, who place him in the XIIIth.

(4) Hoornbeek, contra Judæos, pag. 7.

(c) Mezer. Abr. Chronol. Torn. II, pag. m. 799.

(6) Hoornbeek, ubi supra.

[A] He lived in the XIIth century. Mr Simon places him in that century (1). Some say he died in the year 1105 (2). Others say he lived in the XIIIth century, and make him cotemporary with Maimonides (3). Others suppose he lived in the XIVth century (4); for they say he was expelled from France with the other Jews, by king Philip the fair. Now the edict of that king against the Jews is of the twenty second of July 1307 (5). Mr Hoornbeek supposes that this Rabbi was banished from France at that time. He makes him to be a native of Lunel in Languedoc, and observes, that it is a town in which there have been always many Jews. See how he proves it: Unde in epistolis Gregorii, libr. 3. epistol. 21. Venantio Episcopo Lunensi inscripta ita incipit: multorum ad nos relatione pervenit, à Judæis in Lunensi civitate de gentibus ad servitium Christiana detineri mancipia (6). — In the letters of Pope Gregory III, book 3. epist. 21. addressed to Venantius bishop of Lunel, we find the beginning runs thus: We have it from many hands, that the Jews in the city of Lunel, detain for their service certain Christian slaves ransomed out of captivity under the infidels.' It is a gross fault; for Lunel in Languedoc was never an episcopal see. Pope Gregory in that place, means Luna a city of Italy in Tuscany. The ruins of it are to be seen at the mouth of the Magra. Its episcopal see was transferred to Sarzana by Pope Nicolas V (7).

[B] His books are much esteemed by the Jews. We have his commentaries upon the Scripture, in the Bibles of Venice and Basil. They have also printed with the body of the Talmud his glosses or commentaries upon this great book (8). Mr Brun (9) says, that he saw some Jews at Bourdeaux, who were still so fond of the memory of Solomon Jarchi, the most famous of all their Rabbies, for the learned commentaries he made, both on the holy Scripture and the Talmud, that they told me, says he, that they resolved to make shortly a journey to Lunelle (10) near Nismes, to see the place where that great man was born, and from which he had his name, and that they would endeavour to live there, which they believed would easily be granted them.

(7) See Mireus, Geogr. Eccles. pag. 236.

(8) Simon, ubi supra.

(9) Brun, Veritable Religion des Hollandais, pag. 214.

(10) It should be Lunel.

* Jarcha signifies the Moon in Hebrew; so that they call him Jarchi for de Lunelle.

JARDINS (MARY CATHERINE DES) famous for her romances [A], flourished in the XVIIth century. 'She was born at Alençon a little Town, whereof her father was provost. When she came to be about nineteen or twenty years old, she began to consider her small estate; and being poor, and having as much wit as ambition, she came to Paris with a design to make her self known, and to change her fortune. She was not altogether mistaken in this: Having a great genius, she was quickly talked of, and people were ambitious to be acquainted with her. Mr de Ville-Dieu, a gentleman well made, and in pretty good circumstances, was one of the first that knew Mrs des Jardins: he esteemed and loved her, and tho' she was not handsome, he married her. But by ill fortune he died some time after. The poor woman retired for grief into a nunnery; but when she had a little recovered from her affliction, she left it, and married Mr de la Châte for her second husband, whom she buried also. Being sensibly touched with this new misfortune, she utterly renounced marriage, and resolved to spend the rest of her days in gallantry. She began to hearken to the love-discourses of the sparks, and answered them in verses and letters, which have a fine and delicate turn (a). The author who furnishes me with this narrative has omitted several things [B], and has not

(a) Richelet, Vie des Auteurs François, pag. Irvil. Hague Edit. 1699.

(1) I think it was intitled Alchiane, or Alcédamie. I do not remember it well.

[A] She is famous for her romances. The first, or one of the first which she made (1), was to contain several volumes in 8vo, according to the custom of that time. But she did not carry it on so far as she designed; and I have heard the reason of it was, because it was known, that she intended to represent under fictitious names, and with some disguises, the adventures of a great lady, who had under-matched herself. She was threatened with the resentment of those concerned, if she carried on the intrigue to the end of the romance; whereupon she went no farther. But she did not bury her talent; on the contrary, having found out a new way of writing romances, she published a great many with very good success. She brought into fashion those little gallant novels, which quickly shew the good or ill success of a soft passion, and she put out of request those tedious and vain relations of heroical, warlike, and amorous adventures, which had brought so much profit to the Printers of Cassandra, Cleopatra, Cyrus, Clelia, &c. The new taste she created does still prevail; and tho' that sort of books quickly lose the grace of novelty, yet the first romances, that she composed upon this new model, are still read with pleasure; as her Journal amoureux, her Annales Galantes, her Galanteries Grenadines, and many others. She published in 1672 Les Exiliez de la Cour d'Auguste; a romance which an illustrious lady (2) thought very pretty. That which is intitled Les Desordres de l'Amour (3), and Seignol's another intitled Portrait des Faiblesses humaines (4), Letters of the count de Buffe are not inferior to the former. It is an unhappy thing that Mrs des Jardins should have opened a way III, Letter, to a liberty, that is daily more and more abused; pag. m. 362. which is, to father one's inventions and love-intrigues upon the greatest men of the later ages (5), and to mix them with matters of fact, that have some foundation in history. This mixture of truth and fiction is spread in abundance of new books; it spoils the taste of young people, and makes one unwilling to believe what is really credible. See the remark [C] of the article NIDHARD.

[B] Mr Richelet . . . has omitted several things. Since I observe this, it would be proper for me to vemb 1681, art. 1, and the Journal des Savants, Novemb. 1685, pag. 494. I may be excused: but Richelet cannot so well come off; for as he lived in Paris, and led no sedentary life, it was an easy thing for him to inform himself of the time that Mrs des Jardins left the country, and settled in the capital city of the kingdom. He might as easily have learned what acquaintances she first contracted, what patrons she got, at what time, and with what book

(4) See the Œuvres Nouvelles, Novemb. 1681, art. 1, and the Journal des Savants, Novemb. 1685, pag. 494.

(5) See the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, Oct. 1684, in the Catalog. n. 5.

not been exact in the circumstances of time; for he will have it that she did not begin to lend an ear to love-discourses, till after the death of her two husbands: But I am assured from many hands, that this date is very ill placed, and that this woman's gallantry was infinitely less than ever at the time he speaks of. There was in the Spanish Netherlands one Mrs DES JARDINS, cotemporary with this, whose name and picture have for some years together been placed in the front of the Almanack. She that makes the subject of this article, died in the year 1683 (b).

(b) See the Mercure Galant for November, 1683, pag. 267.

book she first came out; what was the date of her first marriage and first widowhood, of her second marriage, and of the death of her second husband; the chronological series of her romances; the time of her death, and many things of this nature, of which he has not said a word; and yet you see at the top of the pages, The lives of the French authors. Can a title be more shamefully abused? Can we call that a narrative, in which so many essential things are wanting? You will tell me doubtless, that many readers will not be angry at those omissions; but this does not justify the writer. They would not have been displeased to find in his book the things that he has forgotten. Abundance of other readers would have been very glad to have seen them. He has not then taken the best method; for it is much better to do what pleases many people and displeases no body, than to do what displeases some, and does not displease others.

JARRIGE (PETER), a native of Tulle in Limousin, one of the most famous preachers among the Jesuits, but otherways a very ill man [A], did so resent the not obtaining in his order the employments he thought he deserved, that he resolved to turn Protestant. He communicated his design to a minister (a), who contrived expedients for his retiring into Holland (b), and he made his abjuration in the consistory of the church of Rochelle on Christmas-day 1647. Being arrived at Leyden, he preached before a numerous congregation, concerning the motives of his conversion; and afterwards endeavoured to make people believe that he was no longer a Papist. The States granted him a pension (c). But the Jesuits made informations against him with the utmost fury, and used all possible means to defame him. They got him condemned by the judge of Rochelle to be hanged, and afterwards burnt . . . But all these proceedings served only to make public the vexation this loss gave them, and to furnish Jarrige, who was violent and vindictive, with a pretence to revenge himself upon them. He did it by a book intituled Les Jesuites mis sur l'Echafaud, (The Jesuits brought upon the Scaffold) in which he treated them in so bloody a manner, that their society never had such a mortification (d). He published also a particular answer to Peter Beaufets, who had slandered him in a heinous manner (e). One would have thought, that he and the Jesuits, whom he had so strangely defamed, could never be reconciled; and yet the Jesuit Ponthelier (f), who was then at the Hague in the retinue of an ambassador, did not despair of bringing him back; and he managed him in such a manner, that he brought him to a resolution of returning to the church of Rome. The thing was executed in 1650. Jarrige left Leyden, and went to the Jesuits of Antwerp, and immediately published his recantation [B]; but it

(a) To Mr Vincent, minister of Rochelle.

(b) Histoire de l'Edit. de Nantes, Tom. III, pag. 93.

(c) Jarrige, Retraction, pag. 101.

(d) Hist. de l'Edit. des Nant. ubi supra.

(e) In a book intituled, Les Impietez & Sacrileges de Pierre Jarrige. Retraction. de Jarrige, pag. 70.

(f) See the remark [C].

[A] He was a very ill man.] This is indisputable from what he confesses himself in his Retraction. So that I need not use the argument which a very worthy man enforced one day in the presence of several Protestants. He said, that a man of letters, as Jarrige was, and perpetually taken up with preaching, could not have remembered at Leyden all the little adventures he displayed in his Jesuites mis sur l'Echafaud, and in his answer to James Beaufets, unless he had writ them down, as he heard of them, with the names and surnames of the persons, and with all the little circumstances of time and place. Now this was a sign of a corrupt mind, and the character of an ill man; for he would never have been at the pains of keeping such a register, if he had not designed to lay up arms for the time to come, in case he should break with the Jesuits. He was thinking of revenge, and of the means of making himself dreaded, even before he knew whether he should ever have occasion for them. There are some men who keep even the least notes of their friends, and especially take care of such notes which they might take advantage of in case of a rupture. They consider the inconstancy of our passions, and they love, as if one day they were to hate (1), and take their measures accordingly. It is certain, that those who keep with that view the letters of their friends, their most free conversations, and strictest confidences, are dishonest men. The person I speak of, used this comparison against Peter Jarrige's diary. I will not vouch for this thought; I relate it only as a meer matter of fact, every one may judge of it as he pleases. I have no occasion for it to comment upon my text, as will appear from the following remarks.

(1) Ita amicum habere, posse ut fieri inimicum potes. Publilius Syrus, apud Macrobi. Saturn. lib. II, cap. vii.

(2) Pag. 8.

(3) Pag. 11.

[B] He immediately published his recantation.] He confessed (2) 'that a virulent passion of rage had made him leave the Jesuits, and that there was nothing (3) in the cursed and scandalous sermon he preached at Leyden, but what was truly speaking a blasphemy, V O L. III.

'so much the more punishable in the judgment of God, because his conscience gave the lie to his words.' He accused himself (4) 'of having cloathed his first and impudent lye with circumstances no less false than criminal, namely, that God had for sixteen years before put into his heart the first foundations of the work he had begun some months before in his own country, and which he so happily and satisfactorily accomplished in Holland.' He confessed (5) 'that by a further malice, he had defamed many innocent persons, to revenge himself of two men whom he thought culpable; that upon the reading of the sentence by which he was condemned to die (6) for a religion, which he detested in his heart. . . . Rage deprived him of his judgment, and that not knowing what he did, he had done like those mad dogs, who bite their masters without knowing them. Being therefore destitute of reason, says he (7), and seized with a spirit of vengeance, I wrote a virulent book against the province of Guienne, from whence I came. . . . I used all manner of artifices to bespatter their reputation. Rhetoric is like prospective glasses, which make little things appear great, and represent a frog as big as an ox. It was sufficient for me to have some slight foundation to build a great crime upon; I did not care to speak truth, provided I had some judicious subterfuge to cover my lyes with. I industriously laboured upon a little matter, and by the circumstances I added, I made a great elephant of a little fly. Those who know the little accidents, and of small consequence, that happened in that holy province, see better than others, that the desire of revenge supplied me with a great deal of art to magnify little things, and with too much invention to make them probable. The reverend Father Ponthelier warmly, but modestly, reproached me with it, when I was in the most violent heat of my anger, and received no other answer from me but

(4) Pag. 22.

(5) Pag. 69.

(6) The provincial of the Jesuits obtained a sentence in the Presidial of Rochelle, whereby Jarrige was condemned to be hanged, and then burnt. He carried me, says Jarrige, pag. 72 of his Recantation, to the gallows, and from the gallows to a wood pile; he caused the sentence of the Presidial to be printed, and the causes of my punishment to be explained; he sent the sentence into all the provinces; and what was done against my effigies, had been done against my body, had not God protected me in a country, where I was only to sin against him.

(7) Pag. 73.

7 A

it is not known what became of him afterwards. Many people believe that the Jesuits imprisoned him for life [C]. This might be; but other reasons may be given why such a man should be seen no more [D]. I am persuaded, that the historian quoted by me, will

(8) Pag. 77.

but this, that since Father Rousseau and Father Beau-fair had used a thousand tricks and inventions to get me condemned to the flames, it was very reasonable, that I should find inventions to revenge myself, and that I should build upon a little foundation beinous accusations, as they had built theirs upon appearances. I added, that they had not only written as I did, but that they had actually banged and burnt me in effigy . . . Like a revengeful man, I took the wrong way to exercise my resentment . . . If I met with any slight occasion to glofs upon, I failed not to make my conjectures pafs for proofs; and if it happened that any were suspected, right or wrong, either at home or abroad, I took those suspicions for truths, and endeavoured to make worthy men pafs for great villains, who, upon a serious inquiry, will be found guilty of meer indiscretion or at most of an inconsiderable fault. Any one that shall seriously and impartially examine my discourse, will find, that I made specious and artful preludes to make my forgeries go down the better. I have said too much to be believed, and the Heretics themselves, though for the time to come they will lay great stress upon my defamations, disapproved them in the synod of Middleburg: and a man must needs be as much incensed as I was, when I wrote that book, to give credit to my contumelies. Certainly, if any thing did happen, those that were guilty were dismissed from the society, which having the qualities of the great ocean, cannot keep dead carcasses in it's bosom. My accusations are therefore unjust, having charged an illustrious order with the faults of those they have expelled as unworthy to live amongst the saints, and to entertain the thoughts of the devil amongst angels. My fury prompted me to discover the evil, and to say nothing of the remedies applied to it. I have indeed said in some places, what some had done: but I did not add that they were immediately, and without any delay, expelled as pestiferous men. I made a satire to revenge my self, and not a panegyric to praise them. Those who know the Jesuits, will no doubt believe, that the crimes of Regicide, Infanticide, Sodomy, and such other abominable transgressions, are meer forgeries . . . (9). How often have I, against good reasoning, made use of captious reflexions to draw a general inference from a particular thing, and to ascribe to the whole society, what could have been verified but of one private person, if I had been reduced to a judicial evidence? What stories have I not forged and altered a thousand ways, in order to cut more sensibly, and to make deeper and more dangerous wounds? if I would refute every thing in particular, or give a reason of my accusations, I should trouble you, dear reader, with a thousand circumstances, which would render my retraction very tedious and irreligious. It suffices then to say, that I retract that pernicious book in general, and in all it's parts, without taking in the things which I have said of Father Rousseau and Father Beauvais for my justification and defence. I beseech the equitable readers to take this present book as one of my declarations, and I entreat them through the merciful bowels of JESUS CHRIST, never to read the other, because it is heretical, and never to cast their eyes upon it, because it is a work which an evil conscience has conceived, melancholy has formed, and revenge has produced.

(10) See the Apologie pour les Reformateurs, &c. livr. 1, chap. ix, pag. 254. Edit. in 4to, and the Critique Generale, Letter 10, pag. 147, of the third edition.

I leave my reader to judge, whether the gentlemen of Port Royal have any good reason for maintaining, that Peter Jarrige published an insufficient recantation, and that he indeed accuses himself of having written his book against the Jesuits with too much passion, but that he does not disown, in particular, any of the scandalous stories he had related. Those who answered Maimbourg's history of Calvinism, failed not to take advantage of this reflexion of the gentlemen of Port-Royal (10). [C] Many people believe the Jesuits imprisoned him for life. As he foresaw that this would be said, or something worse, he affected to make it known, that the Jesuits had given him a very good reception, and that they who would not believe it, might come and see him. Here is what he wrote to a merchant. 'I know very well, that the ministers and gentlemen I have left, will say, that I am dead or imprisoned; but do me this favour, to desire those who shall come to Antwerp, to come and see me in the college, and I promise you, I will not only speak to them with freedom, but, if they please, I will wait on them through the town, and travel with them into the Catholic territories (11). To which you may add this passage of his recantation (12). 'I know very well, that the Heretics, measuring the actions of others by their own, will spread false reports, that I have been poisoned, or clapt up in a dungeon, where I can only see the light through a hole; that the reverend father John Ponthelier, who was the principal instrument God made use of to take me out of the abyss, has seduced me, and cunningly conveyed me from the United Provinces, where I was safe, to deliver me into the hands of my enemies, or to death. But this concerns the conversion of all the apostates of several orders, who are still in the mire of error, and only kept in it by the fear of punishment, to know that these stories are false, and that I am escaped out of the power of the wolves, to enter into the bosom of a merciful pastor, who glories to carry the straying sheep upon his shoulders. Certainly, if I was treated according to my crimes, an imprisonment of ten years would not be sufficient to expiate them. But since I return into the bosom of my father voluntarily, and without constraint, where sin has for two years abounded, grace at present doth much more abound.' He affected to make it known how many securities had been granted him. 'I have obtained from his majesty, said he (13), 'one of the finest patents of pardon and absolution that ever was granted: so that I neither fear Bourdeaux, for the book, nor Rochelle, for the sentence of death. I have received in the second place, letters of assurance from our holy father the Pope, with power to retire into any Catholic town I please, in which he has commanded all magistrates and ecclesiastics to protect me, being contented that I should only wear the habit of a priest. I have received thirdly, a passport from the arch-duke Leopold, through all his territories. Fourthly, the general of the society of Jesus, Francis Piccolomini, has sent me a patent to enter again among the Jesuits, where I am with an entire abolition of my fault, without imposing upon me any penance or satisfaction, except what I shall take upon myself: the same has given me other patents to go into what kingdom or province of the world I please, so that I have the choice of all the colleges of the society: all this is signed with the great seals of his office, and nothing is more authentic. And to compleat my happiness, Father Ponthelier, who has procured me all these favours and wonders, has leave to live with me as long as he pleases, and he will never leave me till I am entirely satisfied, I can assure you of it. Besides (which is a thing granted to no body) I have the choice to be either a secular priest, or to live in the society of the Jesuits; and I expect a definitive answer from Rome.'

[D] Other reasons may be given why such a man should be seen no more. His recantation proved him to be the greatest rogue upon the earth; for in it he acknowledged, that to revenge himself of two Jesuits, he had defamed the whole society with false accusations of regicide, infanticide, sodomy, and such other abominable crimes (14). When a man owns himself a public calumniator, with respect to such crimes as these, the best thing he can do, is to conceal himself all the rest of his days. If he has any conscience, he ought to confine himself to a place of penitence as long as he lives; if he has none, and has any sense of honour left, he ought to shun all company, and, like Bellerophon, avoid the very footsteps of men.

Ἄλλ' ὅτε δὴ κἀκεῖν ἀπ' ἡμεῶν παῖσι θεοῖσιν,
ἦτοι δ' ἀπαπειρίον τὸ Ἀλκίον ὄϊον ἄλ' αὐτοῦ,
Ὅν θυμὸν καλῶν, πᾶτον ἀνθρώπων ἀλυσίνων.

(11) Lettre de Jarrige au Sieur G. M. Marchand à Leide, datée d'Antwerp le eight of May, 1650. It was printed at Leyden the same year, with an answer, which I shall mention hereafter, in the remark [F].

(12) Pag. 4.

(13) Letter to the merchant of Leyden.

(14) Retraite, pag. 79.

Sed

will not take it ill, if for the instruction of the public, I rectify his account [E]. In the answers that were made to Jarrige's retraction, it was said that his morals had not been

Sed quando jam & ille invivus fuit omnibus diis, Ille quidem per campum Aleium solus errabat, Suum animum excedens, vestigia hominum vitans (15).

*Afflicted by the gods he roams alone
O'er the Aleian plains, and seeks mankind to shun.*

He ought then to practise what Balzac said he would do for a much lesser reason. I would go, says he (16), and eat my heart in the deserts of Thebais, ipse meum cor edens, hominum vestigia vitans.

[E] The historian quoted by me, will not take it ill that I rectify his account.] Jarrige was a turbulent and ambitious man, and possibly he converted himself more out of spite to see himself crossed in the design he had to arrive to the dignities of his order, than out of any zeal for the truth. He made an abjuration of the Romish religion, in the confilatory of Rochelle, on Christmas day, after which he retired into Holland. This was the first breach made in their society, none of which, before this man, was ever known to forsake the Catholic religion. At least, if others have left it, there was no noise made about it, either because the Jesuits prudently thought fit to be silent, or because these Persons did not deserve that any complaints should be made of them (17).

Some time after his book was published, Jarrige disappeared, and the Jesuits boasted, that as he left their order, only out of anger, he was returned to it out of repentance; that he had shut himself up in one of their houses, to hide himself from all worldly commerce, and to do penance all his life. But because he was never seen afterwards, it was believed on the contrary, that the Jesuits had caused him to be carried off, and that they had secretly revenged themselves upon him, for the displeasure he had given them by his change. Indeed, it is not imaginable, that after they had made so much noise for the loss of him, they would not draw some advantage from his return, and produce him at least some times in the provinces, where his desertion was known, to lessen the joy that the Protestants conceived upon that conquest. Besides, we have had since many other experiments of what they can do against those that desert them, and we are no longer ignorant, that they know how to steal them away from their safest retreats, and make them expiate with long sufferings, the crimes of violating their vows (18). I shall only make three remarks upon this narrative.

The first will be short: This author should not have expressed himself by a possibly upon the motives of Jarrige's change. It is evident that anger was the only cause. Mr Spanheim was convinced of it at the first conversation he had with him (19), and his whole retraction shews it.

My second observation is, that it was not the first breach made in the society of the Jesuits, attended with consequences that made a great noise. In the XVIth century, a Jesuit called Elias Hasenmullerus, left the order to turn Lutheran. He was a man who had curiously observed both the strong and weak side of that society; so that for fear of his publishing the history of it, the Jesuits did all that was possible to seize him. He had the good luck to avoid their snares, by hiding himself sometimes in one place, and sometimes in another but at last, to put himself out of the reach of their conspiracies, he retired to Wittemberg, in the year 1587 (20), where he spent his time, in putting the last hand to a history of the Jesuits, which he designed to publish. He died before he could do it: his manuscript was published some time after by Polycarp Lyserus (21). It is a very strong piece against the Jesuits (22), and take it altogether, it is more provoking than the books of Jarrige, though perhaps there are not so many particular adventures in it. This work was received with great applause. The Jesuits caused it to be refuted by James Gretserus, which occasioned several books pro and con.

I have said, that perhaps Hasenmullerus does not tell so many adventures as Jarrige; but it is certain, that in the chapter of the vow of chastity, he relates some that are very scandalous; and doubtless to make the impurities of which he accuses the Jesuits, the more abhorred, he has laid open many precautions, with which he says they fortify themselves against this sin. He says, they make use of foods that mortify and enervate the flesh, and that they order watchings, fastings, whippings, and hair-cloths, to those that confess their temptations. 'In cibis & potu variis utuntur herbis & pharmacis, quibus naturæ vim enervant, & sobolem, ut ita dicam, intra viscera propria occidunt μωδῶς.' ἁπασι, & à Deo ordinatæ humanæ propagationis hostes. Si qui fratres in confessionibus conqueruntur de carnis infirmitate, flammis atque ustione, eam ut extinguant ordinant illis vigilias, jejunia, cilicia, & flagella, quibus carnem suam doment, castigent, & in servitutem, ut loquuntur, spiritus redigant (23).

— In their meat and drink, they make use of several sorts of herbs, and other drugs, whereby they enervate the strength of nature; and thus these masturbators, if I may use the expression, destroy their children even in their own bowels, and are enemies to the propagation of the human species, as ordained by God. If any of the brotherhood complain, in their confessions, of infirmities in the flesh, of lustful flames and burnings, they direct them, in order to extinguish these, to make use of watchings, fastings, sack-cloth garments, and scourges, whereby they may tame and correct the flesh, and reduce it, as their phrase is, into subjection to the spirit. He adds, that there are some who study to rail and cherish in their soul, a great hatred for the fair sex, 'Nonnullos vidi qui nihil voluerunt edere, quod a muliere coctum sciebant. Alios dicentes audivi, quoties de scemina cogito, toties stomachus meus & bilis commoventur & conturbantur. Alius dicebat, tædet pudetque me quod à muliere sum in hanc lucem editus; dignus certe cui vacca fuisset genitrix. Alii nihil prorsus boni in tota mulieris substantia esse dicunt, sique ex illis quidam cæteros in harum calumniarum palæstra vincere conantur, illi ad mentionem mulieris expuunt, & in tabula maledicos & in sexum scemineum contumeliosos Mantuanî versus (quos tamen non nisi de malis cecinit) descriptos ob oculos ponunt, ut sic in seipsis majus in mulieres odium excitent (24).

I have known some of them who would eat nothing that they knew to have been dressed by a woman; others I have heard saying, as often as I think of the sex, my very stomach and bile are distorted and disturbed. Another said, it vexes and makes me ashamed, that I was born of a woman; worthy sure to have had a cow for his mother. Others assert, that there is nothing good in the whole substance of a woman; and when some endeavour to outdo the rest in breathing out these calumnies, they spit at the very mention of a female, and when at table, set before their eyes Mantuan's bitter verses on the sex (though his satire is pointed only against the bad) that they may stir up in themselves the greater aversion to women in general. By this we see that all sorts of extravagancies may enter into the mind, under a false devotion; for what can be more absurd, and more resembling a lunatic, than the discourses of those people? My stomach rises, say they, and my cholera is stirred as often as I think of a woman; I am sorry and ashamed, to owe my birth to a woman; I spit when I hear a woman mentioned. I have not found in Hasenmullerus's book, a passage quoted by a modern author (25): he pretends to have read in it, that a workman who was at work for the Jesuits, though they gave him meat and drink enough, could not care for his wife; and yet when he laboured at other people's houses, did very well perform his nocturnal duty, even when he drank nothing but water: for which reason his wife would not suffer him to work for the Jesuits any longer, and afterwards the magistrates of Landsberg (26) did not permit any body to buy their beer. If it had that ill quality, the magistrates were to be praised for forbidding laymen to drink it; for the conjugal duty is so privileged a case, that many casuists submit the laws of the church to it. They pretend, that when fasting hinders a man from paying his duty to his wife, he is ipso facto, dispensed from fasting. See the margin (27).

If the conversion of the Jesuit Hasenmullerus made a great noise, that of the Jesuit Reihing made still a greater (28). It is he, who is thought to have contributed (23) Hasenmullerus, Historia Ordinis Jesuitici, pag. 127, Edit. Francol. 1605.

(24) Ibid. pag. 131.

(25) The author of the Polygamia Triumphatrix. The following words are to be found, pag. 132. Hasenm. Hist. Jel. cap. vi, pag. 99, ubi joculorum, sed tamen v. ram historiam narrat de opifine quodam, qui apud Jesuitas laborans comedens & bibens, uxori benevolentiam debitam non potuit reddere, sed apud alios vel aquam bibens virum se valuit prestare, eamque ob causam non voluit, ut amplius Jesuitis inserviret, uti & postea Landesherrgenies prohibuerint in Bavaria, ne amplius cerevisiam apud Jesuitas emercent.

(26) A town in Bavaria.

(27) These are not obliged to fast, who . . . when they fast, cannot pay a due benevolence to their wives. Emanuel Sa. Anthoni verba Jejunium n. 9. Tolet. Instruct. Sacerdot. lib. vi. cap. iv. Thom. 2. secunda Quest. 147. art. iv. De Mulin in the book of Traditions, pag. m. 343.

(28) He turned Lutheran about the year 1623.

(15) Homer. Illad. lib. vi. ver. 200.

(16) Letter xxxiv, to Châpelain, book v. See Cicero Tull. Quæst. lib. iii. fol. 263, D.

(17) Hist. de l'Edit de Nantes, Tom. III, pag. 93.

(18) Ibid. pag. 94.

(19) Jarrige, Retraction, pag. 7.

O' Hasenmullerus, an Ex-Jesuit, and of his Historia Ordinis Jesuitici.

(20) Taken from the preface of Polycarp Lyserus, prefixed to Hasenmullerus's book.

(21) At Frankfurt, in the year 1593, in 4to.

(22) Hasenmullerus qui fuit Jesuita, & scriptor triumphum Papæ, habet multa bona. Scaliger, in Scaligeranis, postscriptum, pag. m. 205. It is not true that he is the author of the Triumphus Papæ, prefixed to his Historia Jesuitici Ordinis. Maximilian Philo is the author of it. Scaliger's mistake is also to be found in the Catalogue of the Bodleian library.

(g) Biblioth.
Vetus & Nova,
pag. 424.

been edifying whilst he appeared a Protestant [F]. König (g) calls him Jarrichius, and will have him to have published in 1665, the Jesuit upon the Scaffold (b); which implies three faults.

In the Catalogue of the Bodleian Library, he is confounded with another Jesuit, whose work is ascribed to him, and whose name was Peter Jarric. (b) Jesuitum . . . ferali pegmate constitutum. It should be Jesuitum.

buted to bring the duke of Newburg to the Romish communion. See the Article of REIHING. Thus you see two eminent conversions of Jesuits which preceded that of Peter Jarrige. I say nothing of Daniel Peirol, minister of the church of Montauban, and professor in the academy of the same town. He had been a Jesuit, and he wrote something against Father Coton. I have found this in the twenty-first page of Gilbert Voetius's Confraternitas Mariana.

My third observation is, that Jarrige was not carried off: he retired voluntarily, being moved to it by the suggestion of the Jesuit Ponthelier. This appears by the authentic pieces that have been printed. Such is the letter he wrote to the merchant of Leyden, and much more his recantation (29).

(29) See the remark [C], citations (11), (12), and (13).

[F] His morals had not been edifying whilst he appeared a Protestant. I have seen two answers to his recantation; one written by Ezekiel Daunois of Compeigne, a minister of the gospel: The other by John Nicolai, of Luxemburg, a member of the French church at Amsterdam. In the preface of his second answer, I have read, that Peter Jarrige endeavoured in vain to be admitted into the ministry, before the four years of trial were expired, which the synods have appointed for those who come from Popery. 'That touch, says he, filled you with indignation after your last rejection in the synod of Harlem, where you was also accused (your conscience knows whether it was wrongfully) of an action as infamous as those filthy things, of which you accuse the Jesuits of your province to put them upon the scaffold. Now, tho' it was not then examined to the bottom, forasmuch as the witnesses were not present; yet the suspicion remained, considering the great knowledge and experience you have expressed in your book, of such sort of impurities.' The letter which the Leyden merchant wrote to him, will explain all this: these words are to be found there: 'You may remember with what spirit you was led, when you returned from the synod of Middleburg, which you had in vain so vehemently solicited, to obtain an exception to the order made against admitting to the holy ministry (which you was fond of to cause a greater scandal) those that come from Popery, till after a trial of four years. Being refused, you made your presumption, pride, and vanity, plainly appear; and in your way home you happened to be at night in the cabin of the vessel, where were many women, whom not being able to talk with but by signs, you shewed them by candle-light your obscene parts, and made them set up a cry against this villanous and abominable priest, as they called you; which not only awaked a good servant of God, who was there, but all the rest of the crew, who running at the alarm, upon hearing the women talked of nothing but throwing you into the water; which they would have done, had it not been for that good man, who pacified them; but the boatman protested that he would tell it in the place from whence you came.'

JAVERSAC (N.) was one of the authors that entered the lists during Balzac's great quarrel with father Goulu. He was a native of a town near Angoulême (a), and he removed to Paris with a book against Phyllarchus (b) and Narcissus (c), under the name of Aristarchus to Nicander. His criticisms are worth nothing in some places; for instance, he maintains, we ought to say Ruette, and not Ruelle; livraire, and not libraire, since they say in French, un livre, and not un libre. This new author found himself attacked in his lodgings, and even in his bed, with sword and pistol; but as he was young and valiant, he took his sword, and pursued his enemy into the street, and got great honour, for this courageous defence. Nevertheless, the very next day this adventure was sung upon the Pont-Neuf, quite otherwise than it happened [A]. A libel was published, intitled, La Defaite du Paladin Javersac par les allies, & confederes du Prince des feuilles (d). (The defeat of the knight errant Javersac, by the allies and confederates of the Prince of the leaves [Phyllarchus]). I have heard a man of great wit say, that Balzac was the author of that piece, and that it is the best that came out upon that dispute. A sacrilegious calumny was found in the title of that libel (e); for father Goulu was charged in it with that attempt, notwithstanding the sacredness of his profession. Javersac declared him innocent of it, and imputed it only to Balzac (f); but discreet persons could neither accuse Phyllarchus nor Narcissus of it (g). That which is certain, is, that it has been published (b) that Balzac being on his death-bed, remembering, that in his younger years something had passed betwixt Javersac and him, sent one of his friends to his house, which was seven or eight leagues, distant from Angoulême to desire him to make him a visit, that he might have the satisfaction of embracing him before he died. That he really embraced him with an incredible transport of joy, and poured into his bosom an effusion of love, which agreeably put out of their minds the remembrance of their antient quarrel. That Mr de Javersac was so sensibly touched with it, that immediately being all in tears, he made a sonnet to lament for ever the loss of his friend.

Since the first edition of this Dictionary, I have learned some circumstances, of which I will give an account to my readers [B].

[A] This adventure was related quite otherwise than it happened. Never were two things more different, than the manner how this adventure is related by Sorel, and by him that published La defaite du Paladin Javersac (1). This pamphlet says, that the Paladin was of Cognac, where he had pleaded some causes; that after the publication of his book, there was a conspiracy to fall upon him in the open street; but that they were forced to attack him in his chamber, because he kept himself shut up all the day long; that he was surprised asleep in the arms of his landlord's wife, on Thursday the eleventh of August, 1628, at nine of the clock in the morning, and awaked by a salvo of bastinadoes, which lasted as long as it pleased the aggressor, since Paladin wholly resigned himself to providence. The conclusion of the libel is, that the friends of Phyllarchus 'joining in this with those of the contrary party, have sworn to root out as many Javersacs as they can meet with, and to make it plain to bad poets, that besides the golden, brazen, and iron, ages, so celebrated in the fables, there is still a wooden age to come, which the ancient poets have not mentioned, in the miseries and calamities whereof they shall have a greater share than other men.' I make use of the edition of 1665 (2). See the following remark.

[B] I have learned some circumstances which I will give an account of to my readers. Javersac's book was printed and reprinted in 1628, with this title, Discours d'Aristarque à Nicandre, sur le jugement des Esprits.

(2) That is, of the folio edition of Balzac's works.

(a) Sorel, Bibl. Française, pag. 132, Edit. 1667. Note that Cognac is the town mentioned by Sorel.

(b) It is the name that Father Goulu took.

(c) It is the name Father Goulu gave to Balzac.

(d) Sorel, ubi supra.

(e) Sorel. ibid.

(f) See the last remark, citation (14).

(g) Sorel, ubi supra.

(h) Morisset, in the account of Balzac's death. It is in the edition of Balzac's works in folio.

(1) It is a pamphlet of sixteen pages in 8vo. It has been reprinted in the folio edition of Balzac's works, with some other pieces made in his favour.

Esprits de ce temps, & sur les fautes de Phylarque. The first thing to be met with in it, is an advertisement of the Printer, full of lies; for it is there given out, that they were forced to use all sorts of artifices to overreach the vigilance, wherewith the author hindered the publication of his work. He did not love it so little as to be willing to expose it to the rage of envy. Afterwards you find an abusive letter, which he writ to Mr Bergeron, counsellor to the king, and referendary in Chancery. As he supposes that this Mr Bergeron had made difficulties against the granting the king's licence, in order to deprive him of the advantage of being the first that should publish any thing about the dispute of Balzac and Goulu, and to give time to la Motte Aigron to be before him, he expresses a great rage in that letter. In the third place, you see his preface, wherein he mentions the great efforts his enemies had made to stop the impression of his book. At last you find the book itself. This is not the only work that Javerlac has published. In the same year, 1628, came out the Discours d'Aristarque à Calidote sur ce qui s'est passé entre lui & Balzac. The impression cost him a hundred crowns (3); and it was not possible for him to get it done at Paris, 'either with licence or without it.' He says (4), 'that his father had had several honourable deputations, and some of the most important posts of the assembly of the Protestants before the rebellions . . . and (5) that he can prove, that his ancestors have acquired their nobility by the right of veterans, in several honourable posts of the crown of Navarre.' He says also (6), that he had offered to give Balzac satisfaction, either as a gentleman, or a Philosopher. He relates at large, the misfortune that happened to him, of being assaulted in his bed (7). He did a little ward off the blow of one of the three villains that came into his chamber; but it is too honourable a thing for me, says he (8), not to confess, that he struck me in the arm, saying, you was forbidden to write against Balzac. He adds (9) that his landlady was wounded in her little finger; and that he pursued them with sword in hand into the street, and that two hundred witnesses, who saw him in his shirt upon the threshold, had said it even ry where before him; that he made a pass at the breast of him who had struck him, and that fifty persons who saw his sword bend to the hilt, knew that this rogue had a coat of mail (10). He observes (11), that two or three days before, he had had the honour to serve a marquis in a quarrel. Truly, I believe he was fitter to fight than to write books, and that he would quickly have worsted Balzac in a dispute to be decided with sword in hand. He spreads upon the paper some strong rhodomontades against him (12), but he expresses some fear, that his adversary would accuse him of some youthful mad pranks in love (13). We must remember, that he never suspected Father Goula to be the cause of that insult. I know not, says he (14), why Balzac is afraid of me, if he is not guilty; and since he thinks to clear himself so well every where from that crime, by throwing it upon Phylarchus, who has showed himself much more generous, and who has a better opinion of his wit than to vindicate himself. I had so many convincing proofs against Balzac, and so good an opinion of Phylarchus's honesty, that I could not suspect him in the least. My book I think, gave him more disturbance than my person.

Note, that it is easy to know he was born a Huguenot, but not whether he was not so still; for what I am going to quote, is ambiguous. Having heard from my landlady, that I lodged there, after they had made inquiries about it, they asked what religion I was of. She answered, that she did not know it, but that I went often to church. She might have sworn that there is no Catholic, who has a more orthodox faith than I have (15). Bergeron published a letter against the impertinencies and falsities printed by the Sieur de Javerlac, in a letter prefixed to a book, &c (16). There came out also (17) a piece intituled, Le non passionné sur le liere intitulé la défense du Paladin Javerlac. This piece is infinitely more favourable to the Paladin than to his adversary. As to the book intituled Achates a Palemon pour la défense de Phylarque (18); it is a thundering one against Javerlac. I have cited a piece of it in the remark of the article ARTABANUS IV (19).

JENISCHUS (PAUL) was born at Antwerp the seventeenth of June, 1558, and died at Studgard the eighteenth of December, 1647. He was a learned man, and understood several languages. His book, intituled, Tesaurus Animarum, exposed him to a grievous persecution: he was banished, and his banishment lasted above fifty years. He bore it very patiently, and enjoyed an extraordinary good health to the last year of his life, eating well, sleeping well (a), and spending his time in Music, which he understood to perfection, and in the study of the Holy Scripture, and in Mechanics. He had nineteen children, whereof four only were living when he died. He was grievously sick the last year of his life, and he died in acute pains (b). He has been unknown to the Bibliographers of the Low-Countries.

IGNATIUS, founder of the Jesuits. See LOYOLA.

ILLYRICUS (MATTHIAS FLACIUS) one of the most learned divines of the confession of Augsburg, was born at Albona in Istria (a) the third of March 1520. He studied classical learning at Venice, under Egnatius; and at seventeen years of age, finding in himself a strong inclination for the study of Divinity, he resolved to become a Monk, because he could not maintain himself in the universities, and so the only way to satisfy his inclination, was to study in a monastery. He communicated his design to a provincial of the Franciscans, a relation of his mother. But this provincial who was inclined to the Protestant religion [A], advised him to go into Germany, and not to shut himself up in a convent. Flacius followed his advice, and went to Basil in the year 1539 [B]. He staid there some months, and then he went to Tubingen, and from thence to Wittemberg in the year 1541, and became a disciple of Luther and Melancthon. He maintained himself by teaching Greek and Hebrew. Having communicated to Pomeranus, and afterwards to Luther, the temptations that tormented him,

[A] This provincial, who was inclined to the Protestant religion. He deserves a place in the Protestant Martyrology, since after he had been imprisoned twenty years because he was suspected of Heresy, he was thrown into the sea. He was called Baldus Lupatinus. See the margin (1).

[B] He went to Basil in the year 1539. He was therefore nineteen years old. Verheiden (2) is therefore mistaken in saying, that Illyricus made a journey to Basil at seventeen years of age, Mr Teissier (3) has followed Verheiden.

(1) Baldus autem iste, ut hoc in εὐαγγέλιον addamus, paulo post in suspicionem hereseos venit: ac Venetiis viginti ipso annos fuit qualiterque carceris, tandem in mari summersus supplicium fortiter pertulit. Melchior, Adam, in Vit. Theol. pag. 472. See also Verheiden in Effigies, pag. 157.

VOL. III.

7 B

[C] He

about sin, the wrath of God, and Predestination, public prayers were put up for him, and scriptural comforts were administered to him, so that these temptations ceased. He received a thousand tokens of kindness and liberality from Melancthon. They married him, and gave him a public employment in the university in the year 1544 (b). The War having dispersed the scholars in Saxony, he removed to Brunswic, where he made himself famous by his lectures: He went and re-assumed his first employment at Wittemberg, in the year 1547, and a little after he strongly opposed the Interim, and all the gentle means that Melancthon was for; and that he might have more liberty to declaim against Popery, he retired (c) to Magdeburg, which was then put under the ban of the empire. He published several books there, but the most considerable of his labours was doubtless that ecclesiastical history called the Centuries of Magdeburg, of which he had the chief direction. He accepted the employment that was offered him in the year 1557, in the new university of Jena, where he was a professor for five years; after which, not being able to agree with Victorinus Strigelius his colleague [C], he retired to Ratisbonne, where he continued to publish many books. He was invited into Brabant, with some others in the year 1567, to model some churches after the Augsburg confession: but the persecution dispersed all these churches soon after, so that he removed from thence to Strasburg, and then to Francfort, where he found a great declension of his glory; for he was forsaken by most of his adherents, because he was accused of Manicheism, under pretence that he taught, that sin was not an accident, but the very substance of the soul (d). He died at Francfort the eleventh of March 1575 (e). He was a man that had excellent talents, a vast wit, a great deal of learning, and a mighty zeal against Popery; but his turbulent, furious, and quarrelsome temper, spoiled all his good qualities, and occasioned a thousand disorders in the Protestant church. He made no scruple to declare, that princes were to be kept in awe, by the fear of insurrections (f). There was no reason to lament his death; for divisions which are always scandalous, were then very pernicious, because of the advantages which the church of Rome drew from them, to insult the growing reformation. Some have said, that the only good thing he did was to die (g). But this is overdoing things. He published a vast number of books (h); and no man in his time, knew how to rummage old libraries to better advantage. He got from thence an ancient mass book [D], which he printed in the year 1557. This will give us

(b) Micraelius, Synagm. Hist. Eccles. pag. m. 751, is therefore mistaken, when he says that he was professor at Wittemberg, in 1540.

(c) In April 1549. Buchholz, pag. m. 564.

(d) See the remark [C].

(e) Taken from Melch. Adam, in Vitis Germanorum Theologorum, pag. 472, & seq.

(f) Metu seditionum terrenorum esse Principes. Melanctho. Epist. ciii, pag. 134.

(g) Nequidquam recti scilicet nisi cum moretetur. Guil. Budaeus, Centur. XVI. haxatoloyias ad ann. 1575, apud Quenstedt de Patris Erudit. pag. 263.

(4) In the year 1560, according to Micraelius, Synagm. Hist. Eccles. pag. m. 827, 828; but according to Melchior Adam, in Vitis Theol. Germ. pag. 420, it was in the year 1557.

(5) Spondanus ad ann. 1560, m. 32.

REFLEXION upon Flacius's doctrine concerning the nature of sin.

(6) See Micraelius, Synagm. Historiar. Eccles. pag. m. 827, 828.

[C] He could not agree with Victorinus Strigelius his colleague. They differed about the conversion of man, and the power of free-will. They disputed upon it before the dukes of Saxony at Weimar (4). They went into two extremes. Strigelius inclined to the side of those who were called Adiphorists, and Synergists, who ascribed a great power to free-will, and pretended that original sin did only slightly touch the soul (5). Flacius on the contrary maintained, that this sin was the very substance of the soul. The dispute lasted thirteen sessions: the acts of it were published with a preface of Musæus, who was one of Flacius's followers (6). We have here a visible effect of the desire of contradicting others; which is a passion that commonly carries men of a lively wit beyond all bounds. Flacius not being able to content himself with a moderate opposition, set himself at the greatest distance possible from his antagonist; and seeing him maintain that the soul was not wounded by original sin, but in it's accidental faculties, he undertook to prove, that the very substance of the soul is corrupted, whence it followed that sin is the very substance of the soul. Flacius had never thought of that doctrine, if his colleague had not taught the contrary. But if the dispute which arose betwixt these two professors shews what the spirit of contradiction, and the ἀμετρία τῆς ἀνβολῆς, can do, it shews also how fit the peripatetic Philosophy is to foment the divisions of the divines. For Illyricus's doctrine would have offended no body, if they had believed, as the new Philosophers do, that there are no accidents distinct from substances, but that for example, pain is nothing else but the soul itself, as it is modified in such a manner: which being granted, it is plain that Illyricus's doctrine is most true. Sin is not a distinct being from a sinful soul, and virtue is not a distinct being from a virtuous soul. I do not apprehend how the divines, who suppose a real distinction between the soul and it's modifications, can say there happens a change in man, when he passes from a state of innocence, to that of guilt, and from a state of sin, to that of grace. According to these divines, when man sins, a new entity, distinct from the soul, is produced, which, being joined with the soul, composes together with it a whole, which contains two beings really distinct from one another, one of which is called substance, and the other accident. I maintain, that this conjunction does not change the soul, and that it continues to be precisely what it was before that conjunction. Mix as much as you please grains of wheat with grains of barley, you will never make them cease to be wheat: and in all natural and artificial mixtures, it is true, that the compounds become capable of a new action; but each part of them, as it is distinct from every other, retains precisely the same nature it had before. In like manner, if the soul was really distinct from it's sin, that is to say, from the sin to which it were joined, it would not pass into another state. A soul once innocent, would always be so. See what the Nominalists say (7) against those who teach that modes are really distinct from substances.

[D] He got from thence an ancient mass-book. Here is the title of this work printed at Strasburg by Christopher Mylius, in the year 1557. Missal latine, quæ olim ante Romanam circa septingentesimum Domini annum in usu fuit, bona fide ex vetusto authenticoque Codice descripta à Matthia Flacio Illyrico. So Mr Colomiés gives it (8), and possibly he had it from du Peyrat (9). He adds a great many curious things about this missal. He says, 'that the Lutherans believing it to be contrary to the opinion and practice of the Catholics, expressed upon all occasions how glad they were of that discovery; that the Catholics on their part, without any strict examination of this Missal, prohibited it in their indexes (10). . . . That the Lutherans coming to examine this missal with more care, and finding it not favourable to them, suppressed all the copies they could find, so that it is grown extremely scarce, and that the Catholics taking advantage of that retraction, have since caused it to be reprinted (11), notwithstanding the prohibition of the Pope and the king of Spain.' I make no doubt that he took from du Peyrat what he says of the Lutherans about the suppression of the copies; in which I think he has been too credulous for du Peyrat gives no other reason for what he imputes to the Lutherans, but the scarcity of the copies Ecclesiastical Annals of France, and cardinal Bona at the end of his work de rebus Liturgicis. Id. ibid. And indeed Wicelius does not say that the Lutherans mended their fault by the suppression of the copies; and yet if du Peyrat was in the right, they had been already

(7) Si niter, in the Abridgment of Gellner's Bibliotheca, tom. I, pag. 472, gives a catalogue of them.

an

(8) Colomiés, Bibliothèque chosie, pag. 12.

(9) Du Peyrat, Antiquitez de la Chapelle du Roi, pag. 561.

(10) Philip II, by the advice, and at the request of the duke of Alba, and afterwards Sixtus V. Colomiés, Bibliothèque, pag. 12.

(11) Father le Coigne has inserted it in the second volume of his Antiquitez de France, and cardinal Bona at the end of his work de rebus Liturgicis. Id. ibid.

an opportunity of discussing several things. Those libraries afforded him vast collections, which have been serviceable to many people. I mean the memoirs which he gathered to compile his Catalogus testium veritatis [E]. It is said that sometimes he disguised his name already suppressed by them, when Wicelius published his book, which was in 1564. Now du Peyrat's proof is taken from the silence of Cassander and Pamelius his contemporary about Illyricus's Missal in their liturgical books. Nevertheless, says he (12), they have curiously inquired into every thing that related to that matter, and they had a great credit in Germany. . . . to get all the books that might be necessary for them.

(12) Du Peyrat, ubi supra, pag. 618.

He therefore argues thus: if the Lutherans had not destroyed the copies of the missal, published by Illyricus, Cassander would have mentioned this missal-book; for he would doubtless have seen a copy of it. But he has made no mention of it; therefore it is certain the Lutherans had destroyed them. Note that Cassander's book about liturgies was printed (13) some years before that of Wicelius. We shall see below, that Cassander's silence is a very bad proof of the scarcity of those copies, and that it is not a sign that this missal-book was unknown to him. At present I shall only observe, that Wicelius's reproach is a proof against du Peyrat. But let us see what he alleges (14).

(13) In the year 1558. See Palatr. Andr. Biblioth. Belg. pag. 261.

(14) Du Peyrat, ubi supra, pag. 617.

Flavius (15) Illyricus having printed it in the year 1557, at Strasburg by inadvertency, not considering what he did, and the Lutherans and other German Heretics being sensible of the prejudice this ancient missal did to their new opinions, collected all the copies they could meet with, and suppressed them, that it might not come to the knowledge of the Catholics, and be used against them, being entirely contrary to the sects of Luther and Calvin. George Wicellius †, an old disciple of Luther, who at last forsook him, and returned into the pale of the church, † Vide Georgium Wicellium in defensione Liturgie Ecclesiastica.

speaking of Flavius Illyricus in his defence of the Ecclesiastical Liturgy, printed in the year 1564, seven years after that Gallican Missal was published, falls sharply upon Flavius Illyricus on account of that Latin missal, saying that a blind man may clearly see, that by printing it, he ignorantly and imprudently engaged against the sects of Luther and Calvin, and greatly obliged the Catholics. Wicellius's words are these: Matthias Flavius Illyricus edidit repertum Missam Latinam, non triumphanti tamen de thesauro tanto adversus Catholicos, quàm vel cecutienti homini apparuit totum illud quod edidit, contra Lutheri, Calvinique sectas edidisse, sed & Catholicis nobis rem longe gratissimam fecisse; quid enim ibi nisi Missam Latinam, quæ bodie in usu generali est, inveniens, imprudenter defendit? Tantùm abest, ut suo scilicet more oppugnet; locupletior est illa quidem, plusque precum continet, sed omnino tamen eadem cum usitata, cujus etiam dicta, factaque omnia passim sequitur, ut diversam esse confirmare nemo audeat. This undoubtedly was the reason why Flavius Illyricus and his adherents of Germany, being sensible of the fault they had committed, burnt, or otherwise suppressed, this Latin or Gallican Missal, fearing they should be laughed at by every body. That which confirms me in this opinion is, that tho' it was printed at Strasburg in the year 1557, George Cassander who died but in February 1566 †, and Pamelius, his commentary . . . make no mention of it. Du Peyrat repeats the same thing at the 623 page. 'I maintain, says he, that since Cassander and Pamelius, who have been most curious in searching out all sorts of liturgies, have never seen this tho' it was printed in their life-time, eight or nine years before the death of either of them (16), and since it is scarce to be met with at this day in France and Germany; that the Lutherans and Calvinists burnt it as soon as it saw the light, to hinder the Catholics from making use of it against them, as of a sharp knife coming from them to cut their throats, and justify their blind obstinacy against the ancient and true doctrine of the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman Church.' Let us now see whether Cassander's silence proves any thing.

† Cassander's epitaph made by Cornelius Galtrius of Ghent, and placed in the church of St Francis of Poland, witnesses it: it is prefixed to the Liturgies of Cassander.

(16) This is false with respect to Pamelius, who died in September 1587, being in the fifty second year of his age. His book of Liturgies was printed in 1571. See Pal. Andr. ubi supra, pag. 445.

(17) Colomiés, ubi supra, pag. 74.

Colomiés, who confutes Cardinal Bona, should have known that du Peyrat had deceived the cardinal. Therefore his censure should have been levelled first of all against du Peyrat: however here are Colomiés's words (17). 'Cardinal Bona is mistaken in believing that Cassander never saw the Missal published by Illyricus: besides that in a collection of ancient prayers made by Cassander, there are some that are also in Illyricus's Missal; Fr. Baudouin, a famous civilian, writing to Cassander from Francfort in the year 1557, that is, the same year that this Missal was printed, uses these words: Francfordiam reverendus, reperi Illyrici ad me literas cum libello de Missæ ad Palatinum nostrum. (He means Otho elector Palatin, to whom this book was dedicated.) Rogat ille meum judicium de suis Missæ antiquitatibus. Ego id ad te nunc refero, & libellum ipsum mitto de quo quid sentire debeamus familiariter nos moveas, ut de qua re tam multi multa confusè balbutiunt, rectè & distinctè respondere aliquando possimus. — When I returned to Francfort, I found letters from Illyricus to me, together with a book, concerning the Mass inscribed to the Prince Palatine. (He means Otho elector Palatine, to whom the book is dedicated) He demands my judgment on his Antiquities of the Mass. Now I refer that matter to you, and send you also his book, of which let us hear your sentiments freely, that on a subject, wherein many talk confusedly, and beside the purpose, we may be able to offer something that is clear and distinct. I have a better reason than this, to prove that Illyricus's Missal was not unknown to George Cassander; and that which is very remarkable, is, that du Peyrat supplies me with it, the marginal note (18), which he has put in the 622d page, informs me, that mention is made of this Missal at the end of a book printed in 1561, and intitled, De officio pii ac publicæ tranquillitatis vere amantis viri, &c. Now it is certain Cassander was the author of this book. If du Peyrat had known this, he would not have affirmed that this author never saw Flavius's Missal. By this we see that he used a very bad argument, as to what concerns Cassander, to prove that the copies of this Missal were grown very scarce. But will some say, it is certain that they grew scarce, and that Cassander makes no mention of that Missal in his book of liturgies. I answer as to the last point, that perhaps this book of Cassander was printed off before the author received Illyricus's book. The Bibliothèque de Valerius Andreas shews, that this book of Cassander was printed in the year 1558; it may be said so in the title page though the book had been made public in the autumn of 1557, a time in which perhaps Cassander had not received Illyricus's book published in the year 1557. Upon the other point, I shall only say, that there are several works of Illyricus as hard to come by as his Gallican missal, and yet no body went about to suppress them. There are many other causes of the scarcity of a book, besides the care of gathering up all the copies to throw them into the fire.

(18) Here it is: I have corrected in it some errors of the press: Ad calcem libelli de officio pii ac publicæ tranquillitatis vere amantis viri in hæc Religionis diffidio typis excusæ, anno 1561. referuntur doctorum aliquot ac plerumque virorum libri, ex quibus videri potest quàm non sit difficilis contraversarum in Religione conciliatio, si controversæ tendi studium vitetur, inter quos fit mentio ejusmodi Missæ hie verbi, Missæ Latina vetus, quæ ante 700. annos in usu fuit in Ecclesia Gallicana, & Germanica. Argentorati apud Christ. Myllum, 1557.

[E] I mean the memoirs which he gathered to compile his Catalogus Testium Veritatis. The work of it is, that he is accused of having stolen some manuscripts. Let us hear Melchior Adam. 'Tertium locum facile obtinet Martyrologium illud, quod hac occasione compilatum ferunt. Contextit Abbas Joannes Tritheimius Catalogum auctorum. Hunc cum vidisset Flavius, temperare sibi non potuit, quin dissimulatâ personâ & habitu aliquot in Germaniâ Monasteriorum bibliothecas perulstraret: quos commodè posset Historicis clam auferret, atque illo adminiculo librum qui Catalogus testium veritatis indigatur, conscriberet (19). — That Martyrology easily obtains the third place, the occasion of compiling of which is thus reported. The abbot John Tritheimius drew up a catalogue of authors. This when Flavius had seen he could no longer contain himself, but disguising his person and habit as well as he could, he went round to the several libraries of German monasteries, carrying away privately from them such histories as were for his purpose, and with this assistance, he composed his book, called a Catalogue of the Witnesses of Truth. The Catholic writers have not failed to take advantage of that remark. 'Egregium scilicet opus, says Sponanus (20), quod ex furto & sacrilegio impii transugæ confectum est, ut mirum videri non debeat, si tot mendaciis & falsiloquiis scateat à patre omnis nequitia & immunditia eructatis. — An extraordinary work indeed, which is composed out of the theft and sacrilege of an impious turn-coat; whence (19) Melch. Adam, in Vit. Theol. pag. 475. He quotes Keckerman in Method. Hist.

(20) Sponan. ad ann. 1562, n. 32. He is mistaken in calling Melchior Adam name [F]. Moreri is much in the wrong to place him under the letter T, at the word Trancowitz [G].

Spondanus has committed a great fault, speaking of the Centuries of Magdeburg [H]: you may see it in the remark (i), where I shall mention some things relating to the history of

(i) In the remark [H].

'it need not seem strange that it so much abounds with lies and falsehoods, belched out by the father of all wickedness and uncleanness.' See in the 120th page of Colomies's Opuscula, what is said of Lindenbroch. But Spondanus goes too fast, when he concludes from a man's stealing manuscripts, that he falsifies them afterwards, and publishes them with a thousand alterations; Spondanus is not well grounded in such a consequence. Besides, he is mistaken when he supposes that Illyricus published his Catalogus Testium Veritatis, only in opposition to William Eifengreinus's book. It is just the contrary, Eifengreinus published his Catalogus Testium Veritatis in opposition to that of Illyricus. This is plain from the dates of the impressions. Illyricus's catalogue, printed at Basil in the year 1556, was re-printed at Strasburg in the 1562, that of Eifengreinus was printed at Dillingen in 1565. Which confutes the following passage (21).

(21) Spondanus, ubi supra, pag. m. 602. Poljev. Appar. Sacr. Tom. I, & alii passim, as Mr. Baillet says in his quotation, affirm the same thing. He affirms it likewise in his Jugem. des Savans, Tom. I, pag. 537-538.

(22) This is false. See, below, claus. (59).

'Nec vero tam illud emulacione Tritheimii, cujus opus omnino diversum est, suum concinnasse putamus; quam turpiori flagitio ad obcurandum illud, quod Gulielmus Eifengreinus itidem Germanus Catholicus ediderat eodem Titulo Catalogi Testium Veritatis, quo patrum & Ecclesiasticorum omnium qui ad eam usque diem hereses expugnaverant, non parvo labore testimonia pro veritate fidei Catholicae protulerant. In cujus invidiam, simul & ut fucum faceret imperitii, Flacius commentarium suum eodem titulo edidit sed abique nomine auctoris (22), fabulis & mendaciis refertum. — Nor do we think he composed his book in emulation of Tritheimus, whose work is indeed of quite a different kind, as with a baser design to obscure that of Gulielmus Eifengreinus, who was also a German Catholic, and who had published a treatise under that title a Catalogue of the Witnesses of Truth; in which from the fathers and other ecclesiastics, who to this day had written against heresies, he had with no small labour drawn out proofs of the Catholic faith, in spite to whom, and with a design to deceive the ignorant, Flacius sent out his book under the same title, but without the name of the author, and stuffed with fables and lies.' Note, that this work of Illyricus was very much enlarged by Simon Goulart of Senlis in the editions of 1597, and 1608.

But he is justly complained of (23) for having taken the liberty to change the method of it, and to add and leave out what he pleased, without shewing what was his and what Illyricus's. This perhaps was the reason why a Lutheran procured a new edition of the Catalogus Testium Veritatis, altogether like that of Illyricus, except that he prefixed to it what learned men have said in praise or dispraise of it. This new edition came out at Francfort in the year 1666 in 4to. without the name of John Conrad Dietericus, who procured it; but it was published with his name in 1672 (24). I must observe, that Melchior Adam has not well abridged the author he quotes: I have consulted the original since the first edition of this Dictionary, and I have found in Keckerman a circumstance, which should not have been suppressed. Illyricus having learned from John Tritheimus's book, that many authors, who lived in the darkness of Popery, had left some monuments of it's corruption, resolved to render useless the care that was taken to conceal the books of those authors. The passage of Keckerman runs thus: 'Ceterum quod attinet ad infidiosos occultatores Historicorum, certum est in Bibliotheca Vaticana, & aliis Bibliothecis Italiae, imprimis autem in Bibliothecis Monasteriorum, clam servari multos Historicos superiorum seculorum, qui de fraudibus Pontificum, deque abusibus Ecclesiae Romanae, & contra de conversatione verae doctrinae, etiam sub mediis tenebris Papatus scripserunt: id quod manifeste patet ex Catalogo auctorum, edito ab Abbate Johanne Tritheimio, qui istos auctores ex Bibliothecis, ante annos paulo plus centum collegit; quem catalogum cum vidisset Mathias Flacius, temperare sibi non potuit, quin dissimulata personam & habitum aliquid in Germania Monasteriorum Bibliothecas perlustraret, artemque arte elucret, quos commodè posset Historicos clam auferret, atque ad eximium istum librum, qui dicitur Catalogus Testium Veritatis, isto adminiculo conscriberet (25). — As to what concerns the fraudulent concealers of histories, it is certain that in the Vatican, and other libraries of Italy, and especially in those belonging to monasteries, there are privately kept many historians of the former ages, who wrote plainly against the frauds of the Popes, the abuses of the church of Rome, and maintained the true doctrine, even in the midst of Papal darkness, as is manifest from the Catalogue of Authors, published by abbot John Tritheimus, who collected his list of writers out of those libraries, somewhat more than a hundred years ago, which catalogue when Mathias Flacius saw, he could no longer contain himself, but disguising his person and habit, he went to visit the libraries of several monasteries in Germany, and eluding art by art, he laid bold of such historians as he could privately carry away, and then wrote his admirable book, called a Catalogue of the Witnesses of Truth, from the helps which he had thus procured.

(24) Idem. ibid.

[F] It is said, that sometimes he disguised his name.

They pretend that Achilles Gassarus, who published a book of Ostridus a monk of Weissemburg (26), is the same with Flacius Illyricus. This book is an harmony of the four gospels, in German verse. It was dedicated to Solomon and Luitbert, archbishops of Mentz, and to Lewis king of the eastern France (27). Mr Wharton, who pretends (28) that Illyricus published it under the name of Achilles Gassarus, will give me leave to inform my readers, that there was in the XVIth century a German Physician, called Achilles Gassarus, who published some books (29) when Illyricus was a school-boy.

[G] Moreri is much in the wrong to place him under the letter T, at the word Trancowitz. Mr Telfier was the occasion of it, by these words of the 471st page of his first volume. The name of MATTHIAS FLACIUS was Trancowitz. He cites Verheiden's Effigies: But Verheiden does not say so. Let us see what the curious Mr Colomies has discovered upon this subject (30). 'I must set down the true name of Illyricus, which is Francowitz, as Bucholcerus the son gives it at the 831st page of his Chronology; or rather of the continuation of his father's, printed at Gorlitz in 1599. Verum & integrum, says he, Flacii nomen ego ex certis authoribus cognovi esse tale: Mathias Francowitzius, cognomento Flacius, gente Illyricus, patria Albonensis. Konig (31) calls him also Francowitzius; but Quenstedt (32) names him Trancowitzium.

[H] Spondanus has committed a great fault speaking of the Centuries of Magdeburg. He says that they began to be published in the year 1560, and that the fourth tome was the first that came out (33). This is very false; for the three first centuries were printed before the fourth. The catalogue of the library of Francfort published in the year 1604, by Becman (34), mentions the year 1559, for the time of the publishing of the three first centuries, and the year 1560, for the publishing of the fourth. Draudius (35) places likewise the edition of the three first in 1559. Mr Sagittarius says, that according to his copy, the three first centuries were printed in 1562, the fourth in 1560, the fifth and sixth in 1562, the seventh and eighth in 1564, the ninth in 1565, the tenth and eleventh in 1567, the twelfth in 1569, and the thirteenth, which is also the last, in 1574. It is very probable that Spondanus's edition was like that of Mr Sagittarius, that is, that neither of them had the first edition of the three first centuries: but this does not excuse Spondanus, for if he had read the preface of the first, he would have seen that the centuriators complain of a failure, in which their work was ill spoken of, though nothing had been published of what they had written. De sumptibus vere profitemur, say they, nos paucissimi mos habere, qui annuatim aliquid conferunt: nec pro laborum conditione operarii satis sustentantur, sicut ipsimet optimi testes sunt: imo nisi Deus nobis quosdam Mecœnates adhuc excitaret (quod tamen ne fiat

(25) Keckerm. de Natura & Proprietat. Hist. in Auctoris, cap. 1. pag. m. 151.

(26) He lived in the 15th century.

(27) See the Acta Eruditorum of Leipzig, 1661, page 295, in the Extract of a book of archbishop Uther, in which, Historia dogmatica controversiae de scripturis & sacris vernaculis.

(28) Apud Ad. Liphent. ibid.

(29) His Epitome Chronicon, Mundi tota printed in 1574. See Gesner's Bibliotheca.

(30) Biblioth. Vet. & Nova, pag. 306.

(31) De Patria Illustr. pag. 256.

(32) Spondanus, ad ann. 1560, m. pag. 601.

(33) See Coffer Sagittarius, Introduct. in Hist. Ecclesiast. pag. 279.

(34) Ibid.

(35) Ibid.

of those centuries. Varillas, who has faithfully transcribed this fault of Spondanus has added so many others to it [I], that it is hard to conceive how a man of wit could be guilty

* fiat, multi invidi strenue laborant) neque progredi fa-tis expedite poterimus: neque forte totum Opus, ut est institutum, absolvere. Impudens igitur, planeque diabolicum est mendacium, & criminatio tetra istius scurrae, qui nuper in maledico & famoso scripto, sine nomine edito (ubi tamen aliam saltat fabulam) Sardonio risu, & virulento sarcasmo nostrum opus histori-cum Aureum appellat: eo quod ex multo auro Ger-manico fit conflatum. Non vidit sceleratus iste scurra Opus, & tamen non veretur canino, aut viperino potius dente arrodere. Deinde non habet cognitatas ra-tiones nostras ille conviciator ac criminator: & ta-men ut Semei, nos false irridet, ac menitur splendidie. Nam quam pauci, & quam parce dent, quam frugaliter alantur hujus instituti operarii, poterat iste irrisor explorare, non à profugis, sceleratis, pollutis, mendacibus, quibus gubernationis nostrae ratio ne nota quidem est, sed à nobis ipsis. — At to the ex-pences, we truly declare that we have few who contribute any thing to them yearly, nor are those concerned in the work rewarded in a manner adequate to their labour, as they themselves can testify: nay unless God raise up to us some patrons (whom yet many envious persons labour earnestly to prevent), we can neither proceed expeditiously enough, nor perhaps finish the whole after the manner at first intended. Impudent therefore, and plainly diabolical is that false charge and black imputation of the buffoon, who in a late lying and scandalous writing, without the name of its author (wherein he advances a new tale) calls with a cruel sneer, and a sarcasm full of venom, this historical work of ours Golden, as if it were collected with great expence of German gold: this villainous libeller never saw our work, and yet he attacks it with a dog's, or rather with a viper's tooth. Besides, this railer, this accuser of ours, knows nothing of our affairs, and yet, like Shimei, falsely mocks us, and lies most glaringly. For how few and how sparingly they give, and with what frugality, such as have any hand in this work are maintained, this defamer might have known, not from runaway, villains, infamous fellows, liars, who know nothing of our manner of proceeding from ourselves. This long passage may serve to two purposes; for besides that it is an argument against the false date of the centuries, it informs us, what account ought to be made of these words of Spondanus: Quod opus vocatum est ab aliis Evangelicis Aureum, non quidem in laudem, sed ironice, propterea quod multo principum quorundam Ger-maniae, & civitatum auro, oliatum emendicato, sit editum. — Which work has been called by some of the Evangelists themselves Golden, not by way of praise but ironically, because the publication thereof cost the princes and cities of Germany considerable sums of gold, which were for that purpose collected from door to door. He says, that the other Protestants called these centuries a golden work, by way of ridicule, and to signify that it had been compiled at the expence of the German princes; but these Protestants dwindle into an anonymous author, who published a piece under the false name of the students of Wittenberg (36). See in Mr Sagittarius (37) several extracts of the Epistles Dedicatory of the centuries, designed to shew that it was not without reason that Illyricus, Wigandus, Judex, Faber, and the other assistants in that undertaking, demand the encouragement of the public. Note, that the third century was enlarged, when it was reprinted at Basil (38). Accesserunt costi-gationes & additiones locorum aliquot in prima editione depravatorum vel omisorum (39). Observe also, that the four first centuries, and part of the fifth, were composed at Magdeburg; that the fifth was completed at Jena; that the sixth was composed in the place where Illyricus, Wigandus, and Judex were in exile; that the seventh was written in the country of Mecklenburg, and the rest in the town of Wilmars, in the same country (40).

I had written all this, before I found a copy of the first editions of those centuries; for the edition of Basil 1624, in three volumes in folio, procured by Lewis Lucius, being more esteemed than any other, every body will have it, and so it is hard to find the others in private libraries. At last, I have been able to consult the edition, which the centuriators caused to be made at Basil, by Oporinus; but because the copy of
VOL. III.

the three first centuries, which was lent me, has been bound more than once, I could not find in it the date of the impression. I imagine that the last leaf was torn off before the last binding, and it was probably in that leaf, that Oporinus placed the date 1559 (41).
However, this copy of the three first centuries is in Italic characters, and has no additions nor corrections.
But we have seen that the edition which Sagittarius made use of, which is that of 1562, contains some additions and corrections. It is not therefore the first, nor that which I have at present in my hands. Note, that the copy of the fourth century, printed by Opo-rinus, in 1560, is in Roman characters.

[I] Varillas... has added to this fault of Sponda-nus many others.] Melancthon, says he (42), was scarce dead, when the centuriators of Magdeburg began to publish their work on Ecclesiastical History with the fourth volume. This is his first fault. This volume, continues he, is indeed the best of the thirteen, in the opinion of the Lutherans, or the most tolerable according to the Catholics. I challenge him to prove that (43). There were at first but four ministers of Magdeburg concerned in it, Matthias Flacius, John Wigandus, Matthew Judex, and Basil Faber; but afterwards the most learned Lutherans put their hand to it, though we only knew the names of four others; viz, Nicolas Gal, Celestin Hutten, Gaspar Nidpruc, counsellor of state to the emperor, and Baptist Heineck (44).
Consult Mr Sagittarius, and he will inform you (45)
that Andrew Corvin, Thomas Holthuter, Pancratius Veltbeck, Nicolas Amldorf, Nicolas Gallus, Martin
Copus, Ebeling Almannus, Ambrose Hidfeld, David Cicelerus, Gaspar Leunculus, William Radenris, Nicolas Beumeller, Bernard Niger, Peter Schrader, and Conrad Agrius had a share in this work. So that Varillas names three persons, who do not appear in this list, and falsely supposes, that we only know the names of eight centuriators. I have seen indeed in Mr Sagitta-rius, the names of John Baptist Heineckius and Gaspar Nidpruc, counsellor to the emperor; but he does not say, that these two persons had a hand in the centuries, but only that they countenanced Mark Wagner, who went from library to library, in quest of materials (46). This Wagner did great service to the centuriators: he visited the libraries of Germany and Denmark, and that of Edinburg in Scotland, &c. He had a very particular talent for this sort of enquiries, and they gave him a very glorious testimonial, in which they acknowledged his faithfulness, diligence and exactness (47). This testimonial was dated the thirtieth of September 1557, and imports, amongst other things, that he had made several journeys with Illyricus, to collect materials (48), and that having shewn his capacity, he was thought able to continue his travels alone, and that they had committed that trust to him with letters of recommendation, wherein they desired learned and pious persons to communicate to him such manuscripts and monuments, as he could draw any advantage from. Illyricus was one of those who signed this testimonial. Varillas affirms, that the authors of the other sects, sprung from that of Luther, criticised the centuries several ways, and published several extracts of the errors, which they pretended had crept into them. No body, that I know of, has mentioned those extracts. Varillas would have been very much puzzled, had he been obliged to give proofs of what he said. Conrad Brunus, whose invective against the centuries was confuted by Illyricus in 1566, was a Roman Catholic. Eifengreinius, who wrote against them, was so too. Let us see some other faults of Varillas. Illyricus, says he (49), undertook the year following 1561, in Touringia, in the town of Weimar, a public disputation against the famous Victorinus Spingel. He is mistaken, both as to the time of this dispute (50), and the name of Illyricus's antagonist (51). The Catholics observed, that more Heresies had sprung from that of Luther in less than fifty years, than there had ever been from our Saviour's time to Luther (52). This hyperbole, which he took from Spondanus, but not without lessening it, is very childish.
Et videas hinc etiam quam secundum fuerit Lutherus, qui plures protulerit pestiferarum haeresum auctores, quam ab orbis ortu fuerint ante in universo mundo (53). You will find in Moreri, that the list of the principle Heretics from the first century to Luther amounts

(41) Mr Hill, minister of the English church of Rotterdam, who has a fine library, and a great knowledge of books, has assured me that the first centuries were printed in that year.

(42) Varillas, Hist. de l'Heref. livr. xxv, pag. m. 229, ad ann. 1561.

(43) Id. ibid.

(44) Spondanus, ad Ann. 1560, n. 32, pag. 602, calls him Joannem Baptistam Henckelium.

(45) Sagitt. ubi supra, pag. 247, 248, 249.

(46) Id. ibid. pag. 252, 253. Note, that Melchior Adam, in Vit. Theol. pag. 474, says, that Gaspar Nidpruc and John Baptist Heineckius helped Flacius and his colleagues.

(47) Id. ibid. pag. 253, 254.

(48) Cum D. Illyricus aliquot monasteria per-strasset, & cum ipso nulla alia de causa peregrinatum fuisset, quā ut pium hunc constant pro sua tenitate juvaret.
Ibid. pag. 254.

(49) Varillas, Hist. de l'Heref. livr. xxiv, pag. 231, 232.

(50) See the remark [C].

(51) His name than there had ever been from our Saviour's time to Luther.

(52) Varillas, ubi supra, pag. 232, 233.

(53) Spondanus, ubi supra.

(36) See Sagittarius, ubi supra, pag. 256, & 266.

(37) Ibid. pag. 260, & seq.

(38) In the year 1562, if I am not mistaken.

(39) Sagittarius, ubi supra, pag. 259.

(40) Id. ibid. pag. 245.

guilty of so many blunders. I must not forget to say, that the Clavis sacrae Scripturae is one of Illyricus's best books. See what Mr Simon says of it in his Critical History of the Old mounts to 183. Whereas we can scarce find ten or twelve schisms in the first fifty years of Lutheranism. Varillas goes on (54). 'It was probably with a design to escape for some time the persecution which Flacius expected from his friends, because of his outrage at Weimar, that he disguised himself, and went incognito into all the libraries of the German monasteries: he took the most scarce books * he could steal, and made extracts of others. The author of his life says, that he did it in emulation of Trithemius, and to compose like him, a collection of those who had written books. But the thing will not appear probable to one, that will be at the pains to compare those two works together, since they are in nothing alike. That of Trithemius, is properly speaking, a table of ecclesiastical authors, and of books composed by them; whereas that of Flacius is a collection of passages, which seem to be contrary to the Catholic religion, and to favour the rigid Lutherans.' There are many faults in these words; for in the first place, Illyricus visited the libraries before the year 1560. He did it to collect materials for his Catalogus Testium Veritatis. Melchior Adam, the only author cited by Spondanus and Varillas, declares it in express words. Now that catalogue was printed in the year 1556 (55). Therefore, &c. In the second place it is false, that Melchior Adam says, that Illyricus undertook such a work in imitation of Trithemius, and to compose like him, a collection of those who had written books. If Melchior Adam had said so, he would have been very much mistaken, and consequently Spondanus (56) would have said a thing which is really false. See in the remark [E] how the reading of Trithemius's book contributed to Illyricus's design. In the third place, Varillas speaks of Trithemius's book, and of that of Illyricus, in such a manner, as plainly shews that he knew neither of them; for Trithemius does not confine himself to Ecclesiastical Authors, nor the other to the passages that seem to countenance rigid Lutheranism. Varillas supposes that Illyricus's jealousy of William Elsingrem, a Catholic divine, who had wrote a book, intitled, The Catalogue of those, who have given testimony to the truth, determined him to undertake the same task for his Sect (57). It is just the contrary, as we have seen above (58). Lastly, Varillas charges him with publishing this book, without putting his name to it, either because he would no longer quarrel with the other sects, who he knew would not like it, or because he supposed it would be well enough known in the world, that he was the author of the book, though he did not name himself (59). All chimeras! He put his name to that book, and had no reason to fear, that the other Protestants would disapprove his compilation.

There is another thing, which deserves to be censured: it concerns the Epistle Dedicatory to queen Elizabeth. Varillas (60) affirms, 'that it gave more vexation than honour to that princess, and that there are few examples of so extravagant a mis-timing, in the history of men of letters, though they are otherwise accused of not being always the best bred.' The centuriators, who signed the Epistle Dedicatory, could not be ignorant of a thing so notorious, that Elizabeth was a Calvinist in her doctrine, though she was a Lutheran, as to the discipline; and yet they inserted in the same epistle, by which they courted this queen's protection, a satire against the Calvinists. They accused them of rendering, as much as in them lay, the Testament of JESUS CHRIST useless, by reasons borrowed from Philosophy; of rejecting the real presence, and communion of the body and blood of that holy Saviour, against his own words, though most perspicuous; and of endeavouring to dazzle those, who read the gospel, by confounding with subtle and studied interpretations, the natural sense of abundance of passages, so evident of themselves, as to need no explanation. They proved afterwards unanswerably in this volume, and the twelve following, that the church had always believed that presence; and whoever will be at the pains of reading them, will easily observe, that though those who paid them for their labour, had desired them to write with less nicety and more moderation upon that point, that they might not oppose the accommodation, which was then negotiating afresh betwixt the Lutherans and Zuinglians; they had so little complaisance for their Mæcenas's, that they treated no point with greater vehemence and heat than that. These things were all forged in the brains of that historian. He has added this romance of his own invention, to an incident remark of Spondanus, and it is very certain, he said this without any authority for it, and without having read the Epistle Dedicatory, which he censured. There was no incivility, or imprudence, in the conduct of the centuriators. They did not as yet know, how the queen of England would determine herself; they only knew that she laboured to establish a good form of religion. They praised her, and congratulated her for it, and powerfully exhorted her to apply herself to it, by a total suppression of the evils, which the followers of Antichrist had brought in. 'Ad te igitur nunc Regina potentissima & serenissima, convertimur. Audemus enim, te post accepta Regia sceptrâ, etiam de præcipuo fine ac munere tui officii, societatis ac vitæ totius omnium subditorum tuorum cogitare. Itaque non tantum lætis acclamationibus Regiæ tuæ dignitati gratulamur: sed toto etiam pectore patrem Domini nostri JESU CHRISTI invocamus, ac rogamus, ut. . . . Sed quia non satis est bene cœpisse, hortamur etiam te, illustrissima & potentissima Regina, ut totis viribus in id opus incumbas, ut Religio pura, integra, inviolata in toto regno tuo instauretur, omnibus Antichristi crudelitibus, vulneribus, pestibus, ac carcinomatibus rectè curatis, atque sublatibus. Debes enim hunc honorem Deo conditori ac redemptori tuo, debes tibi ipsi, debes subditis tuis (16). — To you therefore, most potent and most serene queen, we now turn ourselves, for we bear that no sooner you received the royal scepter, than you applied yourself to the great end of your high office, the taking care of all your subjects. We therefore think it not enough with joyful acclamations to congratulate your accession to the royal dignity, but we also invoke, with all our hearts, the father of our Lord JESUS CHRIST, and beseech, that. . . . But because it is not enough to have begun well, we exhort you, most illustrious and most powerful queen, that you endeavour, with your utmost force, to establish in your dominions the pure, sound, and undefiled religion; all the cruelties, wounds, plagues, and cankers of Antichrist, being thoroughly cured, and taken away. For this honour, you owe to God your creator and redeemer, to yourself, and likewise to your subjects.' It was not improper that the divines of the confession of Augsburg should add to this a word of advice about the doctrine of the real presence; which they did in this manner (62): 'Illud verò etiam non prætereundum est, cum jam variè passim grassentur quasi factiones opinionum, inter quas aliqui etiam testamentum Domini planè philosophicis rationibus ita evacuant, ut corpus & sanguinem Christi, quod ad præsentiam & communicationem, juxta clarissima, evidentissima, veracissima & potentissima verba ipsius CHRISTI, prorsus removeant, miraque verborum perplexitate fucum faciant: in primis videndum tibi est, ut & articuli fidei sine pharisaico fermento, & Sacramenta à Christo instituta citra omnem adulterationem instaurentur: id quod te facturam esse, omnes pii sperant, summique votis à te contendunt. — But moreover we ought not to pass by, that at this time there rages various factions in opinion, among which some there are which quite make void the Testament of our Lord, by philosophical reasons, whereby they remove the body and blood of CHRIST, as to that presence and communication, which is clearly, truly, and most evidently taught in the most express words of CHRIST himself, imposing on us by a wonderful perplexity of words, that you may restore this article of faith free from pharisaical leaven, and as it was instituted by CHRIST without any adulteration is what you ought to perform: what the faithful hope from you, and what with the most ardent wishes, they expect and desire.' When Varillas supposes that they could not be ignorant of so notorious a thing, as queen Elizabeth's being a Calvinist in her opinions, he betrays his own ignorance; he does not consider, that they wrote their Epistle Dedicatory, at a time, in which it was not yet known up-(54) Varil ubi supra, pag. 233.

* In Flacius's Life.

(55) See Joh. Albertus Faber, in Decade Decadum, n. 96.

(56) Nec vero tam illud æmulatione Trithemii. . . . suum concinnasse putamus, quam, &c. Spondan. ad ann. 1560, pag. 602.

(57) Varillas, ubi supra, pag. 233.

(58) In the remark [E].

(59) Varillas, ubi supra, pag. 234.

(60) Ibid. pag. 230.

(61) Epist. Dedicat. Centur. IV, Magdeb. pag. 8.

(62) Ibid. pag. 9.

Old Testament (k). See likewise John Albert Faber, in the XCVith article of his Decas Decadum.

(k) In the thirteenth chapter of the third book, pag 428, & seq. of the Rotterdam edition, 1685.

on what foot the English Reformation would be established. I know indeed, that their volume bears the date of the year 1560, and that queen Elizabeth's Reformation was established in 1559. But every body knows, that the bookellers put the date of the year following to the books that come out towards the end of August. I believe therefore, that this Epistle Dedicatory, which has no date, was sent in 1559 to Oporinus, the Bookeller of Basil, before it was known in Germany, what ecclesiastical regulations queen Elizabeth had made: however, it could not appear at that time, that this prince had declared for Calvinism with respect to the real presence. Read these words of Dr Burnet: 'Some Protestant divines were named, to revise the Liturgy of Edward. The only considerable change they made in it, was in the article of the Eucharist. The design was to prepare an office for the communion, whose expressions should be so well contrived, that, by avoiding the condemnation of the corporeal presence, all the English might be united in one and the same church; most people were imbued with that doctrine. So the queen charged the divines to say nothing that might absolutely condemn it, but to leave it undecided, as a speculative opinion, which every one was at liberty to embrace or reject. To this end, they left out of Edward's Liturgy, the rubric, which explained for what reasons the church of England or'dained, &c. (63).'

(63) Burnet's History of the Reformation of England, ad ann. 1559.

INCHOFER (MELCHIOR) a German Jesuit, born at Vienna in the year 1584, was admitted into the society at Rome in 1607. He had already signalized himself in the study of the Civil-Law. He taught Philosophy, Mathematics and Divinity, a long time at Messina; and there published a book in 1630, which brought him into trouble [A]. He was obliged to go to Rome to answer the complaints that were made against him in the congregation of the Index. His judges were well satisfied with the reasons he alledged in his justification, and only enjoined him to change the title of the book, and to explain some things more at large. This he did in a second edition. He lived many years at Rome, and at last died at Milan the twenty eighth of September 1648 (a). Besides the works we have of his [B], which shew he had a great deal of learning, he intended to publish several others (b), which would have shewn the great extent of his knowledge, if death had not prevented it. He is thought to be the author of a satire against the Jesuits, intituled Monarchia Solipsorum [C]. He was not pleased with them (c).

(a) Taken from Nathaniel Southwell, Biblioth. Scriptor. Societ. pag. 608.

(b) See the titles of them in Nath. Southwell, ibid.

(c) It appears so from these words of his preface: Illud constat nisi inter solipsos rubiginis t, & copia & splendore inter summes literarum viros fuisse radiaturum.

[A] He published a book . . . which brought him into trouble.] The title of it is, Epistola B. Mariæ virginis ad Messanenenses veritas vindicata, (A letter from the blessed virgin Mary, to the inhabitants of Messina) in Folio. The congregation of the Index having heard Father Inchofer's reasons, gave him leave to reprint that work, with this title, Conjectio ad Epistolam Beatissimæ Mariæ Virginis ad Messanenenses. This second edition was made at Viterbo, in the year 1633. He obtained leave to strike out, and to add what he should think fit. S. Congregatio non solum permittit eidem dictum opus de novo edere, mutato tamen iustis de causis titulo in hunc modum, Conjectio, &c. & quibusdam magis explicatis . . . sed etiam demeritis & addendis si quæ viderentur, liberam & amplam facultatem permittit (1). The meaning of it is, that provided it be not amended in too positive a manner, that the holy Virgin wrote to the inhabitants of Messina the letter that goes under her name, one may be allowed to believe it, and to persuade others of the truth of it. A German writer (2) observes, that Baronius and Theophilus Raynaud are not of Inchofer's opinion concerning this letter. I will not dispute it as to Baronius; for tho' that annalist does not speak particularly of the pretended letter received by the inhabitants of Messina, he declares in general, that all the letters the holy Virgin is said to have written to some towns, ought to be reckoned apocryphal. Traduntur & aliæ ab ipsa ad alias scriptæ civitates, quas cunctas cum careant Ecclesiæ auctoritate, non nisi in Apocryphorum classem rejiciendas esse omnes facile judicabunt (3). But as for Theophilus Raynaud, he ought not to be cited upon this subject; for he only speaks of the letter, which it is said the holy Virgin wrote to St Ignatius, and of his pretended answers (4). The German author is not more happy in quoting Riverius (5), who without making any mention of the letter of Messina, is contented to reject the story of the epistolary correspondence between the holy Virgin and Ignatius.

[B] The works we have of his.] I do not repeat what concerns his book relating to the pretended letter of the holy Virgin to the inhabitants of Messina. His other writings are, Tractatus Syllepticus in quo quid de terræ solique motu vel statione secundum sacram scripturam & SS. Patres sentiendum, quæ certitudine alterutra sententia tenenda sit, ostenditur, Rome 1633, in 4to. De sacra Latinitate, hoc est de variis linguæ Latine mysteriis, ex origine, progressu, fine, cæteraque

instituti sui ratione ad Evangelii prædicationem, Latine Ecclesiæ exaltationem, Romanique Imperii magistratum spectantibus, Messino, 1635, in 4to, and Munich, 1638, in 8vo. Historia trium Magorum, Rome, 1639. Annalium Ecclesiasticorum Regni Hungariæ, Tomus I, Rome, 1644, in Folio. The funeral Oration of Nicolas Ricardi, a Dominican, master of the sacred palace. He published some other books, to which he did not put his name (6).

[C] Intituled Monarchia Solipsorum.] The author of this satire (a) calls himself Lucius Cornelius Europæus. It was printed in Holland, 1648, juxta exemplar Venetum, as the title imports; there is added to it a key to the feigned names. The edition of Venice 1651, ascribes this work to Melchior Inchofer (7). Christopher Pellerus, mentioning this conjecture, says likewise, that this German Jesuit went to Rome after his writing this book, and returned no more. Monarchia Solipsorum quam perhibent scripsisse quempiam patrem ex Societate N. Inchoferum Germanum, postea Roman præfatum nunquam reversum (8). He is mistaken as to that journey to Rome, for Inchofer had quitted Germany long before he wrote that satire. He did not write it till after he had bore many discontents in the order, the habit whereof he took at Rome, at twenty three years of age. This passage of Pellerus has occasioned König (9) to make two authors of one. He speaks of Melchior Inchofer, and Nicolas Inchofer. He says of the first, part of what Alegambe says of him, and ascribes the Monarchia Solipsorum to the other. He cites Christopher Pellerus, but he makes him say more than he says, viz. that this piece was composed in 1643. Pellerus does not say so. If König had observed, that for want of knowledge of a man's Christian name, an N. is put instead of it, he would not have forged a pretended Nicolas Inchoferus upon Christopher Pellerus's authority. He observes, that others ascribe this work to Scioppius. It is certain, that Ottor Tabor, a German civilian, believed Scioppius might be the author of it; but he has not affirmed it. Lucius Cornelius Europæus, says he (10), five is fit Gasper Scioppius, five quis alius ex genere Scriptorum satyricorum, in Monarchia quam dicit Solipsorum Leonis Allatio dedicata, &c. — Lucius Cornelius Europæus, ut, whether he be Gasper Scioppius, or whoever else of the class of satiric writers, in his Monarchy (as he calls it) of the Solipsians, dedicated to Leo Allatius, &c. Deckherus (11) neither rejecting Pellerus's

(6) Alla quædam ipsius prodierunt sub alienis nominibus R. P. E. L. &c. & sub nomine Academici Vertumili, adjectum prælectionibus Joannis Baptiste Cortesi prima in laudem Med. clina, & contra males Medicas. Situel, ubi supra.

[a] It was translated into French, and printed at Amsterdam, in 1722, in 12mo. The translator has added some remarks, and some other pieces. The preface contains several particulars concerning that work, and it's author. R. M. C. 17.

(7) Vide Placcium in Rhodanis, n. 59, pag. 43.

(8) Christoph. Pellerus in Politico scelerato impugnat, pag. 9. Edit. 1665.

(9) Bibl. Vet. & Nova, pag. 417.

(10) Otto Tabor, in præfat ad Disputationes de Confrontatione apud Placcium in Rhodanis, pag. 43.

(11) De Scriptis Adefotis, pag. 95, Edit. 1666.

(1) Nath. Sotuel. Bibliot. Scriptor. Societat. pag. 608.

(2) Placcius de Pseudonymis Jo. Rhodii, n. 59, pag. 44.

(3) Baronius, ad ann. 48, n. 25.

(4) Theophil. Raynaudus de Milis & Bonis libris, n. 235, pag. m. 148.

(5) In Critico Sacro, lib. ii, capp. primis.

(12) There is Peller in Decker's edition of 1686.

(13) Morale Pratique, Tom. III, pag. 686.

(14) Ib. pag. 86.

Pellerus's (12) nor Tabor's conjecture, proposes another without any foundation. He believes, that Gabriel Bariacus Lermæus, a gentleman of Languedoc, might be the author of the Monarchia Solipsorum. I shall set down two passages of Mr Arnauld, one of which will solve our doubts, and the other teach us Inchofer's design, and the meaning of the word Solipsi. * The Monarchia Solipsorum, says Mr Arnauld (13), should be Scioppius's work, because it was printed in Germany, with some books that are undoubtedly that author's. And yet it is certain that this Monarchia Solipsorum is the work of a German Jesuit, called Melchior Inchofer. And we know where there is an original letter of a Spanish Jesuit, who acknowledges it, and makes great complaints of it. The other passage is this (14). 'It is well known, (says Mr Arnauld, speaking to the Jesuits) that it is your character to be zealous to do good, provided you can do it alone, and that no body may share the glory of it with you; and if you would be sincere, you would confess, that one of your society, who wrote the Monarchia Solipsorum, knew you very well.' See the Theſes of Gisbert Voetius (15).

There was handed about a pretended letter of Innocent XII to the emperor, in the year 1696, in which the Pope calls the society of the Jesuits Monarchiam Monopantborum. Upon which Father Papebroch made this reflexion: Forſitan quaſi pavor aduſa ſoli omnia velint eſſe & aſſimari Jeſuitæ, ſcilicet alludendo ad vetus ſcemma ſatyrici cujuſdam commentis quo ſcripſit anonymus aliquis Monarchiam Solipsorum, veluti innuere volens quod Societas ſoli ſibi arrogare nitatur omnia (16).

(15) Vol. III, pag. 685, 686.

(16) Papebroch, Elucid. Hiſt. Actor. in controverſia Carmelitica, cap. xi pag. 123.

INNOCENT VIII, created Pope in the year 1484, was of Genoa, and his name was John Baptiſt Cibo. Authors are not agreed about the illuſtriousneſs or the obſcurity of his family [A]; but it is acknowledged that he was ſent to the court of Naples in his youth, and that he ſerved king Alphonſo. He was afterwards one of cardinal Bologna's domeſtics at Rome, which I think was of ſome uſe to him, in order to be promoted to the biſhopric of Savona (a). Pope Sixtus IV, who was much his friend, beſtowed on him the biſhopric of Melfi, and afterwards a cardinal's cap. One of the firſt actions of Innocent VIII, after his advancement to the pontificate, was to conſpire with the grantees of the kingdom, againſt Ferdinand king of Naples; he ſent for Robert Sanſeverino to give him the command of the troops in the expedition againſt that king; but being not ſatisfied with the conduct of this general, he turned him out of that poſt, and made peace with Ferdinand. The conditions of the treaty were, that the king of Naples ſhould pardon the rebels, and pay to the holy ſee the tribute that he owed: he performed neither the one nor the other, and fruſtrated the Pope's deſigns, who endeavoured to revenge that infraction [B]. Afterwards Innocent VIII thought no more of war, and applied himſelf to make Rome enjoy the fruits of peace [C]. He procured there a great plenty and cheapneſs of proviſions, and cauſed robbers to be ſeverely puniſhed. He created new offices, the ſale whereof brought him a great deal of money, and he was the firſt

(a) You will find in Moreri, that he was promoted to it by Paul II.

(1) In the remark [E].

(2) In Commentario de Pontificibus & Cardinalibus.

(3) In Vita Innocentii VIII.

(4) See Spondanus, Ann. Eccleſ. ad ann. 1484, n. 5, pag. m. 180.

(5) Id. ibid.

(6) See the remark [A] of the article TOUCHET.

(7) Volaterranus, lib. xxii, pag. 821.

[A] Authors are not agreed about the illuſtriousneſs or the obſcurity of his family. We ſhall ſee below (1), that, according to Volaterranus, he had been a poor boy. Onuphrius Panvinus affirms the ſame thing in one of his books (2), and makes him of a middling family, and the ſon of a Phyſician; but he ſpeaks otherwiſe in another work (3), wherein he ſets forth the antiquity and nobleneſs of the houſe of Cibo, and makes him the ſon of Aaron Cibo, a noble Genoefe, illuſtrious for his military actions, governor of Naples, under king Renatus and king Alphonſo, and famous for having gloriouſly diſcharged the office of a Roman ſenator (4). It is conjectured (5), that Panvinus corrected his firſt account upon reading the funeral Oration of Innocent VIII, made by Leonelli, biſhop of Concordia, who forgot not to ſpeak of the nobility and employments of Aaron Cibo. It is ſomewhat ſtrange, that ſo learned an hiſtorian as Panvinus was, and a Monk beſides, who flouriſhed a little after this Pope, ſhould have been ignorant of the merit, and the great employments of Innocent VIII's father, and ſhould rather have known him under the falſe title of a Phyſician, than under the glorious character of a noble Genoefe, governor of Naples, and ſenator of Rome. Many people will believe, that in his retractation, he leſs followed the truth than the notions of the preacher, who made this Pope's funeral oration, a ſort of diſcourſe which allows of an open flattery. Every one may think of it as he pleaſes; but we muſt remember, that it is a common thing to deſcribe the firſt condition of ſuch as riſe to the higheſt poſts (6).

[B] Ferdinand . . . fruſtrated the Pope's deſigns, who endeavoured to revenge that infraction. The author who ſupplies me with this article, does not ſay that Innocent VIII excommunicated king Ferdinand; he only obſerves that the Pope's deputies returned without doing any thing: 'Quorum neutrum Ferdinandus quum poſtea minime præſaret, miſſus Petrus Vincentinus cameræ auditor audaciſſimus, una ſimul cum Jacobo Volaterrano ſecretario apoſtolico ac cubiculario viro prudente ad res repetendas re infecta revertit' (7). — When afterwards Ferdinand performed neither the one nor the other, Peter Vincen- tin, Camerlengo, a perſon of great boldneſs, with James Volaterran, apoſtolic ſecretario, and a very prudent man, was ſent to demand reſtitution, but they returned without having been able to effect anything. To ſupply this omiſſion, I ſhall ſet down the words of Coeffeteau. 'Ferdinand not obſerving the treaty he had made with him, the Pope demanded the tribute he owed to the church; upon which Ferdinand having but ill ſatisfied his embaiſadors, Innocent thundred againſt him, deprived him of the kingdom, and declared Charles, King of France, the lawful heir of it, who had the right of Renatus, king of Sicily, and of his brother the count Du Maine (8).'

[C] He thought no more of war, and applied himſelf to make Rome enjoy the fruits of peace. We ſhall ſee how difficult it is to exerciſe the papacy; for if the Popes are blamed for meddling with the politic affairs of Europe, they are alſo blamed when they do not concern themſelves with them, and it is then ſaid that they are uſeleſs to the public good. Guicciardin gives us this idea of Innocent VIII. It is true, he adds ſomething that ſoftens his cenſure; for he obſerves, that the indolence this Pope fell into, produced this advantage, that no body feared his giving any diſturbance to Italy. This matter of fact is to be found in the following words, with a parentheſis of a Proteſtant divine. 'Guicciardin deſcribes Innocent VIII in theſe words, that his life in other reſpects uſeleſs to the public good (an excellent quality for a Pope) was at leaſt uſeful in this, that having ſuddenly laid down his arms which he had unfortunately taken up in the beginning of his pontificate againſt Ferdinand, at the intigation of ſeveral barons of the kingdom of Naples, and afterwards turned his mind to IDLE PLEASURES; he had neither for himſelf, nor for any that belonged to him, any thoughts that tended to diſturb the repoſe of Italy (9).' Thoſe who ſhall conſider the parentheſis, will perceive, that the reaſon why I quote River's reply, rather than the original words of Guicciardin, is becauſe the paſſage of River ſerves me for a proof. Would to God there were no other faults committed but ſuch as contribute to the public peace!

(8) Coeffeteau, Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 1209.

(9) Rivet, Remarques ſur la Reſponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, Par. II, pag. 625, 627. What he quotes out of Guicciardin is ſcarcely the beginning of the firſt book.

[D] He

first Pope who gloried in having bastards, and loaded them with wealth [D]. He was a handsome man, obliging even to excess; but covetous, ignorant, and of little wit [E].

[D] He was the first Pope who gloried in having bastards, and loaded them with wealth. Volaterranus speaks of it in this manner. Pontificum etiam primus, qui novum & ipse exemplum introduceret palam liberos nothos jactandi, ac soluta omni antiqua disciplina divitiis eos omnibus cumulandi (10). — He was the first of the Popes who introduced that new and extraordinary proceeding of owning publicly his spurious issue, and without any respect to the ancient discipline, heaping upon them riches without measure. He mentions but one son, and one daughter of this Pope, and he says, that the one obtained of his father some towns in the neighbourhood of Rome, and the advantage of being son-in-law to Lawrence de Medicis, and that the daughter (11) was married with a prodigious fortune to a Genoese (12). Morelli has stumbled here; he says, that Innocent VIII left two rich sons, which he had before his pontificate. This is an error both as to the sex, and the number of these bastards. They were sixteen, eight sons, and eight daughters; whence this epigram:

Quid queris testes, sit mas an scemina Cibo,
Respice natorum, pignora certa, gregem:
Osto nocens pueros genuit, totidemque puellas.
Hunc merito poterit dicere Roma patrem.

Of Cibo's sex, if you full proofs require,
Look on the pledges he has left below,
Eight lads, eight lasses, own him for their sire,
The stile of father well might Rome bestow.

According to du Pleffis (13), these four verses are an epitaph upon Innocent VIII, composed by Marullus, but I do not find them in my edition (14) of this poet's works, and I cannot believe they were left out to please the court of Rome; for the following epitaph was left in it.

Epitaph. Innocentii Octavi.
Spurcities, gula, avaritia, atque ignavia defes
Hoc Octave jacent quo regeris tumulo (15).

Luß, glutny, av'rice, sloth, beneath this stone,
Are with the corps of our Octavus thrown.

I find also the following distich in it:

De Xysto & herede.
Exhaust Xyltus bellis & cædibus urbem;
Tercentena hæres restituit sobole (16).

By wars, by tumults, Xyltus thinn'd the place,
His heir restor'd it by his numerous race.

Mr du Pleffis says, that the first of these two distichs, is the conclusion of the epitaph, or of the four verses first mentioned. I know not whether he made use of an edition of Marullus, different from mine, or whether he followed an unexact transcriber; but I make no doubt that the author of the Prejugez contre le Pape, advanced without any examination (17), that the elegy of Innocent VIII, was included after his death in his Latin version, which he sets down. It is an epigram, the last distich whereof is the epitaph which is actually in Marullus's poems: the two first distichs are those that are not found in my edition, either before the epitaph, or in any other place. Mr Zuinger (18), professor at Felfo Corporis Basil, supposes that these six verses are two epigrams of Marullus: he has been however more judicious than the author of the Prejugez, having not joined what ought to be divided. As for Sannazar's epigram,

Innocuo plicos æquum est debere Quirites,
Progenie exhaustam restituit patriam,

In debt to Innocent, Rome may be still'd, Whole joins her long exhausted country still'd.

VOL. III.

He is in the right to mention it, since it is to be found among the verses of this poet (19). Coëffeteau found himself very much perplexed in that part of his answer to du Pleffis, as you will see. Du Pleffis says, he, not being able to find fault with Innocent about his lawful marriage, (for he was married before he was Pope) produces a nameless author, who says, that he was the first that gloried in having bastards. And to confirm this, he produces an epigram of Marullus, in which the poet speaks only of the children which Innocent had in a lawful marriage. Now all those authors are not to be credited, and the licentiousness of their pen well deserved a severe punishment, for taking the liberty to defame the head of the church. It is certain, that good historians do not accuse Innocent VIII of any of these impurities, which the filthy poet Marullus taxes him with. However, we will let him enjoy the privileges of those of his profession (20). Rivet's reply will plainly shew the absurdity of Coëffeteau's answer. The pleasures of this Pope were not always idle, for he had a great many children. If it was in a lawful marriage, before he was an ecclesiastic, no body could blame him for it; and if Coëffeteau had produced good authorities for it, he had done a service to his memory; but I find no body that says he was married. As for the author who affirms that he was the first Pope who introduced the new example of boasting publicly of his bastards; it is not an obscure author, as the adversary would have it, but the same Volaterranus, whom a little before he calls a great man, and an orthodox writer. . . . Coëffeteau could not but know this author; but he had a mind to dissemble it, to fall upon the poor poet Marullus, as if he had divulged this news, calling him a filthy poet. Let him consult his Possévin, and he will teach him, that this Marullus is in esteem with the church of Rome for his piety, and his works have been often printed at Antwerp, Cologne, and elsewhere (21). I find both a fault and an omission in these words of Rivetus. The latter consists in not having censured Coëffeteau's boldness concerning Marullus's verses (22). He affirms, that this poet speaks only of the children which Innocent had in a lawful marriage. What then is the meaning of the word Nocens in the third verse? does it not signify, a criminal fatherhood? the other fault consists in his taking Marullus of Spalato, whom Possévin praises, for Marullus, whose verses are so well known: they are two different persons.

[E] He was a handsome man, obliging even to excess, but covetous, ignorant, and of little wit. I will quote a Catholic writer, because a Protestant would be suspected. Fuit Innocentius corpore excelso, ac candido, decoroque: ingenio tardo, ac literis procul (23). — Innocent was tall, well made, and of a fine person, but slow of understanding, and had no learning. A little before he had said (24), Pauper olim puer, forma tamen præstanti inter Alfonso regis Siciliæ ministros (25) inde Romam veniens in contubernio Philippi Cardinalis Bononiensis fuit Quum Xylto plurimum dilectus esset ob dulces mores & humanitatem qua omnes usque ad viciū superavit. Nam & infimæ conditionis homines sæpe excolabatur, amplectebaturque. Verum quum omnibus blandus esset, nemini tamen benignus, innatamque avaritiam jocos atque disteris transigebat. — Formerly bring a poor boy the beauty of his person introduced him to the courtiers of Alfonso, king of Sicily, afterwards coming to Rome he lived in the house of Philip, cardinal of Bologna. . . . Xyltus loved him exceedingly for the sweetness of his disposition, and his excessive humanity in which he excelled every one, even to a fault, for he would kiss and embrace the vilest and meanest of the people. But as he was civil to all, he did good to none, disguising his innate avarice, by familiar expressions, and a pleasant behaviour. Du Pleffis Mornai thought that Volaterranus expressed here in modest words, the filibustiness of Innocent the eighth's private life (26); whereupon Coëffeteau fell into a passion: It is a strange thing, says he (27), that he should make a vice of his natural beauty, and from thence render him suspected of the sin, for the punishment of which he fell from heaven; which against all charity, and even against

(19) It is the thirty eighth of the first book, pag. 124, of the Amsterdam edition, 1689.

(20) Coëffeteau, ubi supra, pag. 1209.

(21) Marcus Marul- lus Spalatinus.

(22) Rivet, ubi supra, pag. 627.

(23) That is, the verses which he acknowledged have been written by Marullus.

(24) Volaterranus, ubi supra, pag. 821.

(25) Id. ibid. pag. 820.

(26) Recolles, pag. 123, of the Life of Soliman Genes, says, that he was a domestic to an officer of the court of Alfonso; and in the following page, that he was a servant in his youth. See the remark [A].

(27) Du Pleffis Mornai, Myftere d'Iniquité, pag. 558.

(28) Coëff. t. ubi supra, pag. 1208.

566 INNOCENT VIII. INNOCENT XI.

He died in July 1492, at sixty years of age. He received from the Sultan a considerable present; I mean, the iron of the lance that pierced the body of our Saviour [F]. It is said, that the inscription of the cross was found at Rome in the time of his pontificate (b). See in father Gretser how they endeavour to answer the objections that were made to prove it supposititious (c).

(b) Taken from Volaterranus, lib. xxii, pag. m. 82cc, & seq.

(c) Gretser. Exam. Mysterii Plesianum, pag. 549, & ult.

gainst good manners, he would confirm; because this prelate was so affable, as to embrace even those of a mean condition. Must not one have a soul strangely corrupted with Heresy to make such an odious judgment of a Pope, recommended for his singular innocence?

[F] He received from the Sultan . . . the iron of the lance that pierced the body of our Saviour.] Bajazet II, being in fear of his brother, even after he had forced him to retreat to Rhodes, omitted nothing to engage the grand master Peter d'Aubusson to deliver him up to him, or at least to prevent his keeping intelligence with the Turks. The grand master engaged upon very advantageous conditions, to have him well observed. This agreement was signed the eighth of December 1482 (28). He permitted him to go into France some time after, and at last consented, that Innocent VIII should have him in his power, and enjoy the great sums which Bajazet distributed (29). He obtained a cardinal's cap for his reward, and was so cautious as to make use of the king of France's authority; for the court of France put the Turkish prince into the hands of the Pope's ambassadors, in the year 1488 (30). Bajazet had made great offers to the king of France, 'only to oblige him to keep him in his kingdom, under a strict guard, that he might have no opportunity of escaping, to return into his country, and begin a new war. These offers were to give up all the relics of GOD our creator, and of the apostles and saints, men and women, which his late father Mahomet had found at Constantinople, when he took that city, and in the other towns he had conquered in Christendom: he repeated the same offers which he had made before to the grand master of Rhodes, to use his endeavours to conquer the Holy Land, and put it into the hands of the king; he also offered a vast pension for his maintenance (31). Bajazet's letter came too late;

(28) See Roccolles, Vie du Sultan Gemes, pag. 97.

(29) Bajazet remitted every year 4,000 ducats to the grand master, and also 35000 for his brother's maintenance. Id. ibid. pag. 92.

(30) Id. ibid. pag. 126.

(31) Id. ibid. pag. 127, 128.

the court of France had already promised to put his brother in the custody of Innocent VIII. When he knew this, he wrote to the Pope, and endeavoured to gain him by presents, and amongst others, by the iron of the lance, that pierced our Saviour's side, which he had before offered to the grand master, and assured him of the punctual payment of 40000 ducats every year on condition he would not let him go upon any pretence whatsoever (32). Volaterranus speaks of this: it is worth while to set down the passage, in which we shall see other particulars; as that Innocent VIII. was buried near the shrine, which contained the iron of the lance, that was found in Antioch at the time of the crusades (33). Sepultus in Basilica Petri aereo monumento juxta arcam ab eo designatam in qua ferrum hastæ conditur quod latus dominicum perdidit. Hoc siquidem olim apud ædem sancti Andree Antiochiæ repertum, capta jam civitate, Bohemundus in prælio corripuens, arcem quæ expugnari non poterat illico cepit, simul & hostium L. millia prodigiose trucidavit. Inde Constantinopolim dono imperatori advectum. Postremo Turca illi succedens, Innocentio ut eum fratris captivi causa leniret pro munere miserat (34). — He is interred in the Basilic of St Peter, under a monument of brass, not far from the chest, which he himself had placed there, wherein is laid up the iron of that spear, which pierced our Lord's side. This is reported antiently to have been found in the church of St Andrew, at Antioch, when that city was taken by Boimond, who after he had reduced the castle in a wonderful manner, destroyed fifty thousand of the enemy; thence it was carried to Constantinople, and presented to the emperor, lastly falling there into the hand of the Ottoman prince, he sent it as a present to Innocent, that he might soften him in respect to his brother who was then a captive, and in his power. See the article VIGERIUS (35).

(32) Ib. pag. 122.

(33) See Maimbourg's History of the Crusades, book II, pag. 175, & seq. Dubé Edit. ad ann. 1098.

(34) Volterr. ubi sup. pag. 821, 822.

(35) Rim [A].

INNOCENT XI, created Pope the twenty-first of September 1676, was of Como in Lombardy, and called Benedikt Odescalchi, as may be seen in Moreri, with many other things, which I pass over in silence for that reason. His first profession was that of a soldier [A]. He left it to devote himself to the ecclesiastical state, and went to study at Naples; where he received his doctor's degree, after which he retired to Rome, in the pontificate of Urban VIII, who made him first apostolical secretary. He discharged so well the duties of that place, that he was made president of the chamber, and afterwards apostolical commissary, and governor of Marca di Roma. He obtained a cardinal's cap the sixth of March 1645, and the legation of Ferrara some time after, and after that the bishopric of Novara (a). The French say, his liberality and courtliness procured him the cardinalship, by the interest of Donna Olympia [B]: but they cannot deny

(a) Taken from a small piece of sixteen pages in 4to, intitled, La Vie d'Innocent XI. Pape de Rome écrite par D. G. B. P. à l'illustre Seigneur le Baron Giovannelli, cousin de la Sainteté.

[A] His first profession was that of a soldier. Here follows what we find in the pamphlet of sixteen pages (1). 'Benedikt in his youthful years took an inclination to martial affairs, being a man of greater courage, and valour than of stature; and foreseeing at a distance the wars which he should have in his old age, especially desiring to have the knowledge of arms, to introduce them advantageously into the church militant. And because he knew what are the consequences of war, and that skill in arms could not be obtained, but by a continual exercise, he went into Poland to engage in the war, with the Turks, and to give proofs of his bravery.' This author gives us to understand that Benedikt bore arms only in Poland; other writers affirm (2), that he was in Flanders in the Spanish service against France, and there received a musket-shot in his right shoulder, which incommoded him all his life-time. I have read in a certain newsmonger, that Innocent XIth's hatred against France, proceeded from an affront, a Frenchman offered him in the war; an affront, that Benedikt Odescalchi left unpunished, but revenged it upon the whole nation, when he was Pope.

(1) See the title of it in the margin of the text of this article, citat. (4); and also the different notes on it.

(2) Mercure Galant for August 1689.

(3) Ubi supra.

our Benedikt Odescalchi, the son of a rich banker of Como, played with Donna Olympia and lost his money on purpose, in complaisance to this lady. This puts me in mind of a passage in Menagiana (4). 'Pope Innocent XI, was the son of a banker, he was elected on St. Matthew's day and the same day Pasquin said, Invenirent hominem sedentem in telonio. — They found a man sitting at the receipt of custom.'

(4) Pag. 187, of the first Dutch Edit.

The following words are to be found in a little book printed at Avignon for John Bramereau, in the year 1652, with this title La juste Balance des Cardinaux vivans. 'After the death of Urban VIII. Odescalchi began to make his court to Donna Olympia, niece (5) to Pope Innocent X, and having treated her several times, he began zealously to espouse his interest; and especially for a thing, which this prelate did, that is worthy to be taken notice of. Going to see her in the beginning of the pontificate of her uncle (6) Innocent X, it happened that a Goldsmith came to shew her a noble and rich chest of silver drawers, which he had to sell; Donna Olympia having taken a view of it in the presence of Odescalchi, and several lords, who heard the answer that she made, that it was a noble piece of plate, but that being a poor widow, she could not lay out so much

(5) It should be sister-in-law; which is the signification of the Italian word cognata in the original.

(6) It should be brother-in-law.

deny that he appeared very remote from a voluptuous life. He was of rigid morality, and looked upon as a devout man. He was much more favourable to the Janfenists than his predecessors had been; which was the reasons why the Janfenists more zealously adhered to the cause of the Popes, than they had done before [C]. He offended abundance of people by the suppression of an office of the immaculate conception, and also by that of several indulgencies. There was no body in France, besides the Janfenists, that was edified with this. They dispersed those two decrees, and added some notes to them [D]. I do not believe that every body approved his forbidding to honour the name and bones of Anthony Cala [E]. He expressed such an inflexible stiffness in his quarrel with France, that he has convinced the world that in point of revenge [F] there are no men comparable * much money, and after having said so, he retired into his chamber. Immediately Odeschalchi called to the Goldsmith, asked the price of the chest, and bargained with him for 8000 crowns; after which, without saying any more, he ordered it to be presented in his name to Donna Olympia, who seeing such a present, was perfectly astonished at so extraordinary a generosity. Upon which she went to the Pope, and begged the office of clerk of the chamber, as a pure gift, for this prelate, and afterwards a cardinal's cap, which he obtained likewise by the mediation of cardinal Palotta. I set down these words according to the copy, which has been communicated to me (7). I have the same book in Italian: intituled La giussa statera de' Porporati, and printed at Geneva in 1650. I have consulted it, and not only found in it the original of what you have just now read, but also that our Benedict Odeschalchi had made his court to Don Barberini, to be promoted to the office of clerk of the chamber; that he had paid the requisite sums, and yet had not obtained his end; that he was a person of an indifferent capacity (8), and that tho' he had been profuse, he was a rich and magnificent cardinal; that whilst he was a bishop, he loved walks, plays, and feasts, but that he lived a very retired life after he became a cardinal.

[C] The Janfenists more zealously adhered to the cause of the Popes, than they had done before. This is what Mr Talon taxes them with in the famous plea he made against Innocent XI, the twenty third of January 1688. A strange thing! says he (9), that the Pope, whose principal care ought to be to preserve the purity of the faith, and to hinder the progress of new opinions, has not ceased ever since he came to St Peter's chair, to keep up a correspondence with all those who had publicly declared themselves Janfenius's disciples, whose doctrine his predecessors have condemned. He has loaded them with his favours; he has given them commendations; he has declared himself their protector: and that dangerous faction, which has omitted nothing these thirty years to lessen the authority of all ecclesiastical and secular powers, that were not favourable to them, at present erect altars to the Pope, because he upholds and foment their cabal; which would have anew disturbed the peace of the church, if the foresight and indefatigable pains of a prince, whom heaven has raised up to be the shield, and the defender of the faith, had not put a stop to it. I do not believe that any Janfenist did ever write in defence of the four propositions, decided by the clergy of France, in the year 1682, against which the favourers of the Ultra-montain doctrines made such out-cries, and published so many books. If the same thing had happened in the pontificate of Innocent X or of Alexander VII, it is certain the Janfenists would have written a hundred volumes in defence of the decisions of the clergy, and in confusion of the Ultra-montaines. Humane nature discovers itself every where: the rule of our conduct changes according to the times, and as we find ourselves disposed towards other men. Out of gratitude to a benefactor, men spare those doctrines, which they would have condemned out of a resentment against an oppressor.

[D] They dispersed those two decrees, and added some notes to them. The one was made at Rome the seventeenth of February 1678, and imports the condemnation of the book intituled, Officio dell' immacolata concezione della Santissima Vergine nostra Signora, approvato dal sommo Pontefice Paolo V, il quale a chi devotamente le recitarà concede indulgenza di cento giorni, come apparisce nel suo breve da-

to in Roma li x. Luglio MDCXV. in Milano per Francesco Vigone. The other was made at Rome the seventeenth of March 1678, which suppresses abundance of indulgences. The Janfenists caused those two decrees to be secretly printed in France, and added some rules to them, by which their usefulness might be discovered. They consist of a collection of passages. It will not be unnecessary to insert here the reflexion of a Jesuit upon the Janfenists zeal for those decrees, and the little account they make of the constitutions of the Popes against Janfenius. 'Some years ago a little Italian book printed at Milan, was put in the index at Rome; in which book the office of the immaculate conception of the mother of God was to be found. The prohibition did not concern the office of the conception, which is known and authorized long ago in the church, and which also has been lately approved by Innocent XI, but this decree respected other things, which were falsely and rashly said, and printed in the same book: and besides it was only for Italy, and not for the rest of the world, where that book was not like to appear. Nevertheless this decree was seen immediately, printed in Latin and French, by the care of some of the party with a rhapsody of useless passages, to make a considerable libel of it. It was dispersed all over France and the Low-Countries with as much zeal, as if it had been a canon of a general council, upon a capital point of religion: and it is well known to what excess the indiscreet zeal of some of their directors went. Thus you see how far these gentlemen can carry when they please their submission to the orders of the church. Would not one believe after this, that the Pope (10) needed only prohibit the version of Mons, to hinder them from dispersing and crying it up in the world? And was not there reason to expect they would do as much for his new decree in favour of the office of the conception, as they had done for the former, which I have been speaking of? but we should have been very much mistaken in our hopes of it: they have other principles for their conduct in what concerns them (11).

[E] He did forbid to honour the name and bones of Anthony Cala. A veneration had been a long time paid to this man in the kingdom of Naples, or, account of his having been a holy hermit: but Innocent XI, in 1680, commanded all this worship to be abolished, and Anthony Cala's bones to be carried into the common church-yard, to be there mixed with others, and never to be taken up again. He enjoined also that his images, his habits, and all his other relics, should be removed from all consecrated places (12). Father Pappabroch by this example justifies the liberty he took to suppress some saints.

[F] In point of revenge. The court of France under Lewis XIV, and the court of Rome under Innocent XI, were acted with the same spirit of haughtiness and inflexibility, whereby they afforded all Europe instances of that spirit for a long time. They strove on both sides to carry revenge as far as ever they could; but at last the world was forced to yield to the church. The Pope has shewn that it is not for nothing that he calls himself the vicergerent of God on earth; of God I say, who reserves vengeance, to himself, and who has declared (13) that it is he to whom it belongs, and that he will pay it. The Pope, as the vicergerent of the God of vengeance, has admirably maintained the rights of his deputation. I will not adopt the thoughts of those satirical wits, who pretend that, in point of revenge, the laity are novices in comparison of the clergy; but we have scarce seen any quarrels between the church and the world, in which

(7) By Mr Pal-lardy, above-mentioned citation (7) of the article GLEICHEN.

(8) E soggetto di mediocre intelligenza.

(9) Talon, Plaidoyer, pag. 42, Dutch Edit.

(10) He means Innocent XI, who had condemned the version of the New Testament of Mons. See the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, May 1685, pag. 495.

(11) Father le Tellier, Observations sur la Nouvelle défense de la Version de Mons, pag. 422.

(12) See Father Pappabroch, in Respons. ad exhibitionem errorum, pag. 18, 19.

(13) Deuteron. chap. xxxii, ver. 35.

comparable to those who pretend to be rigid moralists. It is thought that a voluptuous Pope, who could have sacrificed his passions to politic interests, would have been more useful to the catholic religion [G]. The French are enraged against him, and it is said this will contribute much to his canonization [H].

which the Popes have not at last had the better in point of revenge, they are the vicegerents of God, who has reserved vengeance to himself, that is saying all. If I well remember, the protection that was granted by Innocent XI to some bishops of France, persecuted for not consenting to the extension of the Regale, was the first step that provoked the court of France (14); because the briefs of Innocent XI (15) in favour of those bishops, were expressed in very strong and vigorous terms. This haughtiness put the court of France upon the most effectual ways to vex him. The clergy declared (16) their opinion about the authority of the church, and formed four propositions thereupon, which reduced the power of the Pope, to such bounds as were very odious to the court of Rome. This was not at the bottom a new doctrine; the clergy decided nothing but what was agreeable to the maxims of the Gallican church, and what the Sorbonne had taught a hundred times; so that one might have thought that another Pope would not have taken exceptions at it, and that Innocent XI would perhaps dissemble his resentment: but to put him under a necessity of confessing that he had received a very great affront, the decisions of the clergy were proposed by royal authority, as a doctrine that no body was allowed to oppose, and which was to be maintained by all those, who would take their licences in Divinity and the Civil-law, and be advanced to a doctor's degree. They studied all the formalities, that might give the greatest lustre to the king's declarations upon this affair. These doctrines were maintained by the rector of the university of Paris, in a disputation where the archbishop of Paris presided, and in which the respondent was invested with all the marks of his rectorship, that it might appear, that it was the whole body of the university, represented by their head, that maintained these decisions. The thesis was posted upon the door of the nuncio's house, notwithstanding the oppositions he threatened to make against it. The Pope expressed his resentment against the clergy; he answered harshly the letter he had received from them, and would never grant his bulls to those who assisted at the assembly of 1682. He abolished the franchises of the ambassador of France, like those of others, and would never receive the marquis de Lavardin, who was sent ambassador to him (17). France did then a very remarkable thing. This ambassador entered Rome almost by main force, and having taken possession of his quarters, he set a guard about it, as if it had been a fortified town (18). The Pope, without being astonished, revenged himself by a surprising blow: he cast an interdiction upon the church of St Lewis, because the marquis de Lavardin had been admitted into it, and excommunicated this ambassador, and obstinately refused to acknowledge him.

Things were at this pass, when his most Christian Majesty perceiving that the continuation of these differences, would be prejudicial to him, secretly dispatched a trusty man to whom he gave a letter of his own writing as a credential to his Holiness (19). This man was to discover to the Pope the most secret intentions of the king. But the Pope would neither receive the letter nor give him any audience. Hereupon the king wrote a letter to cardinal d'Etrée, which was communicated to the cardinals. He complained in it of the Pope's conduct, and shewed, in particular, the prejudice that Europe and the church might suffer, from what the Pope had already done against cardinal Fursenberg. He ascribed to this partiality the intrigues that were forming against king James, in favour of the Protestant religion, &c. This letter dispersed in Rome was perhaps a new motive, which induced the Pope to countenance more and more prince Clement of Bavaria, to the prejudice of cardinal Fursenberg. Now by the exclusion of this cardinal, he revenged himself a hundred fold, for all the affronts he had received. He deprived the king of France of being the arbitrator of peace and war, and involved him necessarily in a war with almost all Europe. He quickly saw the effect of this conduct; and if he lived not long after so terrible a revenge, he lived long enough to have the satisfaction of seeing France attacked by so many enemies, that according to the general conjectures, she was to sink the very first campaign. Tell me now whether the church did not obtain the victory over the world, in a long dispute where both parties contended in point of revenge. If Alexander the Great had been a Catholic, he would have had much ado to draw out of the Pope's mouth what he did from the priests of Delphi, My son, thou art invincible (20).

[G] It is thought that a voluptuous Pope . . . would have been more useful to the Catholic religion.] Those who do not love this Pope, say, that he was well enough acquainted with the general affairs, to know that, in the state they were in when cardinal Fursenberg sued for the electorate of Cologne, he might have saved the king of England, and enabled France to execute all her projects; for with the assistance of such a cardinal, who would have succeeded to all that his predecessor possessed, she would have tied the arms of the princes of Germany that were ill affected to her. She experienced it, in the year 1684, when she desired a truce. Now it is certain that the victories of this crown, would have extended the Catholic religion, and strangely weakened the Protestant: whence comes it then that the Pope was so contrary to that cardinal? It is, say they, because he hated the king of France, and chose rather to renounce the advantages of the Catholic religion, than the pleasure of crossing his enemy, or the sweetness of revenge. These same persons say, that he knew very well there was a league forming, of which the Protestants would be the chief directors, and which might be able in its turn to oppress the Catholic religion, almost all over Europe; and that the most effectual means to prevent this league, was to put the whole succession of the late elector of Cologne into the hands of a cardinal, who would never join with Heretical princes. Why then was Innocent XI so contrary to the interest of this cardinal? Because, say they, he was overjoyed to expose the French monarchy to the greatest dangers; and provided he could revenge himself of the court of France, he cared but little for the losses of the Pope-don. This is what is said by his enemies: but it is not too much to be relied on; their passion ought to make their conjectures suspected. It is perhaps much more reasonable to say, that being very intent upon the reformation of manners, and pious exercises, he was neither capable of knowing what was useful to his religion, nor of preferring the profitable before the honest part. Now he believed he was bound in justice to prefer the duke of Bavaria's brother before the cardinal candidate. Some apply to Innocent XI what was said of Hadrian VI: he was an honest man; but did not understand politics (21). It was the good fortune of the Protestants, that in the year 1688, the see of Rome was possessed by a Pope who did not well understand his own interests, or who was too stiff to take advantage of the present junctures, to the prejudice of his particular passions.

But after all, who can assure us, that Innocent XI did not in some respects behave himself like a good politician? Has the court of Rome nothing to fear from the too great power of princes, that are most violent against the sects separated from her communion? Did not Sixtus V who so well understood politics, choose rather to countenance Henry IV and queen Elizabeth, than to suffer the king of Spain to grow too powerful (22)? Who can affirm that Innocent XI was not moved by some such spring, when he entered upon measures so contrary to the interests of France, and so useful to the Protestants? One thing seems very certain, that an anonymous author of a little book (23), intitled, The extravagant reproach; in which is shown, that the Pope cannot without folly be reproached, with the ruin of the Catholic religion in England, has no reason to call this reproach a folly.

[H] The anger of the French . . . will contribute much to his canonization.] It is not long since (24), the news-writers of Holland, have published in their monthly accounts, that many miracles were wrought at this Pope's tomb, and that this is a great mortification

(14) See a list of several other occasions of complaint given to France after this, in the Answer to the Protestation of the Marquis de Lavardin, pag. m. 97, & seq.

(15) Written to the king of France in 1683, and 1679.

(16) In the year 1682.

(17) In the year 1687.

(18) See Leti, Monarchie Universelle, Part. II, pag. 346, & seq.

(19) A letter of the French king to cardinal d'Etrée of the sixth of September 1688. It is in Leti's Monarchie Universelle, ubi supra, pag. 447, & seq.

(20) Delphi in-visti, Apollinem de eventu belli, quod moliebatur, consultum. Sed virgo istitica ne-bat per os ad- adit deum fa- esse; donec ipse eo profectus, vi conspuit regi- nem, & ad tem- plum venit. Sed quum inter ma- dum illa patrum mitem pertra- ca regis vitam reparavit, excu- misset, invenit ei, fili; accipere amon dixit: ne alio oraculo fili- spoli esse. Friend- Supplement. in Q. Curtium, lib. i. cap. xi, n. 16, ex Plutarcho.

(21) See remark [Q] of the article HADRIAN VI.

(22) See the remark [R] of the article ELIZABETH.

(23) Printed at Cologne, for Peter Martens, in 1689.

(24) I write this in the beginning of September 1695.

He was not learned [I]. He died the twelfth of August 1689. The French king's letter to the conclave, says a great deal in a few words against the memory of this Pope [K].

I find in the Valesiana a Passage which deserves to be set down here at length [L]. I shall also insert some Verses of Mr de la Fontaine, which shew how freely they wrote against to the court of France; and that probably the enemies of that crown, will endeavour out of spite to get this Pope canonized. This will then be a saint made out of spite. It is commonly prudence to take the strongest side: but that maxim is sometimes false. There are some princes who owe their elevation only to their nice policy, of declaring themselves betimes irreconcilable enemies to a potent state, which terrifies all, it's neighbours; for all those that are afraid of this power, countenance this declared enemy, and gratify him as far as they can in all his desires: and we need not go so high as the ages of Paganism, to find some princes who have irrecoverably lost themselves, by preferring the alliance of the most potent of their neighbours, before that of others (25). A private person that falls from a prosperous state into misfortune, does no longer see about him, that multitude of friends who encompassed him before: they forsake him, and leave him to himself.

(25) Confer quæ supra, in remark [X] of the article BEL-LARMIN.

Donec eris felix, multos numerabis amicos:
Tempora si fuerint nubila solus eris (26).

(26) Ovidius, Trist. lib. i, Eleg. ix, ver. 5.

Serene your fortune, friends will then abound;
But once obscur'd there will not one be found.

Sovereigns find it quite contrary: for if they grow too potent, they find no more allies; every body forsakes and confederates against them. It is certain that Innocent XI purchased a great many friends and admirers, merely for his thwarting at much as he could the designs of the court of France. This will keep his memory sweet, and make his pretended miracles more easily go down.

[I] He was not learned.] It is said, he wanted his secretaries to explain to him in Italian what they wrote for him in Latin. See the Menogiana, wherein are these words (27): 'Favoriti, secretary to the late Pope, reading to him the briefs he had made, and explaining them in Italian; the Pope wept for joy, and said, Cosa diranno di noi nella posterità, quando vederanno così bella latinità nostra. — What will posterity say of us, when they see our Latin so elegant.'

(27) Page 52 of the first Dutch edition.

[K] The French king's letter to the conclave, says a great deal in a few words against the memory of this Pope.] This is the beginning of it (28): We have learned from your letter of the thirteenth of this month, the decease of our holy Father Innocent XI, and we have just reason to believe that it has pleased the divine majesty to take him out of the world at a time when all the re-united forces of Heresy, seem to conspire against the ruin of our religion, to which the division of the Catholic princes contributes not a little. This is to say in a few words, which have a great air of moderation, that the wants of the church requiring a Pope that should lay her interests to heart, God had removed Innocent XI out of the world, who was ill affected to the church, or unable to labour for her good.

(28) The Letter is dated from Versailles the twenty fourth of August 1689. It is to be found at length in the Mercure Historique & Politique of October 1689, pag. 1026.

[L] I find in the Valesiana a passage which deserves to be set down here at length.] It is pity said the learned Hadrian Valois (29), that Innocent XI suffered himself to be influenced, as he was, by the enemies of France. If he had been seconded by people as well affected as himself, what advantages might he not have procured to the Christian religion? what would he not have re-established? what would he not have reformed? what promising hopes did not he give by his abolishing the office of the immaculate conception, as Clement IX had done that of the slavery? what would he not have done, if he had heard of the impertinent devotion of that Monk, which M. . . . spoke of the other day? would he not have rigidly condemned the superiors, who suffer one of their visionaries to print orations, addressed to all the parts of the body of the holy Virgin (30). Are not religion, modesty, and good sense, wounded by such an extravagance? Innocent XI would not have stopped there: he would have reformed the luxury and fineries of women. How many husbands would have been obliged to him, had his design taken effect? I am assured also from good hands that he would have abolished the privileged altars, as a very great abuse. And indeed can some indulgences granted to an altar, make the mass better? or does the blood of CHRIST, which is of infinite worth, want any accession of merits to be more acceptable to God, and more efficacious to those that are prayed for? the mendicant Friars have invented these things, to bring customers to their churches.

(29) Valesiana, pag. 45, & seq. Dutch Edit.

(30) Mr Baudouin, pag. 183, of his Etolomy Aulettes, says he has seen the printed book, which contains these orations.

What Mr Valois says concerning the design of reforming the luxury and fineries of women, puts me in mind of the great zeal Innocent XI expressed against those who shewed their breasts. This Pope finding he was not able to prevail with the fair sex, by the many powerful means he used, not to shew their breasts and their arms, and knowing withal that the terror which seized all Italy, when the Turks besieged Vienna, did not put a stop to that disorder, had recourse to the last remedy; namely, excommunication. He published an order the thirtieth of November 1683, which enjoined all maids and women to cover their shoulders and breasts, up to their necks, and their arms down to their hands, with some thick and not transparent stuff, upon pain of being so fully excommunicated ipso facto, if they did not obey in six days time, that, except at the last hour, no one but the Pope could absolve them; for it was declared, that the confessors who should presume to absolve them from that excommunication, should incur it themselves, and should be liable to such spiritual and temporal punishments as his holiness should think fit to inflict upon them: which temporal punishments, the fathers, husbands, masters, and other heads of families, by whose permission or connivance their daughters and wives act contrary to his ordinance, shall likewise undergo (31). I do not know what was the success of these terrible menaces; but I believe that as they were renewed from time to time under the predecessors of Innocent XI (32), there was occasion to renew them some time after. It is the fate of these sumptuary laws: luxury, and the desire of setting off one's beauty, quickly elude the wisest regulations: we may say of this disorder, what a grave historian has observed with respect to Astrologers; they were always commanded to depart Rome, but they never went out of it (33). King Lewis XIV has lately (34) put out fine edicts against luxury: if he can command obedience upon that head, it will be a more admirable thing, than the power he has had to lessen very considerably in his kingdom the madness of duelling. The news-writers have told us lately, that the advocates of the parliament of Paris, have engaged to see this reformation of profuseness observed in their own houses. Time will inform us, whether by the concurrent authorities of the prince and the husbands, the reformation will be established for a continuance. These gentlemen have been told (35) that as part of those (36) that set up most for women of quality, would perhaps, have a great repugnance to retrench any thing from their sumptuous habits, furniture, coaches, &c. as also from the superfluous number of their waiting-women, embroiderers, tapestry-workers, and footmen, which they have in their service; it had been resolved to oppose a licentiousness so little consistent with the state and quality of those ladies. . . . (37). The king's intention being, that they should obey and reform themselves the soonest, without any distinction of birth and quality, and that they should begin immediately, by not suffering their train to be born up. It is added, that two famous advocates (38) were charged to communicate this order to their brethren, and that the latter being overjoyed, expressed their acknowledgment for it, and unanimously resolved to thank the first President for procuring a regulation so just, so necessary, and so worthy of the king's wisdom; and to assure him at the same time, that they would cause it to be observed in their own houses, with the utmost exactness: they all looking DISGRESSION concerning the reformation of luxury.

(31) Nouvelles de la Repub des Lettres, May 1686, art. II, pag. 495.

(32) See the Nouvelles, &c. ibid. pag. 497.

(33) Genus hominum . . . quod in civitate nostra & vetabitur semper & retinebitur. Tacit. Hist. lib. i, cap. xxii.

(34) I write this in May 1700.

(35) See the Lettres Historiques of May 1700, pag. 574.

(36) That is, advocates wives.

(37) Lettres Hist. ubi supra, pag. 575.

(38) Mr Helleu and Mr Chardun.

(b) Concerning the harangues of this Orator, see the Acta Eruditorum, in the third Tome of the Supplement, pag. 43, & seq.

against Innocent XI, in Paris [M]. You will find a noble encomium upon this Pope in the seventh speech of Mr Malagonelli (b). The Latin style of it is admirable, and worthy of ancient Rome.

upon it as the most effectual means to free them from infinite discontent, and to prevent the fruits of their laborious employments from continuing to be sacrificed to the extravagant ambition of their wives. It is very likely that they spoke as they meant; for indeed their fine, noble, and profitable employments, are attended with great toil. They sometimes envy the happiness of a countryman, who can sleep all night.

Agricolam laudat juris legumque peritus
Sub galli cantum consultor ubi otia pulsat (39).

(39) Horat.,
Sat. I, lib. i,
ver. 9.

The lawyer wak'd, and rising with the sun,
Cries happy Farmers that can sleep till noon.

CREECH.

Is it not reasonable, that they should desire that a gain, which costs them so many watchings, should not be squandered away by superfluous expences; and that the royal authority should enable them to remedy it, since otherwise they could never accomplish it?

[M] I shall insert some verses of Mr de la Fontaine, which show how freely they wrote against Innocent XI at Paris.] We find amongst his posthumous works a letter, part of which I will transcribe:

(40) He speaks to the prince of Conti.

Pour nouvelles de l'Italie,
Le Pape empire tous les jours,
Expliquez, Seigneur (40), ce discours
Du costé de la maladie.
Car aucun Saint-Pere autrement
Ne doit empirer nullement.
Celuy-ci veritablement
N'est envers nous ni Saint ni Pere.
Nos soins de l'erreur triumpans
Ne font qu'augmenter sa colere Contre l'Ainé de ses Enfants.
Sa santé toujours diminuë,
L'avenir m'est chose inconnuë,
Et je n'en parle qu'à tâtons;
Mais le gens de delà les Monts
Auront bien-tôt pleuré cet homme;
Car il deffend les Jannetons, Chose très-necessaire à Rome (41).

(41) La Fontaine, Oeuvres posthumes, pag. 182, Dutch Edit.

From Italy, my lord, they say
The Pope grows worse and worse each day,
But let me beg you to apply
This language to his malady;
Since it sounds oddly, in discourse,
To say the Pope grows worse and worse.
But 'tis true, I say it rather,
To us, nor holy be, nor father,

Our triumphs over error here
Only augment his spleen and fear,
And serve to egg his anger on,
Against the church's eldest son:
Worse as he grows . . . I cannot tell Whether he will do ill or well,
On this bow'er I'll pawn my word,
His loss will not much grief afford
Beyond the Alps . . . since he dismiss'd
Each girl who would be freely kiss'd,
And banish'd by, too harsh a doom,
The sweetest, slightest, fun in Rome.

Here are some verses of a freer strain, and taken from the same work:

Je vois ces Heros retourner
Chez eux avec un pied de nez.

Et tout le parti Protestant Du Saint-Pere en vain très-content.
J'ay là dessus un conte à faire.
L'autre jour touchant cette affaire
Le Chevalier de Sillery,
En parlant de ce Pape-cy,
Souhaitoit pour la paix publique,
Qu'il se fust rendu Catholique,
Et le Roy JACQUES Huguenot.
Je trouve assez bon ce bon mot (42).

(42) Id. Ibid.
pag. 174.

These heroes I return'd have seen,
Successful and o'ercome with spleen.

In vain the party Protestant,
Are with our holy Pope content.
But t'other day I heard a tale,
To make you laugh it scarce can fail,
The Chevalier de Sillery
Said for the public peace 'twould be,
If once the Pope turn'd Catholic,
And good king James a Heretic.
However this odd change might hit,
His saying surely wants not wit.

Racine (43) had a stroke at the Pope, but not so openly; however it was a stroke. Mr de Vize in his Mercure Galant, and in his books about the transactions of the present times, says many things to the dishonour of Innocent XI.

(43) See his preface to Esther. Mention is made of it in the Année important and Refugees, pag. 343.

JOACHIM, husband of St Anne [A], and father of the holy Virgin. His marriage was a long time unfruitful, by reason of which his oblations were rejected by the high-priest Issachar, who cruelly upbraided him for his infecundity. Joachim was so confounded to see himself treated in this manner by the high-priest, that he durst return home no more. He went and concealed himself in the country, among his shepherds, and was there comforted by an angel, who came to tell him, that he should have a daughter by his wife Anne, that should be called Mary. This angel went immediately to tell the same news to Anne, who was lamenting and weeping, not knowing what was become of her husband. This angelical news was no doubt very acceptable to her; for she very much grieved at her having no children [B]. Many believe, that a bare kiss of her

(1) Joannes Damascenus, de Fide Orthod. lib. iv, cap. xv, apud Barronium Apologatus, n. 42.

(2) Contra Faust. Manich. lib. xxiii, cap. ix. See the remark [D], citat. (11).

[A] Joachim, husband of St Anne.] Here is his genealogy: Levi, of the tribe of David, was the father of Panther, Panther was the father of Barpanther, who was the father of Joachim (1). Some have said, that Joachim did not descend from David, but from the tribe of Levi, and even that he was a priest. The Manichees grounded an objection upon this, which St Augustine (2) has examined.

[B] She very much grieved at her having no children.] She found her self deprived of a certain honour that was paid to mothers according to the laws; upon which she had recourse to extraordinary prayers, that she might partake of that honour: she entered into the holy of holies, and made earnest supplications to God, representing, that she had done nothing against the law, and therefore ought not to be excluded from the privileges her husband impregnated her; but others affirm, that the common way was made use of [C]; for otherwise, say they, the birth of Jesus Christ would not be so wonderful as we hold it. What is most wonderful is, that though we know nothing for certain of the name, qualities, and history of the father and mother of the holy Virgin [D], yet all this that I have privileges which the law gave to women, who had children. Her prayer was heard; God giving her to understand, that she should bear a child (3). St Gregory Nyssen relates this story, which he read in an apocryphal book. They who know that none entered into the holy of holies, but the high-priest himself, and that he was not permitted to enter into it but once a year, need not have the falsity of this story represented to them. If St Anne prepared herself on one hand, her husband did no less on the other; for he fasted forty days upon a mountain, in order to obtain of God the desired posterity (4). See in the following remark, the words of St Epiphanius.

[C] Others affirm, that the common way was made use of. St Bernard maintains, that it is the opinion of the church. 'Si licet, says he (5) loqui quod Eccl[esi]a sentit, (& verum ipsa sentit) dico gloriosam de Spiritu Sancto concepisse, non autem conceptam fuisse: dico peperisse virginem, non tamen partam à virgine. Alioquin ubi erit prerogativa matris Domini qua singulariter dicitur exultare & munere proliis & integritate carnis, si tantundem dederit & matri ipsius? Non est hoc Virginitatem honorare, sed honorari detrudere. — If I may be allowed, says he, to speak what the church thinks, (and what she thinks is truth) I say that the most glorious Virgin conceived by the HOLY GHOST, but was not conceived of it. I say that she brought forth though a virgin, yet not that she was born of a virgin. If it were otherwise, where would be the prerogative of the mother of our Lord, by which she is said singularly to rejoice, both in her offspring, and in the purity of her body, if as much should be granted to her mother? This is not to honour the Virgin, but to take from her honour.' Pelbartus of Temelwaer, notwithstanding his bigotted credulity, embraces St Bernard's opinion. 'Simplicibus quibusdam tribuit hanc opinionem quod Anna conceperit per solum osculum Joachim. Agnoscit tamen eam de viro concepisse concubitu matrimoniali (6). — He attributes to some foolish people this opinion, that Anna conceived by a bare kiss of Joachim. However he acknowledges that she conceived by her husband, as married people do.' The error of the pretended virginity of St Ann, is very ancient; for St Epiphanius was obliged to confute it.

Εἰ γὰρ Ἀγγέλους προσκυνεῖσθαι ἔθελαι, πόσω μᾶλλον τὴν ἀπὸ Ἀννῆς γεγεννημένην, τὴν ἐκ τῆς Ἰωακείμ τῇ Ἀννᾷ δεδωρημένην, τὴν δὲ εὐχῆς, καὶ πάσης ἐπισκευῆς κατὰ ἐπαγγελίαν πατρὶ, καὶ μητρὶ δεδεδόσαν, ἢ μὲν ἑτέρας γεγεννημένην παρὰ τὴν τῶν ἀνθρώπων φύσιν, ἀλλὰ καὶ ὡς πάντες ἐκ σπέρματος ἀνδρὸς, καὶ μητρὸς γυναικὸς; εἰ γὰρ καὶ ἡ τῆς Μαρίας ἱστορία, καὶ παραδόσεις ἔχουσιν, ὅτι ἐπὶ τῇ πατρὶ αὐτῆς Ἰωακείμ ἐν τῇ ἐρημῳ, ὅτι ἡ γυνὴ συνεληφθῆσα, ἔχ ὅτι ἀνευ συζυγίας τὸτο ἐγένετο, ἡδὲ ὅτι ἀνευ σπέρματος ἀνδρὸς. Nam si ne Angelos quidem adorari permittit, quanto minus id Annæ filiae tribui concesserit, quam illi de Joacimo Dei bonitas indulget? quam precibus, omnique animi studio, ac contentione, parens uterque promeruit? ita tamen ut non aliam quam cæteri mortales nascendi conditionem habuerit; sed, ut illi, de virili satù, ac matris utero prodierit. Quamvis autem ex Mariæ historia, ac Traditione illud habeatur: Joacimo ejus Patri divinitus hoc in deserto nuntiatum fuisse, uxor tua concepit; non ita tamen accipiendum est, quasi hoc citra nuptialem confociationem, ac virilem satum acciderit (7). — For if he permit not the Angels to be adored how much less will he allow that honour to the daughter of Anna, whom GOD in his great mercy gave to Joachim, whom by prayers, by earnest entreaties, and by extraordinary piety, her parents obtained? yet so as that she was not born in any other manner than the rest of human race, springing from the seed of her father, nourished in the womb of her mother, for though we have it in the history of Mary, and by tradition, that Joachim her father had it revealed to him from heaven, in the desert, thy wife has conceived; yet are we not to understand thereby, that this happened without any conjugal conversation, or exclusive of the seed of man. The cavalier Bori had a strange thought concerning the conception of the Virgin, he believed that St Joachim was impotent, and that the HOLY GHOST did incarnate itself with the Virgin Mary in the womb of her mother, who by that means remained a virgin after she had born her child. 'Cadde in proporzioni più ridicole, insegnando che la Vergine non era stata concetta con seme umano, mà per opera divina, avendo lo Spirito Santo pigliato carne nel ventre di S. Anna, e partorita dalla medesima, che asseriva che nel parto era rimasta Vergine, e tale essere stata avanti il parto, e assicurando che S. Gioachino fosse stato impotente alla consumazione del matrimonio (8).'

[D] Though we know nothing for certain of the name, qualities, and history of the father and mother of the Holy Virgin . . . St Epiphanius, who flourished in the year 370, is the most ancient author, that tells us the names of the Holy Virgin's father and mother. It is true, that he pretends to have received from the tradition and history of the Virgin Mary, what he says concerning the prayers of Joachim and St Anne, and the revelation of the angel (9); but does not he himself confess, that there went about very absurd traditions concerning the birth of Mary? does he not quote a book upon this matter, in which were abominable things (10)? Does he not say, that the reason assigned there of Zachary's losing his speech in the temple, was because he had seen a man in the shape of an ass? He was preparing to go out, and to say, Woe be to you, what deity do you worship? But that deity, to hinder him, made him speechless: when he had recovered the use of his speech, and revealed what he saw, he was killed. St Epiphanius adds, that they found in the same book, that the reason why the legislator had ordered the high-priest to wear little bells, was this, that this deity might have time to hide himself, that he might not discover his figure of an ass; so that to prevent being surprised, the sound of the bells was to give him warning, that the high-priest was coming. I am sensible that all traditions do not deserve to be rejected like these; but however, we have no solid reason to assure us, that those which St Epiphanius has espoused, had any good foundation. This is so true, that St Augustin makes no scruple to take those traditions which made Joachim, the Holy Virgin's father, a priest, for uncertain and apocryphal. 'Quod de generatione Mariæ Faustus posuit quod patrem habuerit ex tribu Levi sacerdotem quendam nomine Joachim, quia Canonicum non est, non me constringit (11).' He adds, that it was possible for one and the same person to descend from two tribes; and concludes, that if he was obliged to pay any deference to apocryphal writings, he would thus relolve the objection of the Manichee: 'Hoc ego potius vel tale aliquid crederem, si illius apocryphæ scripturæ ubi Joachim pater Mariæ legitur, autoritate detinerer, quam mentiri Evangelium in quo scriptum est, &c.

Would you have any other proofs of the uncertainty of these traditions, do but consider Baronius's conduct, he has rejected part of the things that are said concerning the father and mother of the Holy Virgin; he says in express words, that the book fathered upon St Jerome, is the work of an unknown and ignorant person, who was incapable of avoiding manifest falsities. 'Non tantum eam Hieronymi non esse dixerimus, sed auctoris plane ut ignoti, sic prorsus imperiti, qui in ea condenda & conscribenda non novit aperta vitare mendacia, dum ait illis temporibus quibus ea acciderunt fuisse Isachar summum pontificem (12). He declares, that though that book has many truths in it, he will not build upon it (13). He therefore overturns one part of the foundation. You may see how Casaubon overturns the other: he shews, that the book de Nativitate S. Mariæ, falsely attributed to St Jerome, was written by a Manichee, and abounds with impious and impertinent things. A pestilentissimo hæretico profectum, postremo nugarum & impietatum esse plenum (14). He wonders that the Jesuit Christopher de Castro durst declare for such a book, the impotence whereof was so well known to Erasmus, Melchior Canus, Sixtus Senensis, and Baroni-

(3) Gregorius Nyssenus, Orat. in Natal. Domini, apud Baronium, ubi supra, n. 44.

(4) Sophronius apud Rivetum, Apolog. pro Sanctiss. Virg. Mariæ, cap. iii. Oper. Tom. III, pag. 605, col. 2.

(5) Bernard. Epist. cxxxix, ad Canon. Logdun. apud Rivetum, ibid. pag. 603.

(6) Stellaris corone, lib. iv, Part. II, art. c. i, apud Rivetum, ibid.

(7) Epiphanius Advers. Collyritianos, pag. m. ac62.

(8) Relazione della Vita del Cavagl. Bori, pag. 351.

(9) See his words in the foregoing remark.

(10) Τὸν ἄνθρωπον γὰρ Μαρίας βιβλίον τὴν Φασίαν εἶναι, ἐν ᾧ δεῖναι τὸ καὶ ὁρίσθαι ὅτι οὐκ ἔστιν ἀλλ' ἑνὶ τῷ αὐτῷ σώματι. Cujusmodi est qui de progenie Mariæ liber inscribitur, in quo horribilia quedam ac detestanda illorum dicta continentur. Epiphanius, Adv. Hæres. pag. 94.

(11) Augustin. contra Faustum Manich. lib. xxiii, cap. ix, apud Rivetum ubi supra, pag. 604, 605.

(12) Baronius, ubi supra, n. 44.

(13) Nec innititur scriptioni illi quæ hætenus Hieronymi nomine ad Chromatium & Heliodorum scripta vulgata est, nam licet in ea complura veritate constantia conscripserit, quæ à dictis auctoribus sibi videntur auctoritatem & fidem, tamen, &c. Id. ibid.

(14) Casaub. Exerc. ad Baron. I, n. 15, pag. m. 90.

I have mentioned, has been asserted, and feasts have been consecrated to St Joachim, and his wife [E]. Some (a) have believed that she had three daughters by her marriage; others, that St Anne was married three times; and that she had one daughter by every husband.

(a) See Baronius, in Apparatu, n. 41.

us. He cites a passage out of it, which supplies me with a strong proof. 'Illud liberè dico quod fidelium ne-
'minem negaturum puto; five hæc vera sunt, five ab
'aliquo conficta sacrosancta S. Mariæ miracula præ-
'cessisse; maxima consecuta fuisse; & idcirco salva
'fide, ab iis qui Deum facere ista posse credunt, sine
'periculo animæ suæ credi & legi posse (15).—This
'I speak freely, and I believe none of the faithful
'will deny it whether these miracles of the holy Mary
'were true, or whether they were forged before-hand,
'mighty things followed after, and in respect to these,
'they who believe that to GOD belongs the power
'of doing such things, may safely, and without peril of 'their souls read and receive them.' These are not the

(15) Id. ibid. pag. 91.

(16) Others call him Leucius, or Leontius. Id. ib.

(17) Id. ibid.

(18) See, above, remark [B].

words of the Manichean Seleucus (16), the author of the book, but of the Latin translator; and it is worth while to observe, that he confesses there are many falsities in the book he translates. 'Impietas istius Pleu-
'dohieronymi excusari salvo pudore non potest: nam
'quum fateatur, Seleucum, five Leucium de doctrina
'Apostolorum multa esse mentitum; ea tamen defen-
'dit, quæ sunt ab eodem hæretico scripta de vir-
'tutibus & miraculis eorum. Poterat ne hic planus
'apertius ostendere, nullam sibi esse curam veritatis, ne-
'que ullum se inter falsum & verum statuere dis-
'crimen? Adde de eo ipso libro quem vertebat: ita
'Et his multa non vera de corde suo confingit (17).
'—The impiety of this false Jerom, cannot, with any 'modesty, be excused; for altho' he confesses, that Se-
'leucus, or Leucius, told many lies, as to the doctrine 'of the Apostles, yet he defends those things which that
'Heretic has written concerning their virtues and mi'racles. Was it possible for him to have shown more 'plainly, that he had no regard to truth, nor made 'any difference between truth and falsehood? He adds
'also, in respect to the book he translated: He inserts
'many other things of his own head which are not 'true.' Do we need any more towards a full conviction of the uncertainty of all these traditions. That which St Gregory Nyssen alleges, is palpably false (18). As to Nicephorus Callistus, Germanus patriarch of Constantinople, John Damascen, &c, they deserve no credit, because they lived in an age too remote from the fountain-head, to have these traditions uncorrupted. Besides every one knows, that Nicepho-rus is a fabulous and injudicious writer (19). We are not obliged to believe that he has rightly quoted Hippolytus bishop of Porto. However, what he cites out of him, contains some falsities, as Casaubon shews.

See the Bibliothèque Universelle (20). Rivetus is in the right to think it strange, that Richard Mountague should assent to most of the stories which Bernardinus of Bussi, Pelvartus of Temelwaer, Coslerus, and such like writers have adopted concerning our St Joachim (21).

I wonder how the abbot de Marolles could pay so much deference to the above-mentioned traditions. See the 235th page of his Memoirs.

[E] Yet feasts have been consecrated to St Joachim and his wife.] The husband arrived to that honour later than the wife: it was not given him before the second of December, 1622. The day appointed for him is the twentieth of March (22); but the feast of St Anne was instituted in 1584. At first it was not necessary by a necessity of precept to abstain from work: it did not arrive to that prerogative till the year 1622 (23).
In all other things the worship of St Joachim is very inferior to that of his wife. She is the patroness of an order of nuns, called the Daughters of St Joseph (24), and there is much talk of her miracles. The village of Ker-Anne, in the diocese of Tannes in Bretagne, is very famous upon that account, and especially,
since an old image of this saint has been dug up, which had been long hid under ground. It was revealed to a husbandman in the year 1625, where this image was to be found. As soon as it was dug up, it performed abundance of miracles. They were quickly in a condition to build her a fine church; the alms of devout souls, who flocked thither from all parts, furnished enough for the expence. The bishop of Van-nes procured from Rome the necessary indulgences for those that should visit this image; and gave the direction of this new church to the reformed Carmelites, and permitted brother Hugh of St Francis, one of them, to publish the miracles which had been lately wrought in those parts (25).

(19) Nicephorum hunc fabulosissimum esse scriptorem, de judicio in literis nullius, facti notum est eruditiss. Casaub. ubi supra.

(20) Pag. 143; et seq. of the eleventh Tome.

(21) Rivet. Apolog. pro S. S. Maria, cap. iii. Oper. Tom. III, pag. 607.

(22) Spondanus, Annal. ad ann. 1622, n. 1.

(23) Id. ibid.

(24) See the last intruded. Les grandes de Sainte Anne. It is mentioned in the Bibliothèque Universelle, Tom. XI, pag. 141.

(25) Taken from Spondanus, ad ann. 1625, n. 1.

JOAN, Queen of Naples. See NAPLES.

JOB, whose patience has been described in one of the canonical books of the old Testament. Not to repeat what we find in Moreri, I content myself with observing some errors. It is a mistake to affirm, that the Turks have a great veneration for the sepulchre of this holy man [A], the first judge of Solomon's court [B]. It is a scandalous

[A] It is a mistake to affirm, that the Turks have a great veneration for the sepulchre of Job.] Here is a passage of Sir Paul Ricaut (1). 'It is the custom of 'the Turks, as often as there is a new emperor, to con'duct him with all imaginable pomp, to the place of 'the suburbs of Constantinople, which they call Job,
'where there is an ancient sepulchre of a certain prophet,
'or holy man, whom the Turks, who have no know'ledge of antiquity or history, pretend to be the same
'Job, who for so many ages has been a pattern of 'constancy and patience.' The French translator of Sir Paul Ricaut, makes an observation upon these words, that deserve to be mentioned: 'I believe, says he (2),
'that some Turks, unacquainted with History and 'Chronology, may take the sepulchre of Job, which 'is under the walls of Constantinople, for that of 'the holy man, whose history is related in the old Testament; but the Mahometan historians tell us themselves, that this sepulchre was built for another Job, who was a Mahometan, and one of the companions of Mahomet. He was killed at the siege of Constantinople, which was attacked by Jezid, son of the calif Moavia, in the fifty second year of the He-gira, or the six hundred and seventy second of Jesus Christ. This is what Elmacinus observes in his history of the Saracens, chap. 7. book 1, and though Elmacinus was a Christian, yet he only relates what he found in the Mahometan Historians, which he owns to have abridged.' One of the most learned

(1) Ricaut's Present State of the Ottoman Empire, translated by Belspier, book 1, pag. 10.

(2) Belspier, Remarques curieuses sur l'Etat Présent de l'Empire Ottoman, pag. 4.

rabbies of the XVIIth century has been in the same error with these ignorant Turks; for he affirms (3),
'that the Mahometans have still a great veneration for
'the sepulchre of Job, which is at Constantinople (4).
'... Doubtless he did not know that it is the 'sepulchre of a different Job, from that of the old Testament, and he was so ridiculous as to believe, that 'all the Mahometans took it for the sepulchre of this 'holy man.'

[B] The first judge of Solomon's court.] Here is another passage of Sir Paul Ricaut. 'The Turks, says he (5),
'so confound history for want of understanding Chro-nology, that they say Job was the first judge of Solomon's court, and that Alexander the Great was the 'general of his armies.' Here is a good criticism upon these words (6). 'The English author has taken
'this from Busbequius, but has not well understood his 'meaning. For Busbequius does not say that the 'Turks believed Job to be the first judge of Solomon's 'court, and Alexander to be the general of his army;
'but only that they understand Chronology and History
'so little, that if such a thing should come into their 'heads, they would make no scruple to affirm, that
'Job was the first judge of Solomon's court, and Alex'ander the Great the general of his army. There is a 'great deal of difference betwixt these two things.'
See Busbequius, epist. 1. Sir Paul Ricaut's error has already crept into some books (7).

(3) Menassih Ben Israel de Benferet. Mortuor. lib. 1, cap. xvi, apud Belspier, ibid. pag. 5.

(4) Belspier, ibid.

(5) Ricaut, ubi supra.

(6) Belspier, ubi supra, pag. 6.

(7) Berroun has copied it in his Varie Lectiones, pag. 260.

[C] B

lous impudence to say, that Job's distemper was the pox [C]. I confess, that in the church of Rome, he is the patron of those who have the pox [D]; but this does not prove the other supposition. He was worshipped in that church before the pox was known in Europe [E]. Tertullian is in an error, to say, that Job left no posterity. See thereupon Mr Spanheim (a) in his history of Job, which is a very good book.

(a) Frideric. Spanheimius, F. Historia Jobi, cap. xv, pag. 481.

(8) Patin, Letter eccclxviii, pag. 202, of the third Tome.

[C] It is a scandalous impudence to say that Job's distemper was the pox. Guy Patin names two famous authors who have said this. These are his words: (8) 'Pour répondre à ce que vous me mandez, je vous dirai que Bolduc Capuchin a écrit aussi bien que Pineda Jésuite Espagnol que Job avoit la verole. Je crois volontiers que David & Solomon l'avoient aussi. — In answer to your question, I will tell you that Bolduc, a Capuchin, and Pineda, a Spanish Jesuit, have affirmed, that Job had the pox: I could easily believe that David and Solomon had it also.' Note, that it may be said, that Job had this ugly distemper, without having committed any act of impurity that had brought it upon him.

(9) Molanus, in Diario Med. cor. pag. 68.

[D] He is the patron of those who have the pox. Consult Molanus's Diarium Medicorum Ecclesiasticum, where you will find these words under the tenth of May, which is St Job's day. 'Volunt nonnulli Sanctum Job peculiarem patronum esse eorum qui lue venerea laborant aut eam curant (9). — Some say that St Job is the particular patron of those that have the pox, or that cure it.'

(10) Id. ibid. pag. 69.

[E] He was worshipped . . . before the pox was known in Europe. The same Molanus cautions us not to admit of Agrippa's error, who ventures to say, that the pox was the cause of Job's canonization. Before this, says Molanus, there was at Venice a church, and a feast appointed for this holy man, who from Charlemagne's time has been inserted in the Martyrology. 'Cavendus est H. Cornelius Agrippa, qui vane scripsit lucem Veneream Job in divos retulisse. Quasi non multo ante Veneti memoriam ejus & templo & festo die celebrarent, confect quoque Usuardum Caroli Magni ætate & Wandelbertum non multo post, Martyrologiis suis eum inseruisse. Et à Grecis ad sextum diem Maii notatur sanctus & justus Job, qui multa contra Satanam certamina sustinuit (10). — We are to take care therefore, of believing what H. Cornelius Agrippa has vainly written, that the Venereal disease brought Job into the number of the saints. Though a long while before, the Venetians had celebrated his memory, by dedicating thereto both a church and feast day, and it is certain that Usuardus, in the time of Charles the Great, and Wandelbertus, a little after, inserted his name in their Martyrologies: and by the Greeks, the sixth day of May is distinguished by honour of holy and righteous Job, who sustained many and sharp conflicts with Satan.' A famous Protestant divine, who has in some measure taken Agrippa's part in this respect, observes, that there is at Utrecht an hospital, where they take care of those that are infected with the pox, and that it goes by the name of Job. 'Dici potest ad defensionem Agrippæ, Jobum inter divos tutelares & quidem fœdi iustis morbi, post ejusdem morbi exortum, demum fuisse letum. Quidquid sit, tanquam divus alexicacus ab humis morbi mythis, annuente Romana Ecclesia salutatur. Hinc in hac urbe Xenodochium S. Jobi olim dominante papatu constitutum, ubi illo morbo laborantes curari solent (11). — This however may be said, in defence of Agrippa, that Job was received into the number of tutelar saints, and even of that filthy disease he mentions, within a short time after it's first breaking out. However it be, he is addressed for the cure of all evils of this kind, with the consent of the Romish church, and hence it is, that a hospital, erected in this city, was put under his patronage, because persons afflicted with this disease, were received into it, and cured there.' It was not long since the question was discussed at Rome, whether Job and the other saints of the old Testament, deserved the worship that is paid to canonized saints, and whether altars ought to be built to them. Consult upon this Acta Sanctorum Maii (12).

(11) Giff. Voët. Disputat. Theol. Tom. III, pag. 435, 436.

(12) There is a dissertation upon this in the Appendixes to the sixth and seventh volumes. See also Journ. des Sav. March 5, 1703, in the extract of a book of Mr Baillet.

(a) La Croix du Maine, & du Verdier, Bibl. François.

(b) Baillet, Jugem. sur les Poëtes, artic. 7342. Menage, cap. cx, of the Anti Baillet.

(c) See the Anti-Baillet, chap. cxi.

JODELLE (STEPHEN) a French and Latin poet in the XVIth century, was of Paris (a). He was one of the Pleiad invented by Ronfard (b). Some make him the first inventor of French verses composed like the Latin, according to the quantity of syllables; but others ascribe this to Baif (c). It makes little for their glory to settle the truth of this matter; for that invention quickly fell into contempt. There is more reason for pretending, that Jodelle was the first Frenchman, who gave in his language tragedy and comedy in the ancient form (d). He had an incredible facility in making verses [A], and possessed several other talents. He was an orator, understood Architecture, Painting, and Sculpture, and was well skill'd in managing arms (e). He made profession of being a man of the sword (f). His birth gave him that privilege [B]. He died in July 1573, being forty one years of age. See the margin (g). His friends published a collection of his works the following year (h). It has been wrongfully said that he died with hunger, as a punishment for his impieties [C], and he has been falsely cried down as a pagan

(g) Mr Varillas is mistaken when he supposes, Hist. de Henri III. livr. xii, pag. m. 267, that Jodelle was living under the reign of Henry III. He says, that the seven French Poets, who were called the Pleiad, having made merry for a whole month at that prince's charges, in a tavern near a gate of Nefle, went out singing: Long live tyranny, we have spent thirty six thousand livres.

(h) Du Verdier, ubi supra, pag. 284, 285.

(1) Bibliothèque, François, pag. 286.

[A] He had an incredible facility of making verses. This I have from du Verdier Vau-Privas (1), in these words. 'He was admirable in one thing, which is almost incredible, viz. that all his compositions were quickly made, without study and pains; and we can, with several persons that are now living, testify, that the longest and most difficult tragedy or comedy has not taken him up above ten mornings: nay, the comedy intitled Eugene, was made at four sittings. He has been seen in his youth to compose and write in one night for a wager, five hundred good Latin verses, on a subject given him on the spot. All his sonnets, even those that were merely accidental, were made by him as he was walking, and amusing himself with other things, so suddenly, that when he pronounced them, people thought he had not yet began them.' We need not wonder then at his numerous productions. It is said that he composed about ten thousand verses upon the passage of the Rhône (2). If his friends had published all his pieces, how many thousands of verses would they have amounted to? he made all sorts of verses, elegies, odes, sonnets, songs, inscriptions, and canticles (3). He made a Poem against the sin of Sodomy (4).

(2) La Croix du Maine, Bibliothèque, pag. 78.

[B] His birth gave him that privilege. He was a gentleman who had a lordship; for he took the title of Seigneur du Lymodin (5). I believe it was a patrimonial estate.

[C] It has been wrongfully said, that he died with hunger, as a punishment for his impieties. Voetius relates (6), that upon his reading in Honfdorf's Theatrum, that Stephen Jodelle, a French Poet, an Epicurean and an Atheist, spent all his estate, and died of hunger (7), he carefully inquired whether the thing was true; but that his library could give him no light into it, which obliged him to consult Rivetus. By which means he found that there was no track of Atheism to be seen in Jodelle's works; but on the contrary, several tokens of Orthodoxy; and that possibly, the Stephani Jodelli Gallici Poëte, quem Epicureum & Atheum confectum dicit. Voëtius, ibid.

(3) Du Verdier, ubi supra.

(4) La Croix du Maine, ubi supra.

(5) Du Verdier, ubi supra, pag. 285. See also la Croix du Maine, ibid.

(6) Voët. Disputat. Tom. I. pag. 137.

(7) Meminit Honfdorf. dicto libro exemplum ad Drexelgum, Lipsiæ in fol. ann. 1570. Edit. dilapidatâ bonâ a Pagan, because in a carnival sport his friends sacrificed a goat to him [D]. I dare not give credit accusation of impiety, which was charged upon him, had no other foundation than the sacrifice of a goat (8), which was offered to Jodelle, as being the head of the tragic Poets; and was only a meer sport, if we will believe the author of Ronfard's life. Nevertheless, Rivetus durst not determine whether for that one action Jodelle does not deserve to be reckoned an Atheist. Voëtius acquiesces in that judgment: he grants with his friend, that if there be no more authentic proofs of Jodelle's Atheism, one cannot affirm that he was guilty of it; but in the mean time he will not acquit him, and leaves it as a disputable thing. In medio relinquat (Rivetus) an ob idem factum Atheus sit dicendum, nisi aliunde alia authentica testimonia suppetant.

(8) See the following remark.

(9) Voëtius, ubi supra.

In ejus sententia & nos acquiescimus (9). It is not probable that the compiler Honfard, goes upon this pretended sacrifice: he gives Jodelle the character of a debauchee, who had squandered his estate. It is therefore upon an habitual sin that he goes, and not upon the force of a pretended sacrifice; a thing done but once, and which may be as well imputed to the other wits of whom Honfard says not a word, as to Jodelle. We may therefore say, that this compiler of examples of the divine justice, is grossly mistaken; and yet we see two famous divines, who equal his accusation, though destitute of all sorts of proof, against the testimonies of orthodoxy, which appear in the books of the accused: they fancy themselves equitable enough, provided they neither condemn nor acquit him. How little do they follow these maxims, 'Quilibet præsumitur bonus donec probetur malus. Astore non probante absolvitur reus? — Every man is presumed to be good till he be proved to be bad. A man is acquitted if the crimes he was charged with cannot be proved.' We must take notice, that Honfard's transcribers, or those whom he has transcribed, be they never so numerous, do not amount altogether to the authority of a single witness, while they quote no body, or only cite one another (10). For the rest, I do not pretend to deny that Jodelle died poor (11). I do not know but Gentillet was the first original of all those compilers, who have mentioned Jodelle, as an instance of divine vengeance upon impious men. 'We might alledge, says he (12), infinite examples of judgment and vengeance of God, exercised against Atheists, despisers of God and religion, even of our own time; as for instance, the tragic Poet Jodelle, who made a true tragical end; for having eaten up his patrimony like an Epicure, he died miserably of hunger.' I have found part of these words in a book printed at Morges, in the year 1581, intitled, Punitions & jugemens de Dieu, &c. and in a book printed in 1586, and written by John Chaffanion, of Monistrol, in Vellay, with this title, Memorable Histories of the great and wonderful Punishments and Judgments of GOD, &c. (13).

(10) You will find the following passage in König's Bibliotheca, of the word Jodelinus: Gregorius Richterius Garlensis in Axiom. Eccles. n. 108, fegg. babet: Memoria nostra Jodelius, tragicorum scriptor, tragicum exitum invenit: nam luxu, gæna, stupris, ex Epicureorum discipulis, patrimonium cum consumpsisset, miserimo genere mortis fame periit.

(11) See the article FINÆUS, remark [D], at the end.

(12) Gentillet, Discours sur les moines de bien Gouverner contre Nicolas Machiavel, Part. II, pag. 179. Edit. 1576.

(13) Book II, chap. xxix, pag. 270.

(14) In Ronfard's Life, pag. m. 159.

(15) He speaks of two ministers, who had writ against Ronfard.

(16) I think it should be Arcueil.

[D] His friends sacrificed a goat to him.] Claudius Binet (14) tells us, how this farce was acted. 'They (15) blamed him; amongst other things, for having sacrificed a goat to Jodelle, in the village of Hercueil (16); but he gives a sufficient answer to that particular accusation, which is this. Jodelle caused the tragedy of Cleopatra to be acted before the king, which every body so applauded, that some days after, when the whole club of the Poets were together in that village, to pass away the time, and enjoy themselves in the licentious days of the carnival, every one of them made some verses in imitation of the Bacchannalia of the antients. A goat happened to go in the street, which gave them an opportunity to play the fool, as well because he was formerly sacrificed to Bacchus, as because they had a mind to offer him to Jodelle, as a recompence for his tragedy, according to the antient custom, to which the Christians themselves, and especially the Poets, have recourse now and then, not out of any belief, but by way of allusion: and that which gave occasion to believe something of it, was the verses and pranks of those Poets, which were published, particularly the Dithyrambs of Bertrand Berger, a Dithyrambic Poet, in which were these verses. . . . All this was but fiction and masquerade.' Perhaps the reader will not be displeased to find here Ronfard's answer, which Binet has only pointed at. Here it is.

Tu dis en vomissant dessus moy ta malice,
Que j'ay fait d'un grand Bouc à Bacchus sacrifice:
Tu ments impudemment: cinquante gens de bien
Qui estoient au banquet diront qu'il n'en est rien.

Muses qui habitez de Parnasse la croupe,
Filles de Jupiter, qui allez neuf en trope,
Venez & repoussez par vos belles chansons,
L'injure fait à vous & à vos nourissons,
Jodelle ayant gaigne par une voix hardie
L'honneur que l'homme Grec donne à la Tragedie,
Pour avoir en haussant le bas file François,
Contenté doctement lea oreilles des Rois.

La brigade qui lors au ciel levait la teste
(Quand le temps permettoit une licence honneste)
Honorant son esprit gaillard & bien appris,
Luy fit present d'un Bouc, des Tragiques le prix.
Jà la nappe estoit mise, & la table garnie
Se bordoit d'une sainte & docte compagnie:
Quand deux ou trois ensemble en riant ont poussé
Le pere du troupeau à long poil herissé:

Il venoit à grands pas ayant la barbe peinte,
D'un chapelet de fleurs la teste il avoit ceinte,
Le bouquet sur l'oreille, & bien fier se sentoit
Dequoy telle jeunesse ainsi le presentoit:

Puis il fut rejeté pour chose mesprisée
Après qu'il eut servy d'une longue risée,
Et non sacrifié, comme tu dis menteur,
De telle faulx bourde impudent inventeur (17).

(17) Ronfard, in the Answer to some ministers, pag. 12, of the ninth Tome of his works, Edit. of Paris, 1664, in 12mo.

1.

In the height of your malice you tell it about,
That one day to Bacchus I offer'd a goat.
Why, good Sir, you lie, full fifty were there,
And saw no such thing, as they all will declare.

2.

Ye Muses who dwell on Parnassus's top,
Ye daughters of Jove, who run nine in a troop,
Come hither and lend me your aid to chastize
Whoever or you, or your scholars, belies.

3.

Jodelle having reach'd in the tragedy strain,
That point of perfection the Greeks did ordain,
While his muse in French verse, with such energy sings,
As well might content an audience of kings.

4.

A brigade of bright wits, on this triumph thought fit
To make use of that freedom the age doth permit;
And as the reward of his skill they devise
To present him a GOAT . . . the old tragedy prize.

5.

The cloth being laid, and the table deck'd out,
And a circle of honest and wise men about,
The old head of the herd, with form was brought in,
By folks who ne'er dreamt that their joke was a sin.

6.

With a motion most solemn, the Goat too appear'd,
His head crown'd with ribbons, and painted his beard;
At his ear stuck a nosegay, thus stalking along,
He seem'd joy'd with his honors, and pleas'd with the throng.

7.

At length the poor Goat was allow'd to turn tail,
When long they had laugh'd, and the jest was grown stale,
Nor never was offer'd, as you folks persuade,
And basely report the vile lie you have made.

Of

credit to what I have read in Beza's life [E]. You will find a great many things relating

Of whatever party a man may be, he carries things too far; and we are often imposed upon by popular reports. The ministers did rashly give credit to the stories that were spread concerning Jodelle's goat: and because Ronfard set up for a persecutor, for he wrote against the Protestants, and fell upon them at the head of the militia, they upbraided him with the ceremony of the goat, putting the worst construction upon it. They called it a Pagan sacrifice, and maintained, that the goat had been sacrificed to a false god. It was a calumny, but they were not the inventors of it. I shall quote Scaliger, who says, that a priest gave birth to that imposture; and it is to be observed, that he has rejected this pretended sacrifice as a fable. I know not whether he remembered, that some ministers had accused Ronfard of it; but I know very well, that he believed his adversary Scioppius had brought him (Scaliger) upon the stage with the others. These are his words.

'At illud, quod adjiciemus, omnia portentia amphitheatrica superat. Parisenses illos amicos tuos imitatis, quos Dionysia agitasse, & hircum immolasse fama est. Dionysia agitare, dicit esse hircum immolare. Hujus enim infamulati sunt illi, de quibus nunc agitur. Vespillonis filius, qui nunquam Lutetiae fuit, in media Suburra habitans Romae, unde hoc mendacium explicari potuit, nisi à quibus reliqua portentia didicistis? Quos putat Dionysia agitasse, vel hircum immolasse, ut illi persuaserunt qui verum dicere, etiam si velint, non possint, ii sunt, Petrus Ronfardus, M. Anton. Muretus, Janus Baisius, Remigius Bellaqueus, Stephanus Jodellus, Nicol. Denisotus, Joan. Auratus, alii, omnes poëtae, præter Patoletum, qui in historiis conscribendis omne studium suum collocarat. Quos tam falsum est adeo execrandum, nefandum, impium facinus fecisse, quam certum est, impune illis futurum non fuisse, siquidem jam Christianæ pietatis, quam exilimationis suæ obliiti tam detestabile scelus in se admisissent. Si illi docti viri viverent, sur non inultum tulisset. Porro tam impudentis calumniæ auctor fuit sacrificulus Gentiliaci vicî, in quo illi doctissimi viri de constituto coierant, ut de symbolis essent. Totum drama exponerem, si opus esset, ut Josephus me docuit, qui illud ad unguem tenet (18). — But what we are going to relate exceeds all the wonders of the amphitheatre. You imitate those friends at Paris, who are reported to have held feasts in honour to Bacchus, and to have sacrificed a goat to him. To celebrate the Dionysia he says was to sacrifice a goat, and this is what is insinuated of those of whom we are speaking. The son of an Undertaker who never was at Paris, but lived in the middle of the Suburra at Rome, where could he pick up such a story as this, but from those who told him the rest of his wonders? Those whom he thought to have kept these feasts, and to have sacrificed a goat being so persuaded by persons who could not tell him truth if they would, were Peter Ronfard, M. Anthony Muret, Janus Bais, Remy Belleau, Stephen Jodelle, Nicol. Denisot, John Dorat, and others, all poets except Patolet, who had applied himself wholly to writing history. That these were guilty of so execrable a villany, is a fact as false as it is certain that they would never have escaped unpunished, if forgetting their duty as Christians, and what they owed to their own reputations, they could have suffered so detestable a thing to have entered their hearts. If these learned men were living, this fellow would not have escaped so. The author of this impudent calumny was a priest in the village of Chantilly, where these learned men used to meet and converse together. I could explain the whole affair, if there was a necessity for it, as Joseph Scaliger himself told it me, who had the story at his fingers end.' All goes well hitherto; I wish what follows was as just. 'Sed ponamus verum esse. Quid hæc ad Josephum, qui tunc puer Burgigalæ primis rudimentis Latini sermonis initiabatur? An quia sexto post, septimo, & octavo anno omnes, præter Jodellum, illos vidit, & familiariter novit, ideo ejusdem criminis postulandus erit? Hoc modo oportere omnes, qui Muretum norunt, Dionysia agitasse, hoc est, majorem partem eorum, qui hodie Romæ agunt. Quanta invidia Josephum premerent, si verum crimen haberent, quod illi objicerent; quum aliorum facta, eaque falsa illi exprobren-

'tur (19)? — But admitting all this to be true, (19) Id. ibid. pag. 340.
'what has all this to do with Scaliger, who was at that time a boy learning the rudiments of the Latin tongue at Bourdeaux? or because six, seven, or eight years after he saw and was intimate with all those persons except Jodelle, must the same crime therefore be imputed to him? at this rate, all who knew Muret must be supposed to have sacrificed to Bacchus, which will tarnish the reputation of the major part of the present inhabitants of Rome. With what joy would they attack Scaliger if they had any real crime to object to him, who thus impute the crimes of others, and those too which have not in them any shadow of truth.'
The heat of the dispute disturbed Scaliger's head; he goes about to clear himself from a thing he was not accused of; he complains of being calumniated when he is not, and so he himself becomes a slanderer (20). When it is said that a man imitates the faults of his good friends, it is not presumed that he was with them in a certain place, where they have committed some crime; on the contrary, it is supposed he was not with them, for if he had been, he would be called an accomplice, and not an imitator. It is not therefore true that Scioppius involved Scaliger in Jodelle's business (21), and consequently Scaliger should not have complained of it, nor alledged his being in another place.

[E] I dare not give credit to what I have read in Beza's life.] I find in it, that Stephen Jodelle, one of the poets of the French Pleiad, made a stanza upon Beza's being struck with the plague whilst he was translating the Psalms. The stanza runs thus:

Beze fut lors de la peste accueilli
Qu'il retouchoit cette harpe immortelle.
Mais pourquoi fut Beze d'elle assailli?
Beze assaillloit la peste à tous mortelle (§ 2).

The plague o'er Beza did prevail
While he to sacred song inclin'd.
Why did the plague this man assail?
He assail'd the plague of human kind.

Antony la Faïe, who wrote the life of this minister (22), gives Jodelle the surname of Modilinus. Stephanus Jodellus Modilinus, says he, non postremum inter poëtas Pleiadis Gallicæ, &c. One may easily perceive that Modilinus was put in for Limodinus, a title belonging to Jodelle, on account of his lordship (23). But as this stanza is ascribed to one Stephen de Modelin in several editions of the Psalms, where it is placed with the epitaph of Clement Marot, composed by the same Modelin, I question whether it be Jodelle's. For such a poet should not have been called Stephen de Modelin. On such occasions as these, it is not usual to make a man known by an anagram. But I have a stronger reason than this. Beza was at Laufanne when he was seized with the plague; and was then looked upon in France as an apostate. The persecution was terrible against the Reformed; can we then believe that a poet, who professed himself a Catholic, would have composed an obliging stanza, in Beza's praise, so agreeable to the taste and stile of the Reformers? that which is certain is, that the opinion of Antony la Faïe has been followed by Andrew Rivetus (24), and Jeremiah de Pours (25).

[(§ 2.) It is very possible, that this Tetra-stich was composed by Jodelle when he was very young. At that time he professed the Reformed Religion, in Geneva; where by that wonderful fertility of genius, which, even in off-hand compositions, is ascribed to him under the letter A. by Du-Verdier-Vau-Privas, one night among others, he was seen to have composed after this manner an hundred Latin verses, in which he decyphered the mæls, with suitable raiories, says a Protestant author of that time. According to all probability, Jodelle's poetry met with no great encouragement at Geneva, since on a sudden he was seen to retake the road to Paris, and the way of that mæls, he had so much cried down by his Latin verses. For the rest, as the Romish religion was become in nothing better, since Jodelle had thought proper to embrace it, that might be the reason why the Protestants, whom he had left, treated him as impious, and even

(18) Scaliger, in Confutatio Fabulæ Burdonum, pag. m. 338, & seq.

(22) Melch. Adam has inserted the greatest part of it in his Lives of such divines as were not Germans.

(23) He was lord of Lymidine.

(24) He writ to Vicius, that Stephen Jodelle had praised the translation of the Psalms, and even imparted to him the Stanza. Voët. ubi supra.

(25) In the second book of the Divine Melody, pag. 586, he inserts the stanza, and ascribes it to Stephen Jodelle Modelin.

* Memoirs of the State of France, &c. Vol. I, fol. 178, verso, and even lating to this poet in the place which I have quoted out of Stephen Pasquier.

even as an Atteist; to which, thirty sonnets, which he made immediately after the massacre of Paris, to charge the ministers with having occasioned the punishments, wars, and massacres, which had been seen in France since, and upon account of the Reformation, contributed not a little. It is said, continues the same author, that Jodelle had a round sum of crowns for these sonnets; which then he must have spent in less than a year, if it be true, as is pretended, that, in the month of July following, he died of hunger and poverty. As for Modelin or Modilin, perhaps Jodelle thus anagrammatized the name of his lordship, either following the practice of the times, or not to appear plainly the author of the Tetrastich, in which the Romish religion is censured, and Beza commended. REM. CRIT.]

JOHN (SAINT) the Evangelist. Not to mention here what is to be found in Moreri, or in Mr de Tillemont (a), I shall only say, I. That in St Augustin's time, there went about a silly tradition concerning the condition St John was in [A]. II. That there is nothing more absurd than what has been said against the author of the translation of the new Testament of Mons [B], under the false pretence, that decency did not allow this holy apostle, and the Virgin Mary to lodge in the same house. III. That what has been answered to Mr Mallet hereupon, deserves to be mentioned [C].

IV. That

(a) Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire Eccle. Tom. I. p. 910, & seq. Brussels, in 12mo.

* August. Comment. in Joan. in hec verba, Discipulus ille non moritur.

(1) The abbot Foydis, Extrait d'un Sermon prêché le jour de St Polycarpe, pag. 30.

(2) Hist. des Ouvrages des Savans, for May, 1695, pag. 427.

(3) See Tillemont. Mémoire pour servir à l'Hist. Eccle. Tom. I, pag. 947.

(4) Ib. pag. 945.

(5) The Gospel of St John, chap. xix, ver. 27.

(6) Mallet, Examen de quelques Passages, pag. 221, of the third edition.

(7) Nouvelle découverte de la Traduction, pag. 430.

[A] A silly tradition concerning the condition of St John. 'Never was any people so credulous about traditions as the Asiatics, and in particular the Ephesians. St Augustin relates upon this subject a very particular thing, which plainly shews the excess of their credulity, and the folly of their traditions. He says, that some Ephesians, or some persons that came from Ephesus, men of great sense and merit, and who were not credulous, non levibus hominibus, had assured him, that St John was not dead; that indeed he was buried at Ephesus, but that he was in his grave as a man that sleeps in his bed; and that as we see the bed-cloaths move up and down, according as a man in his sleep breathes, so the earth of the grave wherein St John was buried, was seen to rise and fall in such like intervals.' Can any thing be more impertinent than such a story (1). I have just now read that Mr de Tillemont is blamed for relating this story, and several others like it. There would be reason to blame him, if he did relate it as a truth; but this he does not do (3). It is a fault then to censure him; for a collection of errors is a most useful part of history. I confess, he seems to believe the story of the manna of our apostle's grave (4).

[B] Nothing is more absurd than what has been said against the author of the translation of the new Testament of Mons. I begin with the Greek text: Kαὶ ὁ ἀνὴρ ἐκεῖνος τῆς ὥρας ἔλαβεν αὐτὴν ὁ μαθητὴς εἰς τὴν ἰδιάν, that is to say, according to the version of Mons, and from that hour the disciple took her into his house. See how this translation of that passage has been criticized: 'It is certain that St John, who had embraced the state of the evangelical poverty, had no house to receive the mother of God; and though he had one, there are many reasons of decency and honesty, which easily persuade us, that the Virgin would not have thought it proper to retire thither. This conduct might even have had ill consequences in the times to come; for scandalous ecclesiastics would have been glad to justify themselves by so noble an example of the dwelling of the youngest and the chafest of all the apostles, with the most modest and innocent of all virgins. And this apprehension is not groundless; for St Epiphanius, who seems to approve the thought of the Mons translators, had the same fear, and he assures that some libertines had already pretended to cover their scandalous conduct with the example of the virgin's abode with St John. In the seventy eighth Herefy, where he speaks of this abode, Vereor, says he, ne hoc ipsum, quod dicimus, fraudi sit aliquibus, ut at contubernales & dilectas, quas vocant scæminas, retinendas, quod genus pessimo sibi errore animi, machinati sunt, fucum inde aliquem, & colorem arcessisse videantur (6).

[C] That what has been answered . . . deserves to be mentioned.] For it contains general and very instructive principles, for such as will judge of things according to their true differences. I do not insist upon the answer which relates to the objection of the evangelical poverty: I only set down the confutation of the other point. 'It is very strange, says Mr Arnaud (7), that Mr Mallet has not seen what has been observed by the interpreters of the Scripture, upon a subject which might have appeared much more scandalous. It is that of the Apostle, carrying with them a Christian woman to take care of their subsistence. Nevertheless St Paul 1 Cor. xv. 5. says (8) that they had that power, and made use of it: (8) It is in the fifth verse of the ninth chapter of the first Epistle to the Corinthians, and not in the fifteenth chapter, as Mr Arnaud quotes it. whereupon Esius make this most judicious reflexion, which shews the true principles, by which we ought to judge of this kind of things, which Mr Mallet should have known before he undertook to subject the Virgin to his false rules of decency. 'If you ask, says this learned divine, how the Apostles could without scandal take along with them women that were not their wives. I answer, that this custom was so well established among the Jews, that our Saviour himself did not think it amiss to do it. This was not practised except by women, whose chastity and piety were so well known and experienced, as to leave no room for any ill suspicion. To which it may be added, that the Apostles led so edifying a life, and had obtained such a reputation of holiness, that tho' these women attended them, no one durst make an ill judgment of them, as the Jews never suspected any thing of that nature, with respect to our Saviour, as much disposed as they were to slander and calumny.' Nothing can be more reasonable, and indeed it is by this we ought to judge that a thing which might give offence, when it is not attended with favourable circumstances, that leave no room for evil suspicions, is truly edifying when it is attended with those circumstances. Now when will the consideration of an experienced holiness be able to stop the mouth of calumny, and even to prevent suspicions in the shallowest minds, and those that are most apt to be prepossessed by the least appearances, if the veneration which the faithful have always had for the mother of JESUS CHRIST, and for his most dear disciple had not had the power to make every body look upon their living together, in consequence of the command received from their dying Saviour, as a most holy and most innocent thing . . . Mr Mallet (9) is the first and only man who has had so mean a notion of the holiness of the Virgin, and of the opinion the church has entertained of her, as to imagine, that being above fifty years of age, she could not live with an Apostle, without staining her reputation, and that it was an example of dangerous consequence, as being capable of authorizing the suspected living together of women and ecclesiastics, which is forbidden by the canons. For thus far he carries his extravagant imaginations against the honour of the Virgin. But if the authors of those canons had been so excessive in their suspicions, as this censor of the Virgin and St John, why did they except out of their prohibitions, such persons as mothers, sisters, and nieces? Is it because they thought incests were absolutely impossible? No certainly: but because being guided by the spirit of God, and knowing that in point of general laws, all excess ought to be avoided, and a wise moderation observed, which obliges to overlook what seldom or never happens, they judged on the one hand, that there was no need of great virtue to avoid being tempted with the sight of those persons, because natural modesty is ordinarily sufficient to prevent the motions of an impure affection upon their account; and on the other hand, that the proneness of men to judge ill of their neighbours, doth not commonly go so far, as to impute to them such black crimes, without very evident proofs: so that they did not believe, that, upon these

(9) See the abbot Foydis, ubi supra, pag. 57, he proves, ibid. pag. 26, that the Holy Virgin did not go with St John to Ephesus, he proves it 1st, because Coloss. 2^{do} but so much scandalous, would have reflected on that journey, which however he has not justified upon.

IV. That the way it is pretended St John justified his cherishing of a partridge is very natural [D]. V. That there are some people who pretend that the marriage in Cana where the water was changed into wine was his own [E], and that upon sight of that miracle, he renounced marriage to live in celibacy all his life.

‘these occasions, there was any ground to fear any such thing, or the suspicion of it.’

[D] His cherishing of a partridge is very natural.] A Huntsman was astonished to see this great apostle, so venerable for his age and virtue, stoop to such an amusement. The apostle asked him whether he always kept his bow bent. He answered that would be the way to make it useless. If, replied St John, you unbend your bow to prevent it's being useless, so do I with respect to my mind for the same reason. I do not believe that this story is very certain; but I fancy that they who never heard of it will not be displeased to know that such a thing is related. The author of the tract De ludicra dictione has inserted it in his work. His phrases being nervous, will not be unacceptable to the learned readers. Let us therefore entertain them therewith. Nec malus, ut opinor, interpret Christi consiliorum & voluntatum Joannes discipulus, qui ad leves lusus atque oblectamenta puerorum descendit ipse jam senior, atque exemplo prævit, quatenus interjungere, & ex quotidianis occupationibus reficere ac recreare mentem licet. Hunc, mansuetam perdidit blande & suaviter alludentem, quidam cum arcu & sagittis venator offendit. Quod cum sacre cum vehementer miraretur, hominem id ætatis, spectatum & cognitum diuturna virtute: sensit Joannes, & interrogavit, an illum ipsum, quem gereret, arcum haberet semper intentum. Cui ille, Nequaquam vero, inquit: stancescat enim arcus, & molliatur intentione perpetua, inutilisque fiat. Tum Joannes, Tu, mi homo, arcum remittis ac relaxas, ne inutilis sit: ego arimum, ne sit inutilis (10).

(10) Vavasser, de Ludicra Dictione, pag. 285.

[E] Some people pretend that the marriage in Cana was his own [E]. The curious and learned Thomafius will supply me with all the materials of this remark. I should be glad to have the thesis which he caused to be maintained (11) concerning St John's glass: but I have only the preface of it (12), from which I learn a custom that I was ignorant of; which is that at great entertainments, they fill out to the guests a glass of wine, which they call the glass, or cup, of St John. This is not without some mixture of superstition, which has derived it's original from a legend, wherein we find that St John having swallowed poison by the order of Aristodemus found no inconvenience from it. This is the reason doubtless, why the Painters represent him with a cup in his hand. I proceed to the marriage of Cana.

(11) Molanus, lib. iv, de Hist. Sacrar. Imaginum, cap. xx, pag. 428, apud Thomafium præfat. 78, pag. 514.

The Legendaries suppose. I. That St John the Evangelist, and Mary Magdalen were the two betrothed persons (13). II. That both of them agreed not to consummate the marriage, but to engage themselves to a perpetual virginity. III. That as soon as St John saw the miracle of water converted into wine, he consecrated himself to the service of JESUS CHRIST, and left his bride (14). IV. That JESUS CHRIST went on purpose to the wedding to prevent the accomplishment of the marriage (15). One thing perplexes them, which is that the virginity of St John could not arrive to the highest degree of perfection, if he had a design to marry; for perfect virginity requires that a man should always have resolved to contain himself. ‘Videbatur ejus (virginitatis) laudem hæc fabula non tollere quidem, labefactare tamen, aut in gradum inferiorem detrudere, cum ea demum numeris omnibus absoluta perhibetur virginitas, quam perpetua incorruptionis nunquam corrupta meditatio pariat (16).’ In answer to this difficulty, they say, among other things, that the divine providence directed the thing so, to heighten the glory of St John's virginity: since thereby it became altogether like that of the Holy Virgin, and was consecrated, being joined with marriage, which is one of the seven sacraments. ‘Quin ergo potius ita cogitemus, decuisse, ut eodem virginittis gradu collocaretur Apostolus, quo Virgo mater, quæ ipsi erat à Christo morituro commendanda? Quid, quod ita demum consecrari virginittas censenda est, si cum ceremonia matrimoniali conjungatur? Neque enim virginittas, sed conjugium est in numero sacramentorum (17).’ I must not forget to say that Baronius and Molanus reject these traditions of the Legendaries. Thomafius cites their words (18), and says probably enough, that Abdias's book was the first original of these idle tales. That supposititious Abdias affirms, that JESUS CHRIST thrice dissuaded St John from marrying. In two prefaces upon the gospel of that Apostle, it is only said in general, that JESUS CHRIST dissuaded him from it: those prefaces (19) are falsely ascribed, one to St Jerom, and the other to St Augustin. As there never were bolder authors than the compilers of the lives of Saints, they have resolved to be more decisive than the authors of these two prefaces; and to that end they have supposed the time and the place, that is to say, the wedding at Cana, where JESUS CHRIST freed his disciple from the conjugal bond. Thomafius does in no wise dispute the virginity of this Apostle; it is grounded upon a pretty good tradition, testified by St Jerom, St Aulin, St Epiphanius, &c. But Baronius was in the wrong to cite Ignatius, who only speaks of St John the baptist (20).

(14) Haymo, par. Hiemal. Homil. pag. 207. Baronius, Tom. I, Annal. ad ann. 31, n. 30, apud Thomaf. ibid. pag. 512.

(15) Messier, de Sanctis Serm. XXX, fol. 43, apud eundem, ibid.

(16) Thomafius, ibid, quoting Pelbarius, de Temelwar de Sanctis Serm. XXX.

(17) Thomafius, ibid, pag. 515, quoting the same Pelbarius, ibid. & Franc Moro, Serm. de Sanctis, pag. 30.

(18) Taken from the above quoted places.

(19) Quas conjunctiones exhibet quarta pars Glossæ in Bibliis ordinariæ. Thomaf. ibi supra, pag. 516.

(20) See the proof of it, apud Thomaf. ibid. pag. 518.

JOLY (CLAUDIUS) chanter and canon of the church of Notre Dame at Paris, and official to the archbishop, was a very worthy and learned man. He had a canonry conferred on him in the year 1631, upon the resignation of Mr Loisel, his uncle by the mother's side, and counsellor in the parliament of Paris. He was carried to Munster by the duke of Longueville plenipotentiary of France for the general peace of Europe, and faithfully assisted him with his advice and counsels. He took a journey to Rome during the commotions of Paris. He was made official the first time by the cardinal of Rets, after the death of John Francis de Gondi archbishop of Paris, and afterwards by the chapter during the vacancy of that see, and lastly by the present archbishop (a). He died at Paris the fifteenth day of January 1700, being ninety three years old (b). He enjoyed in his great age very good health, and the perfect use of all the faculties of his soul.

(a) I wrote this in the year 1700.

(b) Taken from the Mercure Histor. for February 1700, pag. 205.

JONAS, one of the Jewish prophets. Since most of the things relating to him may be found in two other Dictionaries (a), I will only insist upon a few particulars. Some Rabbies (b) have been so silly as to say, that being first swallowed by a male fish, he was afterwards discharged into the body of a female. Not finding himself pressed in his first prison, say they, he had no recourse to the invocation of God; upon which the male fish had orders to disgorge him into the stomach of a female, which was great with young (c). He there found himself very much straitened, and made the excellent prayer which is still extant (d), and which appeased the wrath of Heaven. They who confute that story by this argument, that a whale which was impregnated would not have pressed Jonas, unless he had lodged in her womb, make but a weak objection

(a) That of Moreri and the Dictionary of the Bible, by Mr Simon a priest.

(b) Solomon Jarchi, apud Martinum Lipenium in Jonæ Periplo thalassio, fol. B. verso, Edit. 1678, in 4to.

(c) Ut eximprægnat one & alvitur in angustis virum Dei refigeret. Li. ibid.

(d) It is in the second chapter of Jonas.

(e) In the remark [O] of the article HERCULES.

objection [A]. We have seen in another place (e) that the heathen poets have told a story of their Hercules somewhat resembling this. They stole it from the sacred story, and falsified it, according to their fancy. This is at least the common opinion of our authors (f). The ancient fathers thought it strange that the Heathens should reject this history of Jonas, after having adopted the fable of Hercules. Those who say that this prophet

(f) See Vossius de Orig. & Progr. Idolatræ lib. ii, cap. xv, pag. 581, 582. Edit. Francof. 1675, in 4to.

[A] They who say that a whale great with young would not have pressed Jonas, unless he had been lodged in her womb, make but a weak objection. Here is a man, who thinks he has Rabbi Jarchi at his mercy. When he asks him, 'Nunquid arbitraberis in utero quæque imprægnatæ balaneæ immisum esse Prophetam, ut ex fœtus piscini multitudine coanguilatur? In stomachum ceti credo descendisse Jonam non in matricem ejusdem. Quomodo itaque Jonæ in ventriculo latentis plus angustiarum ex utero intumescencia poterat surgere (1)? — Do you believe that the prophet was thrust into the womb of a pregnant whale, that he might there be squeezed among the multitude of her young ones? I believe that Jonah descended into the stomach, and not into the matrix of that fish. How then could Jonah lying in that ventricle, be strained for room, by the swelling and pressure of the womb of the whale?' These questions spoil Lipenius's good cause: and give the Rabbies room to take off the ridicule to which they designed to expose them, they would ridicule him in their turn, if they should ask him how he came to be ignorant of a thing which is known to every body viz. that the dilatation of the Uterus presses and straitens the bowels and the ventricle, and sometimes hinders considerably the respiration.

(1) Martinus Lipenius, in Jonæ Periplo thalassio, folio B 2.

[B] The antient fathers thought it strange, that the Heathens should reject this history of Jonas, after having adopted the fable of Hercules. Here is a fine passage of Theophilact. 'Devoratur ergo à cetō Jonā, tresque dies ac totidem noctes in eo permanet vates: quæ res omnem excedere fidem audientibus videtur, maxime iis qui ex Græcorum scholis sapientieque doctrina, ad hanc historiam accedunt. Quos equidem non satis demirari possum qui fiat quod hæc non intelligant, cum suis ipsorum alii capiuntur. Apud ipsos enim nonnihil tale de Hercule narratur: nempe quod & ipse à balæna devoratus, incolumis remanserit, nisi quod tantummodo depilatus redierit, idque ob ingenitum & internum belluæ calorem. Aut igitur nostra suscipiant, aut sua rejiciant (2). — Jonas therefore was swallowed by a whale, he remained therein three days and three nights, which fact seems to exceed the faith of the hearers, especially those who come from the Greek schools, and the study of the sciences, to the considering this history. Yet I cannot sufficiently admire at them, for pretending not to understand this, when they are ready to receive things of the same kind from their own writers. For by them a thing of the same kind is related of Hercules, viz. that he also was swallowed by a whale, and remained safe in her belly excepting only that he lost his hair, when he came out from the strong inward heat of the creature, let them therefore either receive our fact or reject their own.' I doubt not but Theophilact would have found among the Greeks several persons, who would have taken him at his word with all their heart. The Philosophers and learned men of Greece would have answered: we accept of your terms; you would either have us reject the story of Hercules, or adopt that of Jonas: we reject them both. But because a great number of Heathens would have condemned this alternative, and maintained that in believing what the poets said of Hercules, they might still laugh at the Jewish story of Jonas; it is certain that Theophilact's thought is very solid, and admirably shews the foolish prejudices of the Heathens. I proceed to St Augustin. He had a great love for a Heathen (3), and writ many letters to him, some of which remained unanswered. This silence made him think that the other was no longer willing to keep correspondence with him (4). Wherefore desiring to answer some difficulties, which this Heathen had propoed to the priest Deogratias, he wrote directly to this priest. By this answer we see that the Pagans made themselves very merry with the history of Jonas. 'Postrema quæstio proposita est de Jona, nec ipsa quasi ex Porphyrio (5), sed tantumquam ex irratione paganorum (6). — The last question proposed concerning Jonah is not put as if

(2) Theophil. in Jonam, cap. ii.

(3) See the forty ninth Letter of St Augustin, at the beginning.

(4) Non inconvenienter arbitror eum quem video mihi retribere noluisse, nihil sibi à me scribi voluisse. August. Epist. xlix, pag. m. 195.

(5) Lipenius is therefore mistaken when he says, in Periplo thalassio Jona, folio A 3, vers. 10, that St Augustin disputes stoutly against Porphyry in that place.

(6) August. ubi supra, pag. 207.

made by Porphyry, but as from the derision of the Pagani. The method of St Augustin's refuting this objection of his friend, is very proper. Either, says he, we must deny all the miracles of God, or acknowledge we have no reason to reject this. Should we believe the resurrection of JESUS CHRIST, if we were afraid of the railleries of the infidels (7)? And since our friend has not supposed any doubts about our admitting the resurrection of Lazarus and that of JESUS CHRIST, I very much wonder he should look upon the adventure of Jonas as incredible. Is it easier to raise a dead man from the grave, than to preserve a man alive in the belly of a great fish (8)? Will it be said that the digestive faculty of the stomach cannot be suspended? but they would urge us with a more considerable objection, if they should alledge the three men who received no harm in the furnace of Babylon. If they will reject also that suspension of the fire's activity, and all the other miracles of scripture, we must have recourse to another confutation. For the infidels ought not to form doubts about one particular fact, but they must either believe or reject in general all the facts of the same nature, even those that appear still more incredible. They would not be so nice with respect to Apuleius, or Apollonius Tyaneus; they would not droll; on the contrary, they would, with an air of insolence, cry up their triumphs, if what we say of Jonas was ascribed to the power of either of those Heathens. I do not give a verbal translation, but only a general notion of St Augustin's reasons; and therefore for the sake of those who understand the Latin tongue, I will set down the greatest part of the original. 'Sed habent revera, quod non credant in divino miraculo, vaporem ventris, quo cibi madescent potuisse ita temperari, ut vitam hominis conservaret! Quanto incredibilius ergo proponerent, tres illos viros, ab impio Rege in caminum missos, deambulasse in medio ignis illæso? Quapropter si nulla isti divina miracula volunt credere, aliâ disputatione refellendi sunt. Neque enim debent unum aliquid tanquam incredibile proponere, & in quæstionem vocare; sed omnia, quæ vel talia, vel etiam mirabilia narrantur. Et tamen si hoc, quod de Jona scriptum est, Apuleius Madaurensis, vel Apollonius Tyaneus fecisse diceretur, quorum multa mira, multo fideli auctore, jactitant; [quamvis & dæmones nonnulla faciant angelis sanctis similia, non veritate sed specie, non sapientiâ sed planè fallaciâ]: tamen si de illis ut dixi, quos magos vel philosophos laudabiliter nominant, tale aliquid narrantur, non jam in buccis creparet risus, sed typhus (9). This method of confounding the Heathens, will perhaps appear to several persons more solid, than that which St Augustin made use of in another book, where after having said that those who laughed at the story of Jonas, did not question the truth of what is said of Arion, he proposes this difficulty, whether the story of Jonas be not more incredible. Yes doubtless, answers he; because it is more miraculous: and it is more miraculous, because it manifests a greater power. Verum illud nostrum de Jona incredibile est: plane incredibile, quia mirabilis, & mirabilis, quia potentius (10). These are witty conceits, will some say, and pretty thoughts, but not good arguments: for from hence it would follow, that the more impossible a thing appears to be, the more credible it is. The fable of Arion was this, that in order to save his life, he was forced to cast himself out of the ship in which he was returning from Italy into Greece, and that he fell upon a dolphin which carried him to the shore. I do not say this in favour of those who have never heard of it, for there are scarce any such persons; but in favour of thousands of people who do not remember it, and would be sorry, not to see at one view the difference betwixt the adventure of Arion and that of the prophet Jonas.

Let us consider a little the partial conduct with which St Augustin upbraids the Heathens. It affords an instance of one of the most ridiculous effects of prepossession. The managers of the Pagan religion had

(7) Si fides Christianorum ca chinorum metueret paganorum. lb. p. 207, 208.

(8) Nisi forte facilius putat mortuum de de sepulcro resuscitari quam vivum in tim vasso ventre belluæ potuisse ferri. lb. ibid. pag. 208.

(9) lb. ibid.

(10) August. de Civit. Dei, lib. i, cap. xiv.

REFLECTION on one of the effects of prepossession.

fed

prophet came out of the fish's belly in the port of Nineveh [C], are but little skilled in Geography; nor is it probable that he came out of it upon the coast of the Euxine [D], or of the Red-Sea [E]. It is much more credible he was cast upon the dry land near the city of Joppa where he took shipping. Some confirm this conjecture by the fable of Andromeda; for they pretend (g) that Jonas's adventure laid a foundation for the poetical accounts concerning Andromeda's being exposed to the fury of a sea-monster, which happened near Joppa (b). See the margin (i). Here is another idle story of the Rabbies. The say (k) that the fish which swallowed Jonas had seven eyes, which served as so many windows for the Prophet to see all that was in the sea, and amongst other things, the way which the Israelites took in crossing the red-sea. Those who say that Jonas is the same young man who was sent by Elisha to Jehu [F], to give him the royal unction, deserve not to be believed. In St Jerome's time the tomb of Jonas was still shewn at the place of his birth (l). Mr Simon (m) affirms, that the Turks have built a very fine mosque to the honour of Jonas, in which there is a miraculous lamp, that burns continually without any oil or other liquor, if he will give credit to their reveries. He says that this mosque is in a little village (n), built to the honour and under the name of this Prophet. Mr d'Herbelot (o) says nothing of all this, though he relates many things which the Mahometans report concerning Jonas. I will name a modern author, who, according to Moreri, made a most ingenious poem upon the history of this Prophet [G].

fed the minds of the people with abundance of fables for many ages, and they would not have suffered that it should be examined whether they were possible, or that they should be deemed incredible. But when the Christian miracles were proposed to them, they set up for Philosophers, they alleged impossibilities, they made use of all such arguments as might be opposed to the current of a foolish credulity, and ridiculed the believers. What inconsistency, and partiality is this? The Christian communions discover one against the other something of this spirit. If the Greek church boasts of some miracle, which shews that Nestorius's schism is displeasing to God; the Nestorians leave no stone unturned to repulse that attack. But as to the prodigies, that are proper to convict the Greek church of injustice, they blindly believe them without examination, and think it very strange, that their adversaries should make any scruple about them. It is well known how easily the Roman Catholics give their assent to an infinite number of miracles. They piously believe thousands of stories which are daily published, and look upon the most plausible reasons of those who deny them as meer cavils of obdurate Heretics. But if they hear that the Protestants spread abroad any miracles, they assume a quite different spirit. They have recourse to all the common places by which the incredulous defend themselves. They deny they fact, they challenge the witnesses, they reproach them with imposture, or a disordered brain. If they cannot deny the fact, they explain it by natural causes, and collect from the Naturalists, and the relations of travellers, a thousand like events. In a word, what they call wrangling, obstinacy, and an opposition to good sense, becomes a most solid and reasonable confutation of a falsity; for they make use of the same common-places that the Protestants had employed against the monks. There are every where persons who readily believe what is grateful to them, and are the hardest in the world to be persuaded of a thing that is unacceptable to them. If they allege the reasons of their incredulity, they cannot endure that they should be thought wrong; and if you alledge the same reasons against them another time, they cannot endure that they should not be allowed the liberty of ridiculing them. This is the way of human life: it is almost an unavoidable effect of prepossession, two weights and two measures. And if this could not be avoided without laying aside prejudices, the remedy would perhaps be worse than the disease.

[C] Some have said this prophet came out of the fish's belly, in the port of Nineveh. Sulpicius Severus fell into a geographical blunder; 'Exceptus à ceto, marino monstro, ac devoratus post triduum fere Nivitarum littoribus ejectus, iusta prædicat (11). — Taken up by a whale, a sea monster, and swallowed, he was, after three days, thrown upon the sea shore near Nineveh, and preached righteousness.' The learned Drusus perceived no fault in commenting upon these words, but only says, that the scripture does not tell us upon what shore the fish disgorged the prophet (12). The other commentators upon Sulpicius, and particularly Hornius have perceived the fault, and so has Mr Lipenius; but he is grossly mistaken in chro-nology, as believing that Sulpicius Severus borrowed this from St Gregory's morals (13). This Pope flourished 150 years after Sulpicius. Mr Simon has transcribed the fault of the later: A whale, says he (14), received Jonas in its bowels . . . and proved a much safer vessel than the first he was in, and put him ashore, or rather vomited him up, the third day in the port of Nineveh. Note, that Nineveh was built upon the river Tigris, which has no immediate communication with the Mediterranean sea. Besides, there is not water enough for such a fish in this river at the port of Nineveh. This reason, together with the surprizing miracle, we must suppose, if we say that the whale went into the ocean, and doubled the cape of Good Hope, and entered into the mouth of the Tigris, and made that prodigious compass in three days, takes away all sorts of subterfuge from such as would excuse Sulpicius Severus. That notion never came into his mind; he honestly believed that Nineveh was situated upon the Mediterranean sea, and erred for want of skill in Geography.

[D] . . . It is not probable that he came out upon the coast of the Euxine. Josephus (15) relates this tradition; which has been followed by many moderns (16), tho' it clashes with probability, and multiplies prodigies; for according to natural laws, a fish of that size cannot convey itself in so little a time from the Phenician Sea to the Black sea. Besides, the journey that Jonas was to make, either to return into Judæa, before he went to Nineveh, or to go directly to Nineveh, would have been too long and too difficult.

[E] . . . Or upon the coasts of the Red Sea. Lipenius (17) attributes this opinion to Pineda, and to the Rabbies: and it is no difficult thing for him to confute it; for the whale must have entered into the ocean, and have gone round Africa. See the remark [C] towards the end.

[F] Those who take him for the same young man, who was sent by Elisha to Jehu (18). This is what the Rabbies do, and after them Mariana and Tarnovius (19). If this was so, he must have been then above an hundred years old. They are Mr Simon's words in his Dictionary of the Bible, which are very obscure; for we do not know to what the word then relates. Does it relate to the time of Jehu's unction? Grammar will have it so, but the sense will be absurd. Does it relate to the time of his voyage to Nineveh, or to the reign of Jeroboam, the second of that name? guess it if you can.

[G] I will name a modern author, who, according to Moreri, made a most ingenious poem on the history of this prophet. He was a Gascon and a minister, named Coras. He was chaplain to marshal de Turenne for some campaigns; afterwards he had a church in the lower Guienne, and there he turned Papist, and had a considerable office in the presbital of Montauban. He published a book before he changed his religion, in which, if I well remember, he maintained, that the Protestants could not be re-united to the Roman church. He published another to confute this after his abjuration. The four poems, which he published upon the histories of the Bible (20), sold well enough, though Mr Boileau, says the contrary in his ninth satire.

(b) Apud Lipenium, ubi supra, fol. C. 1, verso.

(i) That is in Gath-Chepher, near mount Thabor Lipen. ubi supra, fol. præced. He quotes St Jerome, Proem. in Jonam.

(m) Simon, Diction. de la Bible, pag. 433.

(n) In the tribe of Zabulon.

(o) D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Orient. pag. 495.

(13) Sulpicius Severus . . . ex St. Gregorio, lib. vi. Moral. cap. xii, arbitratu lonam esse expositum in littoribus Nivevitarum. Lipen. ubi supra, cap. iiii.

(14) Simon, Diction. de la Bible, pag. 432, 433.

(15) Joseph. Antiq. Judaic. lib. ix, cap. xxi, fol. 355, verso.

(16) See Lipen. ubi supra.

(17) Lipen. ubi supra, fol. C. 1, verso. He quotes Pineda, lib. iv, de rebus Solomonis, cap. xii.

(18) II Kings, chap. ix, ver. 1.

(19) Hebraei in Seder Olam, & ex iis Jo Mariana in Schollis, Bibl. & D. Joh. Tarnovius Comm. Jon. pag. 2. Lipenius, ubi supra, fol. B.

(20) Upon Jonas, David, Joshua, and Sampson.

(g) See Lipenius, ubi supra, fol. A 3.

(b) Plin. lib. v, cap. xlii, pag. m. 507, & xxxi, pag. 613, & lib. ix, cap. v, pag. 283.

(i) Hadrian Scribeclius, Originum Indice III, fol. p. verso, falsely believes, that it appears from the third verse of the third chapter of Jonas, that the fish vomited up that prophet at the distance of three days journey from Nineveh, and that he went thither in one day.

(11) Sulpicius Severus, Histor. Sacr. lib. i, pag. m. 79.

(12) Drusus, in Sulpic. Severum, pag. 179.

Le Jonas inconu seche dans la poussiere,
Le David imprimé n'a point veu la lumiere.

*The Jonas uncalled for, is bury'd in night,
And David, tho' printed, has ne'er seen the light.*

The enemies of Coras sent him by the post to Montauban, a pretended letter from his Bookseller at Paris, in which he was desired to vindicate himself against Boileau; because since the publication of his ninth satire, no body bought his poems. He was provoked with that insult, and published a very violent piece against his critic. He made some verses against Racine, in the year 1675. You will see in the Menagiana (21), a very pretty epigram of Racine against him. Note, that he was descended from the famous Civilian John Coras, counsellor in the parliament of Toulouse, one of the Protestant martyrs; for he was hanged for his religion at Toulouse, in his counsellor's habit, in the year 1572 (22).

(21) Page 200, of the first Dutch edition. It is also to be found in the second Festum, ou Cal. of Foretierre, pag. 13, of the Dutch edition, as being ascribed to Mr de la Fontaine.

(22) See d'Anbigne, Hist. Univers. Tom. II, livr. I, cap. 7, pag. m. 560.

JONAS (ARNGRIMUS) an Islander, made himself esteemed in the XVIth and XVIIth centuries by the works he published. He was still alive in 1644, being above ninety years of age (a). Four years before, he was married a second time to a young woman. He was a learned and good man, and in great esteem among all the learned. He had been coadjutor to Gundebrand de Torloc, bishop of Hole in Island (b). This Gundebrand was an Islander, a man of great learning and probity (c). He had been a disciple of Tycho Brahe, and was a good Astrologer. After his death Arngrimus refused the bishopric of Hole, which the king of Denmark offered him (d): he begged the king to excuse his accepting of it, both to avoid being envied, and to prosecute his studies with greater tranquillity. Most of the books he published [A], are histories, and descriptions of Island, or apologies for his nation. Blefkenius had said several things to their disadvantage, both with respect to witchcraft [B], and lasciviousness [C]. Arngrimus confuted him.

He

[A] The books that he published. I shall mention all those that I find in the catalogues of Albert Bartholinus, Idea veri Magistratus, Copenhagen, 1589, in 8vo. Brevi Commentarius de Islandia, at the same place, 1593, in 8vo. Anatome Blefkeniana, at Hole, in Islanders, 1612, in 8vo, and at Hamburg, 1618, in 4to. Epistola pro patria defensoria, at the same place, 1618. Απολογία Καλυννία, at the same place, 1622, in 4to. Chrymogæa (1), seu rerum Islandicarum libri tres, at the same place 1630, in 4to. Vita Gudbrandi Thordacii, at the same place, 1630, in 4to. Specimen Islandiæ Historicum, & magna ex parte Chrographicum, at Amsterdam, 1643, in 4to (2).

(1) It should be Crymogæa.

(2) Taken from Albert Bartholinus's treatise, de Script. Danorum, pag. 12.

A learned man, who has published the treatise of Albert Bartholinus, with historical and critical additions, informs me, that the Anatome Blefkenia, is a confutation of a book printed at Leyden, in the year 1607, and intitled, Islandia, seu descriptio populorum & memorabilium bujus Insulæ; that the Crymogæa was written in the year 1603, and printed at Hamburg, in 1609, with a map of Denmark, and without it in 1610; that the Specimen Islandiæ Historicum, contains an apology for the author's opinion against the reasons of John Isaac Pontanus. Our Arngrimus Jonas maintained that Island did not begin to be inhabited till towards the year 874, and so cannot be the antient Thule (3). Pontanus thought it a little strange, that Arngrimus Jonas should write an apology for an opinion, that was less glorious to Island, than the contrary one; nevertheless, he spoke of this learned Islander with all sorts of civility, and marks of esteem. See the letter which he wrote to Stephanus, the first of July, 1638 (4). Mr Mollerus (5) gives us the titles of some of our Jonas's works, which had been omitted by Albert Bartholinus, some of which have been published, and others not.

(3) Taken from Mollerus, Hypomn. ad Barthol. de Script. Danorum, pag. 165, 166.

(4) It is the exciise of those which Mr Matthæus, published at Leyden in 1695. See page 325, of that collection of Letters, and like-wise pag. 210.

(5) Moller. ubi supra, pag. 166.

(6) La Peyrere, Relation de l'Islande, pag. 23.

(7) See a story related by Charles Ogier, pag. 473, of his Iter Polonicum.

[B] Blefkenius had said several things to the disadvantage of Island, with respect to their witchcraft. . . . Blefkenius says, that the Islanders sell the wind, and that he has experienced it (6). Arngrimus laughs at this; for he says, 'that the seamen of Island know over-night, by the disposition of the air, what wind and weather there will be the next day; and that when they conjecture there will be such a wind, as a stranger waits for to go off, they go to him, and engage to sell him this wind: which they do in this manner. They ask the stranger for his handkerchief, in which they pretend to mutter some words, and immediately tie the handkerchief with a knot (7), as if it were for fear the words pronounced should fly away. After this they give him the handkerchief thus tied, and advise him to keep it carefully, as he receives it, assuring him that he shall have a good wind during his voyage. Now it sometimes happens, that this wind blows the next day; but most frequently it changes after the stranger is gone, and is out at sea . . . If it happens but once in a hundred times, that the wind carries a stranger to the end of his voyage, that single chance authorises the error, notwithstanding a hundred contrary experiments, and the error is spread by him, who confidently says, because he believes it, that he bought the wind in Island, and that this wind has carried him safe home.' The same Blefkenius relates (8), 'that there are some magicians in Island, who have the power to stop ships in full sail in the open sea: he says also, that they who are thus stopped, make use of some stinking fumigations for a counter-charm (9), which he describes; with which, says he, they that are stopped, drive away the devils that stop them, and the ships being uncharmed, resume their course.'

[C] . . . and lasciviousness. Blefkenius says, 'that the Germans, who trade into Island, set up tents near the harbours where they land, and there expose their merchandizes, which are cloaks, shoes, looking-glasses, knives, and abundance of baubles, which they exchange for commodities of the Islanders. The young women, which are very fair in this island, but ill clad, come and offer themselves to the Germans who have no wives, for bread or biscuit, or any thing else of small value. The fathers themselves present their daughters to the strangers; and if they are got with child, it is a great honour to them. This makes them more respected and courted by the Islanders than the others, and several strive who shall have them. When the Islanders have bought, that is, bartered for wine or beer with the foreign Merchants, they invite their relations and friends, and neighbours, to drink both; and they never leave off till they have drank it all. They sing, as they are tipping, the heroic actions of their captains . . . It is reckoned an incivility among them, to go from the table, when they drink, to make water. The young women, which, as I have said, are not ugly in this country, slip under the tressles, and hand the chamber-pot to the drinkers. Arngrimus Jonas says this is a false and abusive banter, and is very angry with Blefkenius for scandalizing the maids of Island. The good man cannot bear to see his countrymen contemptuously treated, and represented as barbarians (10). If it was ever lawful for an apologist to fall into a passion, that of Arngrimus cannot be blamed; for it is not probable that the gospel, which has been for so many ages planted in that island, could leave a people in so great a brutality; nor, in case religion had made so little progress among the Islanders, that the king of Denmark would suffer them to insult the laws of public decorum with impunity. The custom of their feasting does not seem to be fairly related; matters are amplified to make the reader laugh. Was such a piece of service, or so extravagant a laziness ever heard of? those people not only will not rise from table to make water, but will not so much as move their hands. For this the story leads us to; else why is it said the young women

(8) La Peyrere, ubi supra, pag. 21.

(9) See the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, for February 1685, pag. 135.

(10) La Peyrere, ubi supra, pag. 23, 24.

JONAS. JORNANDES. JOUBERTUS. 581

(e) See Mollerus, Hypomn. ad Albert Barthol. de Script. Danor. pag. 164. He died in the year 1649 (e). He had been pastor of the church of Melfad, and prefect of the neighbouring churches in the diocese of Hole (f).

(11) See the New Letters against Maimbourg's Mist. of Calvinist. pag. 542, & seq. An objection drawn from the impudence of some nations.

women slip under the tressles. The chamber-pot might easily be given to the guests without that, if all the business was to save them the trouble of rising. If what Blefenius tells us were true, jealousy would not be an useless thing in the world (11). If it were lawful to lye in favour of truth, we must deny all that is related of the impudence of some nations: for libertines draw a great advantage from there being, they say, certain nations, which annex no infamy to the prostitution of women. This is true of the Islanders, according to the narrative of Blefenius; nay, they go much farther; for they look upon the big belly of a girl, who prostitutes herself to strangers, as honourable, and fathers look upon themselves as very happy, when foreigners accept of the offer they make of their daughters maiden-heads. Where then, would they ask, is that natural impression, which enables all men to distinguish between right and wrong? there are even Christian nations, which not only disregard chastity in practice, but have even lost the theory of it: whence it follows, that, in this respect, they are not conscious of what is naturally right. Does not this shew, that the ideas of virtue depend upon education and custom, and not upon a natural impression? and how will you cure these people, whose conscience is dead? for if it be possible, that, with the notions of right and wrong, the conscience may unhappily be lulled asleep, must not this necessarily happen where these notions are extinct? it is not necessary to reply to this objection, because Arngimus Jonas denies the fact. To him we must refer all those, who would take advantage of his adversary's narrative. And if they alledge matters of facts, they shall then be answered.

(f) Id. ibid.

JORNANDES, originally a Goth, was bishop of Ravenna about the middle of the VIth century.

His history of the Goths translated into French, was printed at Paris in the year 1703, and dedicated to the king of Sweden (a).

(a) See the Memoirs of Tre-voux, January 1704, art. vi. of the French edition.

JOUBERTUS (LAURENCE) counsellor and physician in ordinary to the king, and to the king of Navarre, first regent doctor, chancellor, and judge of the university of Montpellier, was born at Valence in Dauphiné, the sixth of December 1529 (a). He was a disciple of Silvius at Paris, and of Argentarius beyond the Alps (b); and he made himself famous by the lectures he read at Montpellier, as professor, and much more by the books he published. The world had such a notion of his capacity, that Henry III. being extremely desirous to have children, ordered him to come to Paris, so much he hoped, that the skill of this physician would remove all the obstacles, that rendered his marriage unfruitful (c). His hopes were disappointed. Joubertus died at Lombez [A] the twenty-ninth of October 1582. He published a great number of books [B] in Latin and French. That which he intituled Popular Errors, raised a great cry against him, because he spoke too freely upon several nice matters [C]. One thing in particular was

(a) La Croix du Maine, pag. 283.

(b) Sammarthanus Elog. pag. m. 75.

(c) Eum in aula vidimus a Rege Henrico III. evocatum, cum plus ille Princeps prolis in publicam utilitatem suscipiendæ cupidus, maximam voti sui spem in ejus industria nequidquam collocasset. Id. ib. pag. 76.

[A] Joubertus died at Lombez. This we learn from la Croix du Maine. He adds, that Lombez is seven leagues from Toulouse, and because it is not on the side of Languedoc, but on the side of Guienne, it is plain Sammarthanus is mistaken (1), when he says, that Joubertus died as he returned from Toulouse to Montpellier. The town of Lombez is at a great distance from that road. Moreri is still more to blame than Sammarthanus, as thus: He says, as he had read it in la Croix du Maine, that this Physician died at Lombez, and he adds to it what he had read in Sammarthanus, that Joubertus died as he returned from Toulouse to Montpellier. The joining of these two things proves him guilty of a Geographical ignorance, which cannot be charged upon Sammarthanus, who said nothing of Lombez. A man runs the hazard of committing many errors, when he mixes the extracts of different writers, without correcting their inconsistencies. I do not mention the Chronological blunder that is found in Moreri: it is plainly either an error of the press, or a want of attention. You will find in Moreri, that Joubertus was born in 1629; that he made himself famous in the XVth century; that he died in 1682, and that du Verdier Vau-Privas, and la Croix du Maine, speak of him in some works (2) they published in the year 1584, which have never been reprinted.

(1) In Elog. pag. m. 75.

(2) Thomas Jourdain, François Vallierola, Bruno Scitellius.

(3) See La Croix du Maine, pag. 255.

[B] He published a great number of books. His Latin treatises make two volumes in Folio, in the Frankfurt editions of 1582, 1599, and 1645. One of the most considerable, is a collection of paradoxes, against which several Physicians (3) have written. He did not fail to reply to them. I observe, that his treatise of the Pancreas was written in French, though when he published it, he put it in the title, that John Paul Zangmaître, a gentleman, born at Ausburg, who was Laurence Joubertus's scholar, had translated it into French from the said Joubertus's Latin (4). [C] He spoke too freely upon several nice matters. Perhaps the questions about virginity, and generation, were never handled in French in so plain terms. He so much enlivened that subject, that he produced three attestations made by sworn matrons, who had been ordered by the judges to see whether some maids that complained of having been ravished, complained wrongfully. The first of those attestations was made in Bern; the second at Paris, and the third at Carcassonne. The first declares the complaining damsel to be a virgin; the other two, that she had been deflowered. Joubertus curiously compares together the terms the matrons made use of. A book was printed in Holland, in 1686, intituled, Tableau de l'Amour considéré dans l'état du Mariage. — The Picture of Love considered in the State of Marriage (5). The author calls himself Salocini, a Venetian Physician; but it is known that his name is Nicolas Venette, and that he is a Physician of Rochelle (6). He produces the like attestations, and Furetiere took from him what he said under the word Pucelage [Maidenhead]. To return to Joubertus, he was taxed with inventing these attestations: 'He well confutes this, in an epistle to his friends, naming him that supplied him with those of Paris and Bern. As for that of Carcassonne, I know that he had it from one that was principal secretary to Marechal Dampville, who often recited it for diversion. Mr Joubert has much ado to understand the terms these midwives use, in order to apply them to the different parts of the member which distinguishes the sex. For he does not find there so many parts as the matrons do. In the public anatomies we shew sixteen or seventeen of them; which I shall name as they occur to me, &c. (7).' La Croix du Maine observes, that some say, that Joubertus spoke too freely, and alledged some passages too obscene in some of his works, particularly in his learned books of popular errors; but if he has used, says he, some terms too ticklish for nice ears, he was forced to do it, if he meant to be understood, and make his books profitable to his reader. Scaevola Sammarthanus is in the right to say, that this did the author an injury (8). Joubertus himself was aware of it; ut supra, pag. 76. for he laid that work aside, and as to what was already published, he endeavoured to answer some complaints. He was blamed for dedicating his book to the queen of Navarre, a most virtuous, generous (9) princess, a true mirror and pattern of honour, since bigné's sisters he was to treat at the beginning of his book of ob-scene

(5) See the Nonvelles de la République des Lettres, Oct. 1686, pag. 1221. It has been translated into Dutch. See the Boekzaal for the month of August, 1695.

(6) The Journal des Scavans, May 13, 1686, pag. m. 188, makes mention of him.

(7) B. Cabrol, Apologetical Epistle, prefixed to the second part of Lawrence Joubert's Vulgar Errors.

(8) Futurus tam cautior, si contentus sit, quæ in usum eruditiorum sermone Latino componebat, à scriptoribus Gallicis abstineret. Naturnum enim pro concessa Medicis facultate liberius evolvens, temere se in plebis imperite censuram atque risum obfecit. Sammarth. ibi supra, pag. 76.

(9) She was not a novice in those matters, if d'Au-princefs, a true mirror and pattern of honour, since bigné's sisters he was to treat at the beginning of his book of ob-scene thought strange, that he dedicated this book to the queen of Navarre, the wife of Henry IV. But all this bustle was so far from hindring the sale of the book, that it very much contributed to make it sell the better [D].

This work was to contain six parts [E], each of them divided into five books; but he published only the first, and part of the second. I will mention a particular, which shews that Joubertus was modest [F], and that he very well knew the bounds of human knowledge.

I have said, after la Croix du Maine, that he was born the sixth of December 1529; but I must add, that we read round his print, that he was in his fortieth year in 1570, which proves, that he was born 1530. Rondelet, whose favourite disciple he was, and whom he succeeded, in the year 1567, as Regius Professor of Physic at Montpellier, trusted his manuscripts with him on his death-bed, and desired him to revise, correct, and publish them [d]. Joubertus carried this place of Regius Professor, after having maintained a dispute for four days on several theses, which have been printed with some others of his tracts at Lyons in 1571. There are among these tracts some remarks which clear up some passages of his paradoxes [G]. He innovated in the French orthography [H].

(d) See the epistle dedicatory of Joubert's Regimen Medicæ, page 104, of the third part of his Opuscula, and a letter of Pothius, ibid pag. 134.

(10) Cabrol, ubi supra.
(11) Id. ibid.
(12) Id. ibid.
(13) Id. ibid.

'scene matters, writing of conception, generation, big bellies, and child-bearing (10). He answered that complaint in the second edition; for besides the excuses which he and Lewis Bertrava alledged, 'he changed the dedication, and presented the whole process to Mr de Pibrac, chancellor of the said lady, to pick out such things as her majesty might know, and judge of without any scruple; the said Mr de Pibrac reserving the rest to himself, as being more suitable to his condition (11). There was another complaint made against him. 'All this, said some (12), would have been better in Latin than in French; such discourses not sounding so ill in a dead, as in a vulgar tongue: besides women and maids who are most ashamed of it, would have known nothing of it.' Cabrol answers what follows (13), 'the Sieur Joubert has sufficiently answered this in his epistle to his friends, wherein he shews, that the chafest women in the world, may read it, and will learn nothing but virtuous things from it, and their conjugal duty; and their husbands too. As for maids, they cannot understand what is said in it concerning the works of the flesh, if they be maids in body and soul, as one may say. But to satisfy every body he has since left out whatever might give offence to the most scrupulous consciences; as knowing, we are not only to abstain from evil, but also from the appearance of it.' All these reasons are not good; and some of them pitiful.

(14) Id. ibid.

[D] The bustle they made about this book . . . contributed to make it sell the better. I shall cite Joubertus's apologist. 'The treatise of Vulgar Errors, says he, (14), has been printed in four several places in half a year, namely, at Bourdeaux, Paris, Lyons, and Avignon; and the least impression in every place was 1600 copies. This book has had so great a reputation, that being at first but ten or twelve pence price, it was afterwards sold for a crown, and even for four livres: just as in times of scarcity (a sort of famine) the price of corn rises every day. Nay, the Booksellers and Printers are importuned for the rest of the work; and the author is only desired to publish the rest of it; at least five books at a time (if he will not do it all at once) according to the division he made of it, besides what he promises. But he is so disgusted, and full of resentment, upon the aforesaid censures, being a man of great spirit, and extremely jealous of his honour, that he has often thought, as I know very well, to burn all that he has done of it. What a loss it would be!'

[E] This work was to contain six parts. When he published the first, he added a table, containing the division of the whole work, and the titles of the chapters in every book. But because it was not he, who put the second part to the press, it does not agree with the plan he had published. It is not divided into five books; and the twenty five chapters it contains, do not correspond with those of the plan, either as to the number or the subject; you will see the reason of it in these words of Cabrol. 'He could not as yet be prevailed upon to condescend to the publishing of the other parts; which he keeps so close, that there is no seeing or reading of them. Now, seeing his resolution (not to say obstinacy) I went about to print some chapters, which I formerly had of him, having done me the favour to explain to me some propositions, upon which I desired his explanation and vice. They are not many, but most of the chapters are very long, and contain several heads, so that should we divide them into particulars, they would scarce be less than thirty. Mr Joubert made the first draught of them, long before he published the first part of his Vulgar Errors: they are certain subjects, which have since been disposed by their author in the division of the whole work, both general and particular, to serve, one for the seventh book, another for the eleventh, seventeenth, twentieth, twenty third, twenty fifth, twenty sixth, and so on to the thirtieth. I have not troubled myself much about their order, since we can have nothing else at present from the author, as he had promised (15). The same Cabrol says (16), that while he caused this to be printed, as it were by stealth, he was surprized at the Printer's by Mr Joubert, who took my enterprise, adds he, very bravely. 'Nevertheless, when he understood, that I designed to present you with it, he . . . permitted . . . the Bookseller to go on, giving him besides two fine discourses translated from his Latin paradoxes, by Isaac Joubert, his eldest son.' Note, that Gaspar Bachot, Counsellor and Physician to the king, published, in 1626, a book which he had written long before, to finish Lawrence Joubertus's design as to the third part of his Vulgar Errors (17). He kept to the chapters of the books, according to the order he found them in, in the table added to the first part; but he modelled them his own way, without swearing in verba Magistris (18). This book of Gaspar Bachot, is intitled Erreurs Populaires touchant la Médecine, & régime de Santé. This author is not to be found in Lindenius Renovatus.

[F] I will mention a particular which shews, that Joubertus was a modest man. Gaspar Bachot, whom I mentioned in the foregoing remark, was made doctor of Physic in 1592 (19). He gloried to have maintained his thesis against all opponents, and he looked upon his Doctorship as the trophy of his victory. But as soon as I read your answer (he writes this to Mr de Lorme, Physician in ordinary to Lewis XIII, and first Physician to the queen-mother (20), in which you acquainted me, that the late Mr Joubert, your colleague and friend, used to say of himself, ter Doctor, nunquam futurus doctus; who being learned, and having obtained that laurel in three different universities, whilst he was admired by every body, could not satisfy himself. I began from that time to have such a distrust of myself, that I thought all my former labour useless, without hoping to grow learned, since so great a person, like another Socrates, confessed his insufficiency, or the fear of his not being able to arrive to the end of his wishes. Note, that he says, that Mr Joubert had learned his profession in Montrifon (21), and in the adjacent country, and lived there when his Decades were dedicated to Papon, a renowned Civilian, the glory of that town (22).

[G] There are . . . some remarks, which clear up some passages of his paradoxes. He had maintained in his second paradox, that it is possible a man may live a long time without eating and drinking. This proposition gave offence, as insinuating, that Moses, Elias, and Jesus Christ, fasted forty days without any miracle. He answered properly to this objection; for his answer was approved by John de la Place, minister of Montpellier. This minister's approbation did not appear in the French translation of this piece of Joubertus; but we find it in the Latin edition of his

(15) Cabrol, ibid supra.

(16) In the epistle dedicatory to Mr de Villeroi.

(17) At Lyons, for Bartholomew Vincent, in 3vo.

(18) See Bachot's preface.

(19) See his letter to Mr de Lorme, prefixed to the book concerning Vulgar Errors.

(20) ibid.

(21) A town of the country called Forez.

(22) That is of Montrifon.

(23) At Page 239, Part II.

(24) In remark [A] of the article VIRETUS.

(25) Jouberti, Opuscul. Parte 11, pag. 136.

(26) Jouberti Opuscul, pag. 156, 157.

(27) Compare the News from the Republic of Letters, July 1704, art. viii.

(28) Taken from Sorel, at page 114, of the Perfection of Man.

his Opuscula, published at Lyons, in 1570 (23). This confirms what is said in another place (24), that Joubertus was a Protestant.

It must be observed, that in explaining what gave offence, he had regard only to good souls, who, thro' a delicacy of conscience, and too little acquaintance with Philosophy, were easily alarmed. But as to those, who, through malice, discovered poison in his works, he left them to the hardness of their hearts. 'Hujus enarrationis, says he (25), vel solo argumento vel demonstrationibus commoveri posse hominum duo genera, facile praesentio. Unum est naturalis Philosophiae & Medicinae imperitum, simplicitatis & pietatis nomine venerandum: qualis plebecula & quicunque in æstimandis rerum causis studium non adhibent. Alterum διαβολικόν, quod etiam quæ bene dicta esse novit, impudentissimis calumniis infectatur. Hoc, quia explicationem non exspectat, & quæcunque impura sua mente excipiuntur depravat, suoque veneno inficit, me nihil moratur. Alteri verò benignè & candidè satisfaciendum puto.' He had been very sensibly affected with the accusations of these persons, since he wishes, that GOD would give him the patience and serenity, which are necessary, when one is exposed to the rage of their slanders. His words discover a heart full of resentment, and dart thunder at his censurers. Thus he concludes. 'Hæc διαβολικὰ κακοῦ ἀνθρώπου ab istius enarrationis prophanatione avertant, quibus est peculiare etiam sacram paginam corrumpere, & in alienum pessimumque sensum detorquere, impudentissime mentiri, & maledicere, animorum concordiam dissolvere, inimicitias colere, invidiam crepare, & nunquam non quibus nocere queant modos excogitare, plique omnibus esse infestissimos. DEUS misericors parcat hominibus quicunque ab ejusmodi furis agitati, earumque veneno afflati & infecti, si milem naturam induunt & referunt: quosque ab istis nequissime tractari patitur, patientia (quæ omnia vincit) & mansuetudine bene muniat. Amen (26). — Let this stop these slanderers from prophaning that narrative, whose business it is to corrupt the sacred page, and pervert it to another, and that the worst sense, to lie most impudently, and calumniate, to break friendships, foment enmities, invent all methods to do mischief, and to pursue with hatred all good men. May GOD of his mercy spare such men as, acted by the same madness, and infected by their poison, imitate their nature: and may he fortify with patience (which surmounts all difficulties) and with mildness, those whom he suffers to be misused by them. Amen.'

[H] He innovated in the French orthography. For he wrote jantil, action, parfait, æmer, instead of gentil, action, parfait, aimer. He likewise made a difference between the v consonant and the u vowel, and would have the consonant (27) written differently from the other (28).

JOVIAN, emperor of Rome, came to this dignity by the choice of the army in the year 363, after the death of Julian the apostate. He was more considerable for the merit of count Varronian, his father, than for his own (a); for he was as yet very young, and served still in the companies of the life-guards [A]. Most things relating to him, being in Moreri's Dictionary, I shall only mention two particulars which are not there. The first is, that Jovian concluded a peace so shameful and disadvantageous to the Roman empire, that he exposed himself to the murmurs and banter of the public [B]. The second

[A] He served still in the companies of the life-guards. In saying this, I have chiefly in view these words of Eutropius: 'Post hunc (Julianum) Jovianus, qui tunc DOMESTICUS MILITABAT, ad obtinendum imperium consensu exercitus electus est, commendatione patris quam sua militibus notior (1). — After this (Julian) Jovian then in the troops of the household, was elected to the empire by the consent of the army, procured rather by what the soldiers knew of his father than himself.' But it must be observed that the expressions of this author, are not precise enough, and that they ought to be rectified by those of another historian, which more expressly shew the degree to which Jovian was arrived. 'Jovianus eligitur Imperator Domesticorum ordinis primus patris meritis mediocriter commendabilis (2). — Jovian is elected emperor out of the household troops, a person moderately esteemed on account of his father's merit.' As military employments have not at present the same order, or the same disposition, as in that age, it would be difficult to find a word that signifies exactly what is meant by domesticorum ordinis primus, or primicerius domesticorum (3); but we may very well presume that those words do not signify, that Jovian was the chief, or captain, of the guards called domestici, for the true name of their captain was Comes Domesticorum (4). It is said in Moreri's Dictionary, that Jovian was captain of the Pretorian guards, when he refused to abjure Christianity under Julian the apostate. This is taken from Socrates the historian, who making use of the word χιλιάρχος (5), does not authorize Moreri's phrase. Observe that Theodoret affirms (6) that Jovian had no employment in the army when he was made emperor. Ammianus Marcellinus, who says the contrary, is more to be credited, for he was upon the spot.

[B] Jovian concluded a peace so shameful and disadvantageous . . . that he exposed himself . . . to the murmurs and banter of the public. He gave up to the Persians five provinces, with some places that were a strong rampart to the Roman empire. Amongst others, the important town of Nisibis, and that of Singara (7); and with difficulty he obtained liberty for the inhabitants to retire into the Roman territories (8). He obliged himself not to give any assistance to the king of Armenia, who had constantly been a good and faithful friend of the emperor's. This was, say the historians, a sort of impiety, and the ruin of this faithful friend, and the loss of Armenia. 'Quibus exitiale aliud accessit & impium, ne post hæc ita composita, Arsaci poscenti contra Persas ferretur auxilium, amico nobis semper & fido . . . Unde postea contigit, ut vivus caperetur idem Arsaces, & Armenia maximum latus Medis conterminans, & Artaxata inter dissensiones & turbamenta raperent Parthi (9). — To which was added a condition equally fatal and impious, to wit, that after this peace no assistance should be given to Arsaces against the Persians, though he was our old and faithful ally. . . . Hence it fell out that Arsaces was afterwards taken alive, and a great part of Armenia bordering on Media, together with Artaxata, in the midst of these dissensions and disturbances, were seized upon by the Parthians.' Nothing can be more moving than the description of the condition the inhabitants of Nisibis found themselves in, when they saw they were forced to remove to another place (10). Their intreaties to Jovian not to force them to leave their country, were enough to break one's heart; and yet he had no regard to them, alledging the engagement of his word, and the fear of perjury: but it was believed he did not assign the true cause of his fear. 'Et hæc quidem suppliciter ordo & populus precabatur: sed verbis loquebantur incassum, Imperatore, ut fingeat alia metuens, perjurii piacula declinante (11). It was thought he only kept his word, because he feared that if he staid in that country, and should have any new quarrels with the Persians, he should have a competitor for the empire. They were perhaps in the right to say this; but at the bottom the Roman historians are much to blame for complaining of his punctual execution of the treaty of peace. Here is a passage of Eutropius, who censures him for it, and makes his great fault to consist in that; for otherwise he owns that Jovian was obliged by a sort of necessity, to consent to those ignominious conditions, which were never before imposed on the Roman people. 'Jam turbatis rebus, exercitu, quoque inopia laborante uno à Persis atque altero prælio victus (Jovianus) pacem cum Sapore necessariam quidem, sed ignobilem fecit, multatus finibus, ac non nulla imperii Romani parte tradita: quod ante eum annis mille centum & duobus de-viginti fere, ex quo Romanum imperium conditum erat, nunquam accidit. Quinetiam legiones nostræ ita & apud Caudium per Pontum Telesinum, ita & in Hispania apud Numantiam, & in Numidia sub jugum missæ sunt, ut nihil

(26) Jouberti Opuscul, pag. 156, 157.

(27) Compare the News from the Republic of Letters, July 1704, art. viii.

(28) Taken from Sorel, at page 114, of the Perfection of Man.

(a) Suidas, in Τοῦτοῦ See also Eutropius's words in the remark [A].

(9) Id. Ibid. pag. 434.

(10) See Marcell. lib. cap. ix.

(11) Id. Ibid. See also the Alexandrian Chronicle.

(1) Eutropius, lib. x, pag. m. 223.

(2) Amm. Marcellin. lib. xxv, cap. v, pag. m. 430.

(3) Hieron. in Chron. uses these words.

(4) Vide Valefium, in Amm. Marcell. lib. xiv, cap. x.

(5) Socrat. Hist. lib. iii, cap. xxii.

(6) Theod. Hist. lib. iv, cap. i.

(7) Vide Valefium in Amm. Marcellin. lib. xxv, cap. ix, pag. 439.

(8) Amm. Marcell. lib. cap. vii.

second is, that he did not approve the using of violence for the extirpation of sects

nihil tamen finium traderetur. Ea pacis conditio non penitus reprehendenda foret, si sœderis necessitatem, cum integrum fuit, mutare voluisset: sicut à Romanis omnibus his bellis, quæ commemoravi, factum est. Nam & Samnitibus, & Numantinis, & Numidis confestim bella illata sunt: neque pax rata fuit (12). — All things being in confusion, the army in want of provisions, and himself twice defeated by the Persians, he at last made a peace with Sapor, necessary indeed, but ignoble, the frontiers being straitened, and a part of the Roman empire lopped off, which in the space of 1118 years, that is, from the foundation thereof, to his time, had never happened, for although our legions passed under the yoke by the command of Pontius Telesinus, and in Spain at Numantia, and again in Numidia, yet was never any part of the Roman territory given up. However, even this condition of peace would not have been altogether blameable, if when he had it in his power he had remedied it, as the Romans did on each of the occasions before mentioned. For against the Samnites, Numantians, and Numidians, the war was still carried on, and no ignominious treaty ever ratified. You see that he is censured for not having imitated the ancient Romans, who without any delay attacked the nations, which had obliged them to accept of a shameful capitulation, but had never made them lose an inch of ground. And since he was censured, though he reigned but seven or eight months, for not repairing the disgrace and loss this peace brought along with it, it is plain they would have had him break these articles a few days after they were concluded, and as soon as his army was supplied with provisions, and in a place of safety: but were not these politics manifestly unjust? Suppose that after a very prejudicial peace which necessity has extorted, it may be lawful to seek an occasion of relief; must one not let some time pass and wait for pretences and conjectures which time never fails to supply? You see that even according to the corrupt maxims of politics, Jovian would have been guilty of a horrible treachery, if he had done what the historians blame him for having omitted. The three examples alleged by Eutropius are not like this. The senate and the people might lawfully break the agreement of their generals; but Jovian who concluded the peace, knew no superior, he was sole master. Note, that what went most to the heart of the true Romans, was the yielding of a country which did belong to the empire; for they pretended, that the like had never been seen before; and it was so little consistent with their maxims to suffer their states to lessen, that they allowed the honour of a triumph only to those who extended their frontiers: it was refused to some generals who had done great actions, but without any other fruit, than recovering what had been lost before. Read the description of this Roman grandeur in these words of Marcellinus.

(12) Eutropius, ubi supra.

Illud tamen ad medullas usque bonorum pervenit: quod dum extimefcit æmulum potestatis, damque in animo per Gallias & Illyricum versat, quosdam sæpe sublimiora ceptasse, famam adventus sui prævenire festinans, indignum imperio facinus amictu perjurii fugiendi commisit, Nisibi prodita: quæ jam inde à Mithridatici regni temporibus, ne Oriens à Persis occuparetur, viribus restitit maximis. Nunquam enim ab Urbis ortu inveniri potest annalibus replicatis, ut arbitror, terrarum pars ulla nostrarum ab Imperatore vel Consule hosti concessa: sed ne ob recepta quidem quæ directæ sunt, verum ob amplificata regna triumphalis gloria fuisse delata. Unde P. Scipioni ob recuperatas Hispanias, Fulvio Capuâ post diuturna certamina superata, & Opimio post diversos exitus præliorum, Fregellanis tunc internecivis hostibus ad deditionem compulsi, triumphus sunt denegati. Id etiam memoriæ nos veteres docent, in extremis casibus scita cum dedecore sœdera, postquam partes verbis juravere conceptis, repetitione bellorum illico dissoluta: ut temporibus præcis apud Furcas Caudinas sub jugum legionibus missis in Samnio, & per Albinum in Numidia scelestè pace cogitata, & auctore turpiter, passionis festinatæ Mancino dedito Numantinis (13). — That all pierced all good men to the very heart, that while he dreaded a rival in power, he passing through the Gauls and Illyricum, meditating what greater things others had done, endeavouring to prevent by his coming the fame of his approach, he, under colour of avoiding perjury, did what was unworthy of the empire, in delivering up Nisibis, which, from the time of Mithridates's reign, that the Persians might never enjoy the eastern parts, had been obstinately defended. Nor is it to be found in the Annals from the very building of Rome (as I apprehend) that any part of our dominions hath been yielded to the enemy, by either general or consul: nay, triumphal honours were restrained, and not allowed for the recovering provinces, but for adding to the territories of the commonwealth. On this account P. Scipio for regaining Spain, Fulvius after the reduction of Capua, which sustained a long siege, and Opimius after seven battles, compelling the Fregellani, our inveterate enemies, to surrender, were all of them denied triumphs. It has also been transmitted to us from our ancestors, that in cases where ignoble terms were submitted to, after the parties had confirmed the covenant with oaths, they were however thought to be dissolved by an immediate carrying on of the war, as in old time after the legions at Samnium, were compelled to pass under the Fork, and Albinus in Numidia made a most scandalous peace, and Mancinus, author of an ignominious treaty with the Numantines, was delivered up to that people. Observe that the remark [D] must be considered as a consequence of this; for I there examine whether Eutropius and Ammianus Marcellinus had reason to affirm what they say.

(13) Amm. Marcellin. lib. xxv, cap. ix, pag. 439, 440.

If we reflect never so little upon the temper of nations, and especially on the condition that Christians and Heathens were then in, we shall easily believe that the emperor Jovian became odious and contemptible, and the subject of many satires. The people fear and hate war; they love and desire peace, and with good reason: for they suffer the greatest inconveniences of the war; nevertheless they are afflicted at a treaty of peace, that disgraces the nation, and deprives it of a frontier, that was a safe barrier to it, and made it formidable to its neighbours. Victories and conquests rejoice the meanest peasants, and make them more patiently bear the burden of the war. Taxes and imposts are most easily forgotten when the war is attended with good success, and with an advantageous peace. Every one has a share in the glory of the nation; but the thought that the enemies will grow haughty, contemptuous, and insulting upon their terminating the war by a peace wholly to their mind, overwhelms them with grief and indignation. Must so many charges and expences, say they, go for nothing? &c. See above (14) the murmurs of the French against the peace of Catcau. Never were people in a better capacity to shew the like indignation than under the empire of Jovian. There was great emulation betwixt the Christians and the Heathens. The latter had just lost an emperor whom they loved, and from whom they expected mighty things; they flattered themselves with the hopes, that his expedition against the Persians would be advantageous and glorious, and they saw that death having deprived him of these fine triumphs, he was succeeded by a Christian prince, under whom things were reduced to a miserable condition. To murmur against such a prince, to censure and satirize him, was to gratify many passions at once; it was heightening Julian's glory, and making the Christians ashamed; it was sacrificing to the idol of political vanity, and to their zeal for religion. They failed not to act according to these several principles: they made verses and parodies to abuse Jovian (15). The libellers of Antioch distinguished themselves; they dispersed their libels against him in the streets, and posted up others; they turned him into ridicule, by applying to him some places of the Iliads, and amongst others that of the third book (16), where Paris is so roughly treated by his brother Hector; and that of the second book (17), where Ulysses threatens Thersites to strip him naked, and ignominiously to drive him away.

How people are commonly affected, with respect to war and treaties of peace.

(14) In the remarks [C], [G], and [H] of the article HENRY II. See also the remark [P], of the article HENRY IV.

(15) See the remarks [C], [G], and [H] of the article HENRY IV.

(16) Ver. 29.

(17) Ver. 260.

Εἰ μὴ ἐγὼ σε λαβὼν, ἀπὸ μὲν φίλα εἴματα δύνω

Χλαῖναντ', ἥδ' ἑλκύνω, τὰ τ' αἰδῶ ἀμφικαλύπτει

Αὐτὸν δὲ κλαίοντα θοῶς ἐπὶ Πύρρας ἀθήσω.

NH

fects [C]. Some authors say, that before him the Romans never gave up any part of the empire by a treaty of peace [D]. Others maintain, that they who speak thus are mistaken. I will examine this in a remark, and will also produce what the fathers of the church have

Nisi ego te captum, & caris vestibus exuam, Lænaque & tunica & vestibus quæ pudenda circumtegent,

(18) Id. ibid.

Ipsum vero te plorantem celeriter ad Persas remit-tam (18).

*Thou wilt I seize, and of thy robes dispoil,
Thy gown, thy tunic, even the needful vest
Which modesty requires, and naked then I'll lash thee howling to the Persians back.*

(19) Id. ibid.

An old woman, who saw him well made and handsome, and heard that he had no genius and no sense (19), cried out, his folly is as great as his stature (20). Suidas, who tells us all these things, had said before, that this emperor knew nothing; that he had no education, and that he lost by his lazy negligence what nature had given him. Ἀμελέτης δὲ ὢν, καὶ ἀγεύς παιδείας, καὶ ἢ εἰς εὐσύνειαν διὰ βαθυμυίαν ἡμάρης καὶ ἡδονῆς. Sed incultus & doctrinæ prorsus expertus; quam ne gustarat quidem. Quinetiam quod habebat ingenium, id per ignaviam obscurabat, & debebat (21). Eutropius and Ammianus Marcellinus speak not after this manner. Vir alias neque iners neque imprudens (22) says one. We shall see the words of the other at the beginning of the remark [E].

(21) Id. ibid.

(22) Eutrop. lib. x, sub fin.

[C] He did not approve the using of violence for the extirpation of sects. The Philosopher Themistius gives him an encomium which does not agree with the accounts we find in ecclesiastical history. He praises him for permitting all men to serve God in their way, and fixing by that means the inconsistency of those flatterers, who had changed their religion, just as the imperial purple had changed hands whom he compares to the Euripus (23).

(23) See the

Penitence deverses for les Cometes,
p. 244.

Θαυμάζει τὸν βασιλέα, ὡς τὸ ἐρεῖναι θρησκείαν ὡς ἐκαστοὶ βόλονται, νικῶντα τὴν κολλῶν τὰς τρίβους, & καὶ διασφύρει πάντῃ γελοῖος ἔρῃ, ἐλέγχοντα αὐτὰς ἀληθεία, ὃ θεὸν θεράπευστας; μηδὲν τε διαφέρει αὐτὰς Εὐρίπῃ, νῦν μὲν ἐπὶ τὰς εἰς εἰς τὴν αὐτὴν τὰ ἐνέματα μεταβάλλοντες. Imperatorem magnis effert laudibus, ob id quod concessa cuicunque libera facultate colendi numinis prout vellet, adulatorem mores compresserit. Quos quidem facete perstringens, ait experimento cognovimus esse, illos non Deum sed purpuram colere: planeque simile esse Euripo, qui modo in hanc, modo in illam partem fertur (24). Themistius spoke in this manner in his oration upon Jovian's consulship. Which signifies, that the emperor did not forbid the Heathens to worship their Gods in their old way; and yet we learn from Socrates the historian (25), that all the temples of the Heathens were shut up, and that these idolaters concealed themselves, some in one place, and some in another; that the Philosophers left off their habit, and that the sacrifices, which had been so frequent in Julian's time, ceased. It must be said then, that Themistius used an hyperbole, that was only grounded upon Jovian's moderation to Heretics, and which perhaps was a crafty insinuation to tolerate all religions in the same manner. That which is certain, is, that this prince seeing himself courted by all the Christian sects, every one desiring to gain him, declared for the orthodox party, as to the consubstantiality of the word (26), but he did not give way to the request of expelling from their churches such as were of another opinion (27), and he answered that he hated disputes, and that he loved and esteemed the lovers of peace and concord. He designed by his gentleness and mildness to extinguish all the schisms of the church; for which reason he gave out, that he would persecute no body, and that he would love and honour especially such, as expressed the greatest zeal for the re-establishment of peace. Ὁ μὲντοι βασιλεὺς ἀρέσας εἶχε, κολεκία καὶ πειδοὶ τῶν δευτέρων τὴν φιλονεικίαν ἐκκλῖναι, οὐσίας μὲν δὲ ὀχληρὸς τῶν ὁπασάν πιστευόντων ἔσσεσθαι ἀγαπήσαν δὲ καὶ ὑπερτιμήσαν τὰς ἀρχὴν τῇ ἐνώσει τῆς ἐκκλησίας παρῆσαντας. Cæterum Imperator id sibi proposuerat, ut dissidentium jurgia blanditiis & leni verborum persuasione extingueret, opebatque se nemini omnino qualiscunque fidei esset

(24) Socrates,

Hist. Eccles. lib. iii, cap. xxv, pag. m. 205.

(25) Id. ibid.

cap. xxiv.

(26) Id. ibid.

& cap. xxv.

(27) Id. ibid.

cap. xxv.

VOL. III.

molestiam exhibiturum: eos tamen præ cæteris amaturum atque in pretio habiturum, qui reparande in Ecclesia pacis auctores ac duces se præberent (28). I must observe that he made a severe law against those who should endeavour to marry the Nuns, or behave themselves immodestly to them; for he ordered them to be punished with death (29). He was induced to this severity that he might suppress the audaciousness that was used in Julian's reign, in marrying the Nuns, and employing sometimes force, and sometimes persuasions to corrupt them (30).

(28) Id. ibid.
pag. 204, 205.

(29) Sozomen.
Hisor. Eccles.
lib. vi, cap. iiii.

(30) Id. ibid.

[D] Some authors say that before him the Romans never gave up any part of the empire by a treaty of peace. The passages of Eutropius and Ammianus Marcellinus before alledged (31), are a manifest proof that this was the common discourse. Casaubon (32) pretends that they who spoke thus, said a thing that was not true: he grounds himself upon the emperor Hadrian's abandoning three provinces (33), and Diocletian's strengthening the bounds of the empire. 'Diocletianus . . . Augusti preceptum, Hadrianique exemplum secutus, imperii, fines à meridie supra Ægyptum arctavit, auctor Procopius in Persicis. I. dem Imperator reliquit & Daciam à Trajano constitutam, sublato exercitu & provincialibus; desperans eam posse retineri, Vopiscus ait. — Diocletian . . . following the direction of Augustus, and the example of Adrian, settled Egypt as the south boundary of his empire, as Procopius informs us in his Persian history. The same emperor, as Vopiscus says, abandoned Dacia, tho' settled by Trajan, removing the army and the provincial officers, because he despair'd of keeping it.' But Valesius (34) shews a great difference betwixt what these emperors and Jovian did. The latter gave up some provinces by a treaty of peace, and as it were by way of ransom; the others voluntarily abandoned a country, the keeping of which was too chargeable. This was to follow the maxims of prudence, and not like Jovian to submit to the laws of the conqueror. And therefore there was no reason for censuring Marcellinus's words, as Casaubon, Lindenbrogius (35) and Coqueus (36) have done; and it is certain that Jovian introduced a novelty. It is generally agreed that it was a scandalous thing (37): the Christians and Heathens did not dispute on that point; but only differed with relation to this emperor's justification. The Christians endeavoured to clear him, and the Heathens to condemn him. We have seen above (38), that a Heathen historian censures him, not for consenting to the treaty of peace, but for observing the conditions of it. This is an unjust, and abominable censure. If necessity obliged him to make a peace, as this author and all others acknowledge, he ought to be excused; for necessity has no law.

(31) In the remark [B].

(32) Casaubon.
Not. ad Spartian.
vit. Adrian.
cap. v, pag. m. 47.

(33) See, above, remark [G], of the article HADRIAN (PUBLIUS ÆLIUS).

(34) Vales. in
Amm. Marcell.
lib. xxv, cap. ix, pag. m. 439, 440.

(35) Lindenbrog.
in Ammian.
Marcell. ibid.

(36) Leonardus Coqueus in August. de Civit.
Dei, lib. iv, cap. xxix.

(37) Post . . .
pudendum pacis
iacta fecerat.
Amm. Marcell.
lib. xxvii, cap. xii. See also Agathias, lib. iv. Socrates, lib. iii, cap. xxii. Zonaras, &c.

(38) In the remark [B], citat. (12).

(39) Labeirus,
apud Macrobius.
Saturn. lib. ii, cap. vii. See also the words of Horace, above, citation (11) of the article of the third rule of GUISE.

(40) Amm. Marcell. lib. xxv, cap. vii, pag. 433.

Necessitas, cujus cursus transversus impetum
Voluerunt multi effugere, pauci poterunt (39).

*With rapid tide necessity rolls on,
And tho' all fly, yet few it's rage can shun.*

And when once he is justified upon this point, the rest goes off of itself. The exact observation of a treaty of peace solemnly sworn, deserves not to be condemned. Ammianus Marcellinus is a more dangerous censurer than Eutropius; he was an eye-witness, and relates things in such a manner, as to give to understand (40) that Jovian unnecessarily engaged himself in that necessity, and that the confusion the Persians had reduced him to, was not so great, but that it had been better to have tried the fortune of the war, than to accept those ignominious conditions. He accuses him of downright cowardice, and of lending an ear to the flatterers who discouraged him. 'Et cum pugnari decies expediret, ne horum quidquam dederetur: adulatorem globus instabat timido Principi, Procopii metuendum subfrens nomen, eumque adfirmans, nisi rediret, cognito Juliani interitu, cum intacho milite quem regebat, novas res nullo renitente facile molitum. Hac perniciofa verborum ille assiduitate nimia successus, sine cunctatione tradidit omnia quæ

7 I

petebantur

(b) See the remark [D].

have said concerning that peace of Jovian (b). I add, that he was a very tall man, zealous for orthodoxy, but very much addicted to wine and women [E]. Those are rather to be believed, who say he wanted neither activity nor prudence and knowledge, than

(41) Id. ibid. pag. 434.

'petebantur (41). — And when it was more eligible to have fought ten battles than to have made such concessions, a crowd of flatterers deluded the timorous prince, whispering that the very name of Procopius was to be feared, and warmly affirming that he knowing of the death of Julian, unless the emperor returned with his whole army, might easily, and without resistance change the face of affairs: overcome with the pernicious assiduity of these counsellors, he, without consideration, gave up every thing that was demanded.' Agathias (42) charges him plainly with the same weakness. The Christians, to excuse Jovian, carefully observed, that Julian the Apostate was the principal cause of all this misfortune, since his rashness was so great, as to burn all the vessels that should have served to transport the provisions; for hence proceeded that horrible scarcity, which obliged Jovian to a shameful capitulation (43). 'Cujus vanis dedi-

(42) Agathias, lib. iv.

(43) See the second Orat. on of Gregory Nazianzen against Julian the Apostate. See also Socrates, lib. iii. cap. xxii. pag. 156.

(44) August. de Civitat. Dei, lib. v, cap. xxi, pag. m. 554. See also lib. iv, cap. xxix.

(45) See Dionysius Halicarnassensis, lib. iii, cap. xxii.

(46) See the remark [B], citat. (13).

(47) See St. Augustin, de Civitat. Dei, lib. iv, cap. xxix.

(48) Ricaut, Present State of the Ottoman Empire, lib. ii, cap. iii, pag. m. 320.

tus oraculis erat (Julianus), quando fretus securitate victorie naves quibus victus necessarius portabatur, incendit. Deinde servidè instans immodicis ausibus & mox merito temeritatis oculis, in locis hostilibus eorum reliquit exercitum, ut aliter inde non posset evadere, nisi contra illud auspiciu Dei Termini, de quo superiore libro diximus, Romani imperii termini moverentur. Cessit enim Terminus deus necessitati, qui non cesserat Jovi (44). — To which vain oracles he (i. e. Julian) was addicted, when, as if secure of victory, he burnt the ships with all their provisions on board. Afterwards advancing with immoderate boldness, and trusting by his timidity merited that death which he received, he left his army in want of all things in countries possessed by the enemy, from whence it was impossible for them to escape; if, contrary to the command of the god Terminus mentioned in the former book, the limits of the Roman empire had not been changed. Thus the god Terminus yielded to necessity, who had not yielded to Jove. You see in these words of St. Augustin all the fault laid upon Julian, and moreover a jest upon the Heathen religion, in that the immobility of the god Terminus had proved false upon that occasion (45). The Pagans might have said, that it was no wonder that this deity had not acted in favour of Jovian, as being a rebel against the gods of Rome; but that subterfuge might easily have been refuted: for it would still be true, that it was a fallacious promise, which the Romans pretended the god Terminus had made, that the boundaries of the empire should never be lessened. Now this is what St. Austin designed to prove against the Heathens.

Note, by the by, how prudent the conduct of the ancient Romans was: they designed to make conquests; and there is nothing more necessary for such a design, than not to restore by a peace, what was gained by the war: for in vain you take towns and provinces, you will never be the greater for it, if you are obliged to restore them by the articles of peace. The Romans to succeed in the project of forming a vast empire, spurred their generals by motives of glory, and scruples of religion, to gain new countries, and not to lose the conquests they had once made. They never granted a triumph to such as did no more than recover what the enemy had taken (46), and they gave out, that it was violating the religion of the god Terminus, and his sacred auspices (47) to yield up the frontiers of the empire. The Turks proposing to make vast conquests, and to lay the foundation of a great empire, have more particularly brought in religion into that design; for they said that it did not permit them to restore a town wherein there was a mosque, to its first possessors. For which reason they made great haste to build a mosque in their new conquests. This was to engage themselves to keep them in making peace, and to oblige the governors of a town to defend themselves by a principle of conscience, with extraordinary obstinacy (48). But they have lately experienced the uselessness of this nice policy. The treaty of Carlowitz, concluded in the year 1698, has exposed them to the same raillery that St. Augustin made use of against the Roman god Terminus, who gave way to necessity under Jovian the emperor. The Sultan has been obliged to yield up a great number of places with mosques in them, to the Christian princes. In vain it was represented to him that this was offending against the maxims of his religion; there was a necessity for doing it, and of two evils, the least was to be chosen.

[E] He was a very tall man, zealous for orthodoxy, but very much addicted to wine and women.] See him here drawn by a Pagan historian (49). 'Incedebat motu corporis gravi, vultu latissimo, oculis caecis, vasta proceritate & ardua, adeo ut diu nulum indumentum regium ad mensuram ejus aptum inveniretur. Et æmulari malebat Constantium, agens seria quædam aliquoties post meridiem: jocarique palam cum proximis adfuetus. Christianæ legis idem studiosus, & nonnunquam honorificus, mediocriter eruditus, magisque benivolsus, & perpenisus, ut apparebat ex paucis quos promoverat, judices electurus: edax tamen, & vino Venerique indulgens: quæ vitia imperiali verecundia forsitan correxisset. — He walked with becoming gravity, his countenance was very pleasant, his eyes grey, his stature large, inasmuch that it was some time before a royal robe could be found fit for him to wear. He seemed to imitate Constantius in talking of serious things, in the afternoon, discoursing however sometimes very pleasantly, even in public to those about him; strongly attached to the Christian religion, in many things worthy of honour, moderately learned, but very benevolent, and chose the judges with great care, as appeared by the few he promoted; a great eater however, and somewhat addicted both to wine and women, which vices, notwithstanding, he might have corrected, and put on a modesty worthy of his dignity.' Zonaras, who was a Christian and a monk, took from Ammianus Marcellinus the greatest part of this character, speaking of that emperor. Ο μὲν Ἰωβιανὸς, λέγει, ἐὺσεβὴς ἦν περὶ δόγμα καὶ ἀρχαιοτάτης. οὐκ δ' ἦν τῆτο καὶ ἀφροσύνη. καὶ τὴν τὴν αἰματώσαν ἀναδύοντι εὐμύκνης, καὶ γράμματων ἰσχυρὸς. Jovianus quidem religiosus fuit erga Christianam fidem, & benivolus. Vino tamen, Venerique indulgens. Procerus statura, nec litterarum expertus. — Jovian was indeed strongly addicted to the support of the Christian faith, and of a benevolent disposition. Prone both to wine, and women. Of a large stature, and not ignorant of letters. Here then you see an emperor very religious as to his opinions, but a great drunkard, and a whore-monger. He gave two strong proofs of his zeal for the gospel, before he ascended the throne: for in the first place, he shewed himself very ready to renounce his post, rather than his religion (50), when Julian commanded the officers of his troops to embrace Paganism, or to resign their employments. In the second place he would not accept of the empire, till having declared that he was a Christian, and that he would not command Heathens, the soldiers had declared that they were Christians (51). He had then the resolution of renouncing for the love of God, not only a small employment, but also the greatest dignity that was then in the world. He was capable of preferring his religion before the Roman empire; but his conscience, which was so nice in this respect, could not move him to leave off drinking and women. He could quit for his religion all other things but those two. What an odd thing is this! what a combination of good and evil in the same man! There are in all ages many who leave their country for their religion, their estates, and their employments, and their friends and relations, who yet cannot bring themselves to renounce Venus and Bacchus. Never believe that Jovian's orthodoxy was imperfect; but he persuaded that he very well knew, that drunkenness and lewdness are forbidden by God, and that the same religion which condemned the Heathen idolatry, condemned drunkenness and the disorderly love of women. Note, that he was as great an eater as he was a drinker; and it has even been said, that he died of eating too much. Multi exanimatum opinantur nimia cruditate: inter cœnandum enim epulis indulgerat (52). Other reasons of his death were alleged (53), viz. the vapour of a chamber over-heated, poison (54), &c. But this which follows was alleged by the Christians themselves: Ἐτελεύτησεν, ἢ ἀφαιδέσθων, ὥς τινες λέγουσι, δειπνῶν, ἢ ὑπὸ τῆς ὀσμῆς τῆς οἰκίας. Obiit

(49) Amm. Marcell. lib. xxv, sub fin. pag. m. 445.

(50) Socrat. lib. iii, cap. xxii.

(51) Id. ibid.

(52) Eusebius, ubi supra. See also Ammianus Marcellinus, ubi supra, pag. 445.

(53) Alii addunt cubiculi, quod ex reventi thermis calidus, grave quiescentibus erat: quoniam nimietate prœtorum, quæ gravi frigore adoleret, molibus jussit. Id. Euseb. ibid. See also Ammianus Marcellinus, ibid.

(54) See Valel. in Amm. Marcellinus, ibid.

(c) See the remark [B], towards the end.

(d) See Ammian. Marcellin. lib. xxv, cap. viii.

(e) Ammian. Marcellin. lib. xxv, cap. v.

(ec) Sozomen. Hist. Ecclef. lib. vi, cap. vi.

(cf) Suidas, ubi supra.

(cg) When he set fire to the city of Persepolis. See Quintus Curtius, lib. v, cap. viii.

(cs) See the remark [B], of the Dissertation concerning Libels at the end of this Dictionary.

(1) Bodin does not express himself well: Gohorri was only the translator of Amadis.

(2) Bodinus, in Methodo Histor. cap. iv, pag. m. 71.

(3) Thuan. lib. xi, sub fin. pag. m. 235.

(4) Vossius de Arte Histor. cap. ix, pag. 43.

than such as make him effeminate, very ignorant, and stupid (c); for he shewed his vigilance in preventing the tumults and competitions, which he feared the news of his election might raise in the western provinces of the empire (d). The measures he took for it were well concerted, though he could not hinder the true news of the ill condition of the east from coming before the false news he ordered to be spread every where, to conceal the advantages obtained by the Persians [F]. His father, who had left the service in order to live quietly in his house (e), had not time to rise to the dignity which was designed for him; he died before Jovian had executed his resolution of making him his colleague in the consulship (f). This dignity was conferred on a child (g), viz. Varronianus the son of Jovian and of Charis the daughter of Lucilianus (h). Jovian's reign was very short; for it lasted but eight months.

Obiit fœce quod intemperantius, ut quidam ajunt, cœnoverat, seu præ odore cubiculi (55). Have you observed Marcellinus's conjecture? He says, that Jovian would perhaps have corrected, by the consideration of his imperial dignity, his intemperance and lewdness. This is a judicious thought, tho' considering things in general, and according to experience, the sovereign power does not seem to be a good school of sobriety and continence for such as naturally love sensual pleasures: on the contrary, it seems much more proper to increase the disease than to cure it, the means of satisfying ones pleasures, being greater and more numerous. But if it be true, that excess in eating was the cause of the death of Jovian, and if what we read in Suidas be not fabulous, Marcellinus's conjecture is very doubtful. Suidas (56) relates, that Jovian, at the instigation of his wife, caused a very fine temple to be burnt, which Hadrian had consecrated to Trajan, and the library which the emperor Julian had set up in it. He adds that Jovian's concubines set fire to it, and laughed at it. This action is very much like the debauchery of Alexander (57) and Thais the courtesan.

[F] He could not hinder the true news from coming before the false news he ordered to be spread every where, to conceal the advantages obtained by the Persians. It is one of the most necessary artifices of policy to deceive the people with false relations, when there is no good news to tell them (58). It is a difficult thing, I confess, to stop the course of bad news, when it is but too true; but one must do what can be done, and Jovian did not forget that stratagem. 'Justum est autem ad implenda hæc perfectu-

ris, extollere seriem gestorum in melius, & rumores quaquà irent verbis diffundere, concinentibus prociuntum Particum exitu prospero terminatum (59). Hos tabellarios fama prægrediens, index trilitiorum casuum velocissima, per Provincias volitabat & gentes; maximèque omnium Nisibenos acerbo dolore percussit, cum urbem Saporì deditam comperisset (60). — It was but fit that thou who were concerned to bring these things about, should endeavour to give a better turn to the story of these transactions, and by dispersing artful rumors through the provinces, encourage the people to believe that affairs with the Parthians had been terminated with success. . . . But same, the quickest messenger of ill news, soon got the start of these carriers, and flew with them throughout the whole empire: the Nisibeniens were of all others struck with the sharpest grief, when they understood that their city was to be delivered up to Sapor.' These words of Marcellinus are remarkable, fama index trilitiorum casuum velocissima; They insinuate that fame never flies so swift, as when it has unlucky news to bring; and therefore it deserves with greater reason to be characterized as it has been.

Fama, malum quo non aliud velocius ullum: Mobilitate viget, viresque acquirit eundo (61).

Fame, the great ill, from small beginnings grows. Swift from the first; and every moment brings New vigour to her flights, new pinions to her wings. DRYDEN.

JOVIUS (PAUL) was born at Como in Italy, in 1483, got a great reputation by his writings, and the bishopric of Nocera (a); but he was looked upon as a mercenary writer; so that no great credit is given to his histories [A]. It is said, that he was

(f) See Valesius in Marcell. lib. xxv, cap. ult.

(g) Ammian. Marcellin. ibid. cap. x.

(h) Id. ibid. cap. viii, pag. m. 439.

(59) Ammian. Marcellin. ubi supra, cap. viii, pag. 439.

(60) Id. ibid. pag. 437.

(61) Virgil. Ænied. lib. iv, ver. 174.

(a) Pope Clement VII gave it him not

[A] No great credit is given to his histories.] James Gohorri made no scruple to say, that the adventures of Amadis de Gaul, may appear as true as the histories of Paul Jovius. 'Illud certe ad sempiternam memoriam tellatum reliquit Gorraeus Parisiensis, qui quas finxit (1) Amadis fabulas non minus veras ac probabiles quam Jovii scripta fore confidit (2). — Gohorri, a Parisian, has left it as a thing certain to posterity, that the fables framed by him concerning Amadis, had in them as much truth and probability, as was contained in Jovius's historical writings.' Thuanus has not made use of that hyperbole, but he says enough to let us know the esteem that writer was in. 'Cum aliqui homo gratiofus se passim obnoxium prodant, eoque nomine ipsi in plerisque rebus fides derogetur, quod ad gratiam & in odium scripsisse, & venalem calumiam habuisse fere omnibus persuasum sit (3). — When a man, otherwise in good esteem, lays himself open in many particulars, and falsifies almost every fact he relates, it is no wonder if most people are persuaded that he wrote out of passion and prejudice, and with a venal pen.' To which you may add the following passage of Vossius, who says that Paul Jovius had in some manner set up a bank: he promised an ancient genealogy, and an immortal glory, to all the scoundrels that paid him well for his pains, and he traduced all others who would not pay him for his lies. Quam fluxæ etiam fidei patrum ævo fuit Paulus Jovius? quem constat in aula Henrici secundi quibusque terræ filiis bene de se merentibus generis claritatem ad perpetuum nomen pollicium: contraque maledice eos traduxisse qui venali historico morem non gererent (4). We shall see in the following remark, from whence this is taken. He had offered his pen to

Don John III, king of Portugal; and because his offers were not accepted, he passed over in silence a victory of the Portuguese. Had he had a good salary for writing the history of Portugal, he would have forged imaginary victories, so far would he have been from suppressing the true one. He has been therefore justly cried down. The historian of Emanuel's life says thus. 'Victoria fuit præclara: quam tamen Paulus Jovius cum de Sultani classe hac in Indiam contra Lusitanos delata narraret, silentio suppressit, iratus videlicet, quod cum Lusitanæ historiæ scribendæ munus Joanni, hujus nominis tertio, Lusitanæ regi venale proponeret, rex optimus non illum muneribus Indiciis ad res Lusitanorum virtute gestas monimentis illustrandas invitavit (5). — This was a very famous victory, which however Paulus Jovius, writing of the great fleet of the Sultan's, sent into India against the Portuguese, passes over in silence, being angry that when he had made an offer to John III, king of Portugal, of hiring out his pen to celebrate the glory of his people, that great prince neglected, by Indian presents, to retain him for that purpose.' He has had the fate of all liars; he is hardly believed when he speaks truth. The worst of all is, that his lies have been more profitable to him, than the love of truth has been to sincere historians. This complaint of Bodin is very well grounded. 'Non quod multa non sint verè & elegantè ab eo scripta: sed hunc mendacii fructum tulit, ut etiam cum vera scribit, suspectus habeatur. Hoc tamen acerbius est ac indignius, quod cum historiam venalem prostituit, uberioris tulit mendacii fructus, quam quis alius vera scribendo (6). — Not but that there are many things truly and elegantly described in his writings, but then he reaps this fruit from his lying

(5) Osorius de Rebus Enmannuicis, lib. vi, fol. m. 179.

(6) Bodin, ubi supra, pag. 73.

not much ashamed to own it [B], and that he ingenuously confessed that he praised or blamed people according as his favour was cultivated or neglected. No Man did ever ask for presents with less reserve than he [C]. You will find in Moreri what Thuanus relates concerning this author's spite against Anne de Montmorenci. Brantome speaks of it more at large [D]. It is said, that Paul Jovius complained of having lost some books of his history in the sacking of Rome, only because he did not find it his interest to publish them. He was not accounted a man of good morals [E], and was charged with being

^a lying, that he is suspected even when he tells truth.

^b Yet what is still more bitter and unworthy, though he

^c prostituted his pen in writing history, yet he got more

^d by telling lies, than another man would have done

^e by relating the bare truth. This man was not in a capacity to write a good history, for when he could say the truth, he had no mind to it, and when he had a mind to it, he could not; he had no good memoirs, except for the transactions in Italy. This is what Bodin says, because Paul Jovius had not travelled, nor been present at the events, but had attended the court of the Popes for thirty seven years. Cum rumoribus fidem habuerit, nec consilia principum nec conciones, nec epistolae, nec res gestas, nec ulla publica monu-menta viderit: sic tamen scribit quasi rebus interfuisset, nec ullum dubitationis locum relinquit. Quae igitur

verissime scribere potuit, noluit: puta res in Italia

gestas: quae voluit, non potuit; scilicet externa (7).—

^f As he gave credit to flying stories, and had no acquaint-

^g tance either with the councils of princes, speeches, epistles,

^h public transactions, or records, he yet writes as if he ⁱ had perfectly known all things, and leaves no room for ^j doubt. What he could have written truly, he would ^k not, I mean the affairs of Italy: what he would, he

^l could not; that is, things done abroad. This to me seems no impediment to his collecting good memoirs about other countries. Besides, Paul Jovius boasts of the sieges and battles he has seen, &c. (8). See, in the remark [F], another passage of Bodin, and the judgment of Justus Lipsius upon our author, whom he taxes with an extreme partiality (§ a).

[§ a] James Gohorry has translated into French the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth books of Amadis, if his work may be called a translation*, for he has added to many things to the original, that he may be as much accounted the author of these books, as the translator. To this the words of Bodin allude. REM. CRIT.]

[B] They say he was not much ashamed to own it.]

Bodin affirms, that Paul Jovius being asked, why he told so many lies, and suppressed true events? answered, that he did it in favour of his friends; that he knew well enough, that the present age would give no credit to his histories, but that posterity would not doubt of what he said. Cum autem rogaretur cur simularet falsa, vera dissimularet, amicorum gratia id à se factum respondit: ac tametsi supersites intelligeret suis scriptis fidem derogaturos, attamen intelligebat infinitas posteritati credibilia fore quae sibi suisque popularibus laudem essent allatura (9). Some will have it that he made answer: 'A hundred years hence there will remain no proof to convict me of falsehood: and therefore what shall be read in my history, will be necessarily looked upon as true. Anzi mi vien detto, che essendo biasimato il Giovio della infedeltà della sua historia, egli la confessò, soggiungendo però, che si riconfortava, sapendo, che dopo lo spazio di cento anni, non vi sarà più alcuna memoria in contrario; onde veran-

no i posteri necessariamente à dare indubitata fede à suoi scritti (10). Some say (11) he bragged that he had a pen of gold, and another of iron, one for the princes who were bountiful to him, and the other against those princes from whom he received nothing. It is said also, that he confessed, that the reason why he suppressed the three books, where he spoke of Antony de Leva, was because that famous general made him no present, and that he resolved an ungrateful man should have no place in his work. Quis nescit quanta fuerit virtus Antonii Levae Hispani ducis, ut solus dicit, aut cum paucis Imperator appellari nostri temporis possit: tamen nequissimus historicus (12), seu potius fabulator, quod pecunias non dedisset, maluit totam cor-rumperet historiam, tresque libros qui illi debebantur in-termittere, ne (ut aiebat) ingratum infereret historiae

(13). It is said, that at the court of Henry II he promised an illustrious genealogy to any one that would pay him for it, and threatened to slander all those that should cross him in his design of getting money. Paulus Jovius, me puero, in aula Henrici secundi obscurissimo cui-que claritatem generis mercede pollicebatur, maledicentia ulturus qui ejus nundinationi aduersaretur (14). For my part, I can scarce believe, that he confessed the things I have been relating. I find he boldly declares, that he printed his book in the life-time of the persons concerned, because he does not fear to be convicted of any falsehood, which he could not avoid, if he was not a faithful historian (15).

[C] No man did ever ask for presents with less reserve than he.] His begging trade (16) puts me in mind of that of Paul Jovius, who craved still more openly and more meanly than he. I have read some letters of his, which are admirable in that kind. In some of which he protests, that if the cardinal de

Lorraine did not pay him his pension, he will say that he is no longer of the rate of Godfrey, who gave the archbishopric of Tyre to a pedant. In others, he begs two horses of the Marquis of Pescara, and desires him for that effect to strike the ground more stoutly than Neptune did. In others, he desires a lady to send some sweet-meats from Naples, because he begins to be weary of eating new laid eggs, &c. (17).

[D] Thuanus relates the spite of Paul Jovius against Anne de Montmorenci. Brantome speaks of it more at large.] Though Brantome's passage be somewhat long,

I will give it intire. 'I have heard a great man say, that he had seen in the first Latin impression of Paul

Jovius (I know not how true it is) a little touch, wherein it is said, that at the very same time the Grand Seigneur, Sultan Soliman, put to death his great favourite Ibrahim Basha; the king of France put out of his favour his great favourite, the constable de Montmorenci: but why, says he, did he not he put him to death; as the other did Ibrahim, or Hibraun

Basha? It was not, said he, but that he had as well deserved it: (and hereupon he specified some impertinences, that are not worth mentioning, and which are false) but because this great king was good and merciful, and the other was a cruel tyrant. I do not know whether that Latin edition, has this; but this gentleman affirmed it to me. This is not in the French version, and no credit is to be given to it;

for the said Paul Jovius spoke it, if he did speak it, as a passionate man, and dissatisfied with the Constable, who, when he was recalled by king Henry, and went about to regulate the king's household, as it was his office, found among the pensioners of the late king, a constant pension of five hundred crowns, given to the said Paul Jovius, which he immediately struck out, giving the king to understand, that it was money ill employed, he being more in the Emperor's interest than in the French, and a great liar.

The said Paul understanding that his pension was cut off, fell a babbling against the Constable, and rail-ling bitterly against him. This it is to have to do with a virulent tongue and pen, which, when provoked, spare nothing. Some say that the Constable, in the time of his disgrace, had read this, which this spark had written rather to please the king, than for any reason, as generally such writers are flatterers, and time-servers for their belly's sake; and that therefore, when the Constable was recalled, he paid him off, and had done worse, if he could have done it;

for it is a great trouble for a valiant and noble man, like him, to be thus abused, and exposed by a writer, without any reason (81). Some say, that Jovius's spite proceeded only from his not obtaining some things which he impudently asked of the Constable. Quod quidem experius est Annas Mommorantius Comes Stabuli

Franciae traductus à venali historico, non aliam ob rem quam quod nescio quid impudenter petens, repulsum tulisset (19). I shall observe by the bye, that Francis I. had no reason to repent the pension he gave Paul Jovius;

for he appeared in the writings of his pensioner more like a conqueror than a conquered prince. It is said, that Charles V made that complaint (20).

[E] He was not accounted a man of good morals.]

Cardan taxes him with leudness. 'Hic nosse historicus,

(14) Joseph Scaliger, Epist. de Vetus. Gentis Scaliger, pag. 3. Paulus, without doubt, took from these what he says above, c. 15.

(15) Absolutè tandem opere id in publicum edere non dubitavit, in vino hercle incorrupta veritatis argumeto: quandoquidem plerique eorum, qui hac bello puerque gesserant, alicui vivant, ac idcirco gravi exultationis nunc cum periculo mentis temere relinere possint. Justus, Prefat. Historia ad Cosmum Medicum.

(16) That is of a man, whom Buzae calls John James. He means the same person, who made Mr. Peiret's Funeral Oration at Rome.

(17) Balzac's ninth letter to Chapelain, book iii, pag. m. 114.

(18) Brantome, Elog. de François I, in the first Tom. of his Memoirs, pag. 218.

(19) Joseph Scaliger, ubi supra.

(20) Cum aliquando Cicerio nosse legeret victoriam quam de Gallis habuerat, dixit profecto non memisset Gallorum Regis victoriam hic scripta, in-dicam, ex pecuniis accepta à Rege quanta mendacia infunderet Historiam. Cardanus, in Apologia Neronis.

(7) Id ibid.

(8) See the epistle dedicatory of his history.

* See the epistle dedicatory of his translation of the sixteenth book.

(9) Bodin, ubi supra, pag. 73.

(10) Stefano Guazzo della Civil Conversatione, lib. ii, pag. m. 242.

(11) Teissier, Addit. to the Elog. Tom. I, pag. 67.

(12) Paul. Jovius.

(13) Cardanus in Apolog. Neronis.

being very remiss in reciting his breviary. His style was bright, but not historical or correct enough [F]. His insincerity is not the only fault he is censured for in his histories (b), which of all his works is that he has taken most pains in [G]. It cannot be denied

(b) See the remark [F].

(21) Id. ibid.

(22) That is, more admirable than the historians whom Cardan had before named, and taxed with several vices.

* Quispe Hermaphroditus.

(23) These words are thus printed in my edition: I think the word inter has been left out.

(24) In Museo Historico, pag. 7.

(25) Scaligeriana prima, p. m. 95.

(26) Rolandus Marefius, Epist. xli, lib. 1, pag. m. 184.

(27) Lipsius Not. ad 1. lib. Politic. cap. ix, pag. m. 218.

cus, says he (21), admirandus profecto magis aliis (22) qui tametsi fenex, parum abfuit, quin pepererit. Sed & id detestabilis, quod cum esset etiam Antistes, gaudebat numerari (23) procos adolescentulos. — Our historian was certainly to be admired more than the others, who, though he was old, wanted little of bringing forth. And what is yet more detestable, when he was even risen to the rank of a prelate, he delighted in being reckoned among brisk strikers. Cardan's marginal note has something very strange in it, which is, that Paul Jovius was * an Hermaphrodite. Imperialis (24) owns that this author was accused of leading a licentious life, and of being very negligent in his prayers, and in repeating his Breviary.

[F] His style was bright, but not historical or correct enough. Scaliger speaks thus of it. Paulus Jovius mendacissimus & Guicciardini inferior, nimis affectato & luxuriante stylo, potius quam castigato utens (25). — Paulus Jovius, a flagrant liar, and inferior to Guicciardini, using an affected and luxuriant rather than a pure style. Roland Marefius speaks of it with the utmost contempt, and even says it is full of barbarisms. Quantum sentio, says he (26), non bonus est historiarum scriptor (Paulus Jovius) nec judicio satis valet: qui si vernacule scripsisset, nullo in numero haberetur. Latinus enim sermo quasi fucus quidam labes illius multas contigit: qui prima specie elegans videtur, nam belle sonat, & quibusdam imponit, mihi non item. Vix enim Latinus est, certe minime purus, totusque idiotismis scatet; nihil fere proprie effert, sed perumque αεὶ αὖτις loquitur, nec pene ulla vox est sine epitheto. — For my part, I take him to be no good writer of history, and of a very indifferent judgment, who, if he had wrote in his own language, would not have been at all regarded, for the Latin tongue, like a kind of varnish, covers a great many of his faults, in as much as at first sight it seems elegant, because it sounds well, which imposes upon many, but not upon me. For after all it is scarce Latin, far from being pure, every where abounding with idiotisms; hardly any thing properly expressed, too much circumlocution every where, and scarce a word without an epithet tacked to it. They are two very competent judges, and therefore it is somewhat strange that Liplius should speak so much in praise of Jovius's style. Must we not conclude from it, that the taste of the best critics is not uniform upon a subject, about which there ought to be no different opinions? Those who know the rules of eloquence, and of the art of history, ought to agree, either in praising or condemning the style of a writer. But let us see what character Liplius gives of Paul Jovius (27). Paulus Jovius multorum judicia magis acerba quam libera experitur. Acriter valde in virum eunt. Ego de eo sic cenfeo, stilo bonum graveque esse & plane ad historiam: judicio ac fide ambiguum. Ubi affectus non distrahunt, rectum, ubi illi adfunt, obnoxium. Ad gratiam scilicet se dat & auram. Laudationum nec caussam saepe habet, nec modum. Gentis suae, Vastii, Medicis nimis ex professo addictus. His quidem ita ut Laurentium Medicen parricidii reum velut apud iudices agat. Orationibus quoque aut frigidis interdum, aut ineptis. Laudandus tamen legendusque ob multiplicem & variam rerum seriem, quas redegit compositae & dilucide in unum historiarum corpus (28). — Paul Jovius has met rather with severe than free censures from many. They are generally too angry with the man. My judgment of him is this, his style is good, solemn, and fit for history: his judgment and his credit doubtful. Where his passions do not draw him aside, he writes truth, where they intermix, he is not to be defended, for he gave himself up to acquire favour and applause. His panegyrics have very often, neither justice, nor measure. To his own nation, and to the house of Medicis, too much, and too professedly addicted. This appears clearly from his defending Laurence de Medicis, though a parricide, as if before the judges. His orations are frequently cold, or little to the purpose. However, he is to be commended and read for the sake of that multiplicity of matters which he has reduced into a regular series, and digested neatly, and clearly into a history. Liplius's observation concerning the cold and impertinent harangues that Paul Jovius has inserted in his history, puts me in mind of Bodin, who laughs at him for making soldiers speak like scholars declaiming in the schools: 'Præsertim in concionibus, epistolis, fœderibus, decretis quæ Jovius pro arbitratu fingit, in quo tamen decorum ita confudit, ut imperiti milites ipsius Alciati sui laudatoris judicio, declamatores scholastici esse videantur (29). (29) Bodin, ubi In speeches, epistles, leagues, decrees especially, which Jovius feigns at pleasure, he shows so little regard to decorum, that even ignorant soldiers, in the opinion of Alciatus, his panegyrist, declaim like scholars. I am persuaded that my readers will be pleased to see here Alciatus's own words, which Bodin goes upon. Id à te præcipue desiderabam, ut ad illud quod Græci ωρέων vocant, non absurdè responderes. Sicuti in ea oratione animadvertēbam, quæ à Marconio gregario milite, ad legiones jam planè confternatas & ad seditionem spectantes habebantur, quum Solymano Pannoniæ finibus excedente, Carolus Cæsar Vienna profectus in Italiam rediret. In ea liquidem concione omnes artis nervos numerosque ita expressisti, ut ille Marconius nequaquam ab aratro Volaterrani agri ad signa vocatus, sed ex schola Ciceronis & Hermogenis ad suggestum raptus esse videatur, quum passim exactæ eloquentiæ schemata interniteant, quæ peroranti turbam parère coegerint (30). — This especially I would put you in mind of that you offend not against what the Greeks call Decorum, as I observed to you in regard to that speech which you have put into the mouth of Marconius, a common soldier, and addressed to his fellows when the legions were about to mutiny on Sultan Solymans's passing the boundaries of Pannonia, when the emperor Charles leaving Vienna returned to Italy. For in that harangue all the art, strength, and harmony of Rhetoric, are so expressed, that this Marconius, instead of seeming to have been taken from the plow at Volaterra, appears rather to have been forced from the school of Cicero and Hermogenes to mount the pulpit: all the beauties of an exact eloquence glittering in his discourse, and as it were compelling the people to fall in with the sentiments of so excellent a speaker.

Note, that these words of Liplius, Laurentium Medicen parricidii reum velut apud iudices agat, have been thus translated by Mr Teissier (31), He vindicates Laurence de Medicis from the crime of parricide, as if he was pleading for him before his judges. Paul Jovius doth just the contrary; he pleads as the advocate of this Laurence's accuser would do (32). Doubtless Mr Teissier thought, that the great Laurence de Medicis is here meant, who was the patron of the learned in the XVth century; but this concerns another Laurence, who assassinated Alexander de Medicis in the year 1537.

[G] His history is of all his works that which he has taken most pains in. It is the first work he composed, and the last he published. He formed the design of it in the year 1515, and continued the execution of it all his life. He took for his subject all that happened in his own time all over the world, beginning at the year 1494, which was that in which the French conquered Naples under Charles VIII. This history contains forty five books, and reaches to the year 1544. But there is a considerable chasm from the nineteenth book to the twenty fourth, inclusively (33). Those six books, which reached from the death of Leo X, to the sacking of Rome in 1527, contain but a short summary of the events. He lost in the sacking of Rome, what he had composed upon that part of his history (34), and he would neither do it again, nor finish what was wanting. He was diverted from it chiefly for two reasons: one was, that he would have incurred the terrible anger of some people; the other was, that he would not exercise his pen upon a subject that was ignominious to Italy. Peritos medicos ne clide nonnulli imitatus, carcinomata desperatæ curationis, quæ si autrectes, & acri medicamine lacessas, in immensum furere, & pestifera edacique serpentine mortem afferre solent, naturæ relinquenda, necue his ullo pasto mātum admoventum judicavi. Quamobrem existimationi salutique meæ consulens, diræ tempestatis materiam, tanquam abominabilis impique operis, mē

(28) La Popeliniere Hist. des Histoires, liv. vii, pag. 403, without mentioning Liplius, but only translated this, giving his judgment about Paul Jovius: Nay, he did not understand these words laudationum nec caussam saepe habet, nec modum: for he renders them thus, he observes neither the causes nor the means in his praises.

(33) Note, that there is also a chasm from the fourth book to the tenth, inclusively. See his address at the end of the fourth book.

(34) Fatali illa sub Clemente VII, utis interfecti that was ignominious to Italy. Peritos medicos ne clide nonnulli imitatus, carcinomata desperatæ curationis, quæ si autrectes, & acri medicamine lacessas, in immensum furere, & pestifera edacique serpentine mortem afferre solent, naturæ relinquenda, necue his ullo pasto mātum admoventum judicavi. Quamobrem existimationi salutique meæ consulens, diræ tempestatis materiam, tanquam abominabilis impique operis, mē

Y O L. III.

7 K

mē

(c) Reusner, in Diaz's Histor.
pag. 185.

nied that this author was a man of parts, and that we find in his books many curious things. He died the eleventh of December 1552 (c) at Florence; whither he had retired very much discontented with the court of Rome, because he could not obtain the bishopric of Como [H]. He had a brother called BENEDICTUS JOVIUS, who

(35) Jovius,
Præfat. Tom. II,
Historiarum.

‘mè attingendam arbitratum sum, quando hæc adversæ fortunæ accepta vulnera, insanæque nostræ detrimenta, non modo non prodenda posteris, sed pro virili occultanda esse videantur: Ea liquidem, quæ Italianum nomen dedecorent, neque memoria recoli sine dolore, neque sine uberrimis lachrymis scribi, nec sine flagitio pudoreque posteris enarrari queunt (35).

‘I have learned to imitate those skillful Physicians, who say of Cancers desperate, and beyond the reach of cure, that if you handle them, and apply sharp medicines, they will grow excessively painful, and spreading with a pestiferous corrosion are wont to bring on death; and consequently ought to be left to nature, and by no means to be meddled with. Wherefore considering my character and my health, I am determined to pass over that unhappy subject, which (as an abominable and impious work whereby others received wounds from our madness) ought instead of being transmitted to future times to be studiously concealed: such things as would reflect dishonour on the Italian name, I cannot bring back to my memory without pain, or write without shedding a flood of tears, nor without a mixture of wickedness and shame can be delivered to posterity.’ We have seen above

(36) In remark
[B].

(36), that this chasm has been much reflected upon to his dishonour. It is a remarkable thing, that though he had alleged these two reasons as a very good apology, yet in the following page he promised to publish in a little time, that part which was wanting to his history. ‘Quod si mihi quanquam pedibus capto, atque adeo graviter feneſcenti. Deus magnus fatalis horæ spatium extendat, perpetua procul dubio lucubratione enitar, ut totum id quod in clade urbis ereptum, vel à me postea contumaci quadam indignatione prætermisum fuit, non diu à bonis mortalibus desideretur (37). — But if notwithstanding my lameness and the heavy load of encreasing old age, the almighty GOD shall be pleased to put off my last hour, I shall without doubt employ my pen continually, that whatever I lost in the sacking of Rome, or has been since then, with a kind of obstinate indignation by me concealed, shall no longer be desired in vain by good men.’ Besides, he tells us, that he has filled up that chasm, with the particular lives he has published. The preface from whence I have taken these particulars, was written at Pisa the first of May, 1552. It is the Epistle Dedicatory of the second volume of his history. The author died in December following, and had not the satisfaction of seeing the third and last volume out of the press. He caused his work to be printed at Florence. For the rest, he who says that it was the first work that Paul Jovius composed, is wretchedly confounded in his calculations. He says, that the author began to write it in the year 1515, when he was about thirty years of age, and that he died being near seventy five years old, and that during the thirty seven years, that he spent upon it, his fortune was very much unsettled. ‘Cum enim anno à nato CHRISTO qui numerabatur MDXV. ætatis autem suæ circa trigefimum, ea quæ post annum MCDXCIV, per totum orbem terrarum gesta essent, atque se vivo gererentur, animo complexus fuisset, illud Historiæ opus, omnium suorum primum exorsus fuit, licet omnium postremum illud ediderit, eique quinque ferme annis septuagenario major immortuus est. Triginta itaque illis ac septem annis quibus historiam concinnavit, varia & ipse fortuna (uti fieri solet) jactatus JOVIUS (38). — For as

(38) Basil. Joh.
Heroldus, ubi
supra.

‘in the year 1515, from the birth of CHRIST, and in the thirtieth of his own age, he resolved in his own mind to write the history of things which happened throughout the whole world, from the year 1494, or were transacted in his life-time. He made this work the first he ever entered on, though he published it the last, and died soon after almost seventy five. Thirty seven years therefore which he spent in writing this history, brought (as is usual) many turns and changes in the affairs even of Jovius himself.’ We may reckon here three faults. I. A man that is employed in a thing from his thirtieth to his seventy fourth year, labours at it forty four, and not thirty seven years. II. Paul Jovius dying in the year 1552, lived not above seventy four years, if it be true that in 1515, he was not above thirty: he would have lived but sixty seven years, or thereabouts. III. Paul Jovius's epitaph (39) gives him sixty nine years, seven months, and twenty two days: it is not therefore true that he lived near seventy five years, and it is speaking inaccurately to say, that he was about thirty years of age in 1515.

I shall occasionally observe, that the book De Pijetibus Romanis, is the first that Jovius published (40). He dedicated it to Cardinal Lewis de Bourbon. The Epistle Dedicatory is dated from the Vatican, the twenty ninth of March 1524. He then proposed to himself, a thing which he did not execute, which was speedily to put to the press the first deced of his history. Exibit in publicum propædium hujusmodi laboriosissimi operis prima decas, non sine aliqua spe immortalitatis (41).

Alcyonius commends it in a book which was printed in the year 1522; but this ought not to serve for a proof of it's being printed; he might mention it, as having read it in manuscript. These are his words. ‘Quam etiam scribendi laudem, felicissimè consecutus est Paulus Jovius tuus, in ea decade, qua res omnes complexus est, quæ toto terrarum orbe gellæ sunt, postquam Carolus VIII. Rex Galliarum cum Maximis Copiis transgressus Alpeis tranquillum Italiæ Statum perturbavit, & prima funestissimorum in Italia Bellorum jecit semina. Historia enim hujus Clarissimi Scriptoris, omnes Elegantiæ flores, omnia Eloquentiæ lumina habet, & mira Orationis Claritate splendescit (usque eo omnia ornate narratur) & regiones aut pugnæ admirabiliter describuntur, & conciones hortationesque prudenter & gravissime interponuntur. Denique illius auctor, varietate, evagationibus, amplificationibus, digressionibus non minus præstantis Historici quam eximii Oratoris laude, ab omnibus decorari debet (42). — Which art of writing your

Paul Jovius has most happily reached in that Decade, wherein he comprehends the history of whatever happened throughout the world, after Charles VIII. king of France, passing the Alps with a great army, first disturbed the peace of Italy, and scattered the seeds of those unhappy wars which so long rent that country. For the history of this most excellent writer abounds with all the flowers of elegance, all the lustre of eloquence, and shines with wonderful clearness of expression (every thing being so exquisitely related) countries and battles so admirably described, speeches and languages so prudently, and with such propriety, inserted. In a word, this author for his Variety, his Epitaphs, Amplifications and Digressions, deserves from every one to be no less commended as an Orator, than admired as an Historian.’

[H] He could not obtain the bishopric of Como.] This appears from a letter which Andrew Alciatus wrote to him (43). It is dated from Pavia, the seventh of October 1549, and is an answer to a letter, which Paul Jovius had wrote to him to acquaint him with his discontent, and design of leaving Rome, and betaking himself to Florence. ‘Scribis te gravi injuria peremptum, Urbe (quod nunquam fieri posse putaram) propædium excessurum, ne diutius acceptæ contumeliæ deformis testis in ea aula specteris, in qua per multos annos (uti mihi videtur) cum auræ mediocritatis bonis planè beatus, tum studiorum tuorum Autoritate clarus hæcenus fuisti. Mirum profectò videri potest, quod tibi doctrinæ ac ætatis honore majora promerito, in petitione Pontificatus patriæ tuæ Paulus Pontifex quandam prætulit. At quem hominem? qui Comi neque natus, neque unquam visus sit, & qui (sicut à multis audio) ex arcanis cubiculi foribus in lucem repente sit productus. — You write to me, that, moved by a heavy injury done you, you have thoughts of leaving Rome (a thing I thought would never have come to pass) that you may not remain an uneasy witness of the wrong done you in that court where (as I apprehend) you have for many years enjoyed the blessings of a golden mediocrity, as well as a just respect flowing from the importance of your studies. I am therefore, I confess, surprized that to a person, who, like you, has both learning and years to

(39) Apud Paulum Freherum, Theatr. pag. 1454. & apud Pope Blount, Conf. Author. pag. 44, ubi, instead of twenty two days, there is twelve days. Thuanus l. vii. twenty two.

(40) Herold, ubi supra, who tells us in what order the several books of that author were published.

(41) Jovius, Epist. Dedic. libri de Pijetibus.

(42) Petrus Alcyonius in Mælicæ Legatio posterius, pag. 103, Edit. Grotii. 1624.

(43) It is referred to Paul Jovius's History.

who wrote some books [I]. There was one PAUL JOVIUS, who in the council of Trent, gave his opinion in a curious manner upon the question concerning Residence [K].

I must not forget that our Paul Jovius has been blamed for giving too much credit to astrological predictions, and such like superstitions [L]. His elogies of illustrious men have

'plead in his favour, Pope Paul should prefer another to be bishop in your country. And who is he that he has thus preferred? One neither born nor known at Como, but one (as I have been told by many) who from the dirty privacies of a bed-chamber, has been brought on a sudden to make a figure in the world.' This is well enough; this is speaking freely enough of the holy father, he is not much better used in what follows: 'Quis in hoc Pontificem ἀμυστοῦργον non judicet: non enim hostis bonarum literarum & plane ferreus esse non potest qui te gravissimarum rerum scriptorem intempestive contempserit . . . Dices te indigne deceptum ab inveterati astus sene principe, qui blandis promissis vota tua honeste concepta inique fefellerit. — Who will not look on this Pope as a foe to the Muses, for can he be other than an enemy to literature, and a person of a stubborn disposition, who could so unseasonably condemn a person like you, who have written on the most important affairs. . . . You will say you have been unworthily deceived by the thorough-paced cunning of an old prince, who with fair promises beguiled those wiser you had honestly conceived.' I am afraid Thuanus is guilty here of a mistake; he pretends that it was Clement VII who refused Paul Jovius the bishopric of Como, and that his refusal drew upon him some reflections in the books of that historian. 'Cum ad Novocomensem Episcopatum omnibus votis anheleret, suaeque erga Mediceam familiam, in cujus laudes profusus fuerat, observantiae deberi id meritum fiducia putaret, tamen ab eo obtinere non potuit: quod in causa fuisse plerique credunt, cur Clementem in Historiis avaritiae & tenacitatis infamulet (44). — As he earnestly desired to be promoted to the bishopric of Como, and confidently believed it due to his merit for the praises which he had so profusely bestowed on the house of Medicis, but for all that mis-carried in his suit, some have imagined that on this account he taxes Pope Clement in his history with covetousness and want of generosity.'

(44) Thuan. lib. 21, pag. 235.

[I] He had a brother called BENEDICTUS JOVIUS, who wrote some books. He was Paul's elder brother, and proved a kind of a father to him; it was he that educated him, and instructed him, and encouraged him to be an author; for having shewn him two of his works, viz. the history of Como, and a treatise of the actions and manners of the Swisses, he excited in him the desire of writing a General History. He led a very quiet and retired life, in the place of his birth, which he never left but to go to Milan to hear the lectures of a Greek professor. He had learned that language of himself: but he desired to learn to pronounce it, which was the occasion of his only journey. He lived seventy three years in perfect health and vigour of body and mind. He designed a century of letters full of learning for the public; and his sons were to have the care of publishing them, with some other compendiums which he left them, some translations from the Greek, and some pieces of poetry (45). Their uncle expected this from their diligence (46), but I think there was nothing of this author printed besides some Latin poems.

(45) Sed hæc & Græcæ traductionis non ignobilis opera cum lepidis poematibus eruditiorum liberorum diligentia nobilitavit. P. Jovius, Elog. cap. cvi.

We are not to believe that PAUL JOVIUS, Junior, whereof many Latin verses are to be seen in the elogies which our Paul Jovius composed, was Benedict Jovius's son. He was nephew to JULIUS JOVIUS, who was made coadjutor to his uncle (47) in the bishopric of Nocera, the twenty first of August, 1551, and was bishop of that place after him. Paulus Jovius junior, a good Poet, was made coadjutor to his uncle, Julius Jovius, in the same bishopric, the twenty ninth of November, 1560, and was his successor there. He kept that see twenty five years, and died in the year 1585 (48). I have said elsewhere (49), that Paul Jovius was no Poet.

(46) Taken from Paul Jovius, cap. cvi, of his Elogia of Learned Men.

(47) That is, to our Paul Jovius.

(48) Taken from Ugheili, Ital. Sacra, Tom. VII, pag. 746.

(49) In the article of H. A. DRIAN VI, remark [D].

[K] One PAUL JOVIUS gave his opinion in a curious manner upon the question concerning residence. One of my friends, who heard me say all that I remembered of our Paul Jovius, represented to me, that I had forgot the most curious circumstance. He was, said he, one of the fathers of the council of Trent; and having no skill in Divinity, for he had been a Physician before he was made a bishop, and never interrupted his study of human learning, I believe he did not distinguish himself in that assembly, when he was to give his opinion upon any point of doctrine. He had a great interest, not to suffer that the residence of bishops should be declared to be of divine right. This assertion so warmly maintained by some of the deputies, did not please him. He opposed it with reasons taken from experience; he shewed, that the dioceses, in which residence was observed, were no less disorderly than others (50); and he influenced upon the city of Rome. This friend shewed me immediately the 470th page of Father Paul, where I find what follows. 'If the absence of the prelates was the true cause of abuses, we should see less corruption in the churches, where the bishops have resided in our time. For this hundred years the Popes have continually kept at Rome, and taken great care to have the people instructed; and yet after all, we do not see that city better governed. The capital cities of kingdoms, where the bishops have always resided, are more corrupted than some wretched places that have not seen their bishops for a hundred years. And none of the ancient prelates, that are present here, and have always resided (for there are some such) can shew us, that his diocese is better ordered, than those of his neighbours, who never resided. They who say that those churches are sheep without a shepherd, ought to consider that curates have the charge of souls as well as bishops; and yet these are only spoken of, as if there could be no true Christians, but where there are bishops. Some people in the mountains, who never saw one in their lives, might serve for a pattern to episcopal cities. We ought to praise and imitate the zeal and conduct of the fathers of this council under Paul, who have decreed some penalties against the prelates, to oblige them to residence, and have begun to remove the impediments, which kept them from their churches. Rather than flatter ourselves with a vain hope, that residence will produce the reformation of the church, we ought to fear, that as we design at present to enforce residence, the inconveniences (51) which will arise from it, may oblige our successors to apply to them the remedy of absence (52).' I easily undeceived my friend, by telling him, that the writer of the history of that council speaks of one Paul Jovius, bishop of Nocera, in the year 1562 (53), ten years after the death of Paul Jovius, who is the subject of this article.

[L] He has been blamed for giving too much credit to Astrological predictions, and such like superstitions. Martin del Rio having mentioned some things, which seem to prove, that Chiromancy and Astrology can reveal futurities, adds: 'Unus ista omnia narrat Jovius, nec usquequaque indubitata fidei historicus, nec satis à superstitionis & gentiliæ ne dicam opinionibus, saltem locutionibus, alienus (54). — Jovius only has told us all these things, an historian not deserving credit in 470.

'always of credit, nor far enough removed from the belief of the superstitions and opinions of the Gentiles at least in his expressions.' He had before blamed him for having some respect for a remark of Amnionancy. This is the name they give to the art of divining by the inspection of the membrane Amnios, wherewith a child is wrapped up in it's mother's womb.

Sed & Jovius ne quid superstitionis omittit, nimis hujusmodi vanitatibus pro Episcopo deditus, in Ferdinandi Davali nativitate (lib. 1. Pifarrii) hujusmodi pelle involutum ex utero proditiæ consideravit (55). — But Jovius also that he might not omit any superstition, being, for a bishop, too much addicted to such vanities, informs us (speaking of the birth of Ferdinand Davali) that he came from the womb, wrapped in such a membrane as this. This membrane commonly breaks when the child is born, but sometimes it

(50) Compare with this what Benintome says in a passage which I have quoted in the remark [N] of the article FRANCIS I, to which you may add these words of Mezerai's Chronological Abridgement, pag. 434, of the sixth volume. They were ordered by a decree of parliament to go and discharge their duty in their bishopricks; otherwise they should be compelled to it by a seizure of their goods and equipage. But most of them lived such disorderly lives, that perhaps their absence was less scandalous than their residence would have been.

(51) He pretends that if residence was declared to be of divine right, the bishops would forsake their obedience to the Popes, and the priests their obedience to the bishops.

(52) Fra-Paolo, Hist. du Concile de Trente, lib. ann. 1562, of Amnion's translation. See pag. 10, of the Italian

(53) It is Paulus Jovius junior: I spoke of him above, towards the end of the remark [I].

(54) In Elogiis.

(55) Mart. del Rio, Disquis. Magicæ lib. 1. cap. 11. Quest. 1, pag. 278.

(56) Idem. ibid. cap. 11. Quest. 1, pag. 277.

(d) Balzac,
Differtat. à Dom
André de Saint Denis, at the end of his Socrate Chrétien, pag.
m. 174.

(e) Henry Stephens. Vide Crenium Animadv. Parte V, pag. 163.

have been thought too sharp and too biting (d), but sometimes they are too flattering. See the censure that a learned critic (e) passed upon him in his dialogue De bene instituendis Græcæ Linguae Studiis. George Sabinus complains, that Jovius in his histories is injurious to the Protestants of Germany, and particularly to Sigismund II, elector of Brandenburg. Consult the letter that George Sabinus wrote to John Sleidan the first of September 1556 (f).

It is necessary to enlarge a little upon what I have said of the first work that he published [M].

(f) It is the last of those that have been printed with George Sabinus's Poems, pag. 419, & seq. Edit. Lips. 1606. See also Crenii, Animadvers. Part. VI, pag. 209.

(56) See Mr Drelincourt's treatise, of which an extract is given in the Nouvelles de la Republ. des Lettres, for July 1683, art. xi,
pag. 815.

is preserved whole, and this is taken for a sign of good fortune: whence comes this proverb, il est né coiffe; (56) (he was wrapped up in his mother's smock). Paul Jovius curiously observed this circumstance in the nativity of the marquis of Pescara; and we have just now seen how he was censured for it by Martin del Rio. I add another proof of his fondness for Astrology. Having said that these happened revolutions of religion all the world over towards the beginning of the XVIIth century, he ascribes it to the influence of the stars. I will tell this story in the words of Florimond de Remond, because they will acquaint us with a little trick of a translator. 'Almost at the same time, says Jovius, that Ismael possessed the empire of the Persians, and changed the religion, mixing it with a new Mahometan superstition, there arose in Germany under the conduct of Luther that monstrous Heresy, which designed to destroy the Catholic religion, and all that antiquity had received, as the people had done in Persia, bigotted with their new follies and superstitions. Whereupon, says he, I freely acknowledge that it came to pass by a secret power of heaven, and a malignant influence of the stars, that at the same time, all the religions in the universe began to change; since not only the Mahometans, but also the Christians, nay the idolatrous nations that are remotest from us, both in the East-Indies, and in the new world lately discovered in the West, fell into new religions and opinions. This is what the Latin Jovius says. But in the French translation the insincerity of the translator is remarkable; who passes over in silence all that Jovius says of this change of religions, and of that monstrous Lutheran Heresy that sprung up in Saxony: this went to the heart of him. With what faithfulness do they handle the holy and sacred books, who can thus lame, without any shame, the historians that are but just come into the world, only to suppress one word which touches Luther the father of all the Heresies that disturb Christendom (57).' Florimond de Remond cites the thirteenth book of Paul Jovius's history, where I find in fol. 239 verso of the Strasbourg edition 1556, that which follows: 'Nec multo post exarsit in Germania aethore Luthero dira heresis, quæ populis, ut in Perside acciderat, ad infaniam versus, Christiani dogmatis placita, & veteris sacrorum ritus vehementissimè conturbavit. Ita ut facile crediderim ab oculis cæli potestate, malignoque siderum concursu provenisse, ut religiones toto ter-

'ratur orbe enatis factionibus, uno tempore scinde-rentur, quoniam Mahometani modo Christianique, sed & remotissimæ gentes idololatras, aut sydera aut portenta pro Diis venerantes, cum in India quæ ad
 'Orientem vergit, tum in Novo orbe ad Occiduum
 'plagam reperto, novas sacrorum opiniones induerint.'
 I know no other French translator of Paul Jovius's general history besides Denys Sauvage. Was he a Protestant? And would he be guilty of the fraud which Florimond de Remond objected to the Reformed?

[M] It is necessary to enlarge a little upon what I have said of the first work that be published. I have said (58), I. that it was the treatise de Piscibus Romanis; II. that he dated the epistle dedicatory of it the twenty sixth of March 1524; in the third place, that he then proposed to put immediately to the press the first decade of his history. With regard to the first of these facts, I have quoted Herodotus, who has expressly said, illud (scriptum) quod omnium primum edidit de Piscibus Romanis. — That piece which be published the FIRST OF ALL HIS WORKS concerning the Roman fishes. The second fact stood in no need of proof; every one may see it at the bottom of the epistle dedicatory; and I have proved the third by a passage of Paul Jovius. I have raised an objection to myself taken from Alcyonius affirming, in a work printed in the year 1522, that he had seen this historian's first decade. I have answered it as well as I could; but here is a new difficulty. Calcagnini informs us in a letter written from Rome under the Pontificate of Leo X (59), that Paul Jovius's first decade was published. * Paulus Jovius . . . tam luculentem, tam doctam, tam elegantem scribit nobis temporis historiam, cujus decem libros JAM EDIDIT ut pudeat me de homine tam disertum tam indiferte scribere (60) — Paul Jovius writes the history of our time so clearly, so learnedly, and so elegantly, ten books of which he has ALREADY PUBLISHED, that I am ashamed to write with so little eloquence concerning so eloquent a writer. If Calcagnini has good reason to say, that this first decade was printed, Paul Jovius would be guilty of the error charged upon me. It would be in vain to alledge that the date of the epistle dedicatory of the treatise de Piscibus Romanis has been altered by the Printers; for it is certain, however it be, that this epistle was written under Clement VII, who was created Pope in the month of November 1523.

(58) See the remark [G], towards the end.

(59) He died in the year 1521.

(60) Calcagninus, Epist. ad Jacob.
Zieglerum, in Collectione Colomesiana Clari-orum Virorum Epistol. pag. 234.

(57) Florimond
de Remond, Histoire de l'Herefie, livr. i,
cap. iv, pag. m.
24.

(a) Taken from Valerius Andr.
in Topographia Belgica, pag. 43, 44.

(b) Ipra colorandis gens prudentissima lanis.
Will. Britto
Philippid. l.b. ii.

IPRES or YPRES, an episcopal town in the earldom of Flanders, has its name from a river that runs through it. It was at first only a castle. The Normans having destroyed it, count Baudouin the second of the name, ordered it to be repaired in the year 880. Count Arnol fortified it in 901, and count Baudouin III. enlarged it many years after. New additions were made to it from time to time; so that in the year 1473, the town of Ipres included within its wall 1173 measures, each whereof was fourteen geometrical feet. It was besieged by the inhabitants of Ghent, and by the English, in the year 1373, for the space of nine weeks. Its stone walls were built in the year 1388, by the consent of Philip the bold (a). The manufactures and dying of wool were in good perfection there at the end of the XIIth century, as appears by the testimonies of, Guilelmus Britto (b). The French took it in the year 1648, and lost it the year following. They retook it in 1658, and restored it to the Spaniards by the Pyrenean treaty. They retook it once more in the year 1678, and the Spaniards gave it up to them by the treaty of peace concluded at Nimegen the same year. The disputes of Janfenism have rendered the name of the town of Ipres famous; Janfenius being scarce ever mentioned without observing that he was bishop of that town. The relation betwixt that town and the controversies of the Janfenists with the Jesuits, is by this means known to all the world; and hence doubtless came that witty fancy of forging a pretended letter of the king to Mr Arnauld [A], dated from the camp before Ipres in 1678. Several copies of this letter were handed about; and I remember that several persons, who were thought to have a very good judgment, found it ingenious: It was ascribed to Mr Rose secretary of the cabinet. I do not believe it has been printed, and therefore I am willing to publish it.

[A] A pretended letter of the king . . . to Mr Arnauld.] Here it is according to the copy I took of it, at the time it went about as a piece intirely new.

A letter of the king to Mr Arnauld on the siege of Ipres.

‘Monsieur Arnauld. We are going to begin a siege, in which you might do us much service with your interest. I have five propositions to make to the gentlemen of Ipres. The first is, that I am come into Flanders to do good to every body. The second that the command I give them to surrender the town is not impossible. The third, that it is in their power to merit or not merit my favour. The fourth, that I have forces with me more than is sufficient to make them obey my orders; and the fifth, that tho’ they be never so much necessitated to surrender themselves, they will do it with an entire liberty. The Question is therefore to make them sign these five propositions, which include all the treaty of grace, that I design to show them. I do not think, that they can elude my orders by the distinction de Jure, and de Facto (between right and fact). For as to the right, I have been so long used to take towns, that time alone might serve me for a prescription in the ‘Low-Countries, were I destitute of so many other indisputable rights. They can therefore only insist upon the fact, and I will convince them of this by thirty cannons, to which I defy them to answer effectually; for they will pierce through all difficulties. By this you may judge, that I shall not be so long in making them sign my five propositions, as you have been in signing those of the Pope. Wherefore I order you to summon the ban and arriereban of the Janfenists, and to leave Paris immediately to come at the head of them, in order to sing Te Deum, upon the tomb of Janfenius, as a thanksgiving to God, for the happy success of my five propositions. You may for a bon-fire bring a hundred copies of the Miroir de la Pieté Chrétienne, (Mirror of the Christian piety) to cast these good Flemings into a holy despair of ever belonging again to Spain. Afterwards you shall go into England to manage there the lower house, which is very averse to a peace. To conclude, I like your politics, and more still your money, with which you use so advantageously to persuade people to what you have a mind to. Hereby I am sure we shall have a peace with England and Spain, before you have it with the Jesuits. At the camp before Ipres the seventeenth of March 1678.

IRNERIUS (a), a German civilian, lived in the XIIth century. He is said to be the first, that renewed the profession of the Roman law, interrupted ever since the invasion of the Barbarians. He had a great interest in Italy with the princess Mathilda, and having persuaded the emperor Lotharius to order the Code and Digests to be read in the schools, he was the first that exercised that profession in Italy. His method was to reconcile the answers of the Civilians and the laws, that seemed contrary to one another. He died about the year 1190 [A], and was buried at Bologna, where he had been professor (b). The thing is carried farther; for it is said that Lotharius abrogated all other laws, and ordered that Justinian’s law should resume it’s ancient authority at the bar [B]. The famous Calixtus, professor of Divinity at Helmstadt, maintains (c), that this is false, and has been followed in that by the learned Conringius his colleague (d). But Bertold Nihufius wrote for the contrary opinion (e), and rudely handled Dr Calixtus. It is certain that the later has not tradition on his side; and that it makes Irnerius the first

(a) He is also called Wernerus, or Guarnerius.

(b) Ex Fortero, Hist. Juris Civil. Roman. lib. iii. cap. vi.

(c) In libello de Morali Theolog.

(d) Consult the preface to his Origo Juris Germanici, printed in 1643.

(e) See the book which he intitled, Irnerius, published in 1642.

[A] He died about the year 1190.] I can hardly believe that he lived till that time; for in the first place Lotharius II lived but till 1138 at most: which plainly shews that Forterus has been unexact; for he says that the restoration of the Roman law happened about the year 1150 (1). Why then should we think that he has been more exact in his calculation about Irnerius’s death? In the second place this is said to have been done in the year 1133 (2). Now who can believe that a thing of that importance could be executed by the counsels of a young man? It is a hundred times more probable, that Irnerius was successful in his counsels by reason of the great authority he had acquired by his learning and wisdom; and therefore he must have been at least forty years of age. From whence it follows, that if he had lived till the year 1190, he would have lived near 100 years, and in that case Forterus would be inexcusable for not taking notice of so uncommon an age. To which I add, that a chancellor of the emperor is always somewhat elderly. Forterus would be hard put to it, if one should maintain, that Mathilda, with whom he says Irnerius had such an interest, was that countess, who was so liberal to the Popes, and who died in the year 1115, or that queen of Italy who died in the year 1101 (3), and who was the wife of Conrad, the son of the emperor Henry IV, and the daughter of Roger king of Sicily.

During the dispute that arose betwixt Dr Calixtus, and Bertold Nihufius, to know whether our Irnerius renewed the study of the law, by the authority of the counts Mathilda, or by that of the emperor Lotharius II, the university of Bologna was consulted, and answered in favour of Nihufius. We find in their answer, that it is a constant tradition that Irnerius began to teach the law at Bologna in the year 1128: This tradition is supported by the following sentence on Irnerius’s picture, which amongst many others, is to be seen in the college of Bologna: Irnerius omnium primus leges commentatus est anno MCXXVIII. Nicolas Alidofio in the preface of his book intitled, Li Dottori Bolognesi di legge Canonica & Civile, affirms, that this doctor teaching Philosophy at Bologna, received orders from the emperor Lotharius II to teach the Law, and that he began to do it about the year 1128. However there is some ground to believe, that he did it of his own accord, some years together, and that he was not authorized by the emperor’s order till the year 1137 (4). It is certain he died before the year 1150, and not in 1190, for it is known (5) that James de Porta Ravennana was Irnerius’s successor in his professorship of the Civil-Law and that he taught it publicly at Bologna in the year 1150. See the author whom I quote (6).

[B] It is said that Lotharius ordered that Justinian’s law should resume it’s antient authority at the bar. Here is what Mr Heiss says of it in his history of the empire under the year 1133. ‘This solemnity being over, the emperor returned into Germany, where by the advice of one Werner Ursperg, otherwise Irnerius (7), who was very well skilled in the Civil-Law, he ordered that justice should be done in the empire according to the Digests or Code, which had been out of use for five or six hundred years: so that this law was introduced into Italy and Germany, and afterwards into France and Spain, where the people before made use of their own particular laws and customs (8). Calvisius, without mentioning our Werner, says, under the year 1137, that Lotharius found in Apulia the Roman laws, that he gave them

(4) See Nihufius, in Irnerio, pag. 13.

(5) Otto Morena, in Chronologia Laudens. apud Baronium, ad ann. 1158.

(6) Nihufius, in Irnerio, where he has inserted the whole answer of the university of Bologna.

(7) The Dutch edition says Irnerius.

(8) Antea homines jure incerto utebantur, jure nempe Romanorum corrupto, jure item Longobardico & lege Salica. Calvis. Mathia Theat. Hist. pag. 521.

first restorer of the Roman law [C]. It is said moreover, that it was he who moved the emperor Lotharius, whose chancellor he was, to introduce into the universities the creation of doctors, and that he drew up the form of it; from whence it came, that at that very time, Bulgarus, Hugolinus, Martinus, Pileus, and some others, who began to interpret the Roman laws, were solemnly promoted to their doctors degree. It was at Bologna that these fine ceremonies began; from thence they were received by the other universities, and proceeded from the faculty of Law, to that of Divinity. It is pretended, that the university of Paris having adopted this custom, made use of it the first time in behalf of Peter Lombard, who was made doctor of Divinity (f).

(f) Mathias, Theatr. Historic. in Vita Lotharii II.

to the Pisans, and ordered they should be explained, and put into practice in the tribunals of the empire. He adds, that this book was afterwards carried into the library of Florence. Another historian (g) says, this happened when that emperor marched against Roger king of Sicily, about the year 1135, and observes that the manuscript of the Roman laws found in Apulia, wanting to be explained, Irnerius was commissioned for that purpose.

[C] Tradition makes him the first restorer of the Roman law.] This is what an author before cited says of him (10). 'Irnerius primus legibus glossas apposuit, & suo exemplo cæteris illuminandi juris exemplum dedit: unde LUCERNA JURIS dictus fuit & instaurator legum Romanarum cognominatus. Irnerius was the first who wrote any glosses on the laws, and by his example led others to comment upon them, whence he was called the lamp of the law, and was surnamed the restorer of the Roman constitutions.' A great number of writers say the same thing.

(10) Mathias, ubi supra.

(g) Christ. Mathias, ibid. pag. 970. ubi quædam Chytræus, in Chron. pag. 309.

(a) Constantin l'Empereur, Not in Itinerar. Benjam. Tutel. pag. 140, says, that Solomon Jarchi was called Isaacides, & cause he was the son of Rabbi Isaac.

(b) R. Solomon Isaacides.

(c) Bartol. Bibl. Rabbinica, Part. IV, pag. 378.

(d) Taken from Bartolucci, ibid. pag. 378, & seq.

(1) Bartol. Bibl. Rabbin. Part. IV, pag. 378.

(2) Remark [A], of the article JARCHI.

(3) Bartolucci, ubi supra.

(4) See, above, citation (1), of the article JARCHI.

(5) Benjamin. Tutel. Itiner. pag. m. 6.

(6) Const. l'Empereur, Not in Itinerar. Benjam. Tutel. pag. 149.

(a) Allard, Biblioth. de Dauphiné, pag. 223, 224.

ISAACITES (a). Under this name is mentioned the Rabbi Salomon Jarchi, in the Bibliotheca Rabbinica of father Bartolucci. I may therefore put under this name what is wanting in the article JARCHI. I shall therefore observe that the surname Raschi, which was given him, was composed of the initial letters of his names (b), as we learn from father Bartolucci (c). He adds, that this Rabbi was born at Lunir, a town in the province of Aquitaine [A]; but that some make him a native of Troies in France, and place his birth in the year 1105. Isaacites began his travels when he was thirty years of age. He saw Italy, afterwards Greece, Jerusalem, and all Palestine, and then he went into Egypt, where he saw the Rabbi Maimonides. He proceeded into Persia, Tartary, Muscovy, and other northern countries, and at last came into Germany, from whence he came into his own country. He spent six years in these travels. He was married, and had three daughters, who were married to very learned Rabbies, who wrote many books. Some of his commentaries upon the Scripture have been translated into Latin by the Christians [B]. It is said, that he was well skilled in Physic and Astrology, and in several languages, and that he died at Troies, being seventy five years old. His body was carried to Bohemia, and buried at Prague in the year 1180 (d).

[A] Bartolucci says that he was born at Lunir, a town in the province of Aquitaine.] Bartolucci adds, that is a town in which there were Jews, as St Gregory witnesses in the twenty first epistle of the third book (1). All this is full of faults; for in the first place he should have said Lunel, and not Lunir. II. Lunel is not in the province of Aquitaine. III. Pope Gregory does not speak of Lunel, or Lunir, but of Luna, an episcopal see in Italy. See, above (2) the censure of an error of Hoornbeek. Here is another blunder. Ibidem (that is in the Catena Cabalæ) Rabbi Joseph Jacobij Auctor dicit quod natus sit anno ab Orbe condito . . . 4865. Chr. 1105. in Urbe Trevis, seu Trevis (3a) in Gallia in provincia Narbonensi, vel in Linguadoca (3). Which is to pretend, that the town of Troies is in Languedoc, than which nothing can be more ridiculous. Note, that according to some rabbies, our Isaacites died 1105 (4); but we have seen, that according to some other authors, this was the year of his birth. Chronological exactness was never the talent of the Jewish writers; and it is a strange thing they have so ill fixed the time of their most famous doctors. Benjamin Tudelensis (5), who died in the year 1173, highly praises the Jews of Lunel, and names some of their learned men, and among others Rabbi Solomon. Some say, (6), that he means Solomon Jarchi; and if you object, that this Solomon died in the year 1105, they will answer, that Benjamin Tudelensis does not pretend that all the doctors he mentions, speaking of what he saw at Lunel, were alive. I do not like this solution. It seems plain to me, that he speaks of a Solomon that was then alive: We must therefore suppose either that it is a mistake to place the death of Solomon Jarchi in the year 1105, or that the Solomon mentioned by Benjamin Tudelensis, is not our Isaacites. I could easily believe, that Constantin l'Empereur is mistaken, when he says, that Benjamin meant Solomon Jarchi. If he had spoke of a doctor so famous as this was, he would have given him great encomiums, and he gives none to his Solomon. If you would have an instance of the bad Chronology of the Jewish authors, you need only consider, that the same book (7), which makes Rabbi Solomon Isaacites to be born in the year 1105, affirms that Maimonides was born in Spain, in the year 1135, and that these two Rabbies had an interview in Egypt, though Solomon did not go thither till he was about thirty two years old (8). Note, that some (9) maintain, that Rabbi Solomon Isaacites has not the surname of Jarchi in the Jewish books, and that it would be a difficult thing to find the time, the subject, and occasion of that false surname, and that the Jews laugh at the Christian authors for using it.

[3a] Trevis, in the Latin of Bartolucci does not signify the town of Troyes in Champagne, but Treys in Provence. It is true the first is called Trevis in Gregorius Turonensis, but Thuanus who names the other Trevis, calls Tricoffes, the inhabitants of the latter. REM. CRIT.]

[B] Some of his commentaries have been translated into Latin by the Christians.] His commentary upon Joel, and the Canticles, has been put into Latin by Genebrard. He published at Paris, in 1563, the version of the commentary upon Joel, and in 1570, that of the commentary upon the Canticles. Arnaldus Pontacus is the author of the Latin translation of the commentaries upon Obadiah, Jonah, and Zephaniah (10). Henry Aquinas published the commentaries upon Esther, with notes, at Paris, in the year 1522 (11).

(7) Catena Cabalæ. See Bartolucci, ubi supra.

(8) See Bartolucci, ibid.

(9) Andreas Accutius in Tractatu de Aquinamaris maleficiis inferentibus, pag. 3.

(10) Printed at Paris in the year 1656, in 4to.

(11) Taken from Bartolucci, ubi supra, pag. 380, 381.

YSE (ALEXANDER D') Minister of Grenoble, and afterwards professor of Divinity at Die in Dauphiné, (a) was a natural son in a family—of which at present is (b) James d'Yse de Saloon, Counsellor in the Parliament of Grenoble. This minister wrote a discourse for the re-union of the two religions, in which he does not differ much from the principles

(b) Mr. Allard put this in 1650.

ples of the Romish church (c). I shall give some extracts of it [A]. He would have been deposed for that work, if the circumstances of the times had not obliged the synod of that province to observe some temper [B]. The Protestants were satisfied with the declaration that Mr d'Yfe made before he died (d). The law-suit that was entered against him, on account of the money which had been raised for the Vaudois, was not attended with the troublesome and disgraceful consequences, that a Catholic writer has published [C].

I learned

[A] I shall give some extracts of it.] This work is intitled, Propositions & moyens pour parvenir à la réunion des deux Religions en France. — Propositions and methods for re-uniting the two religions in France. The impression was finished the last of August, 1677. It contains six hundred and eight pages in 4to, and is divided into two parts. The author enlarges in the first, upon five considerations, which tend to incline the parties to mutual abatements, and the second gives a long catalogue of the articles which they might agree in.

(1) Proposit. & Moiens, pag. 185.

(2) Alb. Graue-rus, cap. iii, Pole-mice Sacrae.

(3) Tobias Wagner, doctor of Divinity at Tubingen, Inquisit. Theol.
in Acta Henrica.

(4) See page 326,
of the Propositions & Moiens.

(5) *Le bis Sytem-
de l'Eglise.*

(6) Proposit. &
Moiens, p. 331.

(7) Page 209.

(8) Ibid. pag.
366.

(9) Ibid. pag.
379.

He cites (1) a Lutheran (2), who maintained that the Calvinists fight with a shadow, when they confute a local presence of JESUS CHRIST, and a natural manducation in the Lord's-supper. He cites another (3), who denies the same presence and manducation, and maintains, that the body of JESUS CHRIST enters into the mouth, but not into the stomach. This Lutheran (4) confesses, that the Calvinists receive the saving fruit of the sacrament, provided they be morally in an invincible ignorance of their errors, but not if they continue in them against their conscience, and with obstinacy. Mr d'Yfe makes several reflexions upon the pacifical method of Father Maimbourg, and upon this objection, viz. that it follows from the doctrine of the Calvinists, that all the Christians, who have not followed Peter Valdo, John Hus, &c. are damned. His answers are almost the same with those of Mr Jurieu (5), both with respect to the expedients of salvation, afforded to many persons who inwardly renounced their errors, and with respect to the consequence that is drawn in favour of those, who inwardly rejecting the false doctrines of Popery, remain still in it's communion. To which purpose he speaks of the permission granted to Naaman, and of a national synod held at Paris, in the year 1559, which forbids to follow one's master into the Popish churches, tho' one does not bend the knee, and yet declares, that those may be tolerated, who, like Naaman, and the duke of Saxony, publicly express, 'that they will not pollute and defile themselves with the idolatries, which are committed in the temples they frequent (6).' He says, that according to the Reformed, the universal church cannot err so far as to overthrow the articles of faith that are absolutely necessary to salvation, and that if the thing be well considered, it will be found, that the Roman Catholics, whatever noise they make about it, ascribe a lesser infallibility to the church, than the Protestants; for, says he, cardinal Richelieu, book 2, chap. 2, insinuates, that the universal church may err in fundamental points. He imputes to some Protestant divines an error which he calls a fundamental one, which is not to receive St John's Revelation, as a canonical book, and he confesses, that the primitive church did not receive it as canonical. It is true, he pretends, that that church erred out of ignorance, and not knowing the truth, but not out of obstinacy, and denying it. The church, according to that cardinal, has been ignorant of some truths, which she came to know in time, and defined afterwards as points of faith. The author adds, that in the references of the second session of the council of Trent, we find this question, 'Whether general councils lawfully assembled, may err in the decision of points of faith.' The answer was, It is a doubtful thing. Touching again upon this in the 441st page, he says, that several doctors are there cited for the affirmative, and others for the negative. He had said before (7), that the councils of Lateran, in 1180, and 1215, and some others, have been held pro Ecclesie reformatione in fide & moribus. He observes (8), that the Monks promising, according to the Roman pontifical, to observe a perpetual continence, as far as human frailty will permit, it is a proof that their vow is conditional; so that when the frailty of their nature will not permit them to preserve their continence, they may marry without breaking their vow. He boasts (9) of alleging nothing that is condescending on the part of the Catholics, but what is grounded on the doctrine of Thomas Aquinas, and other grave doctors, and that the condescension he uses on the part of the Reformed, is grounded on what has been confessed by Calvin, and some other famous writers. From whence he infers, that private persons in both communions, who would not submit to the like condescensions, would be unreasonable. He produces hereupon the praises that some Popes, and some illustrious societies have bestowed upon Thomas Aquinas's doctrine; and as for the particular doctors, who have praised him, he refers us to a book, intitled, The Disputation of the University of Complutum on Dialectics. He mentions also the approbations given to cardinal Richelieu's and the bishop of Condom's books, and proves, that Calvin, Thomas Aquinas, &c. have made the concessions he speaks of. He shews, that Calvin, Rivetus, and Bucanus, held the probability of the doctrine of a guardian angel; and as for what concerns the possibility of celibacy, he cites the national synod of Rochelle, 1571, which advises the wives of ecclesiastics relapsed into Popery, to have no commerce with them. That of Vitrai, 1588, does not approve that a man whose wife is become leprous, should marry another. They advise him to pray to God, and to contain himself during his wife's life.

Though this book was printed with the consent of some considerable persons, the Monks obtained, that the copies of it should be carried to the rolls of the Chatelet. They had seen some of them at a Binder's, and they made a great bustle about it. It is at least a piece of news, which was written to me in the year 1678, by a curious person, who was well informed of what concerns the Republic of Letters.

I make no doubt, that the fragments I have inserted in this place, will be acceptable to the readers, because it is a book but little known, and almost impossible to be met with.

[B] The circumstances of the times obliged the synod of that province to observe some temper.] D'Yfe, who had been a minister at Grenoble, and who was actually professor of Divinity at Die, wrote a treatise upon this subject, and imagined he had found the means of a perfect reconciliation. However his project had not the good luck to please the synod of his province, which forbid him to publish or communicate it. But D'Yfe prepossessed with the flatteries of President de la Berchere, who filled him with hopes of great rewards, and mighty things, would not believe the synod. He took a journey to Paris, with several recommendations from the President to the chief members of the council. The ministers of the place having had notice of his design, endeavoured to have a sight of his book, in order to discourage him from publishing it. They could obtain nothing. D'Yfe would not communicate it to them, but shewed it to the bishop of Condom. That piece could not please the Catholics, because the author made them too condescending; and under other expressions, kept most of the articles of the reformed doctrine: so that he returned without any approbation and recompence; having offended his brethren without gaining the good-will of their enemies. Nay, he was like to be involved in some criminal affairs, to pay him for his good intentions; but the President, his protector, screened him. As for the synod, they durst not meddle with him upon that account, at a time when it was believed the court would be displeased with it. Without deposing him therefore, a treaty was made with him, by which he was suffered to enjoy his Professor's salary, but by way of discharge, he was deprived of the functions. He died some time after, and repaired the fault he had committed on that occasion, by a declaration of his sentiments, which was very edifying (10).

[C] The law-suit was not attended with the troublesome and disgraceful consequences, which a Catholic writer has published.] Mr Bernard (11) affirmed, that when the duke of Savoy made war with his subjects of the vallies of Piedmont, the Reformed had raised a sum of six or seven hundred thousand livres, which

(c) Allard, ubi
supra, pag. 224.

(d) See end of the remark [B].

(10) Hist. de
l'Edit. de Nantes,
Tom. III, Part.
II, livr. xv, pag.
350, ad ann.
1677.

(11) Bernard, Explication de
l'Edit. de Nantes,
apud Hist. de
l'Edit. de Nantes,
ubi supra, Tom.
III, livr. xi,
pag. 60, ad ann.
1666.

I learned from a letter which I received in 1678, that Mr Cregut had published an Apology, in which he painted this minister in very black colours [D].

I add

which D'Yfe had received, and distributed; that he did not well discharge that administration; that he was prosecuted in the chamber of Grenoble to bring him to an account; that the consistory, in order to put an end to the noise that was made about it, were forced to depose him; that they made him Principal of the college of Die, and named four ministers to revise his accounts. There is nothing true in all this, except this one article, that D'Yfe had received the money designed for the relief of the inhabitants of the valleys, and that they took this opportunity to bring him into trouble, out of resentment and revenge. You will find the sequel of this affair in the History of the Edict of Nantes. I shall only mention three or four particulars out it. D'Yfe delivered his accounts towards the end of the year 1656. President Perissol prosecuted him in the year 1665. This prosecution was carried on by degrees to the court made up of Protestant and Catholic judges. D'Yfe had his cause pleaded in the court, and gained his point. The President enraged at this affront, prosecuted the cause still more violently, and his menaces, which neither the intreaties of his colleagues, nor the remonstrances of the consistory, nor the solicitations of the whole church, could put a stop to, obliged the consistory not to depose D'Yfe, but to send him to Die in quality of professor of Divinity. He had already performed the duties of that place, whilst Cregut was forced, by the persecution of the bishop, to leave his professorship. In the mean time the cause was removed into the court of Castrès; and the President incited as much as possible the inhabitants of the valleys to carry on the action against him. The consistory made him give a new account, to put an end to that scandal; and they found but one article, amounting scarce to a denier per livre of the whole sum, which he could not well account for. But his honesty appeared, &c. (12). The words which I suppress inform us, that he was only guilty of a little negligence; which was well for him, and he ought to be accounted a happy man for having failed only in that; for the handling of such public gatherings is so dangerous an occasion of sinning, that a wise man ought never to engage in it, before he has made a frequent trial of his strength. The custody of this money is perhaps more difficult than that of a beautiful woman. The comparison betwixt money and pitch, which is so common even among countrymen, is a very good one; one can hardly handle that fatal metal, any more than pitch, without soiling one's fingers. There was a terrible out-cry (13) against the ill management of the immense sums (14), which were raised for the Vaudois; and I believe that, in all such cases, there has been, and there will be, occasion to cry out; O how rare a thing it is to find a man who is not made of iron with respect to that loadstone.

(12) Hist. de l'Edit. de Nantes, ubi supra, pag. 61.

(13) See Mr Leti, Critique sur les Loteries, Part. II, pag. 108, & seq.

(14) The author of the History of the Edict of Nantes, denies that the money raised in France, amounted to six or seven hundred thousand livres, as Bernard will have it. It was at most, says he, but the third part of all the several sums, and all the sums did not amount to five hundred thirty thousand livres. Mr Leti, ibid. pag. 110, says they amounted to three millions, and those of France to seven hundred fifty thousand livres.

(15) Horat. Od. ix, lib. 19.

(16) Idem, Od. ii, lib. ii.

Abstinentes ducentis ad se cuncta pecuniae (15).

From gold abstaining; gold, that draws,
And subjects all things to it's laws.

We must seek for him with Diogenes's lantern, and if we design a crown for him, we may keep it long enough before we can find a man that deserves it.

Regnum & diadema tutum
Deferens uni, propriamque laurum;
Quisquis ingentes oculo irretorto Spectat acervos (16).

Decreeing for that man alone
The crown, the laurel, and the throne,
Who can with unaverted eye
See heaps of shining metal lie.

[D] Mr Cregut had published an apology in which he painted this minister in very black colours. It fell into my hands but a few days ago: the title of it is: Apologia necessaria non minus quam requissima Antonii Creguti, contra accusationem imprævisam, in expectatam & iniquam Friderici Spanhemii Professoris Leydensis.

It was printed at Amsterdam, in the year 1678, and contains forty eight pages, in 8vo. Mr Cregut (17) shews, that after the death of Stephen Blanc, who had been professor of Divinity at Die, the academical senate charged Mr D'Yfe, the minister of the place, to fill the vacancy of the deceased till the next synod. Mr D'Yfe did so. The synod of the year following convened at Die, chose Antony Cregut (18), professor of Divinity. This choice was conditional, and became definitive at the end of the year, by the judgment of the synod of Pragelas. Mr D'Yfe, who did the more earnestly desire that place, because he had discharged the duties of it for some time, thwarted, as much as possible, the election of another; but not succeeding, he grew extremely jealous of Mr Cregut, and fought all imaginable means to prejudice him, though he always pretended to be his friend. He contributed, by his intrigues, to put a stop at Geneva, to the impression of a Latin book of Mr Cregut (19), under pretence that the doctrine of it was false, and very dangerous. The author of it desired, that the examination of his book should be made only by the professors of Geneva, that the whole matter might be transacted with less noise, and more judgment and expedition; but his request was rejected, and his work was examined in the assembly of all the ministers. He expected no good from it, and remembered the complaint of the emperor Adrian: The multitude of Physicians has destroyed me. Turba medicorum me perdidit. They condemned two or three of his doctrines: this condemnation was communicated by his adversary to the ministers of the Grefivaudan (20) assembled in a body, and from that time, prejudices grew so violent against the author, that he was threatened with deposition the next synod, which was to be held at Die. Mr D'Yfe not doubting that the quality of moderator of that synod, would powerfully enable him to execute his resolutions, desired to obtain it, and actually did. The first accusation, concerned the assertions about Grace, which Mr Cregut had published. He offered his reasons, and thought he had nothing to fear, when he saw the end of that first proceeding; but he was mistaken; for some days after Mr D'Yfe having declared to the synod, that the ministers of Geneva had censured some articles of the Revelator Arcanorum of Mr Cregut, put some questions to the author about the doctrine of the imputation of Adam's sin. Mr Cregut was going to explain that matter; but he was presently interrupted, upon pretence, that there was some other affairs which could not be put off. He waited for another opportunity to explain himself in the following sessions, in case that dispute should be set on foot again; but he waited in vain. Mr D'Yfe plaid his part so maliciously, that he got his adversary condemned, without giving him an opportunity to plead his cause. There was a famous disputation in the Philosophy-school. The Jesuits of that town, and several other persons of the Romish clergy, were present at it, and it was very necessary that Mr Cregut, as rector of the university, should be there. Mr d'Yfe took that opportunity, drew up an act of condemnation, and got it approved at the end of the synod. Part of the ministers were already gone, and the rest were very desirous to stay no longer. If the absence of some members is favourable to those who have an ill design the disposition of the rest who desire to go home, is so too; for being in haste to finish what remains, every thing is carried on in a hurry. Thus you see how innocence was oppressed, as Mr Cregut pretends. Illo tempore (21) me absente, inaudito, iusto deputatis silentio, sub sinu Synodi, dum omnia tumultuario fiunt, Pastoribus tunc vel absentibus, vel abiturientibus Dicitur ipse bellum illum articulum non mihi, sed sibi ludibrium propinans, fabricavit, assumptum in tanto facinore suo Achate Rainaudo, digno patellæ operculo (22). He adds, that they ordered a great number of copies of that act to be made, to communicate them to all the Protestant world. Verum illis non sufficiebat calumniosus articulus intra privatos parietes fabricatus ab inimicis, haud potuit satiari invidia maligna, nisi per totum Orbem Reformatum exemplaria illius articuli mitterentur, tam in Galliam quam exteras nationes, Helvetiam, Germaniam, (17) Cregutus, Apol. Necessaria, pag. 11, & seq.

(18) He was minister at Montelimart.

(19) Intitul'd, Revelator Arcanorum.

(20) A country near Grenoble, and one of the Citizens of the Reformed province of Dauphiné, in the Protestants.

(21) That is, whilst he was present at the public disputation, as rector of the university.

(22) Cregut, ibid. super, pag. 15.

I add, that the churches of the vallies of Piedmont sent him into England in Cromwell's time, to remove some difficulties concerning the collections of money made for the Vaudois; and that he was present in the national synod of Loudun, as deputy of the province of Dauphiné (c).

(a) Taken from Histoire des Eglises Vaudoises, published by John Leger, at Leyden, in 1569, pag. 205, of the second part.

(23) Id. ibid.

'maniam, Hollandiam, &c. Pædagogis suis jugiter occupatis ut plura Apographa describerent (23).' In fine, he says, that his book having been sold, without any alteration made in it, ruined the trophies of his enemy, and convicted him of having extracted something out of it, that manifested his envy and rascals. 'Paulo post libro meo edito abique vel apiculis immutatione, abortivus ac furivus ille Dizii articulus cecidit coram meo Revelatore, sicut Dagon coram arca fœderis. Et ne plura exempla proferam, unum Rev. Antistitis Ecclesiæ Bernensis D. Homelii erit mihi pro cunctis, dum essem Bernæ in illius Musæo protulit sua Bibliotheca meum Revelatorem Arcan. & Dizii prævè & stolidè articulatulum articulum arthritide laborantem, & dixit se contulisse cum locis Revelatoris, quem tunc præ manibus habebat, unde facta etiam inter nos collatione non poterat satis mirari stuporem, virus & invidiam compilatoris (24). — Soon after my book had been published without the alteration even of an accent, the abortive and stolen work of D'Yse fell before my Revelator, like Dagon before the ark of the covenant. And, not to multiply examples, I will be satisfied with that alone of Homelius, Antistes of Bern's who, when I was at Bern in his Musæum, brought out of his library my Revelator Arcanorum, and D'Yse's filthy lame performance, and said he had compared it with

'the passages of the Revelator, which he had then in his hand; upon which comparison between us, he could not sufficiently wonder at the stupidity, malice, and envy of the compiler.' He says (25), that having explained in some letters, the sense of his propositions, and offered new explications, if those already published were not sufficient, the divines of Geneva, permitted the impression of the Revelator Arcanorum, and took off the prohibition of selling the Theſes maintained at Die. He is contented to mention in general; the great trial above mentioned (26); but he says that Mr d'Yse being shamefully expelled from the church of Grenoble, was admitted again into that of Die. Ex Ecclesia Gratianopolitana turpissime ejecti Ut Dizius fuerat potius intrusus quam vocatus, ita detrusus fuit. Non inquiri de crimine quod objiciebatur, esset piacular. Deus novit. Acta sunt publice in Parlamento litigata, quæ ad has usque Oras pervenerunt Læu Maris a Naufragio servatus, Galli nostri vulgo dicunt, d'un coup de vent ou de tempeste, pristinas sedes recuperavit, in Portum Dienſem appellens ubi antea Minister fuerat, ibi cum suo Rainaudo, juxta meminisse laborum præteritorum (27).

(25) Id. ibid. pag. 30.

(26) In the remark [C].

(27) Cregut, Apol. Necessaria pag. 30, 31.

I do not vouch for the truth of these particulars alleging them only as a proof of my text, viz. that Mr Cregut has painted Mr d'Yse in very black colours.

(24) Id. ibid. pag. 27.

ISLEBIANS. Thus they are called, who embraced the opinions of a Saxon divine, named John Agricola, a native of Eisleben, and a disciple and countryman of Martin Luther. I have spoke very largely of this JOHN AGRICOLA (a). He taught for some time a very false doctrine concerning the use of the Mosaiical law. He mistook St Paul's dispute against the Jews, and the opposition which this great apostle of Grace so often made betwixt the œconomy of works, and the œconomy of faith. Luther did so vigorously oppose the errors of Agricola, that he forced him to recant. Every one may know, why the name of Antinomians was given to the followers of this man. Their opinions have not been faithfully represented by their adversaries; and there's no doubt but that Prateolus has much exaggerated what he says of them [A]. But this is nothing, if compared with Garasse's scurrility in his account of the pretended heresies of the Islebiens [B].

(a) See his article, at the letter [A], pag. 140.

(1) Prateolus, in Elencho Hæreticorum, voce Antinomi, pag. m. 41. He says Staphylus took this from Agricola's notes upon the Gospel of St John, and from Luther's Antinomian disputes.

[A] Prateolus has much exaggerated what he says of them. He did not go to the fountain head, but only copied Staphylus, Hofius, and Lindanus. What he copies from Staphylus, may be reduced to this (1), that according to John Agricola, the law of God is altogether useless, that it is neither necessary before nor after our justification, and that men under the gospel are not obliged to good works. What he takes from Lindanus, is much harsher: viz. that according to John Agricola, men may be righteous against their consciences; and that an adulterer, an usurer, a fornicator, or any such great sinner, shall be saved, provided he believe. Antinomi à Johanne Islebio Lutheri cive ac discipulo exorti. Hi dogma sequuntur legibus divinis contrarium (ait Querela Lutheri) legem operum rejicientes, finguntque homines contra conscientiam justos esse. Aiant enim, teste Lutero lib. de Conciliis; si es Adulter, Scortator, Usurarius, Avarus, aut alius pollutus peccatis, si tantum credis, salvus es. Haftenus Lindanus (2). I cannot believe this is a faithful account of Agricola's opinions.

(2) Prateolus, ibid.

[B] Garasse's scurrility in his account of the pretended heresies of the Islebiens. It is an useful thing to let the reader see how bold some men are in their slanders; and therefore the length of this passage will not hinder me from inserting it here. 'The Islebiens, or Antinomians, otherwise called Nomomachi, forasmuch as they oppose the law of Moses, saying, in their articles of faith, that it is the torment of our souls, are the disciples of a certain labourer, called Joannes Islebius, who, coming from the tail of the plough, Tridus se Theologum professus est, as Melanchthon speaks, writing against him. The principal reveries of these upstarts are to be found in the book de Libertate Christiana, written by Dr Paul Crellius, who was one of the chief supporters of that cursed sect. I will only produce three of the most remarkable, taken word for word from their articles of faith. The first imports, that the gospel, and the Old Testament, unless they are preached viva voce, sunt veteres calcei in angulo derelicti, are like old shoes thrown by in a corner, when they can be no longer worn. But when the gospel is preached, then it becomes like the shoes mentioned in the Canticles, Quam pulchri sunt gressus tui in calcamentis tuis, filia principis; — (How beautiful are thy feet with shoes, O princes daughter!) and in the CVIIIth psalm: In Idumeam extendam calcamentum meum. That is according to Beza's exposition:

Contre Edom peuple glorieux
Je jetteray mes solliers vieux.

. my shoe
On Edom will I cast.

'So that in their way of speaking, preachers are Cobblers, the holy Scriptures are old shoes; the pulpit, the shop wherein they are kept, and Lent and Advent the old shoes-fair.

'The second proposition of the Antinomians is still more horrible; and I am very sorry my words cannot express the weight of my thoughts: It is expressed in these terms by Dr Crellius: Qui querit salutem in veteri lege querit P E D I C U L U M I N S C A B I E. He that seeks his salvation in the law of Moses, and the Old Testament, seeks a LOUSE in a S C A B, that is to say that the Salvation of our souls is like LICE and GOD is like a S C A B. I want words to express my astonishment . . . (3).

'The third maxim of the Nomomachi is quoted by Dr Crellius, in these words, Moses ad cor vos abeat cum lege sua, nam si non respicit, est damnatus

(3) Garasse, Curious Doctrine, book v, sect. xvi, pag. 557.

* natus ad omnes Diabolo. — Let Moses be banded with his law, for if he did not repent he is damned to the pit of hell. I appeal from the sentence of the Antinomians, as being Moses's advocate, and I find the Antinomian madness far exceeding that of the Manichees; for when they rejected Moses, they pretended to have more honourable pretences, as St Austin relates in the fifteenth book against Faustus. Being asked why they rejected the Old Testament and the law of Moses, they answered, with specious words, and well adjusted phrases, that they therein practised the command of Jesus Christ, who forbade his Apostles to put new wine into old vessels: and that their church was like a young damsel, who receives no letters or Billetts doux from her old lovers, that endeavour to corrupt her by

* promises: that is to say, their church neither receives nor acknowledges the old Testament, which is an old decayed wine, an old piece of tattered cloth, an old cast-off lover. And then they added as in triumph and insulting our church: Vos quidem pergitis agere ut cepistis, rudem pannum veteri vestimento committite, novum vinum veteris utribus credite, duobus maritis nulli placituri servite, Christianam fidem Hippocentaurum facite, nec equum perfectum nec hominem: Nobis soli Christo servire permittite. Who, hearing this delicious impudence, these bewitching words, would not say, here are pious and holy souls; but it appears at the bottom, that the Manichees were meer scoundrels. It is true that as great scoundrels as they were, they had not so many lice, as the Antinomians (4).

(4) Id. ibid. pag. 559.

ITALICA, a town in Spain, was so called when Scipio Africanus gave it the form of a city (a). It grew very considerable, and was the birth-place of Trajan and Hadrian (b). It enjoyed a long time (c) the privileges of those towns which were called Municipia, and afterwards it desired to be in the same condition with those which they called colonies. Hadrian wondered it should desire this change (d); for he looked upon the privileges of a municipium, as preferable to those of a colony. Nothing remains of Italica but the ruins of it (e). Some authors place it near Seville in a place which at present is called Sivilla la Veja (f). I have said in another place (g), that it did not appear to me, that it could be proved there ever was such a town in Italy as Italica. I do not retract what I said, though I know a very specious objection may be made against it [A].

(a) Appian. in Ibericis, pag. m. 464.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Aulus Gellius, lib. xvi, cap. xiii.

(d) Id. ibid.

(e) See Ludovicus Nonnius in Hispania, cap. xvii, pag. m. 64.

(f) Id. ibid. pag. 65.

(g) See remark [A], of the article HADRIAN (PUBLIUS AELIUS).

[A] I know that a very specious objection may be made against it. It is grounded upon a passage in Strabo, where we find that some people of Italy rising and confederating to make war against the Romans, made Corfinium their place of arms, and named it Italica. Μετονομασθεσαν Ἰταλικὴν, Italicae nomen indiderunt (1). Note, that Corfinium was the capital town of the Peligni, and that this war was that which was called Bellum Sociale or Marsicum, or Italicum, and which began in the year of Rome 662 (2). It is very probable, that in these words of Diodorus Siculus, τὴν κοινὴν πόλιν Ἰταλικὴν ὀνομάσαντες (3), it ought to be read Ἰταλικὴν (4), and not Ἰταλίαν. Thus you see two good authors who witness, that the town of Corfinium was called Italica, when these people confederated against Rome. Velleius Paterculus might be alleged as a third witness, caput imperii sui Corfinium leverant, says he (5), quod appellarent Italicum. There are some critics (6), who read quod appellarent

(1) Strabo, lib. v, pag. m. 167.

(2) See Sigonius, in Fastis, ad ann. 662.

(3) In Excerptis lib. xxxvii, apud Photium.

(4) See Casaubon, in Strabo, lib. v, pag. m. 94.

(5) Vell. Patere. lib. ii, cap. xvi.

(6) Gerard. Vossius, Nor. in Patercul. ibid.

Italicam. Others (7) keep to Italicum. It matters not with me; the answer I have to make, does not want the more favourable eading; for this is what I have to say. The name of Italica, which the allies gave the town of Corfinium, lasted no longer than the war: they gave it a new name, when they chose it their common metropolis. They established in it (8) a policy like that of Rome, whereby they shewed not only their emulation for the capital city of the Roman people, but also their resolution to make themselves independent. Since then the new name of Italica was a consequence and a monument of their conspiracy, it is not likely that the Romans would suffer it to remain. Corfinium resumed its former name, when the war was finished in the year of Rome 664, and we do not find that it was called otherwise than Corfinium, since that time. Whence the error of those appears, who pretend that the poet Silius Italicus was a native of Corfinium, and for that reason surnamed Italicus.

(7) Sigonius, de ant. Jure Italicæ, lib. iii, cap. i, fol. m. 100. Boetius. Patere. ibid.

(8) See Sigonius, ubi supra.

JUBA. History makes mention of two princes of this name, whereof one was the father of the other. Moreri has spoken of them; but he has committed some faults [A], which

[A] Mr Moreri . . . has committed some faults. I. He says that Juba, the father, was king of Mauritania: This is false. In this Juba's time, the Mauritania Caesariensis belonged to Bocchus, and the Tingitana to Bogud. Some time after, that is, in the year 716, Bocchus possessed himself of the Tingitana. After his death his kingdom was reduced into a province in the year 721, as Numidia had been under Julius Cæsar (1). II. He says, that Juba, the son, was restored by Augustus to the kingdom of his father, that is to say, to Numidia. He should have said with Dion (2), that Augustus gave him some parts of Getulia, and the two Mauritania's; and that the best part of Numidia remained still a Roman province. It is true that Strabo affirms (3) that Augustus restored Juba to the kingdom of his father, and that moreover he granted him Mauritania; but this Geographer limits the Roman province and the kingdom of Juba in such a manner as shews (4) that Numidia belonged to the Romans. III. Moreri makes Pliny say, that Juba, the son, found an herb, which his Physician Euphorbia called by his name Euphorbia. This is not what Pliny says; his words are (5): Invenit et patrum nostrorum ætate rex Juba, quam appellavit Euphorbiam Medici sui nomine. The meaning of which is, that Juba found an herb, which from the name of his Physician, he called Euphorbia. It would be somewhat strange that a Physician to the king should have been so bad a courtier, as to give his own name to an herb, which the king his master had found. Yet this is what Pliny

(1) You will find all this proved in Father Nori's Cenotaphia Pisanæ, pag. 235.

(2) Lib. liii, ad ann. 729.

(3) Lib. xvii, pag. 570.

(4) See Father Nori, ubi supra.

(5) Plin. lib. xxv, cap. vii, pag. m. 400.

affirmed, if we believe Moreri. It would be much less strange, that a king, who discovers an herb should chose rather to give it the name of his Physician than his own. Which is what Juba did, if we depend on the testimony of Pliny whom I have cited; but there is reason to believe, that Pliny has not been so exact here as he ought to have been. What he says in another book is more credible, namely that Euphorbia was so called from the name of its discoverer, who was the Physician of king Juba. He adds a thing, which well deserved that Moreri should take notice of it: which is, that Juba wrote a particular treatise upon this herb, in which he extolled the singular virtues of it. Juba Ptolemæi pater, qui prius memorabilior etiam, quam regno, similia prodidit de Atlante: præterque gigni ibi herbam Euphorbiam nomine ab inventore medico suo appellatam. Cuius lacteum succum miris laudibus celebrat in claritate visus, contraque serpentes, & venena omnia, privatum dicato volumine (6). — *Juba, father of Ptolemæus, who before reigned over both Mauritania's, more famous as a learned man than as a king, gave the same account of Atlas: and besides, that there grew there the herb Euphorbia, so called from his Physician, who discovered it. The milky juice of which herb he wonderfully extols as an antidote against the venom of serpents, and all kinds of poison.* IV. I might observe as one fault Moreri's false quotations (7).

(6) Plin. lib. vi, cap. i, fol. fin. pag. m. 527.

(7) He quotes Dion, in the forty first book, seq. But he should have quoted the forty third. He quotes Pliny, lib. xxv, cap. i, he should have quoted the third and fourth books. He should have quoted the second book of Strabo, and the first of Ptolemæus.

[B] I shall

which it is not improper to take notice of. I shall rectify but a few faults of other authors [B].

[B] I shall rectify but a few faults of other authors.]

It seems Josephus says that Juba, the son, had to wife Glaphyra, the widow of one of the sons of Herod. See this woman's article (8) where we confute this. Father Salian thought that Juba died in the 759th year of Rome. Father Noris (9) has invincibly confuted him by this observation; Strabo wrote his thirteenth book a little after the year 771. Now in his seventeenth book he speaks of Juba, as of a prince lately dead; Juba therefore did not die before the year 772, or thereabout. The same Strabo says elsewhere (10) that Juba lived in the reign of Tiberius. Now Tiberius began his reign but in the year 767. It seems that one may infer from a passage of Tacitus, that Juba was yet alive in the year 776 (11). Noldius is mistaken in supposing, that Dion says that Augustus gave Egypt to Juba, besides the kingdom of his father (12). There is nothing in Dion's words, that obliges us to refer the word ταύτην to Egypt, and it is certain it must be referred to the word Cleopatra. Dion's translator has miserably blundered. *Ἡ τε Κλεοπάτρα Ἰούδα τῇ τῆ Ἰούδα πατρὶς συνῆκε. τὴν γὰρ ὁ Καίσαρ τεφέντι τε ἐν τῇ Ἰταλίᾳ, καὶ συζευταμένην οἱ ταύτην τὴν καὶ τὴν βασιλείαν τὴν πατρὶαν ἔδωκε. Cleopatra autem Juba filia in matrimonium tradita est. Hunc Jubaem Caesar in Italia educatum, ac suam militiam secutum, hoc regno (read ea, Cleopatra scilicet) & paterno etiam donavit (13). Noldius citing the passage, in which Dion says (14) that Juba, instead of his father's kingdom, received of Augustus some parts of Getulia, and the dominions of Bocchus and Bogud, observes that Pliny has justly substituted in the room of those dominions, both the Mauritania. Pro quibus rectè Plinius Hist. Nat. V. c. 1. utramque Mauritaniam substituit, hoc est Cæsariensem & Tingitanam. Which is clearly to innuuate this falsity, viz. that these two Mauritania's and the dominions mentioned by Dion, were not the same thing.*

JUDEX (MATTHEW) one of the principal writers of the Centuries of Magdeburg, was born at Tippolswald (a) in Misnia the twenty second (b) of September 1528. He shewed a great inclination for learning, upon which his father permitted him to go and study at Dresden. He staid not there long, but chose rather to study in the college of Wittemberg, and afterwards in that of Magdeburg: He was in a wretched condition, when he came to this last town, being over-run with the itch, and without money. The way he took to live, was to beg alms by fingering from door to door; but after he was known to be a hopeful young man, he was preferred to a tutor's place in the house of an advocate, who sent him with his son to Wittemberg in the year 1546. He there took his master of arts degree, in October 1549. After which he returned to Magdeburg, and there taught the second class some years; and afterwards he was minister of the church of St Ulric till the year 1559. He quitted not that employment till he went to be professor of Divinity, in the university of Jena. He continued in that professorship only eighteen months; for that place was taken from him by order of John Frederic duke of Saxony, in the beginning of October 1561. He stayed still half a year at Jena; and then spending almost as much time at Magdeburg, he retired to Wismar. He died the fifteenth of May 1564 [A] at Rostoc, whither he went a few days before to assist at the promotion of scholars. He was a man of good morals, laborious, zealous, learned, and he wrote several books [B]. He had many persecutions and vexations to go

[A] He died the fifteenth of May 1564.] I should not make a remark upon this, if it were not to say, that authors are very careless with respect to the dates of the death of persons, and other computations. I find in Paul Freherus's Theatrum (1) that our Judex died the eleventh of June 1564. This date is alledged upon the credit of the Nomenclator Professorum Lenensium, written by Hadrian Beyer. Mr Sagittarius (2) citing the same Nomenclator, places Judex's death on the same day as Paul Freherus: but I see in Micælius (3) this death placed in the year 1587, which was the seventy ninth year of the deceased. There is in the margin, Freher, p. 202. It is hard to conceive, how such an unfaithful quotation could creep into that place; and note, that Judex would not have lived seventy nine years, though he had lived till 1587, for he was born in 1528. It is affirmed in his life (4), that his death was the more regretted, because he had not lived above thirty seven years. This calculation is not right; for since his birth was placed on the twenty second of December 1528, and his death on the fifteenth of May 1564, it should have been said that he was not yet thirty six years old.

[B] He was a man of good morals . . . and wrote several books.] He was of such sobriety, as not to eat so much in a week, as others, but of a moderate stomach, eat in two days; and his best friends could never obtain of him to drink more than to satisfy his thirst (5). He was so averse to pomp and luxury, that on his wedding-day he would not consent, that his wife should dress herself finely, and obliged her to content herself with very ordinary cloaths (6). His chastity was so great, that, before he married, some people thought that he was of a frigid or insensible constitution; and he confessed privately to his intimate friends, that he believed the cause of his ill state of health, or at least, that what increased his infirmities, was his staying too long before he married.

Ante legitimum conjugium adeo pudice vixit, ut à nonnullis frigidus sit judicatus, ac ipse intimis sit confessus, se judicare originem aut certe non leve suae adversae valetudinis incrementum inde existeret, quod non prius duxisset uxorem (7). Yet he was married at twenty six years of age (8), when he was called to be minister of the church of St Ulric at Magdeburg. He married a maid of fifteen or sixteen years of age, who was not rich. Some of his friends were angry, that he had married a wife who had neither years nor money enough; but he answered them, that he had always begged of GOD a wife, unexperienced in evil things, tractable, free from pride, &c. Egrius tuleret amicorum quidam, quod juvenulam & minus dotatam sibi jungeret virginem, sed iis respondit, se ab adolescentia assidue petisse à Deo, ut puellam bonis progeneret, honestè educatam, virtutibus & pietate ornatam, malarum rerum aetate adhuc imperitam, & morigeram potius, quam natalibus elatam, delicatâ & blandâ educatione ac conversatione malâ depravatam, ac dotibus & ornamentis fortunæ proterviam, sibi dare dignaretur, ac se voti sui compotem factum in Dei providentia acquiescere (9). — Some of his friends took it amiss, that he had married a young girl without a fortune; but he answered them, that he had made it his constant prayer to GOD from his childhood, that he would bestow on him a young woman, born of virtuous parents, virtuously educated, good and pious, unacquainted with the vices and follies of life, and of a complying temper, rather than one who is proud of her family, spoiled through polite education and company, and insolently vain of her qualifications and fortune; and that, being possessed of his wife, he acquiesced in the providence of GOD. (10) He lived piously and comfortably with his wife a little above ten years, and had six children by her (11). She married the second time Andrew Schoppius (11).

I shall

(8) In the remark [B].

(9) Ubi supra, pag. 238.

(10) Lib. vi, circa fin.

(11) See the article GLAPHYRA, R. A. grand-daughter, &c.

(12) Noldius de Vita & Gestis Herodum, pag. 276.

(13) Dio, lib. lii. pag. 520. Leandrius takes notice of this fault of Xylander in his edition of Dion Cassius.

(14) Id. lib. liv. pag. 580, ad ann. 729.

(a) It is a place two German leagues distant from Dresden.

(b) Andreas Schoppius, ubi infra, citat. (c) says that it was on St Matthew's day: and therefore he should have said the twenty first, and not the twenty second.

(1) Page 202.

(2) Sagittarius. Introductio in Hist. Eccles. pag. 247.

(3) Micælius. Hist. Eccles. pag. 770. Edit. 1699.

(4) Andre Schoppius, Orat. de Vita Matth. Judicis apud Crenium Anim. Phil. & Hist. Part. VI, pag. 71.

(5) Schoppius, ibid. pag. 58.

(6) Id. ibid. pag. 58, 59.

(7) Id. ibid. pag. 57, 58.

(8) Id. pag. 58.

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) Id. ibid.

(11) Id. ibid. pag. 59.

go through during the course of his ministry (c) [C].

(c) Taken from Andrew Schoppius, in Oratione de Vita Matthæi Judicis. It is to be found at the end of the second part, enarrationis Epistolæ lærum Dominicalium Matthæi Judicis, Iſlebiæ 1578, in 8vo. Mr Crenius has inserted that Oration in the sixth part of his Animadver- siones Philol. & Histor. pag. 49, & seq.

I shall now speak of the books he wrote. He translated into Latin the German book of Luther concerning the literal sense of these words, This is my Body. He dedicated that work to the senate of Ratisbon, and consuted in the Epistle Dedicatory the fifteen main arguments of the Zuinglians. The title of a book he published in the year 1559 runs thus: quod argueret peccata seu concionari penitentiam sit proprium Legis & non Evangelii proprie dicti, Rationes & Argumenta. His treatise de Typographiæ inventione, & de prælo- rum legitima inspectione, was printed in the year 1566. His Enarrationes Epistolæ Dominicalium came out in the year 1578. He published six books of his own composing in High-Dutch. He and Wigandus jointly

(12) In 1558.

(13) Taken from Andrew Schoppius, pag. 63, & seq.

(14) Id. ibid. pag. 56.

(15) He was tutor to the children of Levinus Embdenus a civilian of Magdeburg.

(16) Andr. Schoppius, pag. 56.

(17) Note, that he had a hand in the German translation of the three first centuries.

(18) Annis quindæcim valeditudo afflictiſſima. Andr. Schoppius, pag. 56.

(19) Remark [H], of the article ILLYRICUS.

(20) Crenius, Animadv. Part. VI, pag. 72.

(21) Viz. His answer to Beza under the name of Michael Fabricius.

(22) Crenius, ubi supra, in Addendis, pag. penult.

[C] He had many persecutions and vexations to go through. He was one of those that drew up the discipline of the church of Magdeburg, which was printed in the year 1554. He shewed himself very exact in procuring the observation of it, and refused the sacrament to some impenitent persons. Hereupon he was threatened to be beaten and trampled under foot (23). He was very much abused in the satires, that were made at Wittemberg against the centuriators. Scurriles Neministæ & Acolasti Witbergenses in famosa illius laboris reprehensione & acerba invective D. Judicem vocabant Judam & pullum filium aſinæ subjugalis (24). He itrongly opposed the Synergists, whilst he was professor of Divinity at Jena. It was a powerful party, and they persecuted him, in an insolent and slanderous manner. They made use of stones too; for there was a gang of rogues, who all the night long committed riots about his house, and threw stones at his windows. He was deprived of his employment, after having exercised it in the midst of many troubles eighteen months. The pretence alledged for it was the publication of a German book, De fuga Papæ, Of the Flight of Popery (25); but one of the true causes was his opposition to the party, which was favoured at court (26). This party was that of Strigelius, a professor, one of the heads of the Synergists, or flickers for human liberty. They did not fail to give out many reasons or pretences for the deposing of Matthew Judex, which were all confuted. He was accused, amongst other things, of having dispersed several copies of Balthasar Winter's life, and he was required to discover the author of that satire, and to recover all the copies, and deliver them to the court. He answered that this work was no libel; that it was only the true narrative of the life and death of a faithful servant of God, that it was necessary to oppose the calumnies which the enemies of that pious man had spread, and to communicate it to the widow, and some others to comfort them. He did not think himself obliged to name the author; but he offered to answer to that affair before impartial judges, made up of laymen, and ecclesiastics. His adversaries did not care for such a tribunal (27). Leaving Jena he retired to Magdeburg with his friend Wigandus, and did not long enjoy the permission the senate granted him to stay there. Some ministers were arrested, others were expelled by night from the town. He did not approve that conduct of the magistrates, and advised these afflicted ministers to patience. He exposed himself by this means to many slanders, and a burgher received orders not to let him his house. His father-in-law had a share in the outrages, because he had lodged him in his house. At last the senate commanded Matthew Judex to depart immediately from Magdeburg. His wife melting in tears, intreated the first burgo-master to permit her to stay at her father's with her five children, till the rigour of the winter should be over. She represented to them that her eldest son was but eight years old, and that the youngest was but three months, and besides was sick. All her intreaties and remonstrances proved ineffectual; depart they must, and retire to Wismar thro' the snow (28). The Roman Catholics have been well pleased with the ill treatment of the centuriators of Magdeburg. I will only alledge the reflexion of a Jesuit. As for the four first authors of the centuries, says he (29), their fortune was very different from that of Baronius; for soon after they had published their work, they were banished by the Lutherans themselves; who could not suffer among them such wicked men.

(23) Ipsi verberentur & conculcentur nem facillimum minati sunt quod eos ad Baptisimum & ulum Cæcæ non admittent. Andr. Schoppius, ubi supra, p. 62.

(24) Id. ibid. pag. 67.

(25) Id. ibid. pag. 63.

(26) The court of the duke of Weimar.

(27) Andr. Schoppius, ubi supra, pag. 66.

(28) Id. ibid. pag. 69.

(29) Maimbourg, Hist. du Luthérisme, Tom. II, pag. 179. Dicit Edit.

JUDITH, A Jewish woman, delivered her country invaded by Holofernes. You will find this history in Moreri, with some observations upon the perplexity, in which it involves the commentators. Of all the books that the Protestants have rejected as apocryphal, there is none that better deserves that blot than this; for the best thing that can be said of it is, that it is a pious romance [A]. It is not many years since, a learned

Benedictin

(1) In the preface to the Précis de l'Histoire de Judith, Paris 1690, in 12mo. The second edition came out in 1692.

[A] It is a pious romance. Dom. Bernard de Montfaucon (1) observes that the Protestants, to extricate themselves out of all difficulties, have said that this book is but a fiction or parable, and that some of them have affirmed it to be a tragedy. I think the Protestants do not trouble their heads with removing these difficulties; for it is their interest they should subtilise and multiply in the most perplexing manner. By this Benedictin wrote a book to solve the difficulties that are made against this history [B]. If he has not removed them, he has at least supplied us with some useful illustrations. I remember to have seen a dissertation (a), wherein, amongst other arguments, this is enforced, that a book cannot be said to be canonical, when it authorizes assassination. This puts me in mind of a thing concerning the assassin of William I. Prince of Orange [C]. Somebody has observed, that is a very significant commendation of Judith to say that she was never ill spoken of [D].

(a) Intituled, Fides Judithæ, &c. at Verona, in the year 1614, and written by Mirabilis de Bonacasa, wherein the author shews, 1. that the book of Judith is apocryphal; 2. That Judith's action was wicked, and that Rofficus Mariana, and other enemies of monarchy have no reason to take advantage of it. The true name of this Mirabilis de Bonacasa, was Eberhard de Weihe; he was chancellor to prince Julius duke of Brunwic. See Placcius, de Pseudonym. pag. 166.

they shew they have reason to reject this book, and that the church of Rome take for a canonical book what is not so. I believe then that the author in saying this, did not attend to the system of the Protestants; he thought they were no less concerned than the Catholics to maintain in that work the glory of the holy Spirit. When it cannot be maintained by reconciling a thing with historical truths, it is usual to have recourse to allegories, parables, the mystical sense, &c. And this the Protestants would do if they believed, this history to be divinely inspired; but because they do not believe it, it does not concern them to say that it is a parable.

[B] A learned Benedictin wrote a book to solve the difficulties that are made against that history. You will see his name, and the title of his book in the foregoing remark. The method he has taken to preserve to the history of Judith the rank that is given it in the church of Rome is more instructive and edifying, than that which is made use of by the Romish controversialists. The latter generally are contented to retort the objections. They endeavour to shew, that the difficulties raised by the Protestants against the apocryphal books, may be alleged against the canonical. But Dom Bernard de Montfaucon touches very slightly upon this, and makes it his business to give a direct answer. His whole recrimination is contained in these words: Are there not many stories in the sacred text, in which we find these and even greater difficulties, and yet for all that, no body goes about to deny the truth of them in the literal sense? Is not the history of Esther full of confusion and difficulties, which it is hardly possible to get clear of? Did ever any one shew clearly and certainly, who is the Abasuerus mentioned in that book, and in what time that history ought to be placed? Is it not as difficult to fix the time of the history of Ruth, and of the ruin of the tribe of Benjamin? And yet no body dares say, that they are parabolical or enigmatical histories (2). I do not know whether he had seen Dr Raynold's objections, who, of all the Protestant writers, has handled the controversy of the apocryphal books with the greatest force.

[C] This puts me in mind of a thing concerning the assassin of William I. prince of Orange. I mean that villain Bathazar Gerard, who killed him; for there were other assassins, who did only wound him. 'Thou' he was a staunch Catholic, he craftily behaved like a Protestant. He went to sermons and evening prayers, he had always Marot's psalms in his hands, or some other Protestant book. He read also du Bartas's Poetical Week; and it was found that the place 'most worn out, was the story of Judith murdering Holofernes (3). There is no doubt but this woman's example may persuade a great many people that it is a holy action, by means of a thousand lies to get one's self admitted to a prince who oppresses liberty and religion, in order to stab him as soon as an opportunity offers. In a word, this history being once taken for a canonical one, encourages assassins to make any attempt upon the life of kings, whom they hate, and furnishes orators with a crown of glory, to put upon the head of the Clement's and Ravallac's. Observe this passage of Maimbourg. The Leaguers published also in their books printed at Paris and Lyons, that an angel had declared to James Clement, that the crown of Martyrdom was prepared for him, when he should have delivered France from Henry de Valois; and that having acquainted a learned Monk with his vision, that Monk approved of it, assuring him that in striking this blow, he would be no less acceptable to God, than Judith was in killing Holofernes. And because his Prior, named Father Edme Bourgoing, was accused of being, of all the preachers of the League, the most passionate panegyrist of that abominable parricide, directing his discourse to him in the pulpit, and calling him the blessed child of his patriarch, and the holy martyr of Jesus Christ, and comparing him to Judith; it was not doubted but it was he, with whom this young man, who was under his tuition, had advised; and that he had afterwards confirmed him in his execrable design (4).

[D] She was never ill spoken of. The thought I speak of, is to be found in an extract of a panegyric (5). The Abbot de la Chambre making the funeral oration of the late French queen (6), took for his text these words of the book of Judith, 'She made herself famous, famosissima, in all things, and there was none that gave her an ill word; for she feared God greatly.' It is perhaps the finest commendation that ever was given to a woman: for though notwithstanding the prodigious detraction that has prevailed so long in the world, there are some women, that remain untouched by that implacable and insatiable monster; yet this good fortune rarely happens to those who have otherwise a shining reputation, and who are, as the text says, famosissime: so that we may boldly challenge all the Greeks and Romans to shew us a passage in their books, that in so few words gives us so great an idea, as that which the book of Judith gives us in the words before-mentioned. The address that Homer made use of, to give his reader a great notion of the beauty of Helena (7), is certainly inferior to the plainness and simplicity of this Jewish author; and that which is most excellent in his way of praising, is, that he has included in his eulogy the true cause and source of the virtue he has described: she bad, says he, a great reputation in all things, and was secure from every evil tongue, because she was sensibly touched with the fear of the LORD. It is upon this happy expression of Judith's panegyrist, that the Abbot de la Chambre built his funeral oration of the queen.

Aufonius places it among the sentences of one of the seven wise men of Greece, that a chaste woman frights away calumny:

Quæ dos matronæ pulcherrima? vita pudica.

Quæ casta est? de qua mentiri fama veretur (8).

He supposes that Bias had two questions to answer. The first was, What is the noblest portion of a woman? he answered, a chaste life. The second was, What woman is chaste? he answered, she whom fame dares not slander. These rules are severe, will some say; for they condemn all women that have been exposed to obloquy; and yet it is certain that there are most virtuous women, who have not been able to avoid them. It must be owned, that this maxim of Bias cannot serve as a general rule without exception; but generally it is a sign of a very wise conduct, both as to the inside and the outside, to enjoy the reputation of a chaste woman without any opposition or contradiction whatsoever. 'Magnus est pudicitie fructus; pudicam credi; & adversus omnes illecebras atque omnia delinimenta muliebris ingenii est veluti fortis ac firmamentum in nullam incidisse fabulam' (9).

It is of great advantage to chastity, to be thought chaste; and never to have been slandered by report, is the bulwark of a female mind against all temptations and allurements. This is what the orator Porcius Latro said, pleading for a husband, who accused his wife of adultery, because a rich foreign Merchant had made her his heir, and gave as the reason of it, his not being able to debauch her. The Advocate drew from thence one of his arguments: he maintained, that a woman became justly suspected, when once her honour was attempted; for if she was very chaste, her refusal might be read in her face, and her outward behaviour would baffle the hopes of a gallant, and discourage him from discovering his passion. She would refuse him at least with so much severity, that he would never

(4) Maimbourg, Hist. de la Ligue, pag. 358.

(5) In the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, Decemb. 1684, art. viii, pag. 1041.

(6) I wrote this the twentieth of August, 1695.

(7) See, above, remark [A], of the article H E. L E N A, citat. (7).

(8) Aufon. In Sept. Sapientum Sententia septenis versibus explicata, pag. m. 128.

(9) Seneca, Controv. vii, lib. ii, pag. m. 187.

(1) Pag. 253.

(2) Hist. d'Alexandre Farnese, Duc de Parme, liv. iii, pag. 205. Printed in 1692.

never be so bold as to make a second attempt. If she is not afraid to be thought capable of the fault, she will not fear to commit it. * Matrona quæ se adversus sollicitantes aviam vult, prodeat in tantum ornata, ne immunda sit: habeat comites ejus ætatis, qui impudicos, si nihil aliud, verecundia annorum removeant: ferat jacentes in terram oculos: adversus officium salutarem inhumana potius quam inverecunda sit; etiam in necessariam refutandi vicem multo rubore confusa longe ante impudicitiam neget ore, quam verbo: in hac servandæ integritatis custodia, nulla libido irumpet. Prodeat mihi fronte in omne lenocinium composita, paulo obscenius quam posita veste nudæ, exquisito in omnes facetias sermone, tantum non ultro blandientes, ut quisquis viderit, non metuat accedere. Deinde miramini, si cum tot argumentis pudicitiam proscripserit, cultu, incessu, facie, aliquis repertus est qui incurreret, & reit adulteræ se non subduceret. Internuntium, puto sollicitantis se, arripit & denudari iussit, & flagella & verbera, & omne genus cruciatus poposcit in plagas deterrimi mancipii: vix imbecillitas muliebris manus continuit. Nemo sic negantem iterum rogat (10). Quæ potest non timere opinionem adulteri, potest non timere adulterium (11). — A matron who would be inaccessible to suitors, should dress only so far as not to be dirty: she should chafe for her companions persons of such an age, that respect to their years, if nothing else can, may deter the immodest: she should keep her eyes generally fixed on the ground: if an officious fellow offers to salute her, she should be uncomplaisant rather than immodest; and, if she be obliged to return the salute, it should be with much blushing and reluctance: modesty, thus guarded, is not exposed to the attacks of lust. Shew me the women, who display all their charms, who behave more obscenely than if they were to appear naked, full of gaiety and wit, and only not caressing their admirers, in short, inviting all comers: then wonder, if, when dress, behaviour, and countenance, conspire to banish modesty, some one be found to entangle himself in the adulterous net. She ordered the go-between, endeavouring to persuade her, I suppose, to be seized and stripped, and demanded rods, and all kinds of torture, for the punishment of that villainous slave: scarce did a woman's weakness restrain her hands. A woman, who denies in this manner, is never asked again. She, who can bring herself not to fear the opinion of the adulterer, can get over the fear of the adultery. These maxims are too rigid and too strained (12), and we shall be frequently very unjust, if we should direct our judgments by them. But the advantage, happiness, and glory, of our Judith, raise her virtue and good conduct to the highest degree. I shall occasionally observe, that the morality of some Heathens was so austere, that they would not have a woman to give matter either for praise or reproach: that is, they would have her true merit to consist in this, that she should not be talked of, and that no body should speak well or ill of her. Plutarch dislikes this maxim, as we see in the beginning of one of his books: ' (13) I am not of Thucydides's opinion concerning the virtue of women; because he reckons her the most virtuous and the best, who is the least spoken of, whether well or ill, imagining that the name of a woman of honour ought to be as much confined as her body, and never go abroad. I think Gorgias was more reasonable, who would have the fame, and not the face of a woman to be publicly known. And, in my opinion, the law or custom of the Romans was very good, which ordered, that women, as well as men, after their death, should be publicly honoured at their funerals with the praises they deserved.' St Gregory Nazianzen was of Thucydides's opinion. Fear the praises of men, said he, speaking to a woman; this fear is the ornament of your sex.

Ἀλλ' ἂν τὰ περισσὰ, σὺ δ' ἄλλο χεῖρ' ἔσιν ἀνδρῶν,
καὶ κληρομένη, τὸ το γυναιξὶ κλέος.

Lingue aliis vana: ac labiis vereare virorum
Commendari etiam, hoc femineum decus est (14).

Be others vain: shun thou the praise of men;
It is the sex's noblest ornament.

(14) Gregor. Nazianz. παρ' ἡμετέρας γυναικων.

(15) Synesius, Orat. I, de Providentia.

To which may be added these words of Synesius (15).
Μία ἀρετὴν Ὀσπρις φέει γυναικὸς εἶναι, τὸ μὴ

τὸ σῶμα αὐτῆς, μᾶτε τὸ νομα διακινεῖν τὴν εὐ-λοῖαν. Unam virtutem Osiris muliebrem esse censet, ut neque corpus, neque nomen mulieris è vestibulo exiret. — Osiris thought it a woman's chief virtue to keep both her person and her name within doors. What Synesius ascribes to Osiris, is at the bottom the same thing that Plutarch ascribes to Thucydides. Some have given it out as the opinion of Pericles. See these words of John della Casa. 'Cujus quidem mulieris (Victoria Farnesiae) modestia ac pudor ingenuus illud profecto præstitisset, quod Periclem ajunt dixisse, primam in muliere laudem esse, ut ne de virtute quidem illius ulla ad viros fama emanet: sed nulla ratione occultari tanta primariæ scemina virtus potest, quin ad viros quoque emerget, ac suo ipsa splendore se prodit (16). — The modesty of which lady (Victoria Farnese) was as great as that which Pericles spoke of, when he said, a woman's chief praise ought to be, that the men have never heard of her virtue: but the so great virtue of a lady of quality can never be so concealed, but it will be known to the men, and discover itself by it's own lustre. But though an hundred persons, as illustrious as these three (17), had vouched this maxim, we should not be obliged to approve of it. This would be condemning women to a more rigid life than that of the Carthusians; it would be imposing on them the inclosure and silence of those Monks, and forbidding them to receive any visit in their cells. Now this is more than is imposed upon the Carthusians.

I conclude with this observation. The reputation of Judith, that reputation, I say, clean and free from suspicion, and secure against evil fame, is an admirable proof of virtue and prudence. But it must not be from thence concluded, that every woman who has not that good fortune, and is ill spoken of, is guilty of imprudence at least. It may be true that a woman has a regular conduct, and yet because she has for some good reasons put off her waiting-woman, her chamber-maid, &c. scandalous stories shall be quickly forged. The disgraced creature being malicious and revengeful, will apply to her mistress's enemies, and give them mysterious insinuations, as the spirit of slander shall suggest. These lies shall be heightened, whispered about, flourished and enlarged on; nay they shall be printed; and thus a person really innocent, shall not have the reputation of being so; so true it is, as I have said in another place (18), that the appearance is sometimes more difficult to obtain, than the reality. This depends upon our selves, the other depends on many causes that are not in our power. The Poet Plautus represents this thought very naturally in a scene, wherein he introduces two old men, Callicles and Megaronides talking thus:

ME. Quia omnes bonos, bonasque accurare addeceat, Suspicionem, & culpam, ut ab se sequeant.

C.A. Non potest utrumque fieri. ME. Quapropter? C.A. Rogas?

Ne admittam culpam, ego meo sum promus pectori: Suspicio est in pectore alieno sita.

Nam nunc ego si te surripuisse suspicer, Jovi coronam de capite, è Capitolio, Quod in culmine assat summo: si id non feceris, Atque id tamen mihi lubeat suspicari:

Qui tu id prohibere me potes ne suspicer (19)?

C.A. Exspecto, si quid dicas. ME. Primum dum omnium, Malè discutatur tibi volgo in sermonibus: Turpiluricupidum te vocant cives tui.

Tum autem sunt alii, qui te voluturum vocant: Hofesa? an cives comedis, parvi pendere, Hæc cum audio in te dicier, excrucior miser.

C.A. Est, atque non est, mihi in manu; Megaronides. Qui dicant, non est: meritò ut ne dicant; id est (20).

ME. Because it beboves all good men and women to remove from themselves all suspicion, and guilt.

C.A. They cannot do both.

ME. Why?

C.A. Do ye ask? it is in my own power not to entertain guilt: the suspicion of it lies in another's breast.

(10) Seneca, ibid. pag. 186.

(11) Id. ibid. pag. 187.

(12) See, above, remark [O]. of the article BLONDEL (DAVID).

(13) Plutarch de Mulier. Virtut. pag. 242.

(16) Joh. Casa, In Vita Petri Bembi, pag. 143.

(17) Osiris, Thucydides, Pericles.

(18) Above, at the end of remark [H], of the article AMPHARAUS.

(19) Plautus, in Trinummus, Act. I, Sc II, ver. 41, pag. 732.

(20) Id. ibid. 61, pag. 733.

breast. For, suppose now, I should suspect you of having stolen a crown, from Jupiter's head, out of the capitol; though you are innocent, if I have a mind to suspect you, how will you binder it? . . . I wait your answer

M.E. In the first place, you are ill spoken of by the people: your fellow-citizens call you a sordid, covetous, fellow; others think you rapacious. Whether you plunder friends or foes, signifies little: when I hear those things said of you, it grieves me exceedingly.

C.A. It is, and it is not, in my power, Megaronides: what they say, is not in my power; but that they say it without foundation, is in my power.

This conclusion is excellent: it does not depend upon me, answered Megaronides, to prevent being ill spoken of; it is only in my power, that it be not done deservingly. Note, that there are an hundred accidents that may give birth to the same consequences, as the malice of a servant turned out.

JULIA, wife of Septimius Severus, emperor of Rome, and daughter of Bassianus, priest of the Sun [A], was born in Syria. The Astrologers had foretold that she should marry a king [B]; for which reason Severus, before he came to the empire, courted, and married her. He paid great deference to Astrology; and therefore believed that such a marriage would be his security for ascending, some time or other, to the throne. She was a woman of great parts, and capable of great things (a). Some say, that her husband gave her a great share in the government [C], though he was not very fond of her. She cultivated Philosophy [D], and spent much time in hearing the discourses

(a) See the remark [A], at the end.

[A] She was daughter of Bassianus priest of the Sun.]

This may be inferred from these words of Aurelius Victor (1). 'Caracalla Severi filius . . . Bassianus ex avi materni nomine dictus . . . Huius (Heliogabali) matris Semae avus Bassianus nomine, fuerat solis sacerdos, quem Phœnices unde erat, Heliogabalum nominabant (2). — Caracalla, the son of Severus . . . called Bassianus after his grandfather by the mother's side . . . Bassianus, grandfather of Semae, mother of Heliogabalus, was priest of the Sun, whom the Phœnicians, whence he sprung, named Heliogabalus.' Semae (3) was the daughter of Mæla: now Mæla was sister to Julia (4); therefore Bassianus, the priest of the Sun, must be Julia's father. We cannot positively affirm whether Emesa or Apamea was Julia's native country: for, according to some authors (5), her sister Mæla was of Emesa: but according to others (6), she was of Apamea. Lampridius (7) calls Julia nobilem Orientis mulierem —

A noble woman of the east; but Dion (8) makes her a Plebeian, ἐκ δημοτικῆς γένους, ἔκ γενεῆς πλεβία. [B] The Astrologers had foretold that she should marry a king.] Let us set down the words of Spartianus, that the readers may know what enquiries Severus chiefly made, when he resolved to marry again he did not inform himself about the merit of the person, but the promises of her nativity. 'Quum amissa uxore aliam vellet ducere, genituræ sponsum requirebat, ipse quoque matheos peritissimus: & quum audisset esse in Syria quandam quæ id genituræ haberet ut regi jungeretur, eandem uxorem petiit, Juliam scilicet, & accepit interventu amicorum: ex qua statim pater factus est (9). — Being desirous, after the death of his wife, to marry another, and being himself a skillful Mathematician, he enquired into the nativities of those he would have married; and hearing, that there was in Syria a woman, who was fated to marry a king, he sought her in marriage: her name was Julia; whom his friends procured for him, and who soon made him a father.'

[C] Some say that her husband gave her a great share in the government.] She had in charge his memorials, letters, and petitions, of whatever consequence they were, says Dion in the life of Caracalla. Which shews her great capacity: for he gave her advice upon all important affairs: and yet he neither loved her much, nor she him, as we see in Dion and Herodian, tho' she commonly received this honour from him, to be named in his letters with praise and commendation, and even when he wrote to the senate, inserting her name with his own and that of his armies, according to the stile of that time. And indeed he kept her rank very well, paying no more deference, nor saluting with more respect the greatest persons of the empire than Severus or Caracalla did. However Caracalla coming to the empire, lessened her authority, no ways yielding to her counsels, especially when the fancy took him to put any person to death. But as to Severus, her husband, he was very much swayed by her advice and good sense (10). This is what Tristram says: but it is certain that he is mistaken, taking the father for the son. For what he relates, has no respect to Julia under the reign of her husband, but ought only to be understood of her, in the reign of Caracalla. There is no difficulty in the thing, if we consider the words of Xiphilin (11). Οὐδὲ ἐπεὶ δε- το ἔτε περὶ τῶν ἑτε περὶ τῶν ἄλλων τῇ μη- τρὶ πολλά καὶ χρηστὰ παραινεῖται, καὶ τοὶ καὶ τὴν τῶν βιβλίων τῶν τε ἐπιστολῶν ἐκατέρωθεν, πλὴν τῶν παν ἀναγκαίων, διοικῶσιν αὐτῇ ἐπι- τρέφει. καὶ τὸ ὄνομα αὐτῆς ἐν ταῖς ἀπὸς τὴν βαλὴν ἐπιστολαῖς ὁμοίως τῷ τε ἰδίῳ καὶ τῷ τῶν στρατευμάτων, ἐν ὧν ἔνται, μετ' ἐπαίνων πολ- λῶν ἐγγράφον. Τὶ γὰρ δεῖ λέγειν, ὅτι καὶ ἡσπάζετο δημοσίᾳ πάντας τὰς πρώτας, καὶ δα- περ καὶ ἐκείνους. Qua in re ceterisque omnibus minime obtemperabat matri iusta & utilis monenti, licet ei curam libellorum atque epistolarum utriusque generis, præter admodum necessarias (12), commississet, ejusque nomen pariter cum suo & exercitus nomine poneret cum maximis laudibus in epistolis quas mittebat ad senatum, dum omnes valere scriberet: nec opus est referre ab hac omnes primarios viros saluta- rium non secus quam ab illo confluxisse. — In which thing, and in all others, he paid no regard to the prudent advice of his mother, tho' he entrusted her with the petitions and letters of both sorts, except those of the greatest importance, and joined her name, giving her great praises, to his own, and the army's, in the letters he wrote to the senate, informing them that all were well: nor need I relate, that she received the compliments of the great men, in the same manner as himself. I observe that it was at her request that her husband undertook the war against Pescennius Niger, and Clodius Albi- nus (13).

[D] She cultivated Philosophy.] Immediately after the words just read, Xiphilin affirms that Julia philosophized notwithstanding so much business. 'Ἀλλὰ ἡ μὲν καὶ μετὰ τῶν ἑτε μάλλον φιλοσόφει. Sed ea nibilo minus philosophabatur. He had said in another place (14), that being persecuted by Plautianus, who had a prodigious interest, he began to cultivate Philosophy, and to spend whole days with the Sophists: καὶ ἡ μὲν αὐτὴ τε φιλοσοφῶν διὰ ταῦτ' ἤρξατο, καὶ σοφισαῖς συννημεύσαν: Quæ dum ob eam causam philosopharetur, ἔς tempus cum Sophistis transigeret. Philostratus called her a Philosopher: Ἀντωνίνῳ, says he (15) speaking of Caracalla, ἢν ὁ τῆς φιλοσοφίας παῖς Ἰουλίας. Antoninus vero filius erat Juliae Philosophæ. Thus it ought to be read, according to the lucky conjecture of the learned Salmassius (16). He has corrected another passage of Philostratus, wherein we learn that the Sophist Philiscus obtained a professorship at Athens, by Julia's interest. It was she that ordered Philostratus to write the life of Apollonius. Philostratus says so himself (17), and observes at the same time that this lady was a great lover of Rhetoric. Tzetzes mentions the society of learned men that were about Julia. See the margin (18).

Mr Le Moyné has made two remarks, which deserve to be mentioned. I. He wonders, that Scalliger, who made such bold conjectures, durst venture none concerning Antoninus, Julia's son, spoken of by Philostratus. II. He has confirmed by the words of Tzetzes Salmassius's correction, which yet he seems never

(11) Xiphilin. In Epitome Dionis, in Caracalla, pag. m. 333.

(12) Trifan should not therefore say that she was interested with the petitions though they were never so important. He should have made this exception, as Mr de Tillamont does, Hist. des Empereurs, Tom. III. pag. m. 180, unless it was about a very important thing.

(13) Capitolinus, in Clodio Albino, cap. III. pag. 639.

(14) In Sept. Severo, pag. 330.

(15) Philostratus, in Vita Sophistarum, in Philisco.

(16) Salmassius ad Spartian. in Vita Severi, cap. xviii, pag. m. 625.

(17) Philostratus, in Vita Apollonii, lib. I, cap. III.

(18) Εἰς τὸ ἑρμηνεύειν τὴν καὶ Γραμματευσάντων τῇ ἑαυτῇ τῇ κραταύ τῇ τῇ Βασιλίδι. Οὐκ ἴδιον ῥητορικὸν & Γραμματικόν, καὶ Ἰουλία Ἰμπερატρίδις, ἡ ἑαυτῇ τῇ κραταύ τῇ τῇ Βασιλίδι. Τζέτζης, Chil. VI, Hyl. XLV.

(1) Aurel. Victor, in Epitome, pag. m. 271.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 212.

(3) Or rather Semae, according to Herodian, lib. v, cap. 112.

(4) Herodian. ibid.

(5) Herodian. ibid. Julius Capitolinus, in Macrinus, cap. ix, pag. m. 759.

(6) Dio, lib. lxxviii, pag. 902.

(7) Lampridius, in Alexandro Severo, cap. v, pag. 890.

(8) Dio, lib. lxxviii, pag. 899. Edit. 1605.

(9) Spartian. In Septim. Severo, cap. iii, pag. m. 594. Tom. I. See also Lampridius, ubi supra.

(10) Dion, lib. lxxviii, pag. 902.

(11) Xiphilin. In Epitome Dionis, in Caracalla, pag. m. 333.

(12) Trifan should not therefore say that she was interested with the petitions though they were never so important. He should have made this exception, as Mr de Tillamont does, Hist. des Empereurs, Tom. III. pag. m. 180, unless it was about a very important thing.

(13) Capitolinus, in Clodio Albino, cap. III. pag. 639.

(14) In Sept. Severo, pag. 330.

(15) Philostratus, in Vita Sophistarum, in Philisco.

(16) Salmassius ad Spartian. in Vita Severi, cap. xviii, pag. m. 625.

(17) Philostratus, in Vita Apollonii, lib. I, cap. III.

(18) Εἰς τὸ ἑρμηνεύειν τὴν καὶ Γραμματευσάντων τῇ ἑαυτῇ τῇ κραταύ τῇ τῇ Βασιλίδι. Οὐκ ἴδιον ῥητορικὸν & Γραμματικόν, καὶ Ἰουλία Ἰμπερატρίδις, ἡ ἑαυτῇ τῇ κραταύ τῇ τῇ Βασιλίδι. Τζέτζης, Chil. VI, Hyl. XLV.

of the wits that made their court to her. It is pity it cannot be said, for the honour and advantage of learning, that her virtue equalled her capacity; for the historians witness that her adulteries were a blot upon her husband Severus [E]. Some authors say, that after the death of Severus she contracted an incestuous marriage, by marrying Caracalla, her husband's son [F]: but it is a mistake [G]. She was no less the true mother of never to have heard of. This is what he says as to Scaliger: Sic Philostratus in vitis Sophistarum, in Philisio, Ἀντωνίνος δὲ ἢν ὁ τῷ φιλοσόφῳ παῖς Ἰουλίαν. Antoninus erat Filius Philosphi Juliae. Ad quæ verba hærens & attonitus Scaliger, Antonino Philospho alius filius quam Commodus, alia uxore præter Faustinam? Nisi legamus ὁ τῷ Σεβήρῳ παῖς καὶ Ἰουλίαν. Hoc etiam tenuit acipitem Tzetzen, nec mihi minorum movit admirationem. Quæ nos proponimus Chronologis eruditis, & Antiquitatis investigatoribus, ut quærant, & nos doceant, quæ ingenue nos nescire profiteamur. Sed miramur hic retinere Scaligeri acumen, & moratam istam felicem audaciam, quæ loca, hoc multo difficiliora, tam strenue & alacriter superaverat (19). As for the passage of Tzetzen, he makes use of it to shew that Philostratus did not say τῷ φιλοσόφῳ; for if Tzetzen had read this in Philostratus, he would not have said this author does not shew who the empress Julia was married to. Σὺ γὰρ δ' αὐτὴν ἔχεις τινος ἢν βασιλῆως. Non dicit vero cuius Imperatoris illa fuerit conjux (20). He might easily have understood that this Julia's husband was either Marcus Aurelius, surnamed the Philosopher, or Septimius Severus who was very much given to Philosophical studies, in imitation of Marcus Aurelius (21). Philosophia, declamandi, cunctis postremo liberalium deditus studiis (22). Philosophia ac dicendi studiis satis deditus; doctrinæ quoque nimis avidus (23). For the rest, Mr le Moyne commonly gives to our Julia the surname Severa, according to some inscriptions (24). [E] Her adulteries were a blot upon her husband.

Severus had acquired a great reputation both by his military and political actions; but he blasted it by indulging his wife's debaucheries. Nay, it was said, that he was not ignorant, that she was engaged in a conspiracy that was formed against him. Huc tanto domi forisque uxoris probra summam gloria dempsere: quam adeo famulo amplexus est, ut cognita libidine ac ream conjugionis retentaret (25). This is what Aurelius Victor affirms: and Spartianus says no less (26). Trifan (27) does not think it probable, that she ever conspired against her husband: his reason is, that she had too much sense, not to know, that such an attempt must have been fatal, both to her self and her two sons. But it may be answered: I. that we frequently act against our true interests, when we have a mind to satisfy a violent passion; as suppose the desire of revenging an affront offered to Julia by her husband, or the desire of delivering herself from an intolerable oppression. II. That Julia might have so managed things, that the murderers of Severus would have given the empire to her son. This is not without precedent. Be it how it will, it cannot be denied, but she found herself oppressed. Severus had so extravagant a kindness for Plautianus, that his interest was visibly greater than his master's (28). Now Plautianus inveighed violently against Julia: he ceased not to blacken her to Severus; he caused informations to be made against her, and sought for witnesses to prove her guilty. He sought for them, I say, by putting many women of quality to the rack. Ὡς καὶ τὴν Ἰουλίαν τὴν Αὐγύσαν πρὸς τὸν Σεβήρῳ αἰεὶ διέβαλλεν, ἐκζητᾶς τε κατ' αὐτῆς, καὶ βαρύνει κατ' εὐγενῶν γυναικῶν ποικίλως (29). Ut etiam apud eum Juliam Augustam semper calumniatus sit, & in eam ac de matronis nobilibus tormentis quaesiverit (30). The historian who informs me of this, does not say that the empress sought her deliverance by any conspiracy against her husband; but only that this was the reason of her studying Philosophy. She cannot but be praised for taking that method of consolation. The misery of it is, that whilst the favourite too insolently abused his power, she afforded him perhaps too many reasons to accuse her of adultery. I shall set down the answer that was made to her in Great Britain. She had followed her husband thither (31), and observing that the women of that island communicated their favours to several men without any shame, she very sharply bantered Argentocoxus's wife, who thus answered her: We better satisfy the cravings of nature than your Roman ladies; for we publicly bestow our favours on the worst men, whereas you secretly commit adultery with the basest fellows. Μαλα αἰεὶ αἰεὶ Ἀργεντοκόξῳ τινὸς γυνὴ Καλινδονίης πρὸς τὴν Ἰουλίαν τὴν Αὐγύσαν ἀποκλώπτουσαν τε πρὸς αὐτὴν μετὰ τὰς σπονδὰς ἐπὶ τῇ ἀνέδῳ σφῶν πρὸς τὴν ἀρετὴν συνκρίσει, εἰπὼν λόγεται, ὅτι πολλὰ ἄνεμον ἡμεῖς τὰ τῆς φύσεως ἀναγκαῖα ἀποπληρῶμεν ὑμῶν τῶν Ῥωμαϊκῶν ἡμεῖς γὰρ φανερώς τοῖς ἀρίστοις διμελῶμεν, ὑμεῖς δὲ λάθρᾳ ὑπὸ τῶν κακίστων μοιχεύετε. Urbane imprimis Argentocoxi Caledonii uxor, Julia Augustæ quæ ipsam mordebat, iniitit fœderibus, quod ipse impudenter cum maribus versarentur, dixisse fertur, Nis (inquit) multo melius explemus ea quæ naturæ postulât necessitas, quàm vos Romanæ. Nam aperte cum optimis viris habemus consuetudinem: vos autem occulte pessimi homines conspuant (32). If any one ask to what purpose the historian makes mention of this answer, I say it was on occasion of a law the emperor had made against adultery; the execution whereof he was forced to neglect, because the multitude of the accused (33) made the courts unwilling to meddle any longer with these trials. It must be confessed that this barbarous woman archly answered the empress's raileries: But let us have a care not to believe that the impudence of these Islanders was less blameable than the secret adulteries of Rome. They who commit an ill action in secret, retain the ideas of virtue, and pay some homage to them. But they who sin without shame, have no regard to justice, either in the theory or practice (34).

Brantome mentions a circumstance which I have not read in the ancient historians. It contains the reason why Severus so patiently bore with his wife's lewdness. These are his words (35). 'The emperor Severus was not much concerned for the honour of his wife, who was a public whore, and did not care to reform her, saying that her name was Julia, and that therefore she ought to be excused, for as much as all the women that bore that name from all antiquity, used to be great whores, and to make their husbands cuckolds; as I know many ladies, bearing certain Christian names (36), which I will not mention out of respect to our holy religion, who are commonly more subject to be whores than other women of other names, and few have been seen that were free from it.'

[F] Some historians say . . . that she married Caracalla. This error is not a story of a late invention, but is found in Spartianus, and Aurelius Victor. See how Brantome relates it. 'We further read of Julia, the step-mother of the emperor Caracalla, that being one day, as it were, by carelessness, half naked, and Caracalla seeing her, said only these words; how gladly I would, if I might. She suddenly answered, you may if you please; do not you know that you are emperor, and that you are to give laws, and not receive them? Upon this fine saying, he married her, and lay with her (37). She must needs have been a great whore, since she loved and married him, who some time before had killed her own son in her arms. She was doubtless a great whore, and had very mean thoughts, but it is a great matter to be an empress, and for such an honour all is forgotten. This Julia was very much beloved by her husband, though she was far advanced in years; but she had lost nothing of her beauty; for she was very handsome, and very courteous, as it appears from her words, which highly increased her grandeur (38). That the reader may see whether this story has been flourished, I will set down the words of the Latin authors who have mentioned this passage. Interesse scire, says Spartianus (39), quemadmodum nocerem suam Juliam uxorem duxisse dicatur. Quæ quum esset pulcherrima, & quasi per negligentiam se maxima corpore parte nudasset, dixissetque Antoninus, Vellem, si liceret: respondisse fertur, Si libet, licet. An nescis te imperatorem esse, & leges dare, non accipere? Quo

(19) Xiphilin. in Severo, pag. 313.

(20) There those and people had been credited for adultery.

(21) See the article JONAS (ANONYMOUS), remark [8].

(22) Brantome, Dames Galantes, Tom. I, pag. 11.

(23) These were varieties of Rabelais' characters, as applied to the ladies.

Nominibus certis credam decetiora mores, Maribus autem potius nomina certa dari?

(24) Brantome, Dames Galantes, Tom. II, pag. 205.

(25) Id. ibid. pag. 206.

(26) Spartianus, in suam Juliam uxorem duxisse dicatur. Quæ quum esset pulcherrima, & quasi per negligentiam se maxima corpore parte nudasset, dixissetque Antoninus, Vellem, si liceret: respondisse fertur, Si libet, licet. An nescis te imperatorem esse, & leges dare, non accipere? Quo audite,

of Caracalla, than of Geta. She had the misfortune not to be able to keep peace betwixt her two sons (b). Her industry, as great as it was, proved deficient in that respect. Geta was killed by Caracalla, in the arms of his mother Julia, who was wounded, and durst

(b) Herodian.
lib. iv, cap. ill.

audito, furor inconditus ad effectum criminis roboratus est: nuptiaque eas celebravit quas si sciret se leges dare, vere solas prohibere debuisset. Matrem enim (non alio dicenda erat nomine) duxit uxorem, ad patricium junxit intestum: siquidem eam matrimonio sociavit cujus filium nuper occiderat. Aurelius Victor representis more clearly the artifice she made use of. She was not so unpolitic, as to undress herself openly before Caracalla; such an impudence might have disgusted the young man; he ordered it so, that it might pass for a surprise; she pretended not to know that Caracalla could see her in that posture; she pretended to be ignorant of his being where she was undressed. Pari fortuna, & eodem matrimonio, quo pater; namque Juliam nupseram . . . forma captus, conjugem affectavit: cum illa factis, aspectui adolescentis, presentia quasi ignora, semet dedisset, intesta corpore, asserenique, Vellem si liceret, uti: petulantius multo (quippe quæ pudorem velamento exuerat) respondisset; Libet? plane licet (40).

(40) Aurel. Victor, in Celsus, pag. m. 244. See also Eutropius, lib. viii, and Orosius, lib. vii, cap. xviii, who mention that through a private window, where he showed himself; and for asking him what he thought of it, he answered, I like you so well, that I should be glad to have you, if it could be done lawfully. Are you, replied she immediately, so ignorant as not to know, that every thing is lawful to you, who are the lord of the whole earth? And thereupon they proceeded to their transgression.

(41) Vigenere, preface to Potholus's pictures.

I do not know where Vigenere found what he says, as to the circumstance of the place. The empress Julia, says he (41), was doubtless Severus's wife; for Antoninus Caracalla married her afterwards, though she was his step-mother; and this incest came from his seeing her one day naked in the hot bath, where he showed himself; and for asking him what he thought of it, he answered, I like you so well, that I should be glad to have you, if it could be done lawfully. Are you, replied she immediately, so ignorant as not to know, that every thing is lawful to you, who are the lord of the whole earth? And thereupon they proceeded to their transgression.

[G] . . . but it is a mistake.] It has been so clearly made out, that Morel is inexcusable, for having told this story as a certainty. If he had read Trifan's Commentaries, he would have seen sufficient proofs of its falsity; though it must be granted, that all the arguments of this author are not demonstrative.

(42) Trifan. Comment. Hist. Tom II, pag. 113, & seq.

His first proof (42) is taken from the silence of the Greek authors, who have exactly described Caracalla's actions, without the least flattery. Dion Cassius lived at that time, and had great employments: he could not then be ignorant, whether Caracalla had or had not married Julia; and if he had known of such a marriage, he would certainly have spoke of it, the better to defame this emperor, whom he does not appear to have desired to spare in any thing. Since then he does not mention it, it is a certain argument of the falsity of this marriage. Herodian's silence confirms the same thing; Herodian I say, who relates many particular and disgraceful things, and who lived much nearer that time, than they who vouch this pretended marriage.

(43) Ibid. pag. 14.

Trifan supposes (43), that at the time when they say her beauty made Caracalla desire to marry her, she was at least forty five years old; for she must have been seventeen or fifteen (44) when she married Severus: and as she had Caracalla the first year of her marriage, and Caracalla was twenty seven years old when it is supposed he saw her naked, it follows, that she was forty four or forty five years old. This author is in the right to suppose, that Julia was not the step mother, but the true mother of Caracalla; no good objection can be made against this. Those that might be made to lessen the age of Julia, and against the consequences that Trifan draws from her being forty five years old, would be more considerable. Nothing hinders, will some say, but that Julia might be but fifteen years old, when she married Severus, and it is probable that Caracalla married her the year after his killing Geta

(4) It is likely error of the is for 18.

(45). Now Caracalla reigned six years after the death of his brother (46), and lived but twenty nine years in all (47); he might therefore marry Julia, when he was but twenty four years old, which being added to the sixteen of his mother, when he was born, make but forty. Trifan (48) will have forty four or forty five years 'not to be an age, in which there could be so much lustre, vigour, and beauty, as to move him so powerfully to love her, that he was obliged to

VOL. III.

'marry her, in order to satisfy his passion.' One might instance some women, who at such an age, and even older, have made princes passionately in love with them; but he might answer, that those women made not their conquests all at once, by appearing naked. The charms of conversation, the artifices of love, and a thousand pretty ways were their strongest arms to conquer; and then I know not what address of body and mind, enabled them to keep their conquests. The bare shewing of a body, that has undergone the influences of above forty years, is not a good expedient: it is not appearing with the best side; and therefore there is no probability, that so cunning a woman as Julia should have taken this method to gain the love of Caracalla, or that if she did, she found her account in it. I go no farther: I believe this may be replied to; the reasons that may be alledged upon such a subject, being not of such a nature as to leave no room for doubting.

Let us see the third proof. Dion (49) observes, that (49) Id. Ibid.

when Julia 'knew of the death of her son, she struck her breast (50) to cause her own death, by reviving

'and irritating a cancer, which she had for a long time, and that it contributed very much to her death afterwards; which shews how ridiculous they are, who have forged this story, that Julia shewed herself naked to Caracalla, and that her nakedness made him desperately in love with her. For is it likely, that this woman would have shewn herself naked, being thus ulcerated, and that Caracalla, a young prince, monarch of the world, who had the choice of all that was fine and beautiful in so vast an empire, could have been caught by this object, as they represent it? There being nothing too difficult for a Sophist, some caviller might be found, who would tell Trifan, that Julia did not shew her whole body (51). Spartianus says, that the only shewed the better half of it. We may then suppose, that the part she concealed was her breast, and so her cancer did not appear. Mr Chevreau could not make this objection; for he says that Julia appeared before Caracalla, in a careless manner, and with a naked breast (52). It would be to no purpose to examine, whether it is probable that a woman, who would shew herself naked, except some part, would make choice of her breast before all others to hide it. This, I say, would be to no purpose, since by supposing the cancer, there were particular reasons that necessarily obliged Julia not to shew her breast. I therefore proceed to a third observation, which enervates the third proof of Trifan: I say, that the cancer came upon her after her marriage with Caracalla. If it came a year after the marriage, she might have had it four years when Caracalla was killed, and so Dion might say, that she had it for a long time (53).

The fourth proof of Trifan is this: Dion, who per- fessly knew Caracalla, observes, that he had been extremely enervated for a long time, and very unfit for that sort of exercise; having brought himself to that pass by his debaucheries, ὡς ἐξ ἐξουθενώσαν (54) αὐτὴν πᾶσα ἡ ἀσθενεία ἰσχυρὴ for, says he, the natural vigour, necessary for the service of the ladies, was extinct in him the last years of his life (55). It is not true that Dion observes, that Caracalla was enervated in that respect for a long time, and so the fourth proof lies open to the same inconvenience as the foregoing; for it may be answered, that this emperor exhausted his strength by his debaucheries, after his marrying Julia. Perhaps the reader will not be displeased to know, to what purpose Dion makes this remark. He had been saying, that Caracalla put four vestals to death, and that he enjoyed one of them as much as his strength would permit. The historian says afterwards what Trifan has quoted, and adds, that this vestal cried out, when she was led to the place of execution, The Emperor himself knows very well, that I have preserved my virginity. Τέσσαρες δὲ τῶν αἰδῶ παρθένων ἀπέκτεινεν, ἐν μιᾷν βίᾳ, ὅσα γὰρ καὶ ἡδύνατο, ἡσυχῆ καὶ ἡσυχῆ γὰρ ἐξουθενώσαν αὐτὴν πᾶσα ἡ ἀσθενεία ἰσχυρὴ. ἀρ' ἔτι καὶ ἑτέρον τινα τρόπον ἀισχυρῆσαι ἐλέγχετο. ἡ δὲ δὴ χόρη αὐτῇ περὶ τῆς λέγου, Κλωδία Λαί- τᾳ

(50) See the remark [1].

(51) Se maxima corporis parte nudisset. Spartian. ubi supra.

(52) Chevreau, Histoire du Monde, Tom. II, pag. 366. Dutch Edit. 1687.

(53) 'Εν πᾶσι πολλὰς χρόνους. Jam multo tempore. Dio, in Macrin, pag. 362.

(54) It should be ἐξουθενώσαν.

(55) Trifan, ubi supra, pag. 114.

(c) Xiphilin. in Caracalla, pag.
345, 346.

(d) Id in Ma-
crino, pag. 362.

(e) They are to be found in the second volume of Tristan's Commentaires Historiques, pag. 117, 118.

durst not afterwards express the least grief (c). If I mistake not, the best expedient Caracalla made use of to comfort his mother, was to give her a good share in the government [H]. This was a wonderful charm for this lady; and if she had a mind to kill herself, when she heard that Caracalla had been assassinated, it was not so much out of grief for her son's death, as because she feared to see herself soon reduced to the condition of a private person (d). And therefore she thought no more of death, when she observed that Macrinus, who succeeded Caracalla, used her well. But as soon as she understood that he resolved to resent the injurious words she had uttered against him, when she heard of the assassination of Caracalla, she starved herself to death [I]. The title of Domna, which is given her, was the surname of a family [K]. There are some difficulties about the time of her marriage with Severus [L]. There are some inscriptions (e),

(56) Xiphilin. in Caracalla, pag.
352.

(57) Tiftan.

(57) Tristan.
ubi supra, pag.
115. He quote
no body. This is to be found in the fragments of Dion, pag. 899, of the edition of 1606.

(58) Funus Getae
accuratius fuisse dicitur quam ejus qui à fratre videretur occisas. Il-latiusque est majorum sepulcro,
hoc est Severi.
Spartian. in Geta, cap. vii,
pag. m. 744.

(59) Urnulam auream Se-veri reliquias continentem eam-demque Antoninorum sepulcro illatam. Id. in Severo, cap. ult.
pag. 640.

(60) Id. in Caracalla, cap. x, pag. 730.

(61) Capitolin.
in Macrino, cap
v. pag. 753.

(62) Herodian.
lib. iv, cap. 13.

(63) See Salma-fius; in Spartian.
cap. xx, pag. 633;
and Mr Span-heim, de Præst.
Numismat. pag.
628.

(64) Spartian. in Geta, cap. v,
pag. m. 740.

(65) See the remark [L].

(66) Aurel.
Victor, in Epit.
pag. 212.

(67) Heliogaba-lus dictus Cara-callæ ex Semea CONSOBRINA
occulte stuprata filius. Id. ibid.

(68) Ulpian. lege ultima de Senat.
apud Trifan,
pag. 117.

τα ἐνομαζέτο· ἢ τις καὶ μῦθα βοῶσα, ὅτι δὲν αὐτὸς Ἀντώνιος ἐστὶ πατέρησιν· σὺ γὰρ κατὰ τοὺς ἰσχυροὺς. Postea occidit quatuor, ex quibus unum quantum in ipso fuit, vitiauit: nam cum ad extremum vix in rebus Veneris defecerat, qua ex re dicebatur flagitia obsecra aliterius generis facere. Huic virgini Clodia Lætia nomen fuit, eaque viva sepulta est: quum tam enim exclamaret scire ipsum Antonium se virginem esse (56).

I proceed to the fifth proof. It is certain, that if Julia had been his wife, when Jbe died, her body would not have been deposited first in the monument of the two brothers, Lucius and Caius Cæsar's, and afterwards in that of the Antoninus's with the bones of Geta, but with him (57). This proof is very bad, and shews, that Trifitan did not know that Caracalla and Geta were in the same tomb. Geta was laid in the sepulchre of Severus (58), that is to say, in that of the Antoninus's (59), and Caracalla was laid there too. Corpus ejus Antoninorum sepulchro illatum est, ut ea fides reliquias ejus acciperet quæ nomen addiderat (60). His body was sent to Rome, by the very order of his murderer (61). Others say, that Macrinus had it burnt, and put the ashes in an urn; which he sent to Julia (62).

The sixth proof is very good ; it is grounded on Julia's being the mother, and not the mother-in-law of Caracalla. This is plain from the testimony of Dion, a man of figure in the empire, and who had seen Severus, Julia, Caracalla, Geta, &c. a hundred times. Herodian says the same things ; and what can be more convincing upon this subject, than these words of Orian? τὸν μεγάλῳ μεγάλῳ εὐριστά δόγμα Σε-
ήρῳ. Since Oppian, in a book which he dedicated to Caracalla, affirms, that Julia brought forth Caracalla, can there be the least doubt of it ? Can a coteremporary writer be mistaken in such a thing? And durst he tell a lie in the face of all the court, about a thing which no body was ignorant of? Can any one be ignorant in a prince's court, whether his wife is the mother, or the step-mother of his sons? I say nothing of the inscriptions, in which Julia is called Caracalla's mother (65). Now all those who speak of the pretended marriage of Julia and Caracalla, suppose that she was his step-mother, and therefore are not to be credited, as building upon a falsity. Nay, they fall into a contradiction. Does not Spartianus say somewhere, that Geta was a greater favourite of his mother than Caracalla? Fratri semper inuifus, matri amabilior quam frater (64). Would a man who should make this remark, and yet believe Julia to be Geta's mother, and Caracalla's step-mother, have common sense? This is not the only argument, that Spartianus affords against himself (65). Aurelius Victor (66) affirms, that Caracalla died, being near thirty years of age : which cannot be true, if this emperor was not Julia's son. See the remark [L]. The same historian observes, that Caracalla having secretly lain with Semea, his cousin, had a son by her, who was the emperor Heliogabalus (67). If Caracalla was Semea's cousin, he was Julia's son. I must observe by the way, that Mammea, Semea's sister, and Alexander Severus's mother, is called by Ulpian Caracalla's cousin (68). Thus we find here a coteremporary writer, who says, that Julia was Caracalla's mother.

[H] Her son . . . gave her a good share in the government.] See what has been quoted out of Dion, in the remark [C]; and add to it what the same historian tells us, when he relates the tragical end of Caracalla. He says, that during Caracalla's expedition against the Parthians, Julia remained at Antioch, and received all the dispatches, and communicated only to the emperor, such as were material. Thus all the affairs of the state went through her hands, and it was she who judged, whether such or such letters written to the emperor, deserved to be sent to him or not. This is a proof of the trust that Caracalla reposed in her, and of the notion he had of her capacity. Ἐκείλευτο αὐτῇ πάντα τὰ ἀρκεύμενα διαλεγεῖν, ἵνα μὴ μάτην αὐτῷ ὄχλῳ χειμασταν ἐν τῇ πολεμίᾳ ὄντι πέμπεται. Cui mandatum erat, cuncta quae mitterentur, discernere, ne ad Antoninum occupatum in terra bosili frustra multitudo litterarum mitteretur (69).

[7] As soon as she understood that Macrinus resolved to resent the injurious words she had uttered against him, . . . she flared herself to death. Macrinus lent her Caracalla's ashes (70), and wrote a very obliging letter to her (71): he desired she might keep all her retinue, and have her guards, as before; in which he made her think no more of killing herself. Ἐπειθ' ὡς ἐτέ τι τῆς βασιλῆως θραυστέας καὶ τῆς τῶν δορυφόρων περὶ αὐτῆς φρονέας πλῆλειθι, καὶ ἐκείνῃ χρῆσα τινα αὐτῇ σπέρσαι, παραστήσασα, τὴν τῷ Σαύτῃ ἐπιθυμίαν κατέβητο. Sed postquam ille non modo nihil de regis famulatu ejus, aut de stipendiatoribus quos secum habebat custodire causa immutavit, verum etiam multa ad eam percommode scripsit, cepit bona spe injecta desiderium mortis deponere (72). But when he understood, that she had furiously inveighed against him, and formed factions, to make herself sovereign in that country, like Semiramis and Nitocris; he ordered her immediately to depart from Antioch, and permitted her to retire whither she pleased. Then Julia would live no longer; she feared more than death the condition of a woman without authority. Some (73) doubt whether her death was voluntary; but Dion does not speak of it doubtfully. He affirms (74), that she flared herself to death, which she the easier effected, as having inflamed her cancer, by striking her breast. Tritan believes, that she struck her breast to baten her death, by irritating her cancer; but I do very much question whether this is the historian's meaning. I believe that Dion meant no more than this, viz. that this lady striking her breast, whilst she was lamenting the death of her son, irritated the cancer (75). The general custom of women, upon the news of a loss like this, was not only to make lamentations, but also to beat their breasts. Julia did as the rest, but probably it was not with such blows, as to design directly to die of them. Since she is compared to Semiramis, the must have been looked upon as a most ambitious and cunning woman. This last quality she did not want, if we believe Dion Cassius (76).

[K] The title of Domna was the name of a family. Trifstan (77) proves it very learnedly, and censures Ritterhusius (78), who thought that in this verse of Oppian, Τὸν μεγάλῃ μεγάλῃ οὐτίσας Δόμνα Σεβήρα, the word Δόμνα is an epithet borrowed from the Latin Domina, and that the Poet making it Greek, inserted it with the licence of the elision of the Iota. He criticises another fault of the same Ritterhusius, which is his believing that Oppian speaks of Martia, Severus's first wife. See Menage (79), who censures Gentilis (80), who was guilty of Ritterhusius's first fault. See also Mr Spanheim (81), who finds the same fault in the notes upon Nicephorus Bryennius.

[L] There are some difficulties about the time of her marriage with Severus.] Dion (82) affirms that Faustina, wife of Marcus Aurelius, prepared the nuptial chamber for Severus and Julia, in the temple of Venus, which was in the palace. Now Faustina died in the east, about the end of the year 175 (83). Therefore Severus's and Julia's marriage was not later than

(69) Xiphilin. in d Caracalla, pag.
357.

(7c) Herodian.
e lib. iv. cap. xiii.

(71) Xiphil in Macrino, pag.
362.

Y o f

...

(73) Herodian.

(74) Xiphilia.
in Macrino, pag.

(75) See the Fragments, pag.
899, of Dion's edition, 1606.

(76) Πρὸς δὲ
τέτοιοις εἶχε καὶ τὸ παῖδ'
τῆς μητρὸς, καὶ τὴν ὕβριν
ὄθεν ἐκείνη ἤλινε· ei fraud &
malitia matris, Syriorumque ex quibus illa orta fuerat. Xiphilini.
in Caracalla,
pag. 349.

(77) Triften.
Comment. Hist.
Tom. II, pag.

(78) Not. in Oppiani Cyn-

t (79) Amznit.
juris, cap. xxv,

(80) Lib. ii, Pa.
regerum juris,

(81) Spanhem. de Præstant. Numif.

(S2) Xiphilin. in al Severo, pag. 310.

(83) Tillemont,
Hist. des Emper.
Tom. III, pag.

at

in which she is called the mother of the camps, the mother of the country, and the mother of the Senate.

that year. Julia was quickly a mother; it is not known whether Caracalla was the eldest of her children, but that might well be. According to Spartianus, who makes him live forty three years, Caracalla was killed in the year 217, according to which reckoning he must have been born in the year 174. If you object to this author, that Caracalla's and Julia's marriage must be placed about the year 212, since it happened after the beginning of Caracalla's reign, which lasted but six years; and if you conclude from thence, that this marriage is a mere fiction, since Julia was then above fifty years old; he will answer you, that Julia was not the mother of Caracalla, and he will maintain, that she was not married to Severus, till long after the year 174. And yet Dion affords us a strong proof that Julia must have been at least fifty years old, when it is pretended, that her nakedness did so charm Caracalla. From what he says, we ought to suppose, that she was married before the death of Faustina, and consequently, that she was at least twelve or thirteen years of age, in the year 175. I am going to shew, that it is impossible, that Caracalla should have been born the first year of Julia's marriage, if it be true, that this marriage happened before Faustina's death.

Spartianus says, * that Caracalla was but five years old, when his father was governor of Illyricum, (which we cannot suppose before the year 190) and that he received the Toga virilis when he was designed consul (that is at the end of the year 201, and so he was not then at most but in the beginning of his fifteenth year). He every where acknowledges, that Caracalla was very young, when Severus came to the empire. He represents him as a child of two or three years of age at most at the birth of Geta, which was the twenty seventh of May, 189 (84). All this is inconsistent with the forty three years he gives this emperor, when he was killed in 217. He therefore contradicts himself. Dion affirms, that Geta lived but twenty two years and nine months (85), and that Caracalla lived but twenty nine years (86). Now Caracalla lived but six years after the death of Geta (87), and he was killed in the year 217. Geta therefore must have been born in the year 189, and Caracalla in 188. Therefore there must have been many years from Julia's marriage to Caracalla's birth, if Faustina prepared the nuptial bed, as Dion relates it; and yet, according to Spartianus, Julia's marriage was quickly fruitful, and gave a second son to Severus, a few years after the birth of the first. Ex qua (Julia) statim pater factus est. A Gallis ob severitatem & honorificentiam & abluentiam, tantum quantum nemo dilectus est. Deinde Pannonias proconsulari imperio rexit. Post hoc Siciliam proconsularem sorte meruit, suscepitque Romæ alterum filium (88). — Whic Julia soon made him a father. He was exceedingly beloved by the Gauls, on account of his severity, honourableness, and abstinence. After that he was Proconsul of the Pannonia: next he was Proconsul of Sicily, and had another son at Rome. There is a great deal of confusion in all this. I know not whether a conjecture, which I advance at a venture, will be approved. Dion does not seem to me to say, that Faustina actually prepared the nuptial chamber, but that Severus dreamed she had prepared it. This historian relates seven prefaces of Severus's exaltation; and after having mentioned the six first, he adds, that they appeared to him in his sleep (89); and afterward he speaks of the seventh as of a fortuitous action, done when he was awake. In relating the six first, he does not always observe upon each in particular, that it was a dream; but he does it three or four times. This might have deceived the interpreters; for he does not observe it as to this action of Faustina, which is one of the six prefaces: he relates it as a reality. I mean without cautioning that it was a dream. Now since he does the same with respect to some of the other prefaces, which were manifestly a dream, and since, before he relates the preface, which consisted in a real action, he gives notice, that all the preceding prefaces appeared in his sleep; I think it may be concluded, that he makes the preparation of the nuptial bed in the temple of Venus, by Faustina, to be only the vision of a man who sleeps. I do not know whether ever the nuptial chamber of any person was prepared for him in a temple. It is easier therefore to come to Dion's assistance, than to bring off the other historian: nevertheless, some contradictions are objected to the latter, without much ground. This I am going to examine, observing first of all, that Mr de Tillemont ought not to have preferred this passage of Dion, to the hypothesis that Spartianus leads us to (90). This hypothesis is to say, that Severus married Julia, whilst he commanded in Gallia Lugdunensis, in the year 186. Some historians tell us (91), that Caracalla was born at Lyons.

Tristan (92) alleges, as a proof of Spartianus's contradictions, these words of Caracalla's life. * Hic tam enim omnium durissimus, & ut uno complectar verbo, parricida, incestorum reus, patris, matris & fratris inimicus (93). — He was the most cruel of men; in a word, he was guilty of parricide and incest, and hated his father, mother, and brother. But I do not think that he can hereby be convicted of contradiction, and of forgetting his hypothesis; he might maintain, that he takes the word mater, according to the notion which he explains two pages before, Matrem enim (non alio dicenda erat nomine) duxit uxorem. — He married his mother; for she could be called by no other name. And we see he does not forget the incest, in the words related by Tristan (94). * *The same Spartianus mentions the reason, which Caracalla said he had to kill his brother, namely, that he despised their mother, and did not pay her the respect that was due to her. Which makes it manifest, that Spartianus, or he that he took it from, acknowledged her to be their common mother. For he would have had no reason to be so enraged with this irreverence of his brother towards Julia, if she had not been his mother, and the pretence had been as ridiculous, as it appeared barbarous, notwithstanding all the other reasons he invented to palliate his violence and his crime. This objection is not good: for in the first place, these words matrem cum irreverentem fuisse (95), signify only, that Geta did not respect his mother; and they ought not to be translated as if being spoken by Caracalla, they meant, Geta does not respect our mother. It is thus however, that Tristan has understood them, which is his fault. In the second place, it is a very specious pretext to extenuate a murder, to say, that the person killed used his mother ill. An usurper, who should dethrone a prince, insolent to his mother, would not fail to charge him with this crime, though he were no relation to the family dethroned. Cromwell and his party would have exhausted all the common-places of rhetoric, if they could have reproached Charles I with such an irreverence. Much more would this pretence be alledged, if a man was the son-in-law of a lady, ill treated by her own son. Such a man would say, that he thinks himself obliged to defend the rights of his father's widow, against all opposers whatsoever. In a word, he would alledge a hundred plausible reasons, and such as might make an impression; and I do not know what Tristan meant when he called this a ridiculous pretence.*

Here is a stronger objection against Spartianus. He says (96) that Caracalla being in his thirteenth year, was proclaimed by the soldiers, an associate to the empire, upon the taking of Ctesiphon. He adds, that Severus returning into Syria, gave the Toga virilis to Caracalla, and named him his colleague in the consulship, which they entered upon immediately. This consulship falls in the year 202, and the taking of Ctesiphon, in the year 198. It is not therefore possible, that Caracalla, who was killed in the year 217, should have lived so long as this historian affirms, that is, forty three years.

(90) See Tillemont, Tom. III, pag. 389, & Spartian. in Severo, cap. iii, & iv, pag. 594.

(91) Aurel. Victor, in Caracalla, pag. 211.

An Examination of some contradictions objected to Spartianus.

(92) Tristan, ubi supra, pag. 219.

(93) Spart. in Caracalla, sub fin. pag. 732.

(94) Tristan, ubi supra.

(95) Spart. in Geta, cap. ii, pag. 709.

(96) In Severo, cap. xvi, pag. 616, 617.

(84) Id. ibid. pag. 389, 390.

(85) Xiphil. in Caracalla, pag. 345.

(86) Id. ibid. pag. 338.

(87) Herodian. lib. iv, cap. xiii. See also Xiphilinus, in Caracalla, pag. 358, ubi dicit, ibid Caracalla regnavit sex annis, tres menses, et quatuor dies. Toga d. 191 accord. to the edition of Dion Cassius, in 1606.

(88) Spartian. in Severo, cap. iv, pag. 594.

(89) Ταῦτα μὲν ἐν τῷνειρῶν ἐμφανέων ἐμαθεν. ὅτι ἡ τὸν βασιλεὺς διόφρων ἐφῆκε, ὅτι ἡ ἀντιφῶν ἐνδονόβη. Quae omnia quum ex somniis intellexerit Severus, tum id revera evenit, quod cum adhuc ephelus esset, confedit in sella principis per imprudentiam. Xiphilinus, in Severo, pag. 310.

(a) Strabo, lib. x. Suidas, Stephanus.

(b) Lib. ii, cap. vi.

(c) In the article ZIA, remark [C], towards the end.

(d) Strabo, ubi supra.

(1) At the word Cœ.

(a) The Italians write it so.

(1) Eras. Adag. Chil. III, Cent. IV, n. 8, pag. m. 725.

(2) Theophil. Rainaud. Hopletheca, Sect. II, Serie III, cap. I, pag. m. 303.

(3) Hadr Junius, Adag. Cent. VI, n. 43.

(4) Theophil. Rainaud. ibid. pag. 304.

(5) In a manuscript remark, which he has inserted to me.

JULIS, a town of the isle of Cea, in the Ægean Sea. In this town (a) were born the Poet Simonides, the Poet Bacchylides, his nephew, the Sophist Prodicus, the Physician Erasistratus, and a Philosopher called Aristo [A]. Valerius Maximus (b), relates a very singular thing, which he was witness of, when he passed through Julis in the retinue of Sextus Pompeius, who was going into Asia, to exercise his proconsulship. I speak of it elsewhere (c). When the four towns of this island were reduced to two, Julis was one of the two (d). It was built upon a mountain three miles from the sea. The native country of so many great men, ought not to have been omitted by Moreri; nor left out in the Dictionary of Charles Stephens, by Mr Lloyd, who had done better to rectify this article [B], than to leave it out entirely.

[A] A Philosopher called Aristo. It is thus we ought to say, and not with Moreri (1), the Philosopher Aristo; for this expression induces one to believe, that either there was but one Philosopher of that name, or at least, that he who was born at Julis, was incomparably more eminent than all the other Aristo's, both which things are false.

[B] Mr Lloyd had done well to rectify this

JULIUS II, created Pope the night between the thirty first of October, and the first of November, 1503, was nephew to Sixtus IV, and was called Julian de Ruvere (a). It is said that he had been a water-man [A]. There was something very remarkable in his election [B]; for, properly speaking, it preceded the entrance of the cardinals

[A] It is said, that he was a water man. Erasmus has inserted this tradition in his Adages. 'A remo ad tribunal, says he (1), Dici solitum ubi quis repente ab infima conditione provehiatur ad honesti muneris administrationem. Id quod haud scio an ulli contigerit feliciter quam Julio secundo. Nam fama est hunc juvenem ad stipem scalum reme subigere solitum, & tamen à remulco non solum ad tribunal, verumetiam ad summum illud rerum humanarum culmen evehctus est. Nec contentus hoc fastigio, pontificis ditionis pomeria multum protulit; longius etiam producturus si per mortis inclementiam vitam illi producere licuisset. From the oar to the tribunal, is proverbially said, when any one is suddenly raised from a low condition to an honourable employment. I know not whether this happened more luckily to any one, than to Julius II. For it is reported, that, when he was a young man, he used to row for hire; and yet he was raised from a boat-man, not only to the seat of justice, but even to the highest of human honours. And, not satisfied with this elevation, he greatly enlarged the Papal authority, and would have carried it still farther, had he not been prevented by death.' Father Theophilus Raynaud is mistaken, in saying (2), that Erasmus makes mention of the same thing in the explication of the proverb, à scapha in triumphalem quadrigam. It is not he, but Hadrian Junius (3), who explained this adage, and says: 'Effertur potest de quovis à face hominum ad magnas opes dignitatesque provecto, quemadmodum Julius Ligur post sedentariam operam in ducendo scalmo diu navatam, Sixti Pontificis beneficio insignibus Ecclesiasticorum honorum ornatus, tandem ad Pontificatum maximum emeruit. It may be said of any Plebeian raised to great riches and honours, such as Pope Julius, who, after having long been employed in rowing a boat, was, by the favour of Pope Sixtus, raised to the honours of the church, and at last obtained the Papedom.' Anastasius Germonius, archbishop of Tarentaise, has maintained, that all the stories concerning the birth of Sixtus IV, and Julius II, are false; and that Leonard de Ruvere, father of Sixtus IV, was a very noble knight, and that before the exaltation of this Pope, the family of Ruvere was in a flourishing state. 'Sixtus IV falso jactatus est se plebeis & piscatoribus editum cum patrem haberet Leonardum de Ruvere, Equitem nobilissimum, ut observavit Anastasius Germonius, exponents indultum Hieronymi Cardinalis de Ruvere $. Sixtus natus 28, qui etiam $. Magnus, de gentis Ruveræ antiquo, (etiam ante Sixtum, splendore, agit diffusissime (4).

Mr de la Monnoie (5) pretends, that Anastasius Germonius, who only copies Onuphrius, cannot stand against Philadelphus, Baptist Fregofus, Volaterranus, Corio, Erasmus, Machiavel, Chaffeneuz, Bandello, du Ferron, Massio, and so many others cited by Spondanus, in his continuation of Baronius, on the year 1471. n. 10. Bandello affirms, that Julius II.

article.] Charles Stephens had done well not to say so absolutely, that the isle of Cea was indifferently called Cia or Cos, and to examine better what he says, that there was a law in Julis, which sentenced all people to death that were above sixty years of age, and that the end of this law was to prevent the want of provisions for the rest. See what we shall say upon this in the remarks of the article ZIA.

boasted that he had steered a little vessel. 'Giulio secondo Pontefice, anchorche di bassissima gente fosse discelo, e non si vergognasse spesse hute dire che egli da Arbizuola, villa del Savonese, haveffe con una barchetta più volte, quando era garzone, menato de le cipolle à vendere à Genova, fù nondimeno huomo di grandissimo ingegno e di molto elevato spirito (6). Pope Julius II, though of mean extraction, and made no difficulty frequently to say, that from Arbizuola, a village in the Savonese, he many times, when a boy, carried onions in a boat to sell at Genoa; nevertheless was a man of great parts, and an exalted genius.'

[B] There was something very remarkable in his election. He was sure of his election before the cardinals entered the conclave; so that he came into it Pope. He was an exception to the common proverb, that he who enters the conclave Pope, comes out cardinal, Chi entra Papa, esce Cardinale (7). He had secured his faction, by so many promises, and had in his power so many means of enriching such as would serve him, that it was not possible for him to miss of the Papal dignity. Besides the riches which he had already gotten, he had in hands those of others: every one was eager to offer him money, and even their benefices; so that he saw himself in a capacity of promising more than was asked. Thus you see the iniquitous way by which he rose to the pontificate. It is not a Protestant, but an Italian author that says it. 'Ma molto più ve lo promossiono le promissioni immoderate, & infinite fatte da lui a Cardinali, a Principi, a Baroni, & a ciascuno, che gli potesse essere utile a questo negotio, di quanto leppono dimandare: & hebbe oltra ciò facoltà di distribuir danari, e molti beneficii, e dignità Ecclesiastiche, così delle sue proprie, come di quelle d'altri: perche alla fama della sua liberalità molti concorrevano spontaneamente ad offerirgli, che usasse a proposito suo i danari, il nome, gli ufficii, & i beneficii loro: ne fu considerato per alcuno essere molto maggiore le sue promesse di quello, che poi Pontefice potesse, o dovesse osservare: perche haveva lungamente havuto nome tale d'huomo libero, & veridico, che Alessandro sexto, nimico suo tanto acerbo, mordendolo nell'altre cose, confessava lui essere huomo verace; laqual laude, egli sapendo, che NUNO più facilmente inganna gli altri, che chi è solito, & ha fama di mai non gl'ingannare; non tenne conto, per conseguire il Ponteficato, di maculare (8). But that which served most in his advancement, was the promises immoderate and infinite, which he made to the cardinals, princes, and barons, and to all others whom he might make profitable to him in that action. Besides he had the means to distribute money, benefices, and spiritual dignities, as well such as were his own, as those that were the rights of others, for that such was the brute and renouwe of his liberalitie,

(6) Bandello, Novel xxvi, of the first part, fol. 29 verso, Mr de la Monnoie has furnished me with this passage.

(7) Memoires des Intrigues de la Cour de Rome, printed at Paris, 1677, pag. 20.

(8) Guicciardini, lib. vi, fol. 165, verso.

Cardinals into the conclave. He had gained the faction of the duke of Valentinois, by making him believe, that he was his father [C], and promising to treat him as his son. He did afterwards just the contrary. No man had ever a more martial spirit than he [D]. He was in person at the taking of towns, and appeared more fiery than those who commanded his armies [E]. A great number of writers affirm, that he once threw heralds, that many made willing offers to him to dispose as he best liked of their treasures, their names, their offices, and benefices. They considered not that his promises were farre to great then, that being Pope, he was eyther bable or ought to observe, for that he bad of so long continuance enjoyed the name of iust and upright, that Pope Alexander him self his greatest enemy, speaking ill on him, in al other things could not but confesse him to be true of his word: a praise which he made no care to defile and staine, so thende to become Pope, knowing that no man more easily beguileth an other, then he that bath the custome, and name neuer to deceiue any. If he had not made use of this Simony, how could he have induced the cardinals to give him their voices. He, who had always discovered such a turbulent and terrible temper, and got many enemies (9). Money brings every thing about; it made a Pope before they had met for the election: a thing never known before. Il Cardinale di San Pietro in Vincola potente d'amici, di reputatione, e di ricchezze, haveva tirati a se i voti di tanti Cardinali, che non havendo ardire di opporlegli quegli, che erano di contraria sentenza, entrando in Conclave, gia Papa certo, e stabilito; fu con essempio incognito prima alla memoria de gli huomini, senza che altrimenti si chiudesse il Conclave, la notte medesima, che fu la notte dell' ultimo giorno d'Ottobre, affunto al Ponteficato (10). The cardinal S. Petri Ad Vincula mighty in friends, reputation, and riches, had drawn to him the voices of so many cardinals, that entering the conclave, he was with an example all new and without shunning the conclave, elected Pope the same night.

[C] He made the duke of Valentinois believe that he was his father. I have read this no where but in Varillas. This historian says (11), that the French accused Julius II of having ascended St Peter's throne by two irregular ways, to wit by Simony (12) and deceit. To prove the Simony they intanced the benefices, and legations promised in the conclave, and given after the election to the cardinals, who were heads of the factions, and they specified the sums of money, which the other cardinals had received for the price of their voices. To demonstrate the deceit, it was remonstrated to the same Pope, that the Spanish cardinals being engaged by oath not to give their voices to any other, than him who was propoled by the duke of Valentinois, the cardinal of St Peter in Bonds, who was sworn enemy to this duke, suborned some persons to persuade him, that he was his father; that he had kept his mother when she seemed only to belong to cardinal Borgia, who was afterwards Alexander VI; that the jealousy the same Borgia conceived against him, was the only cause of the persecution he had suffered from him for ten years together; but the business at present being to chuse another Pope, if he would lend him his interest, he would treat him as his son. The duke of Valentinois gave credit to what was told him in confidence so far as to consent, that the cardinals of his faction should elect the cardinal of St Peter in Bonds, who failed not immediately after to deprive him of all Romagna and Umbria, instead of acknowledging him for his son.

[D] No man had ever a more martial spirit than he. Here is what John le Maire Historiographer to Lewis XII says of him. Let us farther observe another wonderful difference in the end of this work; I mean the graciousness and affability of the Sultan to the Most Christian king, in comparison of the rigour and obduracy of the present Pope, who being all over martial and four, and always in his armour, as if he would have his terrible and warlike actions spoken of, as those of the great Tamerlane, emperor and Sultan of the Tartars, will continually carry on the war, which becomes him as little, as dancing does a hooded Monk. Yet he must not expect to make a new world wholly monstrous, as he is attempting; for hogs will always feed on acorns, oaks will be deprived of their leaves in due time, and wood will be applied to such an use as properly belongs to it. But the glorious stelliferous crown, and the eagle of Jupiter, which are bright celestial luminaries, fixed and unmovable, as Astronomers witness, will shine in the firmament as long as the world lasts (13). William Budæus called him a bloody ringleader of gladiators (14), and strongly represented the scandal that Pope gave, who at seventy years of age appeared in a warlike habit, whilst the people were going in procession to beg peace of God. Cum sacerdos septuagenarius Christi, Pacis conditoris & parentis Legatus, Bellonæ facris operaretur, cui cum generis humani luculento dispendio litare contendebar. Idque tum, cum profanum vulgus ad delubra pacis & concordie miserabili specie supplicationes inibat. Enimvero vilendum spectaculum, Patrem non modo sanctissimum, sed etiam senio & canitie spectabilem, quasi ad tumulum Gallicum Bellonæ fama suos evocatos cientem: non trabes, non augustis insignibus venerandum, non Pontificiis gestaminibus sacrosanctum, sed paludamento & cultu barbarico conspicuum; sed furiali, ut ita dicam, confidentia succinctum, fulminibus illis brutis & inanibus lucidum, eminente in truci vultu culique spirituum atrocitate (15). When a minister of CHRIST, of seventy years of age, ambassador of the Prince of Peace, was employed in sacrificing to Bellona, to whom his vows were offered at the expense of the human race. And that, at a time when the populace were lamenting and making prayers in the temples of Peace and Concord. It was indeed a remarkable sight, to see a most Holy Father, venerable for his old age and grey hairs, exciting his subjects to war, habited, not as a prince or Pope, but armed, and breathing nothing but rage and fury. This is but a small part of Budæus's vehement declamations against this Pope. You may see them at large in Flacius Illyricus, in the twentieth book of his Catalogus testium veritatis.

VOL. III. No LXXVII.

[E] He was in person at the taking of towns, and appeared more fiery than those who commanded his armies. Du Pleffis Mornai adds nothing to the expressions of Guicciardin, when he says (16), being resolved to attack Ferrara, he was advised first to take Mirandola, and being tired with the slow progress of that siege, which went not to his mind (a thing not expected, and never known before) the vicar of CHRIST on earth was there in person against a Christian town, says Guicciardin, and too old and sick, was so obdurate and impetuous in a war that he himself had raised against the Christian Princes, that nothing was done soon enough, he was always calling to the captains in a fury, having his quarters so near the battery, that two men were killed in his kitchen, notwithstanding the remonstrances the cardinals made to him of the disgrace he brought both upon himself and his see. Montfret (17) says on that occasion, he deserted St Peter's chair, to take the title of Mars the god of battle, to display his three crowns in the field, and to sleep in a watch-tower; and God knows what a fine figure these mitres, crosses, and crofters made, fluttering in the camp; the devil was not such a fool as to be there, for benedictions were too cheap. Guicciardin does very well represent what concerns the siege of Mirandola; for he observes, that this Pope had no regard to the horrible cold of the season, which retarded the works of the besiegers. Partii secondo di di Gennajo (18) da Bologna accompagnato da tre Cardinali, e giunto nel campo, alloggiò in una year 1511. caferà d'un villano, sottoposta a' colpi dell' artiglierie de' nimici; perche non era più lontana dalle mura della Mirandola che tiri in due volte una balestra commune: quivi affaticandosi, & essercitando non meno il corpo, che la mente, e che Imperio, cavalcava quasi continuamente hora quà, hora là, per il campo, sollecitando che si desse perfezione al piantare dell' artiglierie, delle quali infino threw St Peter's keys into the Tyber [F], in order only to use St Paul's sword: but as these writers copy one another, without citing any good original author, I would not advise any body to vouch for the truth of it. However, it may be said, that if this Pope wanted the qualities of a good bishop he had at least those of a conquering prince. He had great courage and a political head, by which he formed leagues, and broke them, according to the exigency of his interest. He made a most formidable one against the republic of Venice, and made use, among other things, of the thunder of his excommunications;

7 P

(19) Guicciard.
lib. ix, fol. 262.
verso.

Fenton, ubi
supra, pag. 505,
506.

(20) Guicciard.
lib. ix, fol. 263.

Fenton, ubi
supra, pag. 506.

(21) Abrégé, Chronolog.
Tom. IV, pag.
455, ad ann.
1511.

(22) He should have said the twentieth of January.

(23) Du Plessis,
pag. 580, quotes
only that author,
and calls him
Gilbertus Ducher-ius. He was of Auvergne. His Epigrams were printed at Lyons,
in 1538.

a quel giorno era plantata la minor parte, essendo impedita quasi tutte l'opere militari da' tempi asprissimi, e dalla neve quasi continua (19). — He parted from Bologna, the second of Januarie accompanied with three cardinals, And being come to the campe, the necessity of the place, compelled him to be lodged in a little countrey cottage, subject and open to the artilleries of the enemies, for that it was no further from the walls of Mirandola, then a common crossbow will boote at twice: there he dispensed with no travail of his body, nor forbore any care or studie of minde. There he was no lesse prodigal of his autoritie, then of his presence, and riding continually thorow, and about the campe, he had almost finished the planting of the artillerie, whereof till that daye the lesser parte could not be employed for impediments, which the unreasonable tyme and snowes gave to all actions of warre. Complaining of his captains, he encouraged his soldiery with the hopes of plunder; for he promised them not to capitulate with the town, but to suffer them to sack it. Stet- te alla Concordia pochi giorni riconducendolo all' essercito la medesima impatentia, et ardore; il quale non raffreddò punto nel camino la neve grossissima, che tuttavia cadeva del Cielo, nè i freddi così similati che a pena i soldati potevano tollerargli: & alloggiato in una Chiesetta propinqua alle sue artiglierie, e più vicina alle mura, che non era l'alloggiamento primo, nè gli satisfacendo cosa alcuna di quelle, che si erano fatte, e che si facevano; con impetuossime parole si lamentava di tutti i Capitani, eccetto che di Marc' Antonio Colonna, il quale di nuovo haveva fatto venire da Modena; nè procedendo con minore impeto per l'essercito, hora questi sgridando, hora quelli altri confortando, e facendo con le parole, e con i fatti l'officio del Capitano. Prometteva, che i soldati procedevano virilmente, che non accetterebbe la Mirandola con alcuno patto; ma lascierebbe in potestà loro il saccheggiarla (20). — The Pope remained not longe at Concordia, the same impatience and violence of mind causing him to returne, which first procured him to come to the campe; neither was his fury any thing abated by the hurfull snowes that continually fell from heauen, whilest he was in the feldes, nor his rigor the more restrained by the sharpe cold, whose bitterness the soldiers could not endure but with great payne: he was lodged in a little church, neare to his artilleries, but somewhat nearer the walls then was his former lodging: and being discontented with all things, that either were already done, or stood to be done, he complained with bitter wordes against all his captains, except only Mar. Antb. Colonna, whom he had newly sent for from Modena: he travelled with great impatience about the armie, enforcing him to persuaade a diligence in the men in whose slownesse he tooke griefe, he accomplished both in wordes and action, the office of a Capteine, promising the soldiours for the reward of their vallours the spoyle of Mirandola, which he said he would not take to composition, but leave it to their libertie to ravensack or raunsom to their own profit. Mezerai (21) says, that the town being taken by composition the nineteenth of March (22), the Pope would be carried into it through the breach.

[F] A great number of writers affirm, that he once threw St Peter's keys into the Tyber. Hitherto I have found no authority for this, besides this Latin epigram of one Gilbertus Ducherius Vultio (23), Aqua-

In Gallum ut fama est, bellum gesturus acerbum, Armata educit Julius urbe manum:
Accinctus gladio, claves in Tibidis amnem ob-Projicit, & sacrus, talia verba facit:
Quam Petri nihil efficiant ad praelia claves, Auxilio Pauli forsitan enlis erit.

Fame says, Pope Julius once the sword did wield,
And, to engage the Frenchman, took the field.
Fierce, into Tyber's stream, the keys he threw,
Exclaiming loudly, as his sword he drew:
Since, in my aid, thy keys, O Peter, fail,
Thy sword, O Paul, in battle may avail.

It must be confessed, that this is a very weak foundation; for when a poet has a pretty thought, and finds no proper subject, that he may apply it to, he makes no scruple to supply the want of it, by his amplifications and fictions; and he will dispense with the truth, rather than lose a witty saying. Poeta modo aliquid argute vel acute dicere videntur, plerumque verum sit an falsum propemodum non curant (24). Be that how it will, this action true or false of Julius II, is to be found in many authors. One of the latest writers, in whom I have read it, relates it thus (25). Percusso cum ipsis (Veneti) federe exercitum suum adversus Imperatoris confederatos Ferrariensem & Ludovicum XII, Regem Francorum, iniquissimus & perfidissimus bellator eduxit (26) cum ea voce, quæ ipsum non S. Petri, sed perditissimum & sceleratissimum latronis successorem esse commonstravit. Cum exercitu enim Roma egressus, Petri clavem furibundus in Tiberim jactavit, adeoque, ut ingeniose Bibliander conclusit, omne, quod à Sancto Petro se habere finxit jus, Tiberino flumini resignavit; additis hisce verbis: Quia clavis S. Petri amplius nil juvat, (evaginato gladio) valeat gladius S. Pauli. — Having made an alliance with the Venetians, this most unjust and perfidious warrior led his army against the emperor's allies, the duke of Ferrara, and Lewis XII, king of France, with an expression, which denoted him rather the successor of a most abandoned and wicked robber, than of St Peter. For, marching out of Rome with his army, he, in a rage, threw St Peter's key into the Tyber, thus resigning to that river, as Bibliander ingeniously concludes, whatever power he pretended to have received from St Peter; adding these words; since St Peter's key is of no farther use (at the same time he drew his sword), let us try St Paul's sword. I must not omit, that Hotman relates the same thing upon the credit of Arnold du Ferron, a Catholic historian. Is it Julius secundus, says he (27), de quo & Arnoldus Ferronus, vir imprimis doctus, & Gallie nostræ historicus, & Burdegalensis quondam Parlamenti Senator, itemque alii complures memorie prodiderunt: quod cum exercitu comparato Roma in Galliam, infesto in Regem nostrum animo, contenderet, suasque armatas copias ipse loriceatus ex urbe per Tiberis pontem educeret, multis hominum audientibus hæc pronuntiavit: Quando nobis claves Petri nihil profunt, age, gladium Pauli distingamus: simul claves, quas secum attulerat, in Tiberim projecit, gladiumque vagina eduxit. Quæ de re notum illud vetus carmen est (28). — This is that Julius II, concerning whom Arnoldus Ferronus, a very learned man, and one of our historians of France, and formerly a member of the parliament of Bourdeaux, as also many others, have related, that, being incensed against our king, and marching with an army from Rome into France, himself armed, as he passed out of the city by the bridge of the Tyber, he said in the hearing of a great many: Since the keys of St Peter are of no use to us, come on, let us draw the sword of St Paul; at the same time he threw the keys, which he had brought with him, into the Tyber, and drew his sword. The epigram upon this is very well known.

I could never have believed, that Hotman could have been guilty of the unfairness of which I am going to convict him. I have consulted Arnold du Ferron, and do not find that he recites Ducherius's epigram, as Hotman seems to say. The verses he quotes are quite of another nature, and he adds to them the answer

(24) Papey.
Maffio, in Vita
Leonis X.

(25) Jean. Herseau Hist. de Histoire France,
pag. 192, 193.

(26) Du Plessis,
pag. 580, should not have placed that expression soon after his election to the Papacy.

(27) In Brevis
summe, pag. 88
110, 111.

(28) It is Ducherius's epigram above mentioned.
Hotman gives it
at length.

communications; but when he saw that the victory which the king of France, one of the heads of that League, obtained over the Venetians, did too much weaken that republic, he forsook his allies, and re-united himself with it. The emperor, and the king of France, equally dissatisfied with him, endeavoured to bring him to reason, by a way always formidable to the Popes; which was, by the calling of a Council (b). But he was not daunted at that, he proceeded severely against this Council, and called another himself, which had the better of it, to which at last the king of France submitted in a low manner [G]. It is true, that Julius II was then dead. The Sacred League, which he formed in Italy, received a terrible check by the battle of Ravenna (c); and if they had known how to make use of that advantage, they would doubtless have humbled this haughty pontiff, whereas they permitted him to recover himself from that severe blow [H], by the little use they made of that victory, to which the powerful diversions in his behalf contributed very much. He obtained great succours from the Swifs, and was very liberal of titles, and marks of honour towards the Cantons [I]. He died of a sickness, full of vast designs [K], the twenty second of February 1513. He answer which John Lascaris made in favour of Julius II. I do not deny that he tells the story of St Peter's keys being thrown into the Tyber; but he questions whether it be not a fiction. 'Quin vulgatum est, says he (29), JOHANE CONFICTO AN VERO, quando Romani pictores Petro Claves, Paulo enim tributum, illum in Gallos emissurum copias esse accinctum & clavibus ad Tybrim profectum in aquas amnemque projecisse claves, hac inferentem, quandoquidem nihil Petri claves prodesse, Pauli enim (quem mox eduxerat) auxilio futurum. — It is commonly reported, whether jestingly or truly, that whereas the Roman Painters give Peter keys, and Paul a sword, this Pope, about to lead an army against the French, armed with sword and keys, and marching by the Tyber, threw the keys into the river, with this saying, since Peter's keys were of no service, the sword of Paul (which he presently drew) should assist him.' Is it consistent with sincerity to build such a story upon the authority of a great Catholic magistrate, and to suppress the declaration he made, that he knew not but it might be an imposture? Most books are full of the like quotations, and we cannot take the trouble often to verify whether those who cite the authors do it fairly; we cannot, I say, often take that trouble, without contracting a mistrust, which will oblige us to believe only our own eyes. If so famous an author as Francis Hotman gives himself so much liberty, what will not little authors do, who have nothing to lose? We must then argue just contrary to him who cried out:

(b) It was convened at Pisa, and then transferred to Milan, and at last to Lyons.

(c) On Easter-day, the eleventh of April, 1512.

Quid Domini facient, audent cum talia fures (30)?

What will not masters dare, when servants thus presume?

[G] The king of France submitted in a low manner.]

This confirms what I have said in another place (31), that princes hardly ever ended their quarrels with the Popes, but to their own confusion. Lewis XII had called an assembly of the Gallican church at Tours, in the year 1510, to know whether he could in conscience make war with Julius II. He was informed by that assembly 'that his cause was just, and that the Pope's was not, and that he might proceed to the offensive part in his own defence (32).' At his request, and the emperor's, and in execution of the decree of the council of Constance (33), some cardinals had summoned a general council at Pisa; he and the emperor had approved by their Letters Patents (34) the calling of this council. He had protected the fathers that composed it, and who declared Julius 'suspended from the administration of the pontificate, and forbade obedience to him (35).' He had protected them, I say, against this Pope, who excommunicated and degraded them in his council of Lateran. Nevertheless, this same king some time after declared, that he looked upon the assembly of Pisa, as a pretended council. His procurators, they are the words of the act (36), 'having in their hands the letters-patents of the Most Christian King, sealed with his seal, and signed by him, and dispatched by his command, after the reverence and humility required in such cases, have entirely departed from the pretended council of Pisa, and absolutely renounced it, and freely, purely, and entirely adhered to the most holy council of Lateran, as to the only true and lawful one. And farther, according to their aforesaid procurators, they have promised that from thenceforth the Most Christian King shall not give any favour or assistance, in any manner whatever, to the said pretended council of Pisa: nay, that all those who shall be found in his city of Lyons, or other parts of his kingdom, territories, and lordships belonging to him, persisting in their adherence to the pretended council of Pisa, shall be forced by him to retire in a month's time; and if any, of whatever state, degree, dignity, or condition they be, whether seculars or ecclesiastics, do obstinately refuse to obey, he will expel them, and repute them schismatics, and as such, upon any order of the aforesaid Holy Father, pursue them with main force, if there is occasion. And farther, the said procurators have promised that the aforesaid Most Christian King shall effectually cause six prelates, and four doctors, or most eminent graduates among those, that were in the said pretended council at Pisa, to be deputed to our aforesaid holy father the Pope, in the name of the said pretended council of Pisa, and representing the body of all those who adhered to it, to appear between this day and the first of January, in person before his Holiness, in order purely and entirely to renounce and abjure the said council of Pisa, after having asked and received the remission and absolution from his Holiness, humbly and in a suitable form. And over and above, that they will adhere and incorporate themselves with the said council of Lateran, as the true and undoubted one, both in their own name and in the name of their adherents. But if they shall refuse to do this, the aforesaid king shall give no succours, assistance, or favour against the authority of the holy apostolical see, to any of those that shall be found to favour or have favoured the said pretended council of Pisa: on the contrary, he shall with all his power cause the sentences, decrees, and censures of our Holy Father to be executed, even with force of arms, if there be occasion, without any fraud or dissimulation. This is what the prelates get who adhere to the interest of their prince in his quarrels with Rome: they are made a sacrifice to the Pope, when their quarrels are ended. It is a wonder to me, that there are so many, who prefer their temporal before their spiritual prince.

[H] They permitted him to recover himself from that severe blow. He recovered so well, that the same year the French were forced to abandon the Milanese. Nothing was so prejudicial to Lewis XII, as the superaddition of Anne de Bretagne his wife. She filled her head with so many scruples, about the war that France made with the Pope, that she retarded all the good designs of her husband (37).

[I] He was very liberal of titles . . . to the Cantons. Whereas his predecessors gave several privileges to the mendicant Friars, this Pope gave them to the Swifs Cantons, who were the principal executors of his lofty enterprizes, to whom he gave the perpetual title of Defenders of the Ecclesiastical Liberty, with many Bells and Standards, and a Sword, and a Cap of Gold, and other presents, to oblige them to perform all his commands (38).

[K] He died of sickness full of vast designs (39). This is what Guicciardin says (40). In questi tali e tanti pensieri (that is of engaging the king of England to make war with France, and of deposing Lewis

(29) Arn. Ferronus, in Ludovico XII, fol. m. 52, verso.

(30) Virgil. Eclog. iii, vers. 26.

(31) In the article GREGORY VII, at the end of remark [B].

(32) Mezerau, Abr. Chronolog. Tom. IV, pag. 453.

(33) Id. ibid. pag. 457.

(34) In July 1511.

(35) Mezerau, ubi supra, pag. 462.

(36) It is to be found intire in Coiffeteau's answer to the Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 1221, & seq.

(37) See Mezerau, ubi supra, pag. 457, 460.

(38) Du Pleffis Morai, ubi supra, pag. 180. See also Heidegger, ubi supra.

(39) Varillat, Hist. de Louis XII, livr. x, pag. m. 217, & seq. mentions seven.

(40) Guicciardin lib. xi, fol. 325.

He was a lover of wine and women [L]; and he is accused even of the unnatural sin [M]: and there is no sort of crime but he is charged with, in a dialogue it is feigned he had with St Peter at the gate of Paradise [N]. The hatred he conceived against France

Lewis XII, and of giving the kingdom to the first that could conquer it) e forse ancora in altri più occulti e maggiori (perche in un' animo tanto feroce non era incredibile concetto alcuno, quantunque vasto, e smisurato) l'oppresso dopo infermità di molti giorni la morte Principe d'animo, e di costanza inestimabile, ma impetuoso, e di concetti smisurati, per i quali che non precipitasse, lo sostenne più la riverenza della Chiesa, la discordia de' Principi, e la condizione de' tempi, che la moderazione, e la prudenza: degno certamente di somma gloria, se fusse stato Principe secolare, o se quella cura, & intenzione, che hebbe ad esaltare con l'arti della guerra, la Chiesa nella grandezza temporale, avesse havuta ad esaltarla con l'arti della pace nelle cose spirituali: e nondimeno sopra tutti suoi antecessori, di chiarissima, & honoratissima memoria, massimamente appresso a coloro, iquali, essendo perduti i veri vocaboli delle cose, e confusa la distinzione del parlare reitamente, giudicano che sia più ufficio de' Pontefici, aggiungere con l'armi, e col sangue de' Cristiani, imperio alla Sedia Apostolica, che l'affaticarsi con l'esempio buono della vita, e col correggere, e medicare i costumi trascorsi per la salute di quelle anime, per laquale si magnificano che Cristo gli habbia costituiti in terra suoi Vicari (41). —

(41) See a passage of Mezerai, in remark [O], citation (60).

In these conceptions no less strange for their varieties, then great for the importance they drew, and perhaps in other thoughts, more secret and singular (for in a mind so fierce and terrible, all sorts of imaginations bore great and wayne so ever they be, are not incredible) after the continuation of his sickness for many days, he declined towards death: he was a prince of incredible constancy and courage, but so full of furie, and unrul'd conceptions, that the reverence that was borne to the church, the discord of princes, and the condition of times, did more to staye him from his ruine, then either his moderation or his discretion: worthy, no doubt, of great glory, if either he had bene a prince secular, or if that care and intention which he had to raise the church into temporal greatness by the means of warre, had bene employed to exalte it by the mediation of peace, in matters spiritual: nevertheless he was lamented above all his predecessors, and no less esteemed of those, who having either lost the true consideration of things, or at least ignorant how to distinguish and peace them rightly, judged it an office more duely appertaining to Popes, to increase the jurisdiction of the sea apostolicke by armes and blood of Christians, then by good example of life and due curing and correction of corrupt manners, to traueil for the saving of those soules, for whom they glory so much that Jesus Christ hath named them his vicars in earth. How judicious is this, and what an admirable censure upon those impatient doctors, who believe all to be just, provided the temporal grandeur of the church be improved by it! this in particular hits cardinal Palavicini, who speaks so faintly of Julius II's faults, and excuses them by reason of the temporal advantage they brought to St Peter's patrimony. — Fu dotato, says he (42), di spiriti eccelsi, à tal che se fosse stato principe di dominio sol temporale, meriterrebbe d'esser contato fra gli Eroi Certamente senza una tal ferocia non havrebbe recuperato egli alla Chiesa il più e' meglio del suo dominio. — He was endowed with a high spirit, inasmuch that if he had been a temporal prince, he would deserve to be put in the number of the heroes. Certainly had it not been for that fierceness, he had not recovered to the church the best part of her patrimony.

* Fenton, ubi supra, pag. 632, 633.

(42) Istoria del Concilio, lib. i, cap. i, n. 5.

Paul Jovius (43) affirms, that Julius II died having a vast design upon the kingdom of Naples. Hæc ingenti animo verum ægro corpore cogitantem, diuturnus fluentis alvi morbus intercept. (44). It was said that the title of deliverer of Italy, with which he suffered himself to be flattered, was but an empty name, whilst the Spaniards were possessed of Naples: If GOD let me see, answered he, striking his stick upon the ground, this shall not last long. Ad quod Pontifex quassato scipione quo innixus pavimentum infrendendo pertundebat, respondit brevi futurum, ut Neapolitani non iratis superis externum jugum excut-politani non iratis superis externum jugum excut-

rent (45). [L] He was a lover of wine and women.] We are told of an exclamation of the emperor Maximilian: (46) Good God! what would become of the world, if thou didst not take a particular care of it, under the reign of such an emperor as I am, who am but a poor hunter, and under that of so wicked and drunken a Pope as Julius II. Some historians observe, that this Pope invented a new name to accuse the French of drinking too much wine, and discharging it immediately by urine; and they add, that this was his great vice. Gallos in Universum novo nomine augens Romanam supellestem, Micturivinos vocarat, quasi immodicos vini potores quod mox emittendum esset, quo vitio ipse maxime laborabat (47). — He gave the French the general appellation of Micturivini [Wine-Pissers] thus adding a new word to the Roman language, implying that they were immoderate drinkers of wine, which was afterwards to be discharged: of which vice he himself was very guilty. I proceed to his lewdness. He had a daughter who was married to John Jordan de Ursinis, and he is brought in, saying in a dialogue with St Peter (48), that he had had the pox.

Note, that there is a fault in the words of Arnold du Ferron before-cited. He supposes that the Pope invented the Latin word Micturivinus, to signify the drunkenness of the French; but it was not in that language that Julius II expressed himself, but in Italian, and the word was Pisciavini. It is said that one of his officers, a Norman by nation, told him one day, Faith, Holy Father, you are then a true Frenchman, for you are one of the greatest wine-pissers on the earth (49).

[M] He is accused of the unnatural sin. It is certain that Julius II is accused of this horrid crime. We read in a book of our divines of Paris, of two young gentlemen abused by him, whom queen Anne, the wife of king Lewis XII, had recommended to cardinal de Nantes to conduct them into Italy (50). Probably du Plessis gives us here a translation of these words of Wolfius. Legitur in Commentario Magistrorum Parisiensium (§ 2), de Julio secundo Papa, quod duobus nobilissimi generis adolescentibus, quos Anna Galliarum Regina Nantensi Cardinali informandos commiserat, & aliis multis diabolicae rabie (proh facinus) stuprum intulerit (51). This quotation seems too indeterminate; he should have told us where, and in what time that book of the Paris doctors was printed. John Crepin, undertaking to relate this adventure, has fallen into an anachronism: We read, says he (52), in a certain commentary of the doctors of Paris, against the Lutherans, that this Julius, inflamed with a diabolical rage, had his will of two young gentlemen of a noble family, whom queen Anne of France had sent to Robert cardinal de Nantes, to be instructed by him. The doctors of Paris would have been far from inserting such a thing in a controversial piece against the Lutherans; if they inserted it any where, it is in the writings they published against Julius, under Lewis XII.

[§ 2] This citation of Wolfius is false. He should have said: In Commentario super Articulos Magistrorum Parisiensium: whence it had appeared that this Commentary being a piece of the new Lutherans, one might expect to find in it such facts, as could not decently be advanced by the Sorbonne. That Commentary, to observe it by the by, is quoted by John Bale, in his Life of Clement VII, and it relates to the twenty five articles of the Sorbonne, published by Peter Gallandius, in 1543, and confuted by Calvin in his Antidote, &c. See Du Boulay, Tom. VI. pag. 384, 385, of his History of the University of Paris. REM. CRIT.]

[N] A dialogue which it is feigned he had with St Peter at the gate of paradise. It is a most satirical piece. Wolfius has inserted it in his Lectiones memorabiles (53). Rivetus (54) affirms, that it was printed at Paris with the king's licence, in the year 1612, at the ends of the acts of the council of Pisa. The substance

(45) Id. ibid.

(46) Desartene, nisi vigilares quam male esset mundo quem regimus nos, ego mihi venator, & ebrius ille ac sceleratus Julius. Du Plessis, Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 380, ubi quæritur Joachim Cuzes Freitadensis, in Annalibus, gentis Silesiæ.

(47) Arnoldus Ferronus, in Ludov. XII, fol. 54, verso.

(48) I speak of that dialogue in the remark [N].

(49) I have this remark from Mr de la Moignon.

(50) Du Plessis, Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 384.

(51) Wolfius, Lectiones Memorabiles, Tom. II, pag. 21.

(52) In his Etat de l'Eglise, 24. ann. 1513, pag. m. 52.

(53) Pag. 61, of the second volume.

(54) Remarque sur la Réponse au Mystere d'Iniquité, Part. II, pag. 614.

France, where he had found a good sanctuary under the pontificate of Alexander VI, was so excessive, that he ordered that all the French which could be met with should be killed [O], and promised a recompence to whosoever should execute his order. We are not to believe, that the wine and hams which he sent to the king of England, were the true cause of the war of the English against France [P]. I do not know whether substance of it is this. 'Paulo post pñus mortem Virquidam doctus in lucem emisit Dialogum, quem inscripsit, Julius, in quo Pontificem hunc horrendorum criminum insinuat, nim. quod fuerit homo palam sceleratus, temulentus, homicida, simoniacus, veneficus, perjurus, rapax, portentosis libidinum generibus undique concupiscens, denique scabie, quam vocant Galliam, totus coopertus [55]. — A little after his death, a certain learned man published a dialogue, which he intitled Julius, in which he accuses this Pope of horrid crimes; for instance, that he was openly mischievous, a drunkard, a murderer, guilty of simony, a poisoner, perjured, rapacious, defiled with monstrous kinds of lust, and lastly, covered with what they call the French pox.' Some say that Faustus Andrelinus (56) was the author of that satirical piece. Some ascribe it to Erasmus; Mr Placcius affirms, that several authors say this in the two places he quotes of Melchior Adam (57). I have consulted those two places, and have found no other testimony than that of Leo Juda. Thus Mr Placcius deceives us. Erasmus was very much troubled, that such a piece should be ascribed to him: he justifies himself very seriously in a letter. 'Dialogi cuiusdam suspitionem mihi moluntur impingere. Is ut ex argumento satis constat, scriptus est in odium divi Julii Pontificis Maximi schismatis tempore, sed à quo incertum, ante quinque annos degustavi verius quam legi. Post reperi in Germania apud quosdam descriptum, sed variis titulis. Quidam testabantur Hispani conspiciam esse, sed suppressio nomine, rursus alii Fausto Poëtae tribuebant, alii Hieronymo Balbo. Ego quid de his conjectem non habeo, subodoratus sum quoad licuit, verum nondum persequar, quod animo meo faceret satis. Inepti quilibet scripsit, ac majore supplicio dignus, quisquis vulgavit. Ac miror esse qui solo Styli argumento mihi obtrudere parent, quom nec mea sit phrasis, nisi prorsus ipse mihi sum ignotus, nec mirum sit futurum, etiam si qui in oratione nonnihil referrent Erasmus, quum verber in manibus omnium, & referimus fere, in quorum assidua lectione versamur (58).'

[O] His hatred . . . against France, . . . was so excessive, that he ordered that all the French which could be met with should be killed. Julius's rage had no bounds; he had made a decree in the name of the council, to transfer the kingdom of France, and the title of Most Christian, to the king of England (59). As he was upon the point of publishing it, heaven taking pity of him and of Christendom, called him out of the world, the twenty third of February. He died of an hectic fever, caused, as he said, by the uneasiness he was under, that he could not bring the Venetians to come to an agreement with the emperor; so furious were his passions, and more suitable to the sultan of the Turks, than to the common father of Christians (60). As for his order of murdering the French, I have read it only in the 100th, and 110th pages of Francis Hotman's Brutum Fulmen. 'Si quæ patrum memoria, says, be, in hoc regno contigerunt recordari volumus, primum hoc reperimus: Ludovicum XII (at, quem Regem? qui Patris patriæ nomen summo bonorum omnium consensu adeptus est) urbes aliquot Italie, bello captas, Papæ Julii secundi ditioni adjunxisse. Papam intermissis aliquot mensibus hanc Regi pro accepto beneficio gratiam remisisse, ut non modo eum schismaticum & hæreticum pronuntiaret, proscriberet, diris suis excommunicationum fulminibus infestaret, verum etiam Gallos omnes hostiles in modum cruciandos intermediumque curaret: præmium etiam percussoribus polliceretur peccatorum omnium veniam, & impunitatem, si quis vel unicum Gallum quoque modo trucidaret. . . . Quo nuntio (61) Julius accepto, tanto dolore atque iracundia exarsit, ut non modo Gallis omnibus aqua & igne interdicere, verum etiam obvium quemque mactari, trucidarique imperaret: præmiis etiam, ut dixi sicarios ac percussores invitaret. — If we would call to mind what happened in this kingdom, in the memory of our fathers, we shall find the principal transaction to be this: that Lewis XII (but what king? one, who, by general consent, obtained the name of father of his country) added to the dominion of Pope Julius II, some cities of Italy, taken in war: that the Pope, after some months, returned the king this favour, for the benefit he had received, that he not only pronounced him a Schismatic and Heretic, proscribed and excommunicated him; but procured all the French to be tortured and slain in an hostile manner; and even promised a reward to those, who should assassinate but one Frenchman, together with pardon of all their sins, and indulgences. . . . When Julius heard this news, he was so exasperated, that he not only proscribed all the French, but even enjoined those, who should meet them, to assassinate and make away with them: he also encouraged cut-throats and assassins, as I said, by promise of rewards.'

V O L. III.

[P] We are not to believe that the wine and hams . . . were the true cause of the war of the English against France. Spondanus has been so unjust as to insinuate this, and to jest upon it; and he pretends that Polydore Virgil said nothing of it, to save at once the honour of Italy and England. Polydore was an Italian, and lived in England; he was therefore concerned in the glory of both these nations. Now he thought it unworthy of Italy to win people by such allurements, and unworthy of England to suffer itself to be caught by such a bait. These are the words of the Annalist. 'Festum est quod refert Guicciardinus, appulisse hoc tempore in Angliam Pontificiam longam navem Falerno vino, caseis, sumibusque onustam, quæ nomine Pontificis Regi ac Principibus, Antilibusque donata, ab omnibus miro applausu accepta sunt: & plebem, quam plerumque non minus leviam quam graviam movent, ad eam navem videndam summa cum voluptate accurrisse, gloriantem antea nunquam in ea insula navim ullam cum Pontificis vexillis conspectam. Quibus bellam gentem nobis depingit Guicciardinus, & vini acutius gustus appetentem, quibus sciret Pontifex eam facile in partes suas trahi posse; sicuti olim Narses fecisse dicitur, ut Longobardos in Italiam alliceret; omnes generis Poma, aliorumque deliciarum irritamenta, quorum Italia ferax esset, mittens, ut pauperima sua rura deferentes ad occupandam regionem cunctis refectam divitiis venirent. Eam verò rem adeo insignem, & Regi, principibusque, & antilibus, ac populo maxime acceptam gratamque, cum Polydorus Virgilius suæ historiæ Anglicanæ non inseruerit; exilimamus, eum ut Italum, & in Anglia commorantem, utriusque nationis gravitati parcere voluisse (62). — It is a merry story, which Guicciardin relates, that a ship belonging to the Pope, laden with Falernian wine, cheese, and Westphalia-hams, arrived at that time in England; which being made a present of, in the Pope's name, to the king, nobles, and prelates, was received by them all with wonderful applause; and that the common people, whom trifles affect no less than things of moment, flocked to see that ship with great pleasure, boasting that they had never before seen in that island any ship with Papal colours. Guicciardin tells us, that nation was fond of wine and high-seasoned meats, by which the Pope knew he should easily draw them to his party; as they say Narses once did, to entice the Lombards into Italy, sending them all kinds of fruit, and other delicacies, with which Italy abounds, that they might be induced to leave their own native poverty, and take possession of a country full of all sorts of riches. Now whereas Polydore Virgil has not inserted in his History of England this memorable fact, so highly acceptable to the king, nobles, prelates, and people, I take the reason to be, because, being an Italian, and residing in England, he had regard to the gravity of both nations. Mezzerai comes much nearer the truth; for he observes, that the Pope spurred on Henry VIII, with the ambition of protecting the true church. The English, says he (63), were upon the point of breaking with the king. For the Pope had made them drunk with the vain-glory of defending the holy See, and with the flavour of delicious wines of all sorts, with which he had sent them a great ship laden, together with hams, saulages, and spices, to make them relish the better. According to Varillas (64), it was from a motive of religion, (55) Joann. Zuingeri, de Fæsto Corporis Christi, pag. 140.

(56) In the edition of Wolfius there is in the title F. A. F. Poëta Regii libellus de obitu Julii secundi.

(57) A Desiderio Erasmo Rotterodamo conscriptus esse diversorum testimonio confirmatur apud Melch. Adam. in Vitis Theologicæ Germ. pag. m. 9, (it should be 97) & pag. 157 (it should be 159) in Vitis Medicæ. Germ. Placcius, de Aegymia, n. 259, pag. 72.

(58) Erasmi. Epist. i, lib. xii, pag. 575, 576.

(59) Concilia si Re d'Inghilterra alla guerra: alquale haveva ordinato che per decreto del Concilio Lateranense se trasferisse il nome del Re Christianissimo: sopra laqual cosa era già scritta una Bolla, contenendosi in essa medesimamente la privatione della dignità, e del titolo di Re di Francia, concedendo quel Regno a qualunque lo occupasse. Guicciardin, lib. xi, fol. 325. — He furred up to make war, the king of England, to whom he had transferred by public decree of the council of Latran, the name of Christianissimo, whereas there was already a Bull written, and in it likewise was contained the privation of the dignity and name of the king of France giving his kingdom to who could occupy it. Fenton, ubi supra, pag. 632.

(60) Mezzerai, Abr. Chronol. Tom. IV, pag. 494, ad ann. 1513.

(61) That is, that he had been succeeded by the council of Pisa, transferred to Milan.

* Paul. Diacon. de Gest. Longob. lib. i, cap. v.

(62) Spondanus, ad ann. 1512, n. 3, pag. m. 289, where these words have been placed as a summary. Quibus illis Pontifex sui Anglos benevolos reddiderit.

ibid. ad 10 (33) ad 10 (33) ad 10 (33)

(63) Atregé Chronol. Tom. IV, pag. 45, ad ann. 1512.

(64) Varill. Histoire de Louis XII, liv. 8, pag. 81.

whether it is possible to find a certain speech, in which he was very ill treated. Varillas, who speaks of it, is liable to censure [2]. The history of Venice, written by Cardinal Bembo, is sufficient to shew the passion, treachery, and prodigious ambition of Julius II, though this historian be less prolix upon it than Guicciardin.

This Pope was so tired with the plaisters that his Surgeon put unsuccessfully upon an ulcer, that he would no longer suffer him to dress it. The Surgeon, who had promised with an oath not to use any more that remedy, made use of an artifice, and cured it [R]. Bandel tells a story that is pleasant enough [S]. I have just now read in a French writer, that this Pope was so malicious as to invent a fable prejudicial to the memory of Gaston de Foix, duke of Nemours, and which might increase the superstition of the people, to the disadvantage of France. The story was, that a serpent had been

(65) Henry VIII gave that entertainment.

religion, that an English bishop founded an alarm for war the day after the feast (65), where the chief members of the parliament were treated with the good wines and excellent cheeses which the Pope's ship had brought to London. This prelate represented, that Lewis XII was a persecutor of the church, and that it would be an eternal disgrace to the English nation to live in peace with the persecutors of 'the holy see.' Varillas should have a little better explained all the reasons of this prelate, and not have been contented to give us to understand, that some political reasons were added to those religious motives. The English prelate urged no doubt, that Lewis XII would depose the Pope, only to create another in his room, who would permit him to conquer Italy. This certainly was the true spring that put Henry VIII in motion; he plainly perceived, that if no opposition was made to it, Lewis XII would reap all the glory of deposing Julius II, the scourge of Christendom, and of creating a new Pope devoted to him, and of subduing all Italy. Human policy and jealousy do not suffer a prince to consent to such an aggrandizing of the glory and power of his neighbours; and for this reason Lewis XII saw the forces of England, Switzerland and Spain against him.

[2] Mr Varillas, who mentions a certain speech... is liable to censure. He says (66), that Pompey Colonna, and Antony Seveli, understanding that the Pope was fallen into 'a sort of a swoon, that lasted four hours, and gave occasion to believe he was dead... called (67) their friends together, run through the streets, encouraged the townsmen to a sedition, and led them to the town-hall, where Colonna, the most eloquent of the two, pronounced the most satirical speech that is extant, against the Popes in general, and Julius in particular. He pretended, that they had most of them abused the sovereign authority, ever since they had usurped it; and reckoning up the towns that had heretofore been under tyrants, he concluded, that not one of them had been so ill treated as that of Rome. He entered into the particulars of the conduct of the late Popes, and dropt some things upon that subject, which it is not decent to relate.' Mr Varillas adds (68), 'that Guicciardin had written this speech from the memoirs of two or three persons that heard it; but it has been taken out of the body of his history. Nevertheless it is to be found printed by itself in Italian; and the French translator who recovered it, restored it to the place it was taken from.' I have occasion for another passage of this author, before I make my criticism: let us see the beginning of his preface (69). 'When, says he, I caused the eighth book of this history to be printed, I thought that the speech of Pompey Colonna to the principal citizens of Rome, to oblige them to shake off the Pope's yoke, was a very rare piece. Indeed, I had never seen it, except in the king's library. But I have been informed since, that it has been reprinted by the care of the late Mr Wicquefort, at the beginning of the book he published with the title of Tuanus Restitutus, and consequently it is not hard to recover. It is true however, that the same Mr Wicquefort has acquitted himself, in that respect, but of one part of his duty to the public, since he has not mentioned the motives that occasioned this speech, which is the most insolent that can be read; and whereas Guicciardin has been as negligent to relate them, the curious will perhaps not be displeased, if I supply the deficiency of these two historians. The first motive, &c.'

(66) Varillas, Hist. de Louis XII, lib. viii, pag. 8, ad ann. 1511.

(67) Ibid. pag. 10.

(68) Ib. pag. 73.

(69) Of the third Tome of the History of Lewis XII.

I can neither affirm nor deny that this speech is in the French king's library; but I can say, that Guicciardin has never inserted it in his history. He only speaks (70) by the bye of the tumult these two persons endeavoured to raise; and he does not say, that it was Pompey Colonna who made that speech, as being the most eloquent. It is not true, that the French translator has restored this speech to the place from whence it was taken. If it was so, it would not be a rare piece, the French translation of Guicciardin being a book common enough. It is not true, that it was reprinted by the care of Mr Wicquefort, at the beginning of Tuanus Restitutus; but this doubtless misled Varillas. They have left out of the fourth book of Guicciardin a long discourse concerning the manner how the Popes became temporal lords of part of Italy. The Protestants have preserved this discourse, and published it by itself a great many times (71). It is to be found (72) in Latin, Italian, and French, at the end of Tuanus Restitutus, printed at Amsterdam, in 1663, and it is in the place where it ought to be in the French translation of Guicciardin, made by Jerom Chomedey, and printed at Geneva in the year 1593, with summaries and marginal notes, which breathe a true Protestant spirit (73). Varillas having heard some account of this discourse, and something concerning the speech of those who endeavoured to dispose the Romans to an insurrection in the year 1511, has confounded the one with the other (§a).

[(§a)] Though Guicciardin has not inserted in his history the speech of Pompey Colonna, he has however given us an abstract of it, which having been left out in most editions, was reprinted by Wicquefort at the end of his Tuanus Restitutus. Note, that the said abstract is also wanting in Fenton's English translation, pag. 540. REM. CRIT.]

[R] His Surgeon... made use of an artifice which cured the ulcer. Naudé brings in this example in a dissertation, where he enquires whether a patient ought to be deceived. 'Is (celeberrimus) Chirurgus Joannes de Vigo dum nodum carnosum Julii secundi contumaciorem in dies fieri, & Pontificem omne genus remedium constanter respicere animadvertit, novam quamdam medendi rationem meditatus est: panis filiginei mica molliore, & arsenici sublimati in aquis rosarum & plantaginis excepti fomento, ad tertias in vase æneo decoxit, expressisque demum illis, & pulveris modo ulceri admotis, quod nullis deinceps unguentis se curaturum jurejurando receperat, brevi summa cum omnium admiratione Pontificem à gravi & molesto affectu liberavit (74). — The famous Surgeon Johannes de Vigo, perceiving that an ulcer of Julius II became every day more stubborn, and that the Pope persisted in refusing all manner of remedies, hit upon a new method of cure: for he boiled together in a brass kettle, for three hours, old rags cut in pieces, with crumbs of fine bread, and a fermentation of arsenic sublimed in rose-water, and plantain; after which, drying them, and applying them by way of powder to the wounds, so which he had sworn he would no longer apply plaisters, he cured the Pope in a very short time of a troublesome disease, to the wonder of every one.'

[S] Bandel tells a story that is pleasant enough. The Germans, says he (75), having asked the Pope to leave to eat flesh upon St Martin's day, when it should fall on a fish-day; Julius would not flatly deny them that favour, but granted it on condition they should drink no wine the same day. This was the same thing as a refusal; there being more to be lost than gotten by such a favour.

(70) Guicciardin, l. vi. x. f. l. 230. See also Paul Jovius, in Vita Leonis X, pag. m. 138.

(71) See the article GUICCIARDIN, remark [d].

(72) With two other passages that had been retrenched, one out of the third book of Guicciardin, and the other out of the tenth book.

(73) Written by la Noue.

(74) Naudé, in Pentade Quæst. hæreticæ theologorum, pag. 122. Edit. Genevæ 1647. He quotes Joannes de Vigo, lib. iii. Chirurg. Tract. II, cap. v.

(75) Bandel, ubi super. This is a remark of Mr de la Moisson.

[T] He

been seen to come out of the duke of Nemours's tomb. The author who tells me this, speaks very ill of that Pope [7].

[7] He was so malicious as to invent a fable prejudicial to the memory of Gaston de Foix . . . the author who tells me this, speaks very ill of that Pope.]

I begin with the story: 'Non defuere qui prædicarent serpentem visum de Fuxensis tumulo sibilum exilire, & hi maxime sacrificuli; nam ab iisdem sæpe aliquid spectri novi intelligimus, sed Physici mitiores (76).

(76) Forcatulus, de Gallor. Imperio & Philosophis, lib. iv, pag. m. 553.

Some there were who gave out, that a serpent was seen to spring out, hissing, from the tomb of De Foix, and those chiefly priests: for we often hear from them of some new prodigy; but naturalists are kinder to us. Note, by the way, that he says the priests were the principal promoters of the story; and that it is a common thing with them to spread prodigies. I omit his quotation of Ælian and Sozomen

(77) Lib. ix, cap. xvii, concerning two serpents found in the sepulchre of the prophet Zachariah.

(77), and will only take what relates to our Julius II. Tales nugas in vulgus emiserat malignitas Julii II. Pontificis Rom. credulitas rudis dederat incrementum (78). — The malice of Pope Julius II, spread these fables among the people, who too credulously pagated them. He relates afterwards how this Pope deceived cardinal George d'Amboise, and made Rome rebound with arms; and how he was delighted with satirical verses against France. He forgave a Poet several crimes, and ordered him a good sum of money for a distich, which we shall see below. Versiculis ad Gallorum ignominiam spectantibus mirè delectatur: adeo ut poetæ stateres aureos ducentos numerarit, præter delictorum abolitionem, qui hos vulgasset:

(78) Forcat. ubi supra, pag. 554.

Julius evulsi Gallis cythereis alas:
Martius hic præfco Cæsare major erit (79).

(79) Id. ibid. pag. 556.

He was wonderfully delighted with verses respecting on the French; inasmuch, that he made a present of two hundred pieces of gold, besides the pardon of his sins, to the Poet, who had published the following:

Julius, who pluck'd the Frenchmen's wings, shall be Greater than Cæsar of antiquity.

Forcatulus, my author in this remark, opposes to these two verses a sharp distich that was made against this Pope. 'Eminuit in contrarium non inelegans Distichum, dignum, opinor, quod Catulli esset, non auctoris incogniti:

Fæx Ligurum Romam, ponti fæx concutit armis Julius, huic Brutum Gallia fortis alit (80).

(80) Id. ibid.

JULIUS III, created Pope the seventh of February 1550, was called John Maria del Monte. He was of low extraction, and a true soldier of ecclesiastical fortune. He rose up step by step till he came to be president of the council of Trent [4]. He was a very voluptuous man [B], and passionately loved a young boy very ugly, and of very

[4] He had rose up step by step till he became president of the council of Trent.] Not to speak of his first advancements, I shall first observe, that he assisted in the council of Lateran, and made a solemn speech at the conclusion of it. He was archbishop of Siponto, auditor of the apostolical chamber, and twice governor of Rome. He was given for an hostage when Rome was sacked by the troops of Charles V., and after his promotion to the cardinalship, he was frequently legate in the principal provinces of the ecclesiastical state and at Bologna (1). He took the name of Julius in memory of Julius II, who had raised his family by the promotion of Antony del Monte, his uncle, to the cardinalship, and from whom he obtained the archbishopric of Siponto. He was born at Rome, in that part of the town called del Parione; but his family was originally of Monte-San-Savino in Tuscany, from whence he took the name of Monte, instead of that of Giocchi, which he bore before (2). He obtained of the duke of Tuscany, the investiture of Monte-San-Savino for his brother: he could not deny himself the pleasure of seeing his family lord it in that place. Impotens sibi temperandi ab eâ voluptate quâ

(1) Taken from Palavicini, Hist. Concil. Trident. lib. xiii, cap. x, n. 3.

(2) Amelet de la Houffaye, in the margin of his translation of Father Paul, pag. 280, ex Onapris.

— There was handed about a tolerably good distich to the contrary, worthy, I think, of Catullus, not of an unknown author:

From France another Brutus soon shall come,
To shake this Julius, who with arms shakes Rome.

Some, continues he, observed, that the time was come in which another Julius, by profusion of borrowed money, obtained the pontificate, and supplanted his competitors; but that this new Julius had nothing common with the other, as to learning, clemency, or honesty; nor had nothing common with the Apostle St Peter, no, not as to the fishing-boat, since the Apostle employed it for an honest livelihood, but Julius in piracy. If you understand Latin you will soon see that I lend nothing to Forcatulus (81). 'Non nulli adiciebant rediisse pro certo Julii seculum, quo ille nimirum profusa largitione Pontificatum indeptus fuerat confiato multo ære alieno, superatque, ut Tranquillus ait, duobus competitoribus ætate & dignitate potioribus . . . Julius demum qui nihil doctriæ cum illo primo & perpetuo Dictatore commune habuit, nihil fidei & benevolentiae, nihil cum Apostolo Petro sanctitatis & prudentiæ, nihil morum (nisi forsan quod Petrus in mari innoxiam piscationem exercuit, ille aliquandiu, ut ajunt, piraticam) post novenne imperium, & si quid mensium excurrit, obitum in Galliam animum ad Manes relit (§ 7).'

(81) Id. ibid.

* In Julio, cap. xiii.

[(§ 7) In the year 1511, Julius II interdicted the whole kingdom of France (except the duchy of Bretagne), and removed the fairs of Lyons to Geneva. This appears by the decree made in the third session of the council of Lateran: 'Anno M. D. XI, die nono Calendras Novembris, & anno sequenti Idibus Augusti, Franciæ Regnum, Lugdunum præcipue, (Britanniæ Ducatu excepto) Ecclesiastico Interdicto subjecit, Nundinasque Lugduni solitus habere in Genesem civitatem transtulit, ut refert Pontificum Diploma in tertia Sessione Synodi Lateranensis, in qua etiam hæc leguntur: 'Damnationis alumnos Bernardinum Carvajal, Guillelmum Brissonet, Renatum de Pria, & Fredericum de S. Severino, Cardinales, eorumque fautores sacro Concilio approbante damnamus, reprobamus & detestamur. Porro Julius Papa, qui antea Julianus, in hæc verba prorupit moriens, Ut Julius Cardinalibus indulgeo Schismaticis, ut Julianus justitiæ rationem habendam judico: id notatam est à Parisio Craff. Cæremoniarum Sacelli Pontifici Magistro †. REM. CRIT.]

† Petr. Frizon, in Gallia Purpurata, pag. 557. He cites Craffius, in Diaritis Pontif.

suos adspiceret in illis dominantes inter quos educati fuerant æquales (3).

[B] He was a very very voluptuous man.] Here is what Thuanus says of it. 'Sub id tempus Julius III intemperantia vitæ magis quam senio effectus fato concessit, qui Joanne Baptista Balduini fratris F. Moruo, cum non ita a Fabiano juniore Baptiste fratre, sollicitaretur, totum se voluptatibus mancipaverat, parato ad delicias nobili illo secessu, structura & operibus antiquis admirando, in quo fere reliquam vitam à negotiis vacuus cum amicis sui similibus, inter ludos, aleam, comedias, & quæ talia comitari amant, sacro fastigio indigna oblectamenta, continuatis noctibus transegit (4). — About that time died Julius III, through intemperance of life, not old age, who, after the death of John Baptist, nephew to Baldwin, being not so solicited by Fabian, younger brother of Baptist, gave himself up wholly to pleasures, in that noble retirement, so famous for it's structure and works of antiquity, in which he passed the rest of his life, free from business, with friends like himself, diverting himself day and night with gaming, plays, and such like entertainments, unworthy his sacred dignity.'

(3) Palavicini, ubi supra.

(4) Thuan. lib. xv, pag. 306.

[C] He

of very mean birth [C]. When he was made Pope, he gave him his cardinal's cap [D], and made a pleasant answer, when the unworthiness of the person was represented to him [E]. His discourses had but little gravity in them, as appears from the

[C] He passionately loved a young boy, very ugly, and of very mean birth. Some said it was his son, others denied it, and told how cardinal del Monte having found this lad playing tricks with a monkey in the streets, took him into his service, because there was no body but he that durst play with that creature. This was the foundation of a kindness which afterwards grew a disorderly passion. This lad had nothing in him but what was loathsome, only he had gotten a habit of buffoonry. Thomas Erasmus relates this; these are his own words. 'Habet puerum quendam, nigram, turpem, arrogantissimam bestiam, ineptam, ignorantem & planè inertem, nisi quod nonnihil eorum quæ scurræ, didicerunt in ore habet. In summa, corpore & animo monstrum. Quis, unde, aut ejus ille puer sit, tam sunt variae hominum sententiae & opiniones, ut nemo exploratum habere videretur. Animadverti ego quosdam, qui filium arbitrabantur; & qui filium negabant, ingeniosè aliorum dicta refutare, atque in plateis repertum eduxisse & parvulo, propter simiam, cum qua præter illum nemo hominum ludere auderet. Ea re Cardinalem (aut Episcopum tum) ita delectatum, ut pro suo habuerit. Hunc puerum, miser, ita amat perditè, ita deperit (dicitur autem alios omnes vincere in τῇ μάχῃ scilicet) ut nihil possit dici vehementius (5). — He has a boy, a black, filthy, insolent brute, silly, and ignorant, and quite a fool, except that he can play the buffoon a little. Upon the whole, he is a monster both in body and mind. Who he is, and whence he sprang, no one knows. Some think him his son; and those, who deny it, ingeniously come off, by saying, he found him in the streets, and brought him up from a child, because of his playing with an ape, which no one else dared to do: the cardinal (or bishop, then) was so pleased, they say, with the sight, that he took him for his own. He is the fondest imaginable of this boy, as indeed he exceeds all others in pederasty.' Thuanus says a thing which confirms part of this: as first, that this boy was called the monkey, even when he had obtained the cardinal's cap. In the second place, that he had his name, because of his employment with the cardinal, his master, which was to look after a monkey. Soluti ad omnem licentiam animi homo: they are the words of this great historian, which give a very ill character of Pope Julius III. 'Statim adepta dignitate qualis esset, omnibus manifestum fecit. Nam cum antiquæ consuetudinis sit, ut novus Pontifex galerum, cui velit, suum largiatur, eum juveni cuidam cui Innocentio nomen, quique, quod in familia similæ curam gereret. Similæ etiam post adeptam dignitatem nomen retinuit, cognomine etiam suo atque insignibus attributis donavit' (6). — Being addicted to every kind of pleasure, he was no sooner created Pope, than he discovered to every one his disposition. For, it being an ancient custom, that the new Pope gives his hat to whom he pleases, he gave it to a certain youth, whose name was Innocentius, and who, because he had the care of a monkey in the family, retained the name of Simia, giving him his name and marks of honour.' See the notes upon the Confession Catholique de Sancy, page 249, of the edition 1699.

[D] ... he gave him his cardinal's cap. We have just seen in Thuanus, that cardinal del Monte being Pope, immediately conferred his cap, his name, and (7) his arms upon a young fellow that was called Innocent, and took care of a monkey. Erasmus, whom I have already cited, gives us a more particular account. This boy was left at Bologna, so that Julius III who would not bring him to Rome before he had made him a cardinal, and who wanted a little time to make that promotion relished, was very uneasy at his absence, and endeavored to find a remedy for it. He was never gay and pleasant, but when he heard of his Innocent, and enquired after him of all those who could give an account of him. He ordered him to come near Rome, that he might have an opportunity to go and see him; and having sent for him once secretly into the city, he expected him at the windows with all the impatience of a man, to whom his mistress has promised a night. He was heard say, that the chief reason why he rejoiced for being Pope, was because it gave him an opportunity of being a benefactor to Innocent; and that he thought himself less indebted to the cardinals for making him Pope, than for having consented to the promotion of Innocent to a cardinal's hat (8). He appointed him his principal minister, and intercessor for all those that would obtain favours of him. 'Dum Romæ post electionem commoraretur, (manserat autem Innocentius, id ei nomen, Bononiæ dicitur nunquam lætus fuisse, nisi dum aliquid de Innocentio intelligeret. Et audiui ego à gravibus viris, inter tam multos Bononienses, qui Romam sint profecti, neminem esse repertum, quem sciret cum Innocentio, aut suspicaretur fuisse, qui non interrogatus ab eo esset, quid, & quomodo Innocentius ageret. Post aliquot menses propius Romam accedere jussit, ut ad eum deambulatum aliquando Roma exire posset. Non enim potuit adduci, ut pateretur eum ingredi Romam, nisi galero rubeo esset ornatum turpe caput. Ab hac re plurimi Cardinales videbantur abhorre, minimeque passuri, ut in Cardinalium numerum cooptaretur, quem ne hominem quidem esse cognovissent. Accessit igitur noctu aliquando in urbem clam, atque ita in fenestris expectabat, ut ii solent, quibus amica, qua nihil habent in vita charius, pollicita est noctem. Dicitur dixisse; se lætari, quod in amplissimam illam potestatem esset collocatus, non tam sua causa, quàm quòd posset bene de Innocentio mereri. Et tandem factus Cardinalis dixit, se pro beneficio magis Cardinalibus obstrictum esse, quàm quòd se Pontificem esse voluerint. Præterea, ut qui aliquid à se velint, id per Innocentium esse impetrandum. Quemobrem Legati Civitatum, Principum & Regum ad puerum concurrunt, illi sua negotia exponunt, ut is de rebus suis gravissimis etiam ad Papam referat (9). Some satires were published at Rome, in which it was said that this favourite, as ugly as he was, was a new Ganymede. The Pope made no mystery of it; but sometimes told the cardinals some stories of this boy's lascivious tricks. 'Romæ fama, erat, & libellis quæ per scriptum fuit, à Jove Ganymedem foveri, licet deformem; sed nec ipse Pontifex hoc ad reliquos Cardinales dissimulare, & per jocum fertur aliquando commemorare, quam sit lascivus adolefcens & importunus (10). I shall speak again of the adventures of this man in the remark [M].

[E] ... and he made a pleasant answer when the unworthiness of the person was represented to him. I will make use of John Bodin's words. 'The prince who exalts a worthless creature above men of merit, or that sets him in the rank of the greatest persons, in doing good to one, does injury to all the rest: As it was represented by the consistory of cardinals to Pope Julius del Monte, when he gave his cardinal's cap to the young lad he loved; that it was a great dishonour to admit him who had neither virtue nor knowledge, nor birth, nor estate, nor any other quality to deserve, as they said, to arrive to such a dignity. But the Pope, who was very facetious, addressing himself to the other cardinals; what virtue, said he, what nobility, what knowledge, what honour have you found in me, to whom I make me Pope (11)? Was not this to make a jest of the Sacred College? And might not Cato's exclamation be applied to this Pope, What a comical confusion have we (12). Some report Julius's answer was thus: 'pray what have you found in me, to do me the honour of making me Pope without deserving it? Let us advance then this young man, and he will deserve it (13). These last words are a sly jeer, and reprove a very common fault. When a man is possessed of an employment, he finds a thousand flatterers, who give out, he has very well deserved it. Montagne says somewhere †, that Antisthenes once made the Athenians sensible of the abuse committed in the promotions to public posts; he advised them to give order, that their asses should be made to plough as well as their horses. It was answered him, that that animal was not made for it: 'it is all one, replied he, all depends upon your decree: for the most ignorant and unqualified, that you employ, as commanders in your wars, fall not immediately to become highly meritorious, because † Bodin lib. cap. 249.

(8) Compare with this what is said in the remark [M], citat. 4.

(5) Thomas Lubrus (qui Erasmus postea voce Græca appellari amavit) in Epistola ad Pellicanum, apud Hottingerum, Hist. Ecclesiast. Tom. V, pag. 572.

(6) Thuan. lib. vi, pag. 121, col. 1.

(7) See the remark [M], in the margin, citat. (30).

(9) Erasmus, ubi super.

(10) Sleidam, Hist. lib. 115, fol. m. 669, verso.

(11) Bodin, de la Reuelique, lib. 1, cap. 14, pag. m. 743.

(12) Adjungit Plotarchus cum Ciceroem cum Moremum Ciceronem esse defensorum Cato, scilicet exposita Stimulatione in Catoem, ante risu inquit à corona pervenit ad subellia, subellia per se ipsum Ciceronem leviter atque ad consilium dixit, quam relictam, juocem, habentem Consilium. Ps. 1550, pag. m. 1550, ex falso Diffinitio, pag. 249.

(13) John Croft, l'Estat de l'Eglise, ad rom. 1550, pag. m. 1550, ex falso Vergetio.

[F] The

the reflexion he one day made upon the answer of two cardinals [F]. The want of gravity was not his greatest fault: it is said that his discourse proceeded sometimes to prophaneness and blasphemy; as when he excused his passion by instancing the anger that God expressed against Adam for an apple [G]. During the conclave in which he was elected, some of his letters were intercepted, which made it conjectured, that this future Pope would be a lewd man; for those letters were stuffed with the most extravagant obscenities [H]. It is thought his money frustrated the election of Cardinal Pole, which had been concluded on, and the publication whereof was only deferred, because they were afraid it would be an ill omen to notify it in the night (a). The medal which he ordered to be struck after the death of Edward king of England, had for its motto a sentence of the holy Scripture, the application whereof proved false in a little time [I]. This Pope died the twentieth of February 1555, being about sixty eight years

(a) Post longam Cardinalium in conclavi disceptationem, cum, teste in Museo Historico Johanne Imperiali, electus esset Reginaldus Polus, camque electionem promulgare nocte appetente inauspicatum duxissent idem; nocte transacta & multis rationibus aureis Julius Papa subito emerit. Heidegg. Histor. Popatus, pag. 233.

[F] The reflexion which he one day made upon the answer of two cardinals. They found him in the court of his palace in a very indecent posture; for by reason of the heat he had put off his cloaths, and was walking in his drawers. He obliged them to do the like, and afterwards asked them, what the people would say of them, should they go and shew themselves in that figure in the field of Flora, and the streets of Rome? They would take us, answered they, for idle rogues, and would throw stones at us. Therefore, replied he, it is to our cloaths we are obliged for not being thought idle rogues: how much then are we indebted to our cloaths? Cum aliquando exitis vestibus, diploide & caligis tantum indutus, in aula, quod ferveret tempestas, obambulare, venerunt Cardinales duo, collocturi cum ipso. Quos ipse ad exuendas vestes suas, & deambulandum secum urgebat, mox autem nudos interrogabat: Quid si in Campo Floræ, aut per plateas nudi sic deambularem, quid oro populum existimatis de nobis judicaturum? Responderunt: Judicarent nos esse nebulones, & conicerent in nos rudera atque lapides. Excepit Pontifex: Ergo quod non habemus pro nebulonibus, id acceptum ferre debemus nostris vestibus. Quantum igitur, o fratres, debemus illis nostris vestibus (14)?

[G] He excused his passion by instancing the anger that God expressed against Adam for an apple. The thing is thus, related in John Crespin's book. (15) He loved amongst other dishes, to eat hogs flesh, and peacocks: but as his Physician had cautioned him against eating hogs flesh, because it was bad for the gout, with which he was often tormented, and yet he could not abstain from it; the Physician secretly advised the steward to give orders that no hogs flesh should be served in. As therefore it was omitted for some time, and the Pope perceived it, he asked the steward, where was his dish of pork? The steward answered, the Physician had ordered that none should be brought in. Upon which he exclaimed in this manner, bring me my dish, (al dispetto di Dio) in spite of God. . . . Seeing one day a peacock at dinner, which no body touched, keep, said he, this peacock cold for my supper, and lay the table in the garden, for I shall have some company at night. As he was at supper, and saw hot peacocks brought to table, but not his cold one, which he had ordered to be kept for him, flying in to a bitter passion, he uttered an execrable blasphemy against God. Upon which one of the cardinals who sat at table with him, said, your holiness ought not to be in so great a passion, for so little a thing. Julius replied, if God could be so very angry for an apple, as to turn our first father, Adam, out of paradise; why should it not be lawful for me, who am his vicar, to be in a passion for a peacock, since a peacock is much more than an apple? They who will read this story in two languages, may satisfy their curiosity by casting their eyes on what follows (16): Sapissimè nequissimè iste homo blasphemis illis usus fuit quæ impurissimis lenonibus aliisque desperatæ malitiæ hominibus tunc temporis frequenter in ore fuerunt, ad quas animus totus quantus exhorrescit, vid. Al dispetto di Dio, in contemptum (17) Dei, & Potta di Dio, i. e. ad vulvum Dei &c. exemplum hujus rei proponit auctor libri cui titulus, Lectura super Canone de consec. dist. 3. ajens: Intellexi, portatam fuisse in Civitatem Paduæ quandam historiam, impressam Latine, Italice, Germanice, & Gallice, in qua narratur, quod San- ctissimus Dominus noster Papa Julius III proximis diebus valde fuit iratus cum Episcopo Ariminense, ejus Magistro domus, propter certum pavonem, & quum sua prælibata Sanctitas bis blasphemasset, primo dicendo, Potta di Dio, deinde Al dispetto di Dio, quod fecit tanquam Johannes Maria de Monte, & sic tanquam homo, non tanquam Julius III Papa, & Vicarius Christi, de quo supra dixi. Et quum unus Cardinalis illi dixisset, quod non deberet irasci propter unam tam parvam rem, id est, propter unum pavonem, tunc sanctissimus D. Papa respondit: Si Deus fuit totus turbatus, & in magna ira & colera, propter unum pomum, & tanta mala fecit omnibus hominibus; quare non possum ego, qui sum suus Vicarius in terris, irasci cum meo magistro domus propter unum pavonem?

[H] Those letters were stuffed with the most extravagant obscenities. They were written the twenty sixth of January 1550, to one Annibal Contin by Camillus Oliva a conclavist of the cardinal of Mantua, and accompanied with a little poem, in which the author filthily described his passion, and the vehement ardour, that made him wish to have his friend again. It is John Sleiden who tells this. Dum in Conclavi res agitur, interceptæ fuerunt literæ, quas ex Cardinalis Mantuani familiaribus, quidam, Camillus Olivus, ad quandam suam Annibalem Continum, Januarii die XXVI, scripsisse ferebatur, & simul carmen lingua populari scriptum, ubi de sua locutus affectione, & alientis desiderio, tam pudendis utitur verbis, ut sine flagitio vix ea recitare liceat. Hinc jocus illorum, qui pontificem dicebant aliquem obscenorum prænunciari, qui proditurus esset ex eo Conclavi, quod ejusmodi literas daret. (18). An author above cited does not relate this passage without having first said, 'Vir doctus anonymus in E. pist. ad amicum narrat, ex eo Conclavi, in quo creatus est Julius, interceptas fuisse literas alicujus ex Conclavistis, i. e. ex illis, qui solent assistere Cardinalibus, Papam electuris, quibus quidem literis non putet ullâ memoriâ unquam scriptas fuisse ullas obsceniores, sceleratiorisque. Nudis enim nefandissimisque verbis illic agi cum cinædo, salvo honore, Has, fateri, ad se primum in Germaniam fuisse missas, sed dare typis excudendas (ut multi voluissent) nunquam quidem se voluisse. Paulo post addit, Julium III valde male audire in hoc obscenissimo genere, (Sodomitici nim. criminis) ita ut neque a Cardinalibus abstineat (19).'

[I] A medal which he ordered to be struck . . . had for its motto a sentence of the holy Scripture, the application whereof proved false in a little time. They expressed an extraordinary joy at Rome, for the death of king Edward; because the princess Mary, who succeeded him, restored England to the obedience of the Pope; but the reasons of that joy ceased in a little time. Queen Elizabeth re-established the Reformation, and rendered that island one of the most flourishing kingdoms in Christendom; so that the prediction of the medal was a meer chimera. Eo insanie Julius pervenit, ut in perpetuam rei memoriam excudi curaverit monetam, cujus altera pars ejus imaginem tricorniferam ostentavit, altera inscriptionem ejusmodi habuit: Gens & Regnum, quod non servierit tibi, peribit. Sibi sibi vindicans, quod Christo Esaias. Sed diuturnum & stabile gaudium nequitiam fuit (20). — Julius arrived to such a pitch of madness, that he ordered a medal to be struck to perpetuate the memory of the thing, on one side of which was a figure with three horns, and on the reverse this inscription: The people and kingdom, which will not serve

(14) Bullinger, in Vita MS. Julii III, apud Heideggerum Hist. Papatus, 155. 235.

(15) Ubi supra, pag. 553.

(16) Joann. Zuingerus, in Tractatu Histor. Theologico de Fæsto Corporis Christi, pag. 146.

(17) The word contemptus, does not express the force of the Italian word dispetto: it should have been said in odio Deo.

(18) Sleidanus, Hist. lib. xxi, fol. m. 660, verso. This is also to be found in Thuanus, in the Frankfurt edition, 1625, lib. vi, pag. 121.

(19) Joann. Zuingerus, ubi supra.

(20) Heidegger, pag. 238.

(b) Spondanus, ad ann. 1555, n. 43, but Palavicino, Histor. Concil. lib. xiii, cap. x, n. 7, says he was seventy years old.

years of age (b). He pretended to be sick [K]; and the better to deceive the world, he reduced himself to a course of Physic, which brought upon him a real disease, of which he died. It is said, that there was so great an intimacy betwixt him and cardinal Crescentio, that they had mistresses in common; and that they maintained the children they had by them at a common charge [L], for want of knowing who was the true father. Each of them also paid his quota for the maintenance of these women. Cardinal Pallavicino extenuates as much as he can the faults of this Pope, but he does not confute what Father Paul says of them [M] I forgot to observe, that the court

of

'serve thee, shall perish: foolishly arrogating to himself, what Isaiah said of CHRIST. But the joy lasted not long.'

[K] He pretended to be sick. The reason of it was, because he discovered, that the cardinals would refuse to consent to the request, which his brother pressed him to make to them. His brother passionately desired the possession of a town, and importuned the Pope perpetually on that account. That he might therefore have a pretence not to hold a consistory, he pretended to be sick. And to play this trick more artificially, he eat but little, and chose such food, as is fit for sick people. This change of diet, they say, brought on him the distemper of which he died (21). This puts me in mind of Martial's Caelius:

(21) Spondan. ad ann. 1555, n. 43, pag. 556, ex Onuphrio Panvinio. Tibullus relates the same thing, lib. xv, pag. m. 306.

Discurfus varios, vagumque mane,
Et fastus, & ave potentiorum,
Cum perferre patique jam negaret;
Cœpit fingere Cælius podagram.
Quam dum vult nimis approbare veram,
Et sanas linit obligatque plantas,
Inceditque gradu laborioso;
(Quantum cura potest, & ars doloris!)
Desit fingere Cælius podagram (22).

(22) Mart. Epigr. xxxix, lib. vii.

Tir'd with th' attendance, clients pay
At great men: levees every day,
Cælius pretends the gout: but see
Th' effect of this hypocrisy!
Whilst he in flannel wraps his feet,
Or walks on crutches thro' the street,
He plays the counterfeit no more
But has the gout, he feign'd before.

Some say that the change of diet, was indeed the cause of his illness; but not that he resolved upon it, in order to deceive the world: they say he hoped to deliver himself thereby from the intolerable pains of the gout. Others pretend, that an old distemper was the cause of his death, and acknowledge, that he was a man addicted to his pleasures, who thought more of enjoying than exercising his pontificate. 'Sunt etiam qui dicunt, eum veterano interisse: cum, ut idem etiam auctor narrat, externa quæque parum curans, fruendo potius quam regendo Pontificatu in-cumberet, totisque esset in extruenda elegantissima ad voluptarios secessus extra portam Flaminiam Villâ Juliâ, cujus insani studio videbatur; in quâ con-viviis potius quam publicæ procuratori vocabat (23).'

(23) Spondanus ibid. ex Rod.

[L] It is said he and Crescentio . . . had mistresses in common, and that they maintained the children they had by them at a common charge.] This I have from Thomas Erasmus. 'Julius III Pontifex, says he (24), & Crescentius fere omnes meretrices communes habuerunt, propriisque sumptibus neuter, sed communibus aluerunt, atque ut breviter dicam, omnium scelus focii extiterunt. Susceperunt ex quadam muliere, honesti viri Viterbiensis filiam, quam, quod neuter suam esse dicere crederetque posset, ut matrem, ita filiam quoque communibus sumptibus educandam tradiderunt, nuptique dederunt Nobilissimo hujus urbis adolescenti, & inter Principeshujus urbis qui sunt 40 constitutum voluerunt. — Pope Julius III, and cardinal Crescentio, had almost all the courtizans in common, and maintained them jointly; in short, were companions in all manner of vices. They had a child by a certain woman, the daughter of a gentleman of Viterbo, which, because neither of them could say or think it was his own, as they had the mother in common, so they educated the daughter at the joint expense of both, and married her to a noble youth of this city, whom they would have ranked among the princes of this city, who are forty in number.' Here is a great exemption from jealousy, which is a rare thing in that country.

(24) Apud Hottinger. ubi supra, p. 574.

[M] Cardinal Pallavicino extenuates . . . the faults of this Pope, but does not confute what Father Paul says of them.] He owns that this Pope loved to divert himself, but he adds that he equally loved application to business (25), he grants that he died (25) 'Promo ad iactamenta; sed æque etiam ad necesse Palavia. Hist. Concil. Trid. dest. lib. xxi, cap. 4, n. 8. (26) Estimacione leral, nec majore benevolentia mortuus est. Id. ibid. (27) Nihilominus ut mes festinus hac de illo exilimato fuit inique: ipsa quippe via major quidem erat speciem virtutis, sed non fortasse ad postum. Id. ibid. (28) Id. lib. ii, cap. vii, a 4. (29) Id. ibid. lectatus ex eo herus, sibique plaudens, quod sua quæ si perspicacia plantam eximiam, adhuc minutulam, & in luto, diserevisset, majori in puerum benevolentia inculuit, quâ illum profequebatur veluti sui judicii prolem, cujus filii plures quam corporis soboles æstimantur (29).' He would have his brother to adopt him; and when he was Pope, he raised him to the dignity of a cardinal, the thirtieth day of May 1550. He had made him stay till then in a village a day's journey from Rome. He gave him an income of twelve thousand crowns: but did not then entrust him with the administration of affairs. This new cardinal was scarce seventeen years of age: he shewed himself wholly unworthy of this honour, and it was necessary under the following pontificate to punish him for his debaucheries. This is all that Palavicino observes: he has cautiously forbore to criticise on Father Paul; who has most plainly shewed that the world looked upon this minion of Julius as his Catamite: prudence of the actors of would not permit him to revive those ideas. Wherefore he does not accuse Father Paul of malicious slanders, but is contented to say, that he is mistaken as to the time of the adoption (30), and as to the place where this young man first began to make himself acceptable (31). Let us see what Father Paul says.

(30) Palavicino, lib. xi, cap. vii, n. 4, says that it appears from the Journal of M. Grellin, secretary to the council, that the young boy was adopted, when he was one of the actors of the second of March, 1547. (31) Palavicino, ibid. says it was not at Bologna, as Father Paul will have it, but at Piacenza. (32) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (33) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (34) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (35) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (36) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (37) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (38) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (39) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (40) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (41) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (42) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (43) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (44) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (45) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (46) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (47) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (48) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (49) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (50) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (51) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (52) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (53) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (54) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (55) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (56) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (57) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (58) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (59) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (60) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (61) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (62) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (63) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (64) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (65) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (66) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (67) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (68) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (69) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (70) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (71) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (72) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (73) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (74) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (75) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (76) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (77) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (78) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (79) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (80) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (81) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (82) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (83) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (84) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (85) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (86) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (87) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (88) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (89) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (90) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (91) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (92) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (93) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (94) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (95) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (96) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (97) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (98) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (99) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation. (100) Fr. Paolo, lib. iii, ad ann. 1550, pag. 289 of Amis's translation.

of France offered this Pope's nephew a prince's of the blood, and that this alliance was refused [N].

section to him as if he had been his own child, and brought him to Trent, where he had like to have lost him by a great fit of sickness. But sending him, by the Physicians advice, to Verona, for change of air, Innocent, (for that was this minion's name) recovered his health, and some time after returned to Trent. The day that he was to come, the legate went out of town as to take a walk, accompanied with a great many prelates, and meeting him, received him with all the excessive testimonies of joy and affection. Which gave much occasion of discourse whether it was an accidental meeting, or a thing designed to take him in the way. The legate used to say, that he loved him, as being the author of his fortune, for as much as the Astrologers had predicted great wealth, and high dignities to this boy, which could never happen, but by his exaltation to the popedom. He was scarce made Pope, but Innocent was adopted by Baudouin del Monte, his brother, for his son: and afterwards having conferred on him many benefices, he made him a cardinal, as I have said: which afforded matter enough for palquins, and gave the courtiers an itch to speak out the true cause of so surprising an action upon several conjectures drawn from passed accidents.

[N] The court of France offered to this Pope's nephew a prince's of the blood. But this alliance was refused. The Pope answered that marriages between persons of so different a rank could not be happy; and as he acknowledged the royal house of France to be the noblest in the world, he acknowledged his own to be the meanest upon earth. However he did not give the true reason of this refusal; for that which induced him to refuse so glorious an alliance, was, the desire of marrying his nephew to the great duke's daughter: which was more useful to him for the execution of what he was projecting in favour of his family. This we learn from Thuanus.

Julius, says he (33), ad scurrilitatem usque festivus, & alienam ab inuata decessoribus Pontificibus ambitionem mentem præ se ferens, cum tamen interea Cosmi, ut proximi & suorum rebus utilissimi principis adfinitatem ultra modum expeteret, & Cameracensium principatum Fabiano destinaret, ut conditionem tam amplam eluderet, sic Lansacum urgentem dimisit, ut diceret, quam ex nobilissima omnium, quæ usquam fuissent, familia rex prognatus esset, tam se ac suos omnium, qui viverent, mortalium ignobilissimos agnoscere; proinde nuptias, quæ inter pares melius coirent, inter inæquales adeo personas commode contrahi non posse. — Julius being pleased even to buffoonry, and a stranger to the ambition of his predecessors, as he eagerly courted the alliance of Cosmo, a prince nearest him, and most likely to be of advantage to his family, and designed the principality of Camerac for Fabian, dismissed Lansac, who importuned him, telling him, that as the king was of the most noble family that ever was, so he acknowledged himself and his family to be the most ignoble of men; therefore that marriage, which requires an equality of condition, could not conveniently be contracted between persons so unequal. Note, that one of the daughters of Cosmo duke of Florence, was betrothed to Fabian del Monte, who was Baudouin's son, and not yet marriageable. See Thuanus, book xliii. Palavicino, in the place above cited, observes, that Fabian was Baudouin's bastard.

(33) Thuan. lib. xiv, circa init. pag. m. 280, ad ann. 1554.

(34) See in the Croix du Maine, pag. 101.

(35) See the title of it in the remark [A].

JUNCTIN (FRANCIS), in Italian, Giuntino, one of the famous Mathematicians and Astrologers of the XVIth century, was of Florence, but spent a good part of his life in Lyons (a), where he published several books [A]. His being doctor in Divinity (b), did not hinder him from being extremely addicted to judicial Astrology, and that with great credulity. I do not know in what year he died. He was fifty six years old when he published his commentaries upon Sacroboscus's sphere, in the year 1577 (c). Deduce from thence the year of his birth. For the rest, he descended sometimes from the region of heaven, to divert himself with human discoveries; for he composed a discourse upon the Epochæ of Petrarch's amours (d). I have elsewhere spoken (e) of his horoscope of Luther. We shall see, below, the particulars of his life, published by Possévin [B].

[A] He published several books at Lyons. He published there, in 1570, his Tractatus judicandi revolutiones nativitatum, in 8vo. Three years after he published his Speculum Astrologie quod attinet ad judiciariam rationem nativitatum atque annuarum revolutionum, cum nonnullis approbatis Astrologorum sententiis (1). This work was in 4to, but in the edition of 1581, it became a Folio, by reason of the commentaries which were added to it, in duos posteriores Quadripartiti Ptolomæi libros innumeris observationibus referta (2), & certissimis Aphorismis (quatenus ex siderum positione liceat Christiano more aliquid conicere) ex probatissimorum Astrologorum scriptis depromptis insignita. His Latin commentaries upon Sacroboscus's sphere, came out in 1577 (3). There was printed at Cologne, in 1580, a book, intitled De Divinatione quæ fit per asra diversum ac discrepans duorum Catholicorum sacre Theologie Doctorum judicium, scilicet Francisci Junctini at Joannis Lensæi. There are two French tracts of Junctin, viz. A large discourse upon the things wherewith the comet that appeared in November, 1577, threatenet many princes, countries, and people of Christendom. At Paris, for Gervais Mallot, 1577 (4), and at Lyons, for Francis Didier, 1578, in 8vo (5), and A Discourse upon the reformation of the year, made by our Holy Father Pope Gregory XIII, with the reasons of his taking away ten days, and the golden number; at Lyons, 1582, in 8vo. He printed in the same city, in 1580, in 8vo, Discorso sopra il tempo dello innamoramento del Petrar-

ca. Con la spositione del Sonetto, Già fiammeggiava l'amorosa stella (6).

[B] We shall see the particulars of his life, published by Possévin. I knew him in France, says he (7), where he lived in exile; he applied himself to the pernicious speculations of Astrology. He was a fugitive apostate; he had been a Carmelite, and promoted to the priesthood, and even to be Provincial: he forsook his vows, and his profession, and the Romish religion; but by the charitable advice of some devout persons, he was in some measure brought back into the right way. He publicly abjured his heresies in the church of the Holy Cross at Lyons. And he gave reason to believe for some time, that he designed to labour for the advantage of the Catholic church. However, he did not retract the works he had made upon prognosticating impieties (8); he was one of those who putting their hand to the plough, and looking back, are not fit for the kingdom of heaven. He dealt in bills of exchange, lent money upon interest, and by that means got sixty thousand crowns, no footsteps whereof were found after his death. He had made a legacy of three thousand livres to the Juntii, to whom he had been corrector of the press. That testimony of his friendship did them no kindness. Juntii honestissimis Typographis (in quorum ædibus sæpe librorum correctionibus operam Lugduni posuerat) mille aureos nummos cum moriens legasset, ii-mibi facti sunt, eos uti reliquis evanuisse; nimirum omnia perditam fuisse quæ perditus ille anxie hinc inde corraserat (9).

(a) See in the Croix du Maine, pag. 101.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Vossius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 194.

(d) See the title of it in the remark [A].

(e) In the remark [B] of the article LUTHER.

(6) Ibid. pag. 404, 405.

(7) Possévin, Biblioth. Select. Tom. II, pag. m. 245.

(8) Non vidimus eum libros suos de impietate divinatorie retractasse. Id. ib.

(9) Ibid.

(1) See the epilogue of Gesner's Bibliothecæ.

(2) This word refers to commentaries.

(3) Printed at Lyons, apud Jo. Tornæum. Vossius mentions only that edition: Du Verdier Vau-Privas mentions only that of 1578, apud Symphorismum Boudand.

(4) La Croix du Maine, pag. 101.

(5) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Bibliothecæ, pag. 404.

JUNGERMAN (GODFREY) made himself known by his learning in the beginning of the XVIIth century. He was born at Leipzig, where his father GASPAR JUNGERMAN [A], was professor of Civil-Law. His mother was the daughter of the famous Joachim Camerarius of Bamberg (a), professor likewise at Leipzig. Godfrey Jungerman understood the Greek tongue in perfection. The public is indebted to him for the first publication of Julius Cæsar's Commentaries in Greek [B]. He had already published his Latin version of Longus's Pastorals, with notes (b). He printed in 1609 some remarks upon the treatise of Equuleo [C], which Magius had written in prison. We have also some of his letters printed. He died the sixteenth of August, 1610 (c), at Hanaw, where he had been a long time corrector of the press to Wechel's heirs [D].

(a) Bibliotheca Classica, pag. 716.

(1) Ibid. pag. 1507.

(2) Epitome Bibl. Gesneri, pag. 258.

(4) See the French epistles written to Scaliger, pag. 368.

(5) Of the second of March 1605, pag. m. 182, Dutch Edit.

(a) In quo (collata) non est necesse continentiam prædicari, qua nulla in ipso
opus erat, virtus enim est cum lucra, Aristotele censore, coniuncta, cuius indignum nulli que unquam in hoc genere emicret flamma, præbere
animadvertit est.
Adiis T.ew.
Math. & Phys.
Prof. & Rector
Universitatis Altdorfensis, in Programmate
anod Henning.
Witten Memor.
Med. coram.

(1) Theatr. pag. 138.

(2) It seems that this word hinc, which anwers
the word cui in the Programma, is an error of the press for hinc.
But this error of the Printer has not put the order observed by the author in a worse condition.

[A] His father GASPAR JUNGERMAN. It is probably he who is the author of some disputes upon some points of law, which Draudius (1) mentions, and of a poem De Custodia Angelica, mentioned by the same Draudius (2), and by Simler (3).

[B] The public is indebted to him for the first publication of Julius Cæsar's Commentaries in Greek. He added to that version, ascribed by some to Planudes, and of which the manuscript that was in Mr Petau's Library, had been communicated to him by Bongars (4); I say, he added to it, not only his own remarks upon the Greek translator, but also those of several learned critics upon Julius Cæsar's Commentaries. This edition of Francfort, in the year 1606, in 4to, is very much esteemed.

[C] He printed some remarks upon the treatise of Equuleo. The Journal des Savans (5) spoke of these remarks with contempt, as if most of them ran only upon trifles; for example, to know whether it ought to be said Equuleus, or Eculeus: but this censure is too hasty; for tho' this little point of orthography has been somewhat largely discussed by Jungerman, the Journalist should not have judged of all the remarks by this, which besides is not useless to the subject, nor unfit to please several persons.

[D] He was corrector of the press to Wechel's heirs. This we learn from some letters he wrote to Goldast (6). Wherein we find also that he was writing upon Julius Pollux; but this was known before, by the preface to his edition of Herodotus. He enriched that edition, with several pieces, and amongst others, with several fragments of Ctesias. Mr Chevallier might have put him into the catalogue of learned men, who have been correctors of the press (7).

(c) Diarium Biograph. Henningi Witten.

(6) See the collection of the Letters to Goldast, printed at Francfort, in 1688, and Goldast's Letters, published at Utrecht, in 1697.

(7) Origine de l'Imprimerie de Paris, pag. 195, 196.

JUNGERMAN (LEWIS) born at Leipzig the fourth of July 1572, and brother to the foregoing, was an excellent Botanist. He betook himself early to the study of plants, and got such a reputation by it, that he was offered in England the place of the famous Matthias Lobel, who died at London in the year 1616; but he chose rather to live in Germany. He had already distinguished himself by contributing very much to the work, intituled, Hortus Eysletensis, which contains the figure and description of all those that grow about Nuremberg, the impression whereof was taken care of by Gaspar Hofman, in the year 1615. He was made professor of Physic at Gießen, in the year 1622 [A], after having planted a garden, which did very much contribute to the scholars proficiency. He spent three years in that professorship, and afterwards he had such another with that of Botanics at Altdorf, in the year 1625. He continued in them to his death, which happened the seventh of June 1653, and during the twenty eight years of those employments, he took such care of the Physic garden, that he made it famous even in foreign countries. He had the more time to spend in this business, because he neither married, nor had any amorous avocation: which has given occasion to say, that he cannot be praised for his continence, since he had no occasion for a woman; for continence is a virtue, which, according to Aristotle, ought to cause a conflict, of which there appeared no sign in Jungerman's life (a). The panyryst of a Monk would have given the matter another face. This professor left his library to the university of Altdorf. I must not forget, that he took a wonderful delight in making anagrams [B]. I know not whether he was fond of judicial Astrology; but in the Programma, from which I take this article, it is very seriously observed, that [A] He was made professor of Physic at Gießen, in the year 1622. The rector of the university of Altdorf has a little perplexed the Chronology, in his Programma. He pretends that Jungerman got so great a reputation during his professorship at Gießen, that he was invited into England to succeed the most famous Botanist Lobel. This is to confound the time; for Lobel died in the year 1616, and Jungerman was not professor at Gießen, but from the year 1622, to 1625. What likelihood is there that the English should have left Lobel's place vacant six or seven years? doubtless they designed it for Jungerman a little after it was vacant; he had therefore acquired before his professorship at Gießen, the reputation that procured him that great mark of esteem the English had for him. Paul Freherus, who has given (1) an abstract of that Programma, has on one hand better specified the dates; but on the other, this serves only more clearly to discover the error of his calculation. Thus he ranges the dates. Doctor Med. says he, creatus, & ad Professionem Med. publicam promotus est A. 1622. Hinc (2) per triennium ea nominis celebritate præfuit, ut in Angliam quo celeberrimi Botanici Matthiæ Lobelii successor fieret invitaretur A. C. 1616. sed ille Germaniæ conditiones prætulit. Ad descriptionem etiam Horti Eysletensis tota Germania celebris laudabilem nec vulgarem operam contulit. — He was created doctor and professor of Physic in the year 1622. Three years afterwards, his great fame procured him an invitation into England, to succeed Matthias Lobel, the Botanist, in the year 1616; but he chose to continue in Germany. He laboured successfully in the description of the Garden of Eyslet, so famous all over Germany. This Hortus Eysletensis was printed in the year 1613. Judge if these things are placed according to their time. Mr Witten's Diarium Biographicum supposes that our Jungerman was professor at Leipzig, and afterwards at Altdorf. Make no scruple to correct it, by putting Gießen instead of Lipsiæ.

[B] He took a wonderful delight in making anagrams. He published a collection of them at Gießen, in the year 1624, intituled, Aulæum Academicum, in 4to. We have two other works of his, namely, the catalogue that the humours of an Erysipelas stopping on a sudden, when Mars was retrograde, produced a scorbutic gangrene [C] in the extremities of his feet. Godfrey and Lewis Jungerman, had a brother named GASPARE, who was a man of letters. See the notes of Godfrey Jungerman upon the fourth chapter of the treatise de Equaleo.

catalogue I have mentioned in the text of this article, and another like it, intitled, Cornucopiae Floræ Giesfensis, &c. Giesfæ, 1624, in 4to.

[C] It is observed that the humours of an Erysipelas produced a scorbutic gangrene.] These are the words of the Programma. Cujus (erisipelatis) fluxus confusis subito subsistens, gangranam

scorbuticam ante trimesse (circa motum Martis in loco Lunæ natalis opposito tardum & retrogradum) in extremitate pedum pepererunt. The Physicians of that time were wont to ascribe much to the influence of the stars, in discoursing upon dilem-

JUNIUS (HADRIAN) born at Horn in Holland [A] the first of July 1511 [B], was one of the most learned men of his age. He was the son of a burgo-master of great worth [C]; and he studied first at Haerlem, afterwards at Louvain and Paris, and at last at Bologna in Italy, where he was admitted doctor of Physic. Being returned into his country, he went into England in 1543 (a), and was Physician to the duke of Norfolk, and afterwards to a great lady. He there wrote some books, and amongst others a Greek and Latin Dictionary, in which he added above 6500 words. He dedicated it to king Edward in 1548; and because he gave him the title of king, they molested him for it a long time after at the court of Rome. He was very much afflicted with that persecution; for we see in his letters (b) to Lindanus, bishop of Remond, and to cardinal Granvelle, that he passionately desired that disgrace might be taken off, with which he had been branded, since the censors had put his works in the catalogue of prohibited books. He wrote to the Pope about it, by the advice of Arias Montanus; and he prepared an apology, where protesting that he had been always a good Catholic, he shewed that he could not avoid giving Edward the title of king (c). As he was a very good poet, he published in 1554, an epithalamium upon the marriage of Philip II with queen Mary (d). This perhaps would have been a considerable fortune to him, if England had remained quiet. He left it during the troubles [D], and confined himself at Horn; but the king of Denmark quickly sent for him, to make him preceptor to the prince, his son (e). Junius not being able to

(a) See his Apology among his Letters, pag. 392, where he says that he went thither, when Charles V was before Landrecy.

(b) Pag. 388, 469.

(c) See his Letter to Vulcanius, pag. 124, where he boasts of having slighted that disgrace.

(d) Ib. pag. 214.

(e) See the remark [E].

reconcile

FAULTS of Moreri, and the Translator of Thuanus.

[A] Junius born at Horn in Holland.]

Moreri, in the article of HADRIAN (JUNIUS), says, that vulgarly his name was Jonghe, or Du Jon; and afterwards when he speaks of Francis Junius, professor at Leyden, he makes only his vulgar name to be Jonghe. There is nothing exact in this; for in the first place he should have said de Jonghe, and that only with respect to Hadrian Junius, since it is false, that in the Dutch tongue his name could be indifferently either De Jonghe or Du Jon. In the second place it is false, that the vulgar name of Francis Junius was any other than Du Jon. It is said in Thuanus's translation (1), that Horn, the native place of Hadrian Junius, is a village of Guelderland. It is a great blunder, which I do not find in Thuanus of the

(1) Apud Telfier, Addit. aux Eloges, Tom. I, pag. 479.

Francfort edition, 1625. If the translator found that fault in his edition, he is excusable; but here is another thing to be censured. He says, that Junius leaving Haerlem because of the siege, went to Armuyden near Middelburg, where having in vain used great diligence and pains, to afford some remedy to the miseries of that besieged town, he was so troubled with the change of air, &c. It is plain that that besieged town neither relates to Middelburg nor Armuyden, but to Haerlem. Now it is very false that Junius thought of relieving that besieged town, when he was at Armuyden; for he went not thither till Haerlem was taken.

Thuanus (2) cannot be well excused for this mistake: for though in writing Latin, there is no necessity to clear a period according to the strictness of French Grammar: yet he would never have expressed himself as he did, had he thought that Junius did not go into Zeland, till after the taking of Haerlem. It cannot be said that he there speaks of the siege of Middelburg, or the siege of Armuyden, since these two places were not besieged whilst Junius lived in Zeland. Melchior Adam has transcribed Thuanus's fault. They should have known that this Physician staid some time at Delft, after the taking of Haerlem, before his going into Zeland.

[B] The first of July, 1511.] This is what we find in the Life of Junius, prefixed to his epistles, vitam hanc orditur Kalendis Julii, anni 1511. Some pages after, we read that he died 'Die 16 Junii anno 1575. cum explevisset annum ætatis 63 qui magnus est mæsticus annus Medicis vocatur. — He died the sixteenth day of June, in the year 1575, when he had completed the sixty third year of his age, which the Physicians call the great climacteric.' Which shews that Thuanus and Melchior Adam are mistaken, who make him die in his climacterical year. But because this Life of Junius is not very exact, and the edition of the epistles (3) to which it is prefixed, is said to have been printed in the year 1552, though it contains the epitaph of the author who died in 1575, and some of his letters dated in 1574, I would not rigorously condemn the Chronology of Meursius, who places the birth of this learned man to the year 1512 (4). That which makes me say that his life (5) is not exact, is, that besides the two dates I have mentioned out of it, I there find his epitaph, which imports, that he lived sixty three years. If the author of this Life Sciences, have thought the epitaph was right, he was in the wrong to place Junius's birth-day on the first of July, 1511, and to say that on the sixteenth of June, 1575, he had completed the sixty third year of his age. On the other hand, when a man is full sixty four years old within fifteen days, it is a great negligence to say that he is sixty three years old, or that he has passed his sixty third year. But whether there be little or much negligence in it, it is certain, that Moreri, Freherus, Melchior Adam, Sir Thomas-Pope Blount, and those who place Junius's birth in the year 1513, are all thereby confuted. The edition of his letters is not very correct; and besides they are not placed according to the time in which they were written, and no care has been taken to discover and supply the dates where they are wanting, which very often happens. These two defects are but too common in such sort of collections.

[C] He was the son of a burgo-master of great worth.] The father of our Junius had not only been secretary, and afterwards five times burgo-master of Horn, but also twice deputed to the court of Denmark, and once to Sweden, and other places. He was a man of learning, and wrote a Latin book, which was never printed, containing the original and growth of Horn (6).

[D] He left it during the troubles.] For want of a better guide, I have followed the life of Junius, which is perplexed to his letters; though I am not ignorant that exactness will not suffer us to make this author live in England from the first time of his coming thither, till the troubles that happened after the marriage

(3) I make use of an edition, printed at Dort, apud Vincetium Caimax, in 12mo.

(4) Valerius Andreas, Bibl. Belg. and Bullart, Académ. des Sciences, have followed it.

(5) I cannot tell whether it be that, which Beverwyck promises in a Letter to Vossius, dated the twelfth of June 1616. See the Letters written to Vossius, n. 78, pag. m. 47.

(6) Boxhornius, Hist. Hollandæ pag. 373.

reconcile himself [E] either to the climate, or the genius of the inhabitants, retired in so abrupt a manner, as not to take his leave of the king. It is probable, this was in 1564 (f). He settled at Haerlem [F], where he practised Physic, and married, and was made principal of the college. The States of Holland commissioned him to write the history of that province, of which he would have acquitted himself honourably, and with greater exactness than he did, if he could have put the last hand to the work, which came out after his death, under the title of Batavia (g). When the Spaniards besieged the town of Haerlem, he found a way to escape out of it, to attend the prince of Orange, who desired to use his medicines. The town being taken in 1573, his library was pillaged, where he had left several works, which had cost him a great deal of pains, and by which he hoped to immortalize himself. He might soon have put them in a condition to be published; which increased his grief. He went into Zealand, where the prince's recommendation procured him a public salary, for practising Physic in Middelburg: but the air of the country was very disagreeable to him. He there got some distempers, which, together with his grief for the loss of his library, occasioned his death the sixteenth of June 1575, being sixty four years old wanting some days. His body was carried from Armuyden to Middelburg, where his eldest son caused him to be honourably buried, and composed his epitaph [G]. We have several books of his composing [H]. I will say something of them in the last remark. He was designed for a Professor's chair at Leyden [I], where the university was,

as

(f) See his Letters, pag. 385.

(g) Vossius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 259. Pontus Henter. lib. ii, de Vet. Belgio, cap. xxv.

(*) Pag. 339, 345, 348.

(8) It was a salary of four hundred rixdollars (German crotons), pag. 409.

(9) Ibid.

(10) See, above, citation (f).

(11) Pag. 179. See concerning his mistress, pag. 109.

(12) In the body of this article.

(13) This book is placed among those of Francis Junius, professor of Divinity at Leyden, in the catalogue of the Bodleian Library.

(14) Huetius, de Claris Interpretibus, speaks of those translations with great contempt.

(15) See his Life prefixed to his Epistles, and in Meijer Adam.

marriage of Mary with Philip II, for I see some of his letters (7) are dated from Haerlem, or Horn, in the year 1552, and at the beginning of 1554, which bespeak a sedentary man. Many of those who have written lives, have stood very much in need of advice.

[E] Not being able to reconcile himself. This appears from the three hundred and eighty fifth page of his letters, where he thus speaks to Sambucus. 'Li-beret mihi Polydori exemplo erumpere in hæc verba, adsum profectus Danica e caligine, nisi longinqui ac molesti itineris ceu partus recordationem oblitterasset jucundus amicorum reduci quotidie gratulationum occursum. — I might, after the example of Polydore, break out into these words: here I am, emerged from Danish darkness; had not the agreeable meeting of my friends, congratulating me daily on my return, blotted out the memory of a long and troublesome journey, as of child-birth.' He adds several reasons for his refusing the salary, and this was no inconsiderable one (8), which he might have enjoyed at Copenhagen. In another letter (9), he says, that he and his wife abhorred that country. In another he desires an augmentation of his salary. I find there, that he was invited to be Physician to the king, but not to be tutor to the young prince.

[F] He settled at Haerlem. The author of his life has not well distinguished the times. He says that he settled at Haerlem, and married only after his return from Copenhagen. But I have proved (10) he returned from thence in the year 1564, and we see by a letter (11) which he wrote in 1559, that he had fixed himself at Haerlem a good while before, and that he was married to a handsome woman who brought him a fortune. The Epistle Dedicatory of his treatise de Auro, that of his tract de Coma, and that of his Animadversorum, are dated from that town in 1556.

[G] His eldest son composed his epitaph. Boxhornius having added an appendix to his Theatrum Hollandiæ, for the omissions he thought were to be supplied, amongst other things inserted this epitaph in great letters, but he let three faults creep into it, velint instead of meruit, 67 instead of 63, and 15 instead of 16, Vixit ann. LXIIIX. obiit die XV. &c.

[H] We have several books of his composing. His chief works besides those already mentioned (12), are, Animadversorum libri sex. Commentarius de Coma. Adagiurum ab Erasmo omisorum centuriæ octo cum dimidia (13). Appendix ad Epitbeta Textoris. Copie cornu, sive Oceanus enarrationum Homeriarum ex Eustatii Commentariis collectus in unum volumen. A Nomenclator. Commentarius de anno & mensibus. Several kinds of Latin verses. The translation of Eunapius de vitis Sophistarum. That of Hesychius Milesius, that of Plutarch's table-talk (14). That of the questions relating to Physic, of Cassius Iatrotophista, made and printed at Paris in 1541. (It is I believe the first of his works.) I mention not a great number of authors, whom he has illustrated with notes, as Nonius Marcellus, Plautus, Seneca, Pliny (15), Virgil, Ho- race (16). He had been a long time upon Suidas, and designed to dedicate it to the prince of Orange's son, as he owns to an English lord (17), whose good offices he desires with that prince, in order to be gratified with a present before hand; for he understood as well as any body else how to make the best of an epistle dedicatory.

I have something to observe concerning three of his works. I. The author of his Life says that the Animadversorum libri sex were lost, when Haerlem was taken: I do not well understand what he means; for they were published by the author himself, and dedicated to Antony Perenot, bishop of Arras, in the year 1556. Gruterus has inserted them in the fourth volume of his Thesaurus Criticus. II. As for the Appendix ad Epitbeta Textoris, it may be said that Junius handled that matter with another sort of learning than Textor, who committed very gross faults in it. See some of them in Junius's letters (18). He looked upon it as a most profitable and painful work (19). III. His Nomenclator is in it's kind an excellent book. The choice of words in eight languages is no less a proof of Junius's learning, than of his indefatigable patience. It is said (20) that he understood eight languages very well, Greek, Latin, Italian, French, Spanish, High-Dutch, English, and Dutch. His travels had done him great service on that account: I find he had been in France, Italy, Germany, and England, but not in Spain, as Valerius Andreas (21), Moreri, and Freherus affirm. Colomies has published (22) a little story, which he had from Isaac Vossius; it shews that Junius neglected nothing to perfect his Nomenclator, and that he condescended to drink with Carters to learn the terms of their trade: besides, I believe it appears from one of his letters (23), that he did not think it a great crime to drink plentifully without being drunk.

When I say that this Nomenclator is an excellent book in its kind, I do not pretend to deny, that there are faults in it, and very gross ones (24); I only mean that the good things that are in it very much exceed what has been commonly published on that subject. Now in works of this nature, where it is impossible not to mistake, perfection does not demand that an author should be free from all faults. Such a book is like man: he is the most perfect that has the fewest faults.

Vitiis nemo sine nascitur, optimus ille est qui minimis urgetur (5).

[I] He was designed for a professor's chair at Leyden. It is Meursius who says this; Sub mortis tempus, says he (26), Academica nascenti inter primos professoris destinatus, sed inter ipsa initia morte abreptus inchoare munus non potuit. Freherus (27) who transcribes this, without adding what university is meant throws his readers into the dark, or into an illusion; one would think that he means Middelburg, of which he had been speaking, and that an university had been lately founded there. I shall observe on this occasion,

(16) See his Letters, pag. 5, 6.

(17) Epist. pag. 175. See also pag. 116.

(18) Pag. 406.

(19) Ibid. pag. 116.

(20) Meursius, Athen. Batav.

(21) Bibl. Belg. pag. 12.

(22) Opus. pag. 131.

(23) It is written to a bishop pag. 460.

(24) See what Crenius, Annal. Phil. & Hist. Port. 1, pag. 31 & seq. quotes out of Græcorum &c.

(25) Meurs. Sat. III, lib. 1, vers. 68.

(26) Athen. Batav. pag. 91.

(27) Theob. pag. 1270.

as it were, just born, when he died. I have not yet had time fully to examine whether he at last turned Protestant [K].

It appears from one of his letters (b), that he put himself into a great passion, when he heard that one of his scholars had accused him of commanding his boarders not to go to church. He protests, on the contrary, that he forced them to go upon holidays; for he condemned to considerable fines those who neglected to go. Elsewhere (i) he complains of his poverty, and that being loaded with debts, and obliged to equip himself, he had no money in his pocket.

occasion, that nothing causes a greater obscurity in books than the not taking pains to add the necessary supplements to what is taken out of other authors. A thousand things are clear in the originals, which are unintelligible, when they are nakedly removed into another place.

(K) I have not had time fully to examine whether he at last turned Protestant. That which holds me in suspense is, a letter (28) that he wrote to the bishop of Haerlem in 1573, to give him an account of the endeavours he had used to hinder this prelate's house from being plundered. He tells him, that he preferred this Depositum, as well as he could, and that he gave it not up to the plunderers till he was overpowered, being threatened with immediate death, with a pistol to his breast. He adds, that the impunity of these wicked attempts obliged him to ask leave to retire out of the town, which he obtained. It is certain he vigorously complained to the magistrates of the violence that had been done him (29), and that he told them the Spaniards would hardly be guilty of the same excesses, if they were masters of the town. That which I do not understand, is what he tells this prelate, that to preserve his house, it had been necessary to drive away the French, who profaned every thing with a cruel rage, excludendo barbaram & crudelem Gallorum omnia profanantium rabiem (§ 2). I do not take the Index librorum prohibitorum & expurgandorum (30), wherein he is called a Calvinist, and an author damnata memoria, to be a convincing proof. [(§ 2) These were probably some remains of the Protestant troops, which being defeated in 1571, had followed Genlis into the Low-Countries. These were no longer those Protestant soldiers, who in the first civil-war, appeared such enemies to vice and all sorts of violence. REM. CRIT.]

JUNIIUS (a) (FRANCIS) professor of Divinity (b) at Leyden, was born at Bourges the first of May 1545. He was of a noble family [A]. His father, who was a man of the Long Robe, found himself exposed to many persecutions for being suspected of Lutheranism [B]. He exposed his wife to horrid slanders, because she proved

[A] He was of a noble family. WILLIAM du Jon, his grandfather, lord of Boffardiniere near Iffoudun, was enobled for the good services he had done in the expedition into Navarre, when endeavours were used to restore John d'Albret unjustly deprived of his kingdom by Ferdinand of Arragon. He had also been a servant to the king (1). He left three sons, the last whereof, called DENYS, studied the civil-law, and took his degrees at Toulouse. He performed his studies but ill (2); for as he had a great spirit, he was always engaged in the quarrels of the scholars. In a word, he was a great duellist. He obtained the office of the king's counsellor at Bourges, as a reward of a bold action he had done. We shall see it in the following remark. He had nine children, of which our Francis Junius was one (3).

[B] His father . . . found himself exposed to many persecutions for being suspected of Lutheranism. The superior of the Franciscans of Iffoudun preached so impudently against Margaret queen of Navarre, duchess of Berry, and sister to Francis I, as to say, that because she was a Lutheran, she deserved to be sowed up in a sack, and to be thrown into the sea. The magistrates of the place advised him not to be wanting in the respect, that was due to that princess; but he laughed at their advice, and went on preaching in the same strain. Informations were made against him, and sent to the king. The king being resolved to punish him with the same punishment, to which he had adjudged the princess, ordered the monk should be brought to him. The queen of Navarre interceding for him, obtained that the punishment should be moderated. The difficulty was to seize that Monk, who had the mob on his side; so that the magistrates of Iffoudun durst not undertake the execution of his majesty's orders. Denys du Jon, being returned from the schools where he had fought so many duels, declared that if his majesty would give him a commission to take the Monk, he would punctually execute it. This commission being dispatched for him, he put himself at the head of the archers, and in spite of the populace, he took the preacher out of the cloyster, who was sent to the galleys for two years. Du Jon by this ingratiated himself with Francis I, and the duchess of Berry; but he incurred the hatred of the people, and of the Franciscans, and found himself exposed to many calumnies, and threatnings, and involved in processes, which ended at last in a cruel massacre, committed on his person. Hæc prima fuit actio, quæ in gratiam Regis, sororisque Reginae insinuatæ patrem: sed apud illam inconsultam plebeculam & Franciscanorum ordinem odia perpetua conciliavit; indignissimæque calumnias, minas, criminationes, persecutiones, damna, cruentam denique eadem patri opportavit (4). He was accused of Lutheranism, and his maid was suborned to attest that he did not observe fasting days. Et Franciscanorum arte, & plebis imprudentia odique maximo pressus est sub religionis specie & Lutheranismi . . . accusatus, subornata ad eam rem ancilla quæ domi servierat. Ea patrem à se visum, quum diebus vetitis carnes ederet, pro testimonio dicebat falso, ut matrem sæpe audivi confirmantem (5). He betook himself to flight, being unwilling to trust himself with such passionate people: they seized on his estate, and the queen of Navarre was obliged to supply him wherewithal to subsist for near a year. At last by the king's authority the accusations were brought to nothing, and then du Jon obtained a place of counsellor, &c. Liberatus ab accusatione pater auctoritate Regis, patrium solum re-petit, atque immigrat in Biturigum metropolim, ubi cum laude ad exitum usque vitæ Consilarii Regii & pro Tribuno militum honoribus à Rege collatis defunctus est: præter alia commoda honoraria, quæ à Regina sorore illius & Biturigum Duce acceptat (6). His father, being discharged from the accusation by the king's authority, returns home, and goes to Bourges in Berry, where, to his death, he honourably discharged the offices of king's counsellor and colonel, conferred on him by the king; besides other honorary benefits, which he received from the queen, his sister, and the duke of Berry. Hear how he was killed. On Corpus Christi day, the Catholics of Iffoudun, without any regard to the treaty of peace, which had been just concluded, committed a thousand violences against the Reformed. The king dispatched a commission to Denys du Jon to inquire into that insurrection, and to punish the authors of it. Du Jon repaired to Iffoudun, accompanied only by three archers; he dispersed the rest in several places, before he entered the town, it being necessary to use prudence in so nice an affair. His precautions did him no service; it was conjectured upon what account he came; the people seized on the gates, and besieged the house of the commissioner. They broke into it, killed du Jon, threw him out at the window, dragged him along the streets, exposed him to the dogs, and publicly forbid (7) any to bury him (8). The king's council, out of indignation against this insolence, ordered that the walls of Iffoudun should be demolished, but Ci-pierre, and some other lords, got the decree changed, especially because the murdered commissioner had been suspected of Lutheranism above twenty four years. The widow of the deceased desiring to prosecute the murderers, got the hatred of a great ma-

(b) Epistol pag. 387.

(i) Ib. pag. 149. See also pag. 254

(30) Pag. 4-6. Edit. 1627, in fol.

* Thuan. lib. II.

(b) And not a civilian, as Father Jacob says in his Bibliotheca Pontific. pag. 456.

(4) Franciscus Junius, ubi supra, col. 2.

(5) Id. ibid.

(6) Id. ibid. pag. 7, col. 1.

(7) However a woman buried him in the night. Id. ibid.

(8) Taken from the Life of Francis Junius pag. 14

(a) His true name was Du Jon, and not Jonghe, as Moreri will have it.

(1) In custodia & equili. . . Ludovici XII, ministravit. Franciscus Junius, in Vita sua, Tom. I, Oper. pag. 63 col. 1.

(2) Hinc ab avo solennis literarum quas Dionysio filio mittebat, & falsa inscriptio, Dionysio dilecto filio misso ad studendum, pro eo quod alii vulgo inscribunt, studeant. Id. ibid.

(3) Taken from Junius's Life.

proved with child, whilst it was believed he had fled away [C], and it was not known that he came once secretly to see her. Our Francis Junius was carefully educated, and became a very learned man, to which his natural modesty, together with his great ambition [D], did not a little contribute. He began to study the civil-law under Hugo Donellus at thirteen years of age. Some years after he was sent to Lyons, in order to join the ambassador, whom the king of France sent to Constantinople: but not arriving till after the departure of the ambassador, he staid at Lyons, and applied himself to his studies with an incredible industry. Bartholomew Aneau [E], who was principal of the college of that town, gave him good advice about the right method of studying. The young gentleman found himself exposed to two very different temptations, to that of love, and that of impiety. He vigorously opposed the first; for he gave a box on the ear to a young woman, who came to caress him [F]: but he yielded ny people, and spent her estate. Hæc cædes consilium Regis commovit plurimum: & decretum de labefactendis muris totius oppidi in eo factum propter atrocitatem sceleris, & periculissimum exemplum illius. Sed postea conversa est factionibus tota ratio consilii: tum propter Sipierrii Gubernatoris & nonnullorum ex nobilitate procerum inveterata odia, tum propter religionis Pontificiæ Zelum, cujus odio indefinenter flagravisse inde ab annis amplius viginti quatuor criminabantur patrem. Itaque eadem illam necesse habuit mater in Regis consilio persequi ex eo tempore: quo facta, cum ipsa in se multorum concitavit odia, tum omnia ferme commoda quæ ex bellica licentia, furtis, rapinis, grassationibusque restabant ipsi, in hac persecutione occupavit (9).

I need not put any body in mind of the ill effects of a religious zeal. Those who are possessed with it, justify a murder, and disapprove the conduct of a woman, who desires that those who have murdered her husband should be punished. But I desire my readers to consider well one thing. Religion, which is looked upon all over the world as the strongest support of the supreme authority, and which would be actually so, if it was well understood and practised, is commonly that, which most enervates that same authority. There was nothing more just than the decree of Francis I, against the preacher of Issoudun; a man who had the impudence to treat the king's sister so basely in the pulpit. And yet not one magistrate durst execute the king's orders against this mutineer, and when a gentleman has the courage to execute them, he exposes himself to a thousand persecutions, and becomes so odious, that his murderers are openly protected. The queen of Navarre, was the first who advised this gentleman to leave his country (10), since the execution of his prince's orders would expose him to the hatred of the bigots. An evident proof that the court did not think itself strong enough to protect its good servants persecuted by churchmen. It is commonly said that the ministry of the gospel est ipsi Angelis tremendum. — Is formidabile to the angels; we may add & ipsi quoque Regibus. — And to kings also. Read the history of the Romish church, and you will find that the greatest princes have had more reason to fear the passions raised by the zealots, than the arms of the infidels: thus that very thing which ought to be the support of the state, is very often the greatest obstacle that sovereigns meet with in the execution of their orders (11).

[C] He exposed his wife to horrid slanders, because she proved with child. It is an imprudence to venture the being so, when the husband is a fugitive; for if he should die before he returned, and before the lying-in, and without owning that he is the father of the child, three things very possible, how could a woman justify herself to the public? but farther, is it nothing to give a handle to ill tongues, as the wife of Du Jon did? it will be said that it is easy to talk so, when one is discoursing of it in cold blood, without considering the case of amorous people. After some months absence, their love is so violent, that no consideration can restrain them; passion hurries them along, and they are not able to hearken to any reason:

[E] Bartholomew Aneau. I have spoken else (15) Above, in where (15) of his Commentary upon Alciatus's emblems. He was called in Latin Annulus, or Anulus: he was a native of Bourges, and published several books (16). He was wickedly killed in the tumult of religion, where Junius had like to have lost his life: his wife would have had the same fate, if the provost of Lyons had not saved her by imprisoning her (17).

[F] He gave a box on the ear to a young woman who came to caress him. This is a thing much more admirable than Theagenes's action (18), as being historical, whereas that of Theagenes is only a romantic fiction. Junius, intent upon his studies, thought of nothing less, than of making love. In the mean time he was teased for his want of gallantry, and it was represented to him, that he would never learn civility, if he did not fall in love. These discourses having no influence upon his conduct, they exposed him to the caresses of three or four young women, who

on that account, at which she was most sensibly afflicted (13). [D] His natural modesty, together with his great ambition. These two passions do not seem to be consistent one with another, and yet sometimes they join together. Junius is an instance of it. He confesses, that in his younger years he wished to be honoured and praised more than he ought to do, and that he could not suffer the praises, which were given to others. 'Natura me puerum ad honoris & laudis appetentiam plus satis accendente. Sic enim mala radix illa τῆς φιλοψυχίας in me germinabat, ut nec alienam laudem ista ætate æquo animo ferre possem miser, nec in mea exultatione illa conquiescere quam mihi conciliabam pertinacissima diligentia.' On the other hand he acknowledges, that he was so timorous, and bashful, that even when he was near fifty years old, he could not speak to his own wife without blushing, and that he durst hardly command his own domestics. 'Pudor summus qui me ad hanc usque ætatem sic pressit, ut rusticus magis ad omnia quam urbanus merito haberi possem. . . . Quid dicam nisi impudentem ferme pudorem esse qui me tantopere impeditum distinet, ut vix sine pudore uxori res vulgares enunciem, vix jam domi servitio imperem.' He pretends to have drawn great advantages from this bashfulness; because distrust- ing himself, he applied himself much more to improve by what he heard and saw (14); and he declares he would not acquaint his readers with his infirmity, if he did not believe, it would be a most useful lesson of modesty to youth. 'Hoc eo libentius prædico de infirmitate mea, ut juvenus ab exemplo meo præceptum hauriat ταπεινοφροσύνης atque modestiæ, ut certum fructum peritiæ certo judicio assequatur. Id enim testor, nihil mihi secundum benedictionem Dei tam commodavisse in rebus omnibus, quam illam de me ipso diffidentiam ex conscientia infirmitatis & pudoris mei, & studiosam aliorum, quibusque cunctis adu, observantiam.' That modesty and rare humility which makes a man distrust his own strength, cannot be too much praised: but it is certain it is of no use to the making of one's fortune in the world; and if a father has a design that his children should come to performances, I would advise him rather to inspire them with vanity and presumption, than with diffidence of their own merit. Junius is perhaps the only person, who with respect to worldly advantages, was not the worse for his modesty. I do not pretend to affirm that arrogance is always useful: it sometimes ruins young men, and hinders them from rising; I speak only of this in general, without regarding the exceptions.

[E] Bartholomew Aneau. I have spoken else (15) Above, in where (15) of his Commentary upon Alciatus's emblems. He was called in Latin Annulus, or Anulus: he was a native of Bourges, and published several books (16). He was wickedly killed in the tumult of religion, where Junius had like to have lost his life: his wife would have had the same fate, if the provost of Lyons had not saved her by imprisoning her (17).

[F] He gave a box on the ear to a young woman who came to caress him. This is a thing much more admirable than Theagenes's action (18), as being historical, whereas that of Theagenes is only a romantic fiction. Junius, intent upon his studies, thought of nothing less, than of making love. In the mean time he was teased for his want of gallantry, and it was represented to him, that he would never learn civility, if he did not fall in love. These discourses having no influence upon his conduct, they exposed him to the caresses of three or four young women, who

(9) Id. ibid.

AN important reflexion upon the effects of false zeal.

(10) Felicius certe utriusque politicos honores gesturo, & Rempublicam administraturo, si post tam forte ausum honestæ causæ migratione, quam sepe fieri Navarrena Regina & nonnulli Proceres cupiverunt, ut ubi Respublicæ interiret pater, sibi propeisset. Id. ibid. pag. 6, col. 2.

(11) Compare what has been said in the article ABDAS, remark [B].

(12) Virgil. Georg. lib. 1, ver. 514.

(13) Proflugas pater clam ad matrem semel redierat, hinc gravida facta mater prociendebatur à vulgo, tanquam si profuita fuisset pudicitia illius. Utrouque hoc incommodum sanctæ illius fœmine animus cognovatur, obsecravit huius malitiam quam plurimis tum Francis illius reverto nem, tum gravitatem, ut aiebant, impudicam. Junius, in Vita sua, pag. 7, col. 1.

Fertur equis auriga, neque audit currus habenas (12).

So the fierce couriers starting to the race . . . Nor reins, nor curbs, nor threatening cries they fear, But force along the trembling charioteer.

DRYDEN.

However it be, our Junius's mother was defamed up-

(14) Ex pudore hæc consequens sunt inde à pueris quod mihi semper sim diffusus, quod aliorum factis audientis, sermonibus observandis & adverting in usum meum studiorum. Idem, ibid. col. 2.

(15) Above, in the remark [M], of the article ALCIATUS.

(16) See La Croix du Maine, pag. 32, & Du Verrier Vau-Prin, pag. 110, 111.

(17) See Junius's historical, whereas that of Theagenes is only a romantic fiction. Junius, intent upon his studies, thought of nothing less, than of making love. In the mean time he was teased for his want of gallantry, and it was represented to him, that he would never learn civility, if he did not fall in love. These discourses having no influence upon his conduct, they exposed him to the caresses of three or four young women, who

(18) See the article HELIO- was represented to him, that he would never learn civility, if he did not fall in love. These discourses having no influence upon his conduct, they exposed him to the caresses of three or four young women, who yielded so much to the sophistry of a libertine, that he found himself a perfect Atheist [G], after lending an ear to him for some days. He did not remain long in that unhappy condition; a tumult about religion, which obliged him to run away, in order to save his life, afforded him an occasion of resuming his first faith. His father recalled him to Bourges, and discovering something of the opinions his son was imbued with, he gave him good instructions, and without seeming to know any thing of the matter, brought him to read the New Testament. The first words (c) that Junius met with, affected him [H] so sensibly, that he quickly grew out of conceit with whatever related not to piety. In the beginning of the civil-wars, he went to Geneva, for the study of the languages. As he carried but little money with him, and had none sent him, he found himself reduced to extreme necessity [I]. At last he received wherewithal to deliver himself from his misery, and to pay his debts; and hearing the tragical end of his father (d), he resolved to get his livelihood by teaching youth. He undertook that employment at Geneva, which he discharged till he was sent into the Low-Countries (e) to be minister of the Walloon church at Antwerp. He performed that office in the midst of many dangers; for tho' he opposed the indiscreet zeal of those, who, without any lawful authority,

(c) The beginning of St John's Gospel.

(d) See the remark [B].

(e) In the year 1565.

who impudently attacked him. They fell violently upon him, and omitted nothing to triumph over his modesty. At last, he lost his patience, and gave one of them a box on the ear; this blow caused a great noise in the house. The girl, who had received it, finding by the young man's look, that it was not by way of jest, but out of anger that she had been thus used, fell a crying and lamenting. She was laughed at, and Junius too; but this made him odious to several people. These are his own words. 'Dies & noctes appetebant canes illæ promiscuæ, nescium quid sibi vellent, & gravitatis honestatque illius, quam in domo paterna videram, subinde recordantem. Neque id seorsim tentabant singulæ, verumetiam ternæ aut quaternæ simul confectis manibus in me iruebant immodestissime, ut perducto ad suam impuritatem animo meo de spoliis pudoris mei triumpharent. Tandem verò adeo me pudit illarum impudentiæ, ut quum una multis spectantibus me amatorie esset adorsa palpo, ego contra colaphum gravem ei impigerim: quem illa addobitans utram in partem acciperet, defixis oculis attenta respexit ad me, aliquantisper observans aliquam mei animi significationem: ut autem rem feriam à me esse vidit, tum illa vociferationibus & ejulationibus implevit domum, omniumque risum imprudens in se, flutorum odia in me concitavit (19).' He was so tired with those temptations, that he had a thousand times the thoughts of returning to his father, without taking leave of the people of the house, where his chastity suffered so many attacks; but he feared their resentment, and the calumnies they might make use of, to disparage him in his family.

[G] He yielded so much to the sophistry of a Libertine, that he found himself a perfect Atheist. By Bartholomew Aneau's advice, he had read Cicero de Legibus, and made collections out of it. In the mean while he received a visit from a man, and heard him maintain with so many arguments, what Cicero alleges concerning Epicurus's rejecting a providence, that he gave way to that impious doctrine: which he did the more easily, because it was the constant table-talk, and all the house rung with it (20). 'Memini, quum liberos M. Tullii de legibus per illud tempus, auctore & suatore Anulo (de quo ante dixi) expenderem, & notas quasdam in eos animadvertionesque colligerem, venire hominem ad me, & illa Epicuri verba quæ libro primo exstant (21), nihil curare Deum nec sui, nec alieni, multis quam diligentissime confirmare: ad quæ ego non ratione judicioque certe responderem: sed assensionem paulatim adhibens, sentiebam venenum serpents, quod imberberam, confirmari in me: & cum auctoritate hominis, tum argutis dictorum ejus præceptis eo deferrebar, ut meus animus in isto malo hærens occallere, totique fieret' avarosus (22).'

[H] The first words that he met with in the New Testament affected him. The thing is so edifying, and so likely to imprint a due sense of the efficacy of the word of God, that I ought to set down the whole passage. 'Hic ergo novum illud testamentum divinitus oblatum aperio: aliud agenti exhibet se mihi aspectu primo augustissimum illud caput Joannis Evangelistæ & Apostoli, in principio erat Verbum, &c.

Lego partem capituli, & ita commoveor legens, ut repente divinitatem argumenti, & scripti majestatem auctoritatemque senserim longo intervallo omnibus eloquentiæ humanæ fluminibus præeuntem. Horrebat corpus, stupebat animus, & totum illum diem sic afficiebar, ut qui essem, ipse mihi incertus viderer esse. Recordatus es mei, Domine Deus mi, pro immensa misericordia tua, ovemque perditam in gregem tuum recepisti. Ex eo tempore, quum in me Deus tam potenter Spiritus sui virtute irrisset, alia frigidius & negligentius legere & tractare coepi; de his verò quæ ad pietatem pertinent cogitare amplius, & ardentius in eis versari (23). — Here therefore I open that new Testament, the gift of heaven: at first sight, and without design, I light upon that most august chapter of the Evangelist and Apostle St John. In the beginning was the word, &c. I read part of the chapter, and am so affected as I read, that on a sudden I perceive the divinity of the subject, and the majesty and authority of the writing, far exceeding all human eloquence. I shuddered, I was confounded, and was so affected that whole day, that I scarce knew myself. Thou didst remember me, O Lord my God, for thy great mercy, and didst receive a lost sheep into thy flock. From that time, when God had given me so great a measure of his holy spirit, I began to read other things with more coldness and neglect; and to think more of, and be more conversant with, those things, which belong to piety.

[I] He found himself reduced to extrem necessity. He gives a long account of it, whereof I will observe but these two things. Having only, upon the approach of the winter, a linnen doublet and a little cloak, he resolved to imitate Cleanthes (24), that is, to get something by the labour of his hands. He designed to work by the day, and turn pioneer in the ditches of Geneva. But he found a young man of his country, who relieved him. Standing in need of this help longer than he had a mind to, he was afraid of being burthen some, and in that apprehension he brought himself to the making but one little meal once a day. This abstinence lasted four months, and reduced him to such a lean condition, that he was scarce able to bear the weight of his shirt. He would have died in a little time, if his friends had not prevailed upon him to eat a little more. 'Ultero ad mensas quatuor jejuniū ipse indixi mihi, & horam prandii in ambulatione, legens & memoriam colens, meditans, orans occupavi: vespere autem cœna frugali usus sum, plurimum sorbens bina ova, & medicamentum vini cyathum hauriens. Sed ex diuturna ista & pervicace inedia paulatim me invasit tabes, & ita exeduit graviter, ut vires omnes exhaustum corpus deficerent. Quod malum tum demum sensi, quum instantibus amicis & tabem meam ex vultu recognoscens, ad majorem cibi copiam sumendam veni, & vivere institui liberalius: nam vel indussi solius one re prægravati mihi esse humeri videbantur (25). — I voluntarily enjoyed myself a fast of four months, and spent the hour of dinner in walking, reading, and recollecting, meditating and praying: in the evening I supped sparingly, for the most part on two eggs, and a moderate glass of wine. But this long and obstinate fasting brought on me by degrees a consumption, and quite exhausted my strength: which I then became sensible of, when, at the pressing instances of my friends, who perceived my distemper by my looks, I betook myself to eating more plentifully, and began to live more freely; for my shoulders seemed laden with the weight of my shirt alone.'

(23) Ibid. pag. 11, col. 2.

(24) Certum de liberatūque erat hebdomade proxime sequentia . . . alternos dies in egerenda terra ad solum urbis, & in studiis consumere, Cleanthes exemplo, ut levarem inopiam meam. Id. ibid.

(25) Ibid. pag. 13, col. 2.

(19) Junius, ibid. pag. 9, col. 2.

(20) Ista horribili impietate confusa erat quicquid mensis, perfumabat domum circumferebant omnia aures meas, adeo ut jamque ad alia omnia obstitissem. Nam quum omnibus horis aliquid atrociter fieri viderem, aut audire, inquit Tullius, etiam qui natura mitissimi sumus, assidue molestarum sensum omnem humanitatis ex animis amittimus: quum imple fieri aut dici, pietatis sentum. Id. ibid. pag. 10, col. 1.

(21) Here is a slip of memory: Junius took the first book of Cicero de Legibus, for the first book of Cicero de Natura Deorum.

(22) Junius, ubi supra.

V O L. III.

7 T

[K] The

authority, broke the images, and pillaged the temples, he was accounted their instigator; which was the reason that they often attempted to imprison him. He had the good fortune always to have timely notice of it, so as to avoid being taken. It was found expedient for him to go into the country of Limburg, where he continued his ministerial functions with good success, till the dangers he was exposed to engaged the magistrates to advise him to retire into Germany. The curiosity that an old man had, deserves to be known [K], it is so proper to shew the knavery of the persecutors, and the foolishness of the people. Junius was received at Heidelberg by the elector Frederic III, with a great deal of kindness, and went to see his mother at Bourges; from whence returning to the Palatinate, he was made minister of a little church there

(f) Scarnovienſis Eccleſiæ.

(g) Tremellius was his partner in that work.

(b) Taken from his Life, written by himself, and published by Merula, in 1595, and afterwards prefixed to his works. Melchior Adam has given us a large Abridgement of it. Moreri is mistaken in quoting Merula, in Deſcript. Vita Junii.

(f). Some time after he was sent by the elector to the army of the prince of Orange, during the unfortunate expedition of the year 1568. He was chaplain to that prince, till the troops had got into Germany; and then he returned to his church in the Palatinate, where he discharged his function till the year 1573, after which he was sent for to Heidelberg by the Elector Palatine, to translate the Old Testament (g). He was sent to Neustadt in the year 1578, and at fourteen months end to Otterburg, where he staid eighteen months; after which he returned to Neustadt, and read public lectures till prince Casimir, administrator of the electorate, sent for him to Heidelberg, to be professor of Divinity. He returned into France with the duke of Bouillon, and waited on king Henry IV, who sent him into Germany upon some business. He thought fit to pass through Holland before he went to give an account of his commission to Henry IV, and being invited to be professor of Divinity at Leyden, he accepted the offer, having first obtained the consent of the ambassador of France (b). He discharged the functions of that employment with great ability, till the year 1602, when he died of the plague. He had an aversion for women; but, as he owns himself, he was punished by God for it, in the four marriages he contracted [L]. He left some children [M]: he published many books [N]. Thuanus is very much mistaken

[K] The curiosity that an old man had, deserves to be known. He had been made to believe, that Junius, the Heretical preacher, had cloven feet, and he was not undeceived, till he had viewed him from head to foot. It was in the presence of a great company, who were met in hopes of hearing a dispute between Junius and a Franciscan. The place and hour for the conference were appointed; but the Friar went back, under pretence of having forgot something. I have a hundred times heard such sort of stories, but never saw them before supported by a printed and authentic testimony. Which makes me set down Junius's own words. *Ridiculum est quod dicam, sed tamen indicium horum simplicitatis, & mendacissimæ illorum impudentiæ. Quum in campo essemus, Franciscani illius adventum expectantes, vir quidam senex frequentiam illam maximam quæ tum aderat perumpens, copiam sibi fieri videndi mei postulavit. Audito strepitu rogabam quid rei esset. Cognito hominem esse mei videndi cupientem, monui ut daretur homini ad veniendum locus. Tum ille demisso vultu inde à pedibus ad verticem usque observans diligentissimè constitutionem meam, erupit in hæc verba: eho, jamjam video non esse id verum, quod mihi de te fuerat enunciatum. Me autem dicente, quid ergo illud est? tibi, inquit, pedes fissos esse (26). — What I am going to relate, is ridiculous, but is an instance of the folly and lying impudence of these persons. When we were in the field, expecting the coming of that Franciscan, a certain old man, breaking thro' the crowd, demanded to see me. Hearing a noise, I asked what was the matter: and finding, that one desired to see me, I desired they would make way for him. Then he, casting his eyes downward, and surveying me from head to foot, broke out into these words: now I am convinced, it is not true, what was told me of you. Upon asking him, what that was, he answered, he had been told, that I had cloven feet.

(26) Ibid. pag. 20, col. 1.

[L] He had an aversion for women, but he was punished by GOD for it, in the four marriages he contracted. Left I should translate his words wrong, I shall only set them down. *In conjugis varie me duriterque exercuit Dominus. Nam quatuor uxores duxi hætenus: adeo me (qui prius propter canum impium scelera à feminis abhorrebam, & functionis meæ studio conjugum refugiebam pervicacissimè) castigavit Dominus, præposterum judicium meum tacite exprobravit, & perjuranda optimarum fidelissimarumque conjugum consuetudine evicit peccatum, indignamque de sexu femineo toto opinionem meam (27). He observes, that he lost his first wife by the ignorance of a midwife, who spoilt her Uterus in delivering her of twins (28). (28) They did not 'Harum primam injuria obstetricis à vita sustulit, licet. Ex prima, quum ita corruptus in obstetricatu fuisset illius uter, ut annos amplius septem indefinente sanguinis deflavo afflicta sit atque exhausta, incredibili cruciatu ipsius, & labore meo (29). The consequences of this accident proved very unhappy, not only for the wife, but also for the husband, namely a continual loss of blood for above seven years together. His second wife died, being with child, the fifth day of a continual fever. The third died of a dropy. The fourth was alive when he wrote this, about the year 1592. Afterwards she died of the plague.

(27) Ibid. pag. 23, c. l. 2.

[M] He left some children. By his second wife, the daughter of John Cornput, secretary and burgo-master of Breda, he had, amongst other children, a daughter who was married to the learned John Gerard Vossius, and a son named JOHN CASIMIR JUNIUS (30), who studied Divinity, and was designed by his father for an Hebrew professor, but that did not succeed. He quitted letters for the military profession, at the solicitation of his uncle John Cornput (31), who made him lieutenant of his company. He died at Gertrudenberg. He published in Dutch an apology for the speech of Sir Dudley Carleton, king James's ambassador. It was in answer to a censure of the States of Holland, who had censured (32) that speech. He left a son called FRANCIS JUNIUS, born at Embden, the twentieth of September 1624, who was professor of the Civil Law in the university of Groningen (33). In the following article I shall speak of another FRANCIS JUNIUS, a son of the Leyden professor, by a third venter.

[N] He published many books. His works of Divinity, collected together, make two volumes in folio, (34) See the and contain, amongst other things, I. A commentary upon the three first chapters of Genesis, with an answer to the twenty two objections of Simplicius (34) 225. II. An Analysis of the Pentateuch, an explication of the prophecies of Ezekiel, Daniel, and Jonah. III. Sacred parallels, and notes upon the Revelation, and the epistle of St Jude. IV. Observations against Bellarmine, and upon the anathema of Gregory XIII against Gebhard Truchses, archbishop of Cologne. He also published some notes upon Manilius and Cicero's epistles, and upon Tertullian, and a work of George Codinus Curopalates. He also translated into Latin, Bodin's Demonomania, John du Tillet, Arnauld's plea against the Jesuits, &c. He wrote an answer (35) in French, to Peter Charmistaken in what he says him [O]. Scaliger's memoirs, who hated Junius, very probably prejudiced this famous historian against him [P]. Junius did not deserve the contempt that Scaliger had for him; the injustice of it is visible. And when we consider the praises that many great authors have given him (i), we find ourselves more disposed to pity than to indignation, with respect to that injustice. He was a learned and honest man; and otherwise so far from running things to an extremity, that he believed salva-

ron's

(i) See Colomesius, Gallia
Orient. pag. 95, & seq.

tion

ron's Three Truths. I must not forget, that he understood the Greek and oriental tongues. He was the first that published George Codinus's book De Officialibus Palatii Constantinopolitani, & officiis magnæ Ecclesiæ. He added to it a Latin translation with notes. He published two editions of this book, one in the year 1583, to which he put his name in Hebrew for he called himself Nadabus Agmonius (36). He dedicated it to the magistrates of Francfort. He dedicated the second to Marquardus Freherus, who procured him some manuscripts, by means whereof he filled up several chafms of the former edition. He was preparing a third, which would have been exempt from some of the faults which had escaped him in the two first, and which were censured by the Jesuit Gretserus (37). What Vossius observes against that critic, is very judicious; he does not deny that Gretserus's book is a learned work, but he thinks that the good service which Junius had done to the Republic of learning, has not been sufficiently considered. Gretserus makes it his only business to censure his faults; which is, says he, the epidemical distemper of the learned. 'Multa in his sunt, quibus etiam doctissimos doceat (Gretserus). Nec pauca tamen, quæ pro Junio possum reponere. Sed hic eruditorum morbus est epidemicus: ut non tam cogitent quantum boni aliquis præliterit: quale est hic, quod primus eum scriptorem Junius sua lingua ediderit, Latine verterit, etiam illustravit Notis; in quibus humani aliquid subinde, in tam arduo negotio, perperam fuisse, nec ipsi negamus. Sed, ut dici solet, inventis aliquid superaddere, vel, quando omnes sumus homines, etiam errores observare, non est ulque adeo difficile (38). — There are many things in them, in which Gretser may instruct the most learned; and not a few, which I can replace for Junius. But this is the epidemical disease of learned men: they do not enough consider, what good any one has done; such as Junius's publishing that author in his own language, translating him into Latin, and even commenting on him; in which laborious undertaking I do not deny that he sometimes commits faults. But, as they say, it is not very difficult to improve upon discoveries, and to observe mistakes, to which, as men, we are all liable.' Junius had translated the three books of Gelasius Cyzicenus, concerning the council of Nice, and added notes to them (39). Vossius (40) promised to get them printed. Junius translated out of Greek into Latin, the books which are called Apocryphal: and from the Arabic, the Acts of the Apostles, and the epistles of St Paul to the Corinthians. He translated from the Hebrew, all the books of the Old Testament, not alone, but with Tremellius.

[O] Thuanus is very much mistaken in what he says of him. These are his words. 'Vir desultorio ingenio qui multa conatus, an adsecutus sit quod moliebatur, doctorum erit judicium. Lugduno Batavorum ubi diu professus est, ob rerum novarum suspitionem ab Ordinibus Belgii exactus, sicuti suo loco diximus, & Altorfii ubi defecit, à Norimbergenfi Rep. honorifico stipendio invitatus (41). — A man of an inconstant genius, who attempting many things, whether he succeeded in what he undertook, the learned will judge. Banished from Leyden, where he had been long Professor, by order of the States, on suspicion of caballing, as I have related in its place, and invited to Altorf, where he died, by the Republic of Nuremberg, with the offer of an honourable salary.' I do not examine whether Junius was justly censured for his levity, and for meddling with too many things. Vossius, his son-in-law, has solidly justified him in this respect (42); but I shall observe after him (43), that Thuanus is strangely mistaken, in supposing, I. that Junius was expelled by the States of Holland, upon some suspicions of a political cabal. II. That he was invited by the magistrates of Nuremberg, and that he died at Altorf. III. That he (Thuanus) has mentioned this exile under its proper year. To begin with this last fault, I say, that Thuanus has not spoken of Junius, but of Donellus, in describing the cabal which was discovered in the year 1587 (44). Junius was then in the Palatinate, and did not come to Leyden till five years after. No one is ignorant, that from the year 1592, till he died, he was professor of Divinity at Leyden. It was Donellus who retired to Altorf, and died there (45).

[P] Scaliger's memoirs . . . prejudiced Thuanus. It is Vossius's conjecture (46), and it is very probable. Scaliger's hatred and fury against Junius, discovered themselves both in his conversation (47) and letters. This is not so plain to every reader in his letters, because Heinsius (48) who published them in the year 1627, put asterisks in the places, where Junius was abused, and left out the names; but the abuses are not the less real for it. 'Hocce anno Heinsius noster in lucem edidit Epistolâ Scaligeri, in quibus non urbanitatem sed rusticitatem Junium tanquam Cumanum asinum tangit homo cætera magnus, sed nimis malignus (49). — This year our country-man Heinsius, published Scaliger's letters, in which that author, in other respects a great man, but too ill-natured, jests with an awkward kind of wit on Junius, calling him the ass of Cumæ.' These are Vossius's words: he had just been saying, that they had found in Junius's books, several gross abuses written with Scaliger's own hand. When a man proceeds thus far, what will he not do. 'Memor eram qualia superflues evomerit adversus Junium, cum totus in fermento jaceret. Et meminisse ipse potes. Adhuc in nostris, & aliorum manibus versantur co-dices Juniani, Scaligeri manu opplati bellis illis e-logiis, sumis, cojone, & aliis id genus convitiis, βαρβαρίσιν (scurra) non Scaligero dignis (50). — I remembered how injuriously, in his life-time, he treated Junius, loading him with all manner of reproaches. And you yourself may remember it. Junius's books are still extant, filled by Scaliger's own hand with the fine encomiums of ape, ass, and the like scurrilities, worthy of a buffoon, not of Scaliger.' Note, by the way, that Scaliger did nevertheless bestow many praises upon Junius's tomb (51). So true it is, that the verses made upon the death of people, are a piece of the grand comedy, which is acted on the stage of the world. Note also, by the by, that Junius drew upon him the hatred of this great man, by the liberty he took of contradicting him sometimes in points of Chronology, &c. Some young men threw oil into the fire, by reporting, in an invidious manner, what Junius said of the other, either in his lectures or conversations. 'Scis quale fuerit illud maximum Scaligeri ingenium. Non ferebat dissentientem. Itaque semper eo nomine offensior Junio fuit, quod in quibusdam ad sacram χρονολογίαν pertinentibus ac credo in aliis etiam nonnullis à se discreperat. Offensam eam unus & alter discipulorum alebant, malignè interpretantes apud Scaligerum, quæ vel publice docuisset Junius, vel privatim dixisset (52). However it be, this is what made Vossius (53) think that Thuanus had been prejudiced against Junius, by Scaliger's letters.

That thought kept him at first in suspense, whether he should make an apology for his father-in-law against Thuanus, or no; for he foresaw, that the son of this great historian would justify his father, by producing Scaliger's letters, which were injurious to Junius; and in that case Vossius would have found himself obliged to write against Scaliger: but he found it more proper to conceal the faults of that great man, than to publish them. At last he took the method, that may be seen in the preface (54), which I have quoted. 'Si calamum adversus Thuanum stringam, periculum video, ne filius Thuani, juvenis eruditus, & ut genere, atque opibus pollens, ita multis in Galliis carus, & maximis honoribus decoratus, quæ de imperitia Junii modestè Parens scripserit, ea apertè, & sine circumsione prodita, offendat à Magno (44) Thuan.

Histo. lib.
lxxxviii, pag.
147.

(45) Idem. lib. c,
pag. 405.

(46) Ubi supra.

(47) See the Scaligeriana.

(48) See Vossius's Letter to Grotius, amongst those of the Arminians, n. 448, pag. 726.

(49) Vossius, in eadem Epistola.

(50) Ibid.

(51) Ibid.

(52) Ibid.

(53) Ibid.

(54) Ibid.

(55) Ibid.

(56) Ibid.

(57) Ibid.

(58) Ibid.

(59) Ibid.

(60) Ibid.

(61) Ibid.

(62) Ibid.

(63) Ibid.

(64) Ibid.

(65) Ibid.

(66) Ibid.

(67) Ibid.

(68) Ibid.

(69) Ibid.

(70) Ibid.

(71) Ibid.

(72) Ibid.

(73) Ibid.

(74) Ibid.

(75) Ibid.

(76) Ibid.

(77) Ibid.

(78) Ibid.

(79) Ibid.

(80) Ibid.

(81) Ibid.

(82) Ibid.

(83) Ibid.

(84) Ibid.

(85) Ibid.

(86) Ibid.

(87) Ibid.

(36) And not Aymenius, as Placcius has it,
de Pseudonymis,
pag. 220, who a little while after says Cornelius, instead of Cod-inus, and appre-hendit, instead of reprehendit.

(37) See Vossius, de Historicis
Grecis, pag. 368.

(38) Vossius, ibid.

(39) Ib. pag. 264.

(40) Ibid.

(41) Thuan. lib.
cxviii, sub fin.
ad ann. 1602.

(42) Vossius, in
Pæf. de Histo.
Latinis.

(43) Ibid.

tion might be obtained in the church of Rome [2]. He never understood better the deficiency of his knowledge, than when he was arrived to the highest pitch of his knowledge (k); which is a sign of a good understanding.

à Magno Scaligero, Reip. literarum dictatore, cui doctior orbis lubens eruditionis falces submittit. Hinc mihi nova cura, etiam tuendi eum adversus Scaligeri calumnias, incumbet. Quem ego virum laudavi semper, ac porro laudare decrevi: non quia ejus potentiam animi, aut maledicentiam ignorem; aut quasi nesciam, quam multis in locis aliquid humanitatis patiat: sed quia ejus tantæ virtutes, præclaræque adeo merita sunt, erga historiam, ac bonas literas, ut propterea, quæ peccavit, censam ei condonari, & æterna oblivione sepeliri oportere (55).

(55) Vossius, Epist. lxxv, pag. 106.

— If I draw my pen against Tüvanus, I see the danger, lest Tüvanus's son, a learned youth, and not only of a good family and fortune, but dear likewise to many in France, and designed for the greatest honours, should shew that the great Scaliger, dictator of the Republic of Letters, whom the learned world readily acknowledges as it's sovereign, declared openly, and without mincing the matter, what his father modestly wrote concerning the unskillfulness of Junius. Hence a new task will lie upon me, even of defending him against the calumnies of Scaliger; a man, whom I always praised, and have resolved still to praise: not that I am a stranger to his impotency of mind, or faculty of slandering; or that I am ignorant, that in many places he is himself in an error; but that I think his faults ought to be excused and entirely forgotten, on account of his great virtues, and uncommon merit, in respect to history, and classical learning. He spares the name of Scaliger in this preface, but not his person; it is true, that he gives him a stab in a very respectful manner. These are his words. Acerbo adeo ut summus vir (Tüvanus) pronuntiaret, fecit amicus ejus, vir cætera egregius; sed, quod in aliis damnat, præfatus planeque idcirco, xai αὐτὸν δὲ, sæpe etiam turgens loliginis succo, ac si quis non per omnia assentiret, vehemens alieni nominis obtricator: quo vitio non mediocriter fœdabat egregias, imo admirandas animi dotes. Non me ariolari hic, sed certissima promere, multis possum indicibus comprobare: sed ea sunt viri illius merita, ut quedam satius sit honoris causa taceri (56).

(56) Vossius, Præfat. de Hist. Latinis. See also his Letter to Goussier: it is the sixty fifth.

— So bitterly, that the great Tüvanus pronounced, his friend did it, in other respects an excellent man; but, what he condemns in others, confident, opinionated, and severe, and apt to detract from the merits of those, who do not assent to him in every thing; with which vice he greatly sullied his excellent parts. That this is not meer conjecture, but strict truth, I can sufficiently prove; but such are this man's merits, that respect induces me to conceal some things. Nothing can be more moderate.

[2] He believed salvation might be obtained in the church of Rome. Nevertheleſs, he called her, as other ministers did, the whore mentioned in St John's Revelation; but he said that she was still the spouse of the son of God; a spouse, whose unfaithfulness Jesus Christ bears with, and whom he has not divorced. This did not please Beza, a great favourer of the monarchy of the Solipsi. Give me leave to call thus the communions, which believe that they only are in the way of Salvation. Junius gave a great latitude to the true church. Perhaps Mr Nicole did not know it (57). Doctissimus socer Junius cum nollet ab iis discedere, qui Romanam Ecclesiam censent esse meretricem Babyloniam, & tamen statueret salvari in ea innumera millia, aiebat esse vivum corpus, sed ulceribus obitum: meretricem esse, sed adhuc sponsam Christi, vel conjugem, quia Christus nec dum ei miserit libellum repudii. Sed non eo satifecit Genevenſibus: qui illam dicerent idololatricam, ac proinde neminem in ea salvari. Narravit mihi aliquando doct. Anthonius Thyſius, cum primam Genevam venisset, & soceri mei nomine multam salutem diceret D. Bezae, illum continuo subjecisse; Et quomodo valet carissimus frater Junius: vir est egregie de Ecclesiis nostris meritis: quamquam in uno capite dissentiat à nobis. Id caput erat de Ecclesia: quam Junius negabat tam arctis limitibus concludi, ac multi volunt (58). — My learned father-in-law

Junius, when he would not dissent from those, who think the Romish church to be the whore of Babylon, and yet laid it down, that great multitudes are saved in it, said she was a living body, but covered with sores: that she was a harlot, but still the spouse, or wife, of CHRIST, because CHRIST had not yet sent her a bill of divorcement. But this did not satisfy the Genevois, who said she was idolatrous, and that therefore no body was saved in her. The learned Anthony Thyſius once told me, that when he first came to Geneva, and had complimented Beza in my father-in-law's name, he immediately answered; And how fares my dearest brother Junius? he deserves extremely well of our churches; though in one article he dissents from us: That article was concerning the church; which Junius would not have confined within such narrow bounds, as many would.

This is what Vossius says. He observes in another place, that Junius being much more free from prepossession, than people generally are, used to say in his latter days, the longer I live, the more I discover my ignorance. Socer meus Fr. Junius, tanti cum à multis retro annis nominis foret, postremis tamen vitæ annis crebrò illud in ore habebat, magis & magis se in dies videre, quam multa se scirent. Ita ille, qui cum novellis Doctoribus sociarat antiquos; qui etiam partium studio non paulo minus laborabat quam vulgò fieri solet (59).

(57) See the preface to his treatise concerning the unity of the church, where he mentions some ministers, who believed, that the true church is to be found in several communions.

(58) Vossius, Epist. ad Hugon. Grotium. It is the 27th in Epist. Eccles. & Theol. of the 2d edition, pag. 312.

(59) Id. apud Colovet. Gall. Oriental. pag. 96.

(a) By the third marriage contracted with Joan l'Ermite, daughter of Simon l'Ermite, lord of Betinfort, chevin of Antwerp, and related to Daniel l'Ermite, de quo suo loco.

JUNIUS (FRANCIS), son of the foregoing (a), was born at Heidelberg in the year 1589. His first design was to be a man of the sword; but the truce which was concluded in 1609, for twelve years, made him take another resolution; which was to apply himself to Literature. He travelled into France; from whence he went over into England in the year 1620. He was received in the house of the earl of Arundel, and lived there thirty years; after which he returned into Holland, and there went on with the study he had very much cultivated in England, I mean that of the northern languages [A]. He made an extraordinary progress in it. He was so passionately fond

(1) Taken from his Life, written by Mr Grævius, prefixed to the folio edition of his book de Pictura Veterum.

[A] He applied . . . to the study of the northern languages. Having found in England several Anglo-Saxon books, he resolved to make advantage of them; and knowing from the skill he got in the Anglo-Saxon language, that it would enable him to discover many etymologies for the illustration of the Dutch, English, and German tongues, he applied himself wholly to that study, and afterwards learnt the ancient language of the Goths, Franks, Cimbrians, and Frisones, whereby he found the etymology of several Italian, French, and Spanish, words: for the Goths, Vandals, Franks, Burgundians, and Germans, spread their language in the provinces which they conquered: there are still some footsteps of them (1). He applied himself self entirely to the writing of glossaries (2); and this is the pedigree he discovered. His omnibus linguis imbibendis cum satis diu insudasset, vidit, quod & privatim apud omnes, quibus cum agebat de hac doctrina, tum publice testatur est, Gothicam esse matrem omnium cæterarum Teutonicarum linguarum, ex qua profluxerit vetus Cimbrica, monumentis Runarum posteris tradita, nec non Suecica, Danica, & Norwegica, Islandica, quibus, illius plagæ homines isto tempore suas animi cogitationes explicant. Ex Anglo-Saxonica, quæ & ipsa aut propago est Gothica, aut illius soror Germanica, & ejusdem matris filia, manavit Anglicana, Scotica, Belgica, Frisica verus. Ex Gothica & Saxonica orta est Francica, quæ Germanica fond of this study, that understanding there were in Friesland some villages, where the ancient Saxon tongue was preserved, he went and lived there two years. He returned into England in 1675, and having stayed two years at Oxford, he retired to Windsor to Isaac Vossius, his nephew, and died there within the space of a year. The university of Oxford, to which he bequeathed his manuscripts, built him a very noble monument (b). I will speak of the books he published [B]. He was not only a man of very great learning, but also of an excellent life. He was not observed to have any vitious passion. He did not mind the riches nor the honours of this world; his books were his only care: and perhaps no man did ever study more than he, without doing any prejudice to his health [C]. I shall set down a passage of Colomiés [D].

(2) Totus est in contextibus Anglo-Saxonica, Francica, & Cimbrica, & explicandis antiquissimis harum gentium scripturis. Grævius, ibid.

When I spoke of his stay at Oxford, and of the time of his death, I followed the account of Mr Grævius; but the same is not exact. I rectify it here by observing that Junius retired to Oxford in the month of October 1676, and continued there till the month of August 1677, when he went to Windsor upon the invitation of Isaac Vossius, his nephew, in whose house he died near that place, on the nineteenth of November 1677. He was sick but a few days. He was buried in St George's chapel at Windsor (c).

(b) Taken from his Life, written by Mr Grævius, and prefixed to his book de Pictura Veterum, in folio.

(c) Taken from Athenæ Oxoniensis.

(3) Id. ibid.

* manicæ superioris parens est. Harum veterimarum linguarum, & dialectorum, quæ ex illis ductæ sunt, cognitionem invicto studio, & incredibili assiduitate non primus tantum affecutus est, sed & solus, viam secutus nullius ante tritam vestigiis (3). — Having applied himself long enough to the acquiring all these languages, he discovered, as he both privately assured all whom he conversed with on this subject, and also publicly declared, that the Gothic was the mother of all the other Teutonic languages, whence flowed the old Cimbric, banded down to posterity by the remains of the Runæ, as also the Sædisb, Danisb, Norwegian, Islandisb, in which the men of that country then expressed their thoughts. From the Anglo-Saxon, which itself is either a branch of the Gothic, or its sister, and daughter of the same mother, flowed the English, Scotch, Belgic, old Frisib. From the Gothic and Saxon sprang the Frankisb, which is the mother language of Upper Germany. He was not only the first, but the only one, who, following an untrodden path, with invincible labour and pains, acquired the knowledge of these ancient languages, and the dialects, which are derived from them.

(4) At Rotterdam, for Reinier Leers, 1694.

(5) Qui argenteus dicitur, quoniam quatuor Evangelia litteris Argenteis Gothicis in illo fuerat descripta. Grævius, ubi supra.

(6) There is XI in Junius's Life; but in the catalogue of the manuscripts bequeathed to the university of Oxford there is IX.

(7) Taken from his Life.

[C] No man studied more than he without any prejudice to his health. He rose at four of the clock in the morning both in winter and summer, and studied, till dinner time. He dined at one, after dinner he used some exercise till three (8): He went again to his study at three, and left it not till eight to go to supper, and then he went to bed. He seldom went out; and when he did, it was upon some business. All this did not hinder him from enjoying a perfect health: he was never sick. Firma fuit valetudine, ut prosperrima per omnem ætatem sine ulla corporis effensione uteretur, quamvis totis diebus à summo mane usque ad noctem incumberet litteris, & rarissime, nec nunquam nisi negotiorum ratio id ei quasi imperaret, prodiret in publicum (9). Such a long solitude spent amongst barbarous books, and wild words, and in making five Gothic or Teutonic Lexicons, did not in the least lessen his gaiety, no not in his old age: he was always free from peevishness, and affable to those who visited him, though he did not care to be interrupted. Mr Grævius describes this in elegant terms. In assiduitate tanta licet invitatus admodum avocaretur ab his, quibus insudabat, curis, tam longe tamen aberat omnis molestia ingenique tristitia, quæ solet esse propria iis, qui à luce hominum & celebritate alieniores omne tempus & operam domi suæ in doctrinæ & litterarum studiis consumunt, præcipue senes, ut nihil sene nostro fieri posset suavis & facilius (10). The polite literate will doubtless believe that he was a very miserable man; they had as good be condemned to the galleys as spend their lives as he did among his desks, without tasting the pleasures of gaming, love, good cheer, or conversation. How can a man live, say they, without wine in the day time, and without women in the night. But they are mistaken, if they fancy their happiness exceeds his. He was doubtless one of the happiest men in the world, unless he had the weakness others have to be disturbed about trifles: for as there are some people, who having no reason to be merry, find out chimerical pleasures to amuse themselves (11); there are some, on the contrary, who cannot be moved with the most just causes of discontent, and yet disquiet themselves for ridiculous things, of which they should be ashamed to complain.

[D] I will set down a passage of Colomiés. 'I knew at the Hague the learned Mr Junius, son of the famous Francis Junius, who was professor of Divinity at Leyden. He is an old man near eighty, but still very vigorous. He studies thirteen or fourteen hours a day, and has lately published the four gospels in Gothic, with a very learned glossary. He made me a present of this curious work, and told me, he would quickly print his book de Pictura Veterum, with the names and works of all the Painters of antiquity. It will be dedicated to the present earl of Arundel, who was his pupil, when he was in England library-keeper to this earl's father. I ought not to forget, for Mr Junius's glory, that Grotius highly commends his book concerning Painting, in the following letter (12). That letter has been prefixed to the new edition of our Junius's book.

(8) Hora prima prandebat, sequente corpus exercebat, vel in area subduali ambulando contentus, aut etiam subulium nonnunquam currendo, aut, si id non ferret asperior tempestas, per omnes scolas in ætæculum ascendendo valetudinis tue de causa Grævius, in Vita F. Junii.

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) Id. ibid.

(11) Dum carceris, gaudia fallit juvant. Ovid. Heroid. Epist. xiii, vers. 108. Consult Mr Dacier on Horace, lib. 1, Epist. viii, pag. 406; 410, 411.

(12) Colomiés, in his Opuscula, pag. 116. Edit. Utrecht, 1669.

JUNO, sister and wife of Jupiter, was the daughter of Saturn and Rhea. Her father being resolved to devour his children, for fear they should dethrone him, did not spare her any more than his two other daughters (a), whom he had already swallowed; but he was forced to disgorge them some years after. They gave him a potion, which

VOL. III.

7 U

(a) Vesta and Ceres, Juno's eldest sisters. Apollodorus, lib. 1, pag. 4.

made

(b) Apollodor.
ibid.

made him vomit up all the children he had devoured (b). And thus it was that Juno returned into the world. The circumstances of her marriage with Jupiter are differently related. There is a tradition which says they loved one another, and lay together unknown to their father and mother [A], and it does not appear that she kept her lover long in suspense. But others say, that she withstood the solicitations of Jupiter like a maid of virtue and honour [B]; and that to avoid his further importunities, she fled into a den. They add, that she there met with a man, whose discourse so softened her heart in favour of Jupiter, that she consented to make him happy upon the spot (c). Others would perhaps confess, that this was the first time that Jupiter lay with her, but not the first time that she lay with a man; for they pretend, that before Jupiter courted her, she passed through the hand of Eurymedon, a stout and leud giant, by the same token, that he got her with child of a son, who was called Prometheus [C]. Jupiter did not know it till after he was married, and he discharged his revenge upon this bastard under other pretences. Upon some other occasions, the chastity of his wife appeared very doubtful to him [D]. He well deserved it, whose gallantries were so common. There was scarce any animal, but he borrowed it's shape to get maidenheads. Every body knows that he metamorphosed himself into a cuckoo, in order to compass his desire with Juno [E]. This goddess presided over marriages (d),

(c) See the article
ACHILLES.

(d) See the remark [Z].

[A] A tradition says that Jupiter and Juno lay together unknown to their father and mother.] They who want a good proof of this matter, may find it in these words of the Iliad (1):

(1) Lib. xiv,
v. 1, 294.

Ὡς δ' ἴδεν, ὥς μιν ἔρωσ πυκινὰς φρένας ἀμ-φεκαλυψεν,
Ὅσον ὅτε πρῶτισον ἐμισγροσθην φιλέτητι,
Εἰς εὐρὴν ποιτῶντε, φίλους λήθοντε τοκῆας.

Ut vero vidit, continuò illum amor prudentia præcordia cooperuit,
Perinde ac quando primum misit sunt amore,
Ad cubile consuetudinis gratiâ euntes, suis clam parentibus.

The god, whose lightning sets the heav'ns on fire,
Thro' all his bosom feels the fierce desire,
Fierce, as when first by stealth he seiz'd her charms,
Mix'd with her soul, and melted in her arms.

P O R T

Homer speaks here of a certain occasion, on which Jupiter, who had been married many ages to Juno, felt, as he saw her by chance, the same ardor, as when he lay with her by stealth the first time. I add to the testimony of a Greek Poet, that of a Latin one. It is a lover who speaks; a lover, I say, who had found the critical minute (2), and is vexed that many before him had received the like gratifications by stealth.

(2) Et mecum
tenera gavisâ est
ludere in herba Purpureos flores, quos insuper ac-cumbebat Candida formoso supponens brachicollo. Valerius
Cato, in Diris,
pag. 61, Cataleflorum veterum Poëtarum.

Istius atque utinam facti mea culpa magistra
Prima foret: lethum vita mihi dulcis esset.
Non mea, non ullo moreretur tempore fama,
Dulcia cum Veneris furatus gaudia primus
Diceret, atque ex me dulcis foret orta voluptas.
Nam mihi non tantum tribuerunt impia vota,
Auctor ut occulti noster foret error amoris.
Jupiter ante sui semper mendacia furti,
Cum Junone prius conjux quam dictus uterque esset, Gaudia libavit dulcem furatus amorem (3).

(3) Valer. Cato,
ibid.

O! that my crime had taught her first the bliss!
With pleasure I had dy'd upon the kiss.
My fame had liv'd, and future ages sung
How first from my embrace love's transports sprung.
In vain my impious wishes would aspire
To kindle in her breast the secret fire.
With Juno, tho' not yet his consort, Jove,
Retir'd in private, stole the joys of love.

[B] Others say that she resisted the solicitations of Jupiter like a maid of virtue and honour.] Her virtue was such according to some, that if Jupiter had not found a remedy, instead of that which he would not grant him, he would not have known what to do. But he went and sat upon a mountain (4) as often as he was in the transport of his passion, which he calm-

(4) Called Leu-fate.

ed by that means (5). The author who furnishes me with this story, does not say whether Jupiter was then married to Juno, nor was it necessary to be so particular upon this subject: the most stupid readers will easily understand, that he was not married, and that he was in love with a cruel woman.

[C] Eurymedon . . . got her with child of a son who was called Prometheus. You will find this story in Homer's Scholiast (6). Jupiter's resentment was not less violent against the father of the bastard, than against the bastard himself; for if Prometheus was put in chains, Eurymedon was cast down into hell. I know not under what pretence Jupiter treated Eurymedon in that manner; but there is no question, that he concealed the true cause of his anger: he had too much sense to disgrace himself by his revenge. His pretence against the bastard was his stealing the celestial fire. The Scholiast (7) whom I cite has this from Eurhiron.

[D] The chastity of Juno . . . appeared very doubtful to him. I will comment upon this text with the words of a modern author, who designing to prove, that Jupiter was a notorious cuckold, expresses himself thus: 'The giant Eurymedon had obtained the first favours of Juno his wife', and not to speak of the 'isle of Samos, which was famous for the unchastity of Juno', 'the goddess of chastity', 'the goddess of amours of this goddess, do not we know that Jupiter discovering a few days after his marriage, that she would quickly be the mother of a child that was not his, she knew how to wheedle him so as to persuade him that she had conceived of herself, and that she had preserved her virginity intire. She made him believe another time that she was with child by eating wild lettuce. So that though the horns that were set upon his statue in Libya, had not denoted him a cuckold, did not he deserve that they should have this signification, and to occasion those ways of speaking, which have been so long in use, by the consent of all nations (8) ?'

[E] Jupiter metamorphosed himself into a cuckoo in order to compass his desire with Juno.] To relate what is most curious upon this subject, I need only follow the dispute of Costar and Girac. The foundation whereof is this: 'Jupiter was no less forgetful on many other important occasions. Pallas complains in Homer that he did not think of wife Ulysses.' Another upbraids him that in the establishment of his household, he had not considered cuckoldom, from which he had received so many signal services (9) ('$ a.'). They are Costar's words. His adversary answers him, that this is a very unjust accusation: 'For good Jupiter, says he (10), to shew the esteem he had for cuckoldom, and the desire of being a cuckold, transformed himself into the bird of that name; when he courted his wife Juno. And afterwards to express his gratitude, he commanded the Argivi to make a fine cuckoo of gold, and to perch him upon the sceptre of Juno's statue; with which this great goddess was not offended, having reaped at least as many advantages from cuckoldom, as her husband had done. And even near the town of Hermonie, there are two little mountains, one of which is called the Cuckoo Mountain, upon which in Paulus's time was seen a temple of Jupiter, and

(c) 'O Ζῆλος ἐλπίσων ἡρώων ἐρχόμενος ἐν τῷ πύργῳ ἐκκαθίξῃ· καὶ ἀνταπάσῃ τῷ ἥρωϊ. Jovem semper Junonis amore captum a faxum hunc accen-sisse, atque ei insidendo amoris impotentiam fe-cisse. Prol.
Hejbali. apud
Photium, Cod.
CXC, pag. m.
402.

(6) Ἦσαν τρεφομένην παρὰ τοῖς γονεῦσιν εἰς τὴν γυναικὴν Εὐφρο-δίου βλαβέμενοι ἔγκλειστοί τε σιν ἢ δὲ Πρω-μυθία εὐγενέας Schol. in Ilad.
lib. xiv, vers.
295.

(7) Id. ibid.
* Didym. in
Hom. Iliad xiv.
Eustath. ibid.

(8) Girae, Re-
plique à Coisar, fest. lxiv, pag.
m. 545.

9) (9) Coſtar, De-penſe des Ouvriers
de Voiture, p.
m. 116.

(10) Gine, Ré-ponse à la Defense de Voiture
sect. xxvi, pag.
104.

his at uf-erich au-and † In Corinth
ver

but she should not have had that employment. It was an ill omen, for she led but an odd life with her husband; and in spite of all the strong reasons, that engaged him to bear

(11) Costar, Suite de la Défense, pag. 382, confer this in those words: Asiote says somewhere in his Rhetoric, that Hegesippus being returned from Ellis, whether he went to consult the oracle of Jupiter, resolved likewise to consult that of Delphi, where he asked Apollo this question: Will you be of the same opinion with your father? Dare you contradict him? But Girac complains, in his Reply, pag. 551, that his words have been falsified: He clearly shews that he was not ignorant that Jupiter gave answers in other places; but that he gave none through his statue except in Egypt.

† Cicer, I, de Nat. Deorum.

(12) Costar, Suite de la Défense, pag. 380.

* Equidem vix credo hanc fabulam apud veteres inveniri, sed fupior ab otioso quopiam Grammatico fuisse confictam: adeo fapit anile quiddam.

† Tu tibi nunc curruca places, setumque labellis Eoribus. Sat. VI, ver. 276.

(13) Costar, ubi supra, pag. 381.

(14) He speaks to Mr Menage.

over against it on the other mountain that of Juno. In Libya, the statue of Jupiter Hammon had great horns upon its head. Which was so agreeable to this god, that tho' statues were erected to him over all the world, he only delivered oracles thro' this (11). He was so well pleased with his horns, that he obliged his dearest friends to follow his example. Bacchus † and Pan, the satires, the gods of the rivers, and many others did not fail to imitate him, Juno herself did the same, to shew that she had some complaisance for her husband, and we still see several medals of this goddess with horns. Diana and Venus wore them too as an ornament that wonderfully became a handsome face. This answer is learned, but it is false; for there is nothing in it that proves the point in dispute. The state of the question is this: whether Jupiter honoured the husbands, whose wives had gallants? Prove as much as you please, that he honoured the bird we call a cuckoo, and add moreover that he would have his statues to be adorned with horns; say withal, that the other gods followed the same fashion; you do not come near the point, because at that time, the words cuckold and horns were not taken in the same sense, that is given them at present. Besides, to disguise ones self in the shape of a cuckoo, in order to succeed in one's enterprizes, would not even in our age be a sign, that a man desires to marry a galanting lady. My readers will easily imagine, that Costar was aware of the vanity of the answers that were made him: but if any one should doubt of it, I shall quickly undeceive him by citing his own words. In which we shall see, that the affectation of making too great a shew of his reading, makes him mix with his replies, some things which spoil his cause. He begins with Jupiter's metamorphosis into a bird, which bears the name of cuckoo; and here follows what he says of it (12).

[§ 2] It would be in vain to look for this story in the writings of the Antients; Rabelais is the author of it, book III. chap. XXXII, but the ground of it is found in Plutarch, No 17. of his consolation to Apollonius on the death of his son. REM. CRIT.

This old woman's story, and that ridiculous invention of a grammarian abusing his leisure, (thus Erasmus † speaks of him) is took from a scholiast upon Theocritus, who says that Juno having left her companions to divert herself all alone and at liberty, after a long walk, laid herself upon the grass in a fine place of mount Thronax. Jupiter, who saw her in that posture, found her so handsome, that he immediately fell violently in love with her, and to ease his passion, put on the shape of a cuckoo, and raising an extreme cold in the air, all trembling and frozen, he threw himself into this goddess's arms; and then resuming his usual form, and promising to marry her, he received from her the satisfaction he desired. The cold that Jupiter rais'd upon that occasion was not greater, than that of the silly jest of our learned author. In effect it appears, that it was not out of love to cuckoldom that Jupiter turned cuckoo, since neither among the gods nor among men, the name of that bird did signify at that time a husband, whose wife was unfaithful to him. At least, there is no sign of it among the Antients: on the contrary, there are some women in Plautus, who call their husbands Cuckoos, whom they surprized in adultery, and Juvenal † calls a poor fellow Curruca [Hedge sparrow], who had that injury done him; doubtless, because that bird feeds the young cuckoos that are laid in its nest. Costar afterwards goes on to the consideration of the horns, and expresses himself in this manner (13). Has Mr de Girac seen any old manuscript, which clearly proves: that at that time horns were a sign of cuckoldom? and you, SIR (14), who know every thing, can you shew me that these ways of speaking, to bear horns, and to set horns, in the sense that they are now taken in, are much more ancient than Artemidorus, who flourished under Hadrian? the horns of Jupiter Hammon were not those of a cuckold, but of a fine ram, prophesying upon the sands of Libya, as our Ronsard speaks. He examines in particular, the horns of those deities which Girac had produced, and makes it evident that they had no relation to the condition of the husbands, which we call cuckolds, and that they were not taken in complaisance to Jupiter; and this is his conclusion (15). If out of all this Mr de Girac can make any thing that may be serviceable to his design, I will not oppose him: but I am very much mistaken, if he can succeed in it, and oblige me to acknowledge that Jupiter, when he settled his household, did not forget cuckoldom, which had always been so serviceable to him. This is a good conclusion; it is to bring things to the state of the question, and to make all the lines terminate in the center.

Let us consider the reply. Girac thinks it very strange that Costar, should treat this matter with a scholastic strictness, and in a serious manner (16). He would have me to prove by demonstration and authority, that it was the love of cuckoldom, that made Jupiter a cuckold. He is not satisfied, unless I shew him some manuscripts that clearly prove, that at that time horns were the marks of cuckolds. Where is the justice of this man? he does nothing in all his writings but banter; he himself confesses that he cannot speak a sentence without the assistance of his beloved irony; and yet he will not suffer me to jest so much as once Although my raileries arise from my subjects, and are supported by very fine antiquities; for is it not true that Jupiter was a downright cuckold, since the giant Eurymedon had obtained the first favours from his wife Juno? You will find above (17) the sequel of this passage: it would be needless to repeat it here; the paper it would take up, will be more usefully employed in these two remarks. The first is, that though it be permitted to jest in a criticism; yet it is not permitted to reason wrong. You may be merry if you please, and speak according as occasion serves, either in jest or in earnest; but be sure not to advance a falsity, and never pretend, that by jesting upon a false supposition, or by building raileries upon ignorance, you will either make good objections, or solid answers to an objection (18). My second observation is, that the adventure of the giant, and the unfaithfulness of Juno, come too late. The author had said nothing of them in his answer, and so they can make nothing against Costar, who was not obliged to govern himself, by what his adversary should say afterwards. They cannot bring Mr de Girac off, for besides that he did not make use of them to support his criticism, they cannot prove the thing in dispute. Suppose Juno had an hundred intrigues, will this prove that Jupiter remembered cuckoldom, when he settled his household? every body sees that my first remark ruins Girac's cause, since all that he alledges is grounded upon a false supposition. He might be reduced to this troublesome dilemma. If you was ignorant, that when Jupiter transformed himself into a cuckoo, husbands dishonoured by their wives unfaithfulness were not called cuckolds, and cornutes, your railery is very impertinent; for according to your own rules, a railery is bad, when it is grounded upon the ignorance of things, which we are obliged to know (19). If you knew that at that time such ideas were not

(15) Costar, ubi supra, pag. 386.

(16) Replique à Costar, ect. lxiv, pag. 544.

(17) In the sequel of this passage, it would be needless to repeat it here; mark [D].

(18) Confet come supra, in the remark [C] of the article COLOMIE'S.

(19) Girac. Réponse à la Défense de Voltaire, ect. xxvi, pag. 190. See Costar, Suite de la Défense pag. 381.

Notwithstanding all this, says he (20), our Sophist urges me to shew him, that when the father of the gods put on the shape of a cuckoo, the name of that bird signified a husband, whose wife was false to him. I promise and engage to satisfy him, if he proves by good authorities, that Jupiter was formerly reproached, that in the settlement of his household he had not thought of cuckoldom. As for what relates to horns, that word in the signification I have given it, is more ancient than is imagined. We learn from Nicetas, that the emperor Andronicus, to ridicule the inhabitants of Constantinople, and upbraid them with their wives lewdness, used to set up in the public places of that great city, the finest and largest flags beads, that could be found; and Artemidorus, who lived fifteen hundred years ago, makes use of the words, to bestow horns, as a common proverb, which did not begin in his time (21). It would be an ill use of one's time, to French Tongue in seek the original of it, and to enquire whether it was false, at the words in use in Jupiter Hammon's time. However it be, my corner and couu, adversary,

bear with her, after so many just occasions of jealousy, which he gave her, their quarrels were driven so far as a divorce [F]; and I believe, that before they came to that, he tried if by beating her he could bring her to reason. He hung her up once betwixt heaven and earth for some time [G]. If on one hand she presided over marriages and weddings, adversary, who pretends to be a subtle man, did not perceive, this time, that I laughed at him. This passage of Mr de Girac makes it plain, that he has lost his cause: he does not find himself capable of proving what is denied him, and without which his criticism is insignificant; he pretends that he designed to ridicule his adversary. There is no writer but may use such subtleties, when he knows not what to answer: we shall see Mr Costar in his turn somewhat puzzled. His knowledge forsook him, when he made use of Erasmus's authority, in a thing where Eras-

(22) The passage of Erasmus quoted by Costar, is in the explication of the Adage, Scit quomodo Jupiter duxerit uxorem. It is the twenty third of the IVth century of the IVth Cbiliad, pag. m. 914.

He observes that the Scholast upon Theophrastus relates this upon the credit of one Aristotle: Adjungit fabulum quam retulerit Aristoteles nescio quis. From whence it appears that he did not believe, as Girac did, that this story was mentioned by Aristotle, Alexander's tutor. Several Aristotles have writ books. See Jonsius, de Hist. Philosoph. pag. 61.

(23) Girac, Replique, pag. 546.

†† Ἀριστοτέλης δὲ ἰσορεῖ ἐν τῷ περὶ Ἐρ-μηνεύσεως ἱερῶν ἐδιώτερον περὶ τῆς Διὸς καὶ τῆς Ἥρας γάμου, &c. Schol.
Theodor. in illum
Vers. Eid. xv, Πάντα γυναῖ-κας ἴσασι καὶ
ὡς Ζεὺς ἡγάγεθ' Ἦουν.

(24) Pausan. lib.
ii, pag. 78.

(2c) So it ought to be called, and not Θρώαξ.
Thronax, as we read in the Scho-liast upon Theocritus. Meursius is the author of that correction.
Miscell. Lacon.
pag. 370. Costar follows Erasmus, who says Thronax.

(26) It was a piece of Polycle- tus, Pausan.
lib. ii, pag. 59.

(27) Id. ibid.

(28) Id. lib. viii,
pag. 253.

her by Temenus, with whom she had been educated. The last was built at the time that she lived at Stymphalum, whither she retired after her divorce. You will find in Charles Stephens's Dictionary, enlarged by Lloyd (29), by what means Jupiter caused Juno to return to him. He spread a report, that he was going to be married to Alopous's daughter. This news made a greater impression upon the provoked goddess's heart, than all Jupiter's intreaties. See the remark [2], at the place where I relate the generation of Typhon.

[G] He hung her up once between heaven and earth for some time. The reason of it was, that she had raised a storm against Hercules, Jupiter put her in mind of it, when he knew the tricks she had played him during the siege of Troy. She knew so well how to charm him, and lay him asleep in her arms, that Neptune had the time necessary to put the Trojan affairs in an ill condition. I speak at large of this stratagem of Juno, in the following remark. Jupiter, who had given her so many sweet words, and procured her great pleasures, no sooner knew the prejudice the Trojans had suffered, whilst he had been lying with her, but he reprimanded her very sharply. He threatened to whip her (30), and asked her, whether she had forgot the time, when he fastened an anvil to each of her feet, and suffered her to hang between heaven and earth in the fight of all the gods, who in vain attempted to untie her; for he kicked from heaven to earth as many of them as he could catch.

(29) He quotes
Phylarchus lib.
xix. But Natalis Comes, Mythol.
lib. ii, cap. iv,
pag. m 135,
quotes Dorotheus,
in lib. ii, Narra-tionum fabulosarum.

(30) Καὶ ἐπὶ
πληγῶν ἡμῶν.
om. Et te verberibus credam.
*Homer. Iliad. lib.
XV. ver. 17.*

* Η δὲ μέμνη ὅτε τ' ἐκρέμαυ ὠλόβην, ἐκ δὲ ποδοῦσ' ἦν
 * Ἀκμονας ἦκα δ' αὖ, περὶ χερσὶ δὲ δεσμών ἦλα
 Χρῦστος, ἀφ' ἧρ' ἦλθον; σὺ δ' ἐν αἰθέρι καὶ τερλησιν
 * Ἐκρέμαυ, ἦλθες δὲ θεοὶ κατὰ μακρὸν Ὀλυμπον.
 Λῦσαι δ' ἐκ ἐδύνατο παρασάδον; ὅν δὲ λῶσοιμι,
 * ῥίψαςκον τελαγὼν ἀπο βηλῆ, ὅφρ' ἂν ἴκω-λαι Γῆν ἐλιγνυπέλεαν.

An non meministi quando pependisti ab alto, à pedibus autem
Incudes demisti duas, circum manus autem vinculum misisti
Aureum, infrangibilem ? tu autem in æthere & nu-bibus
Pependisti, indignabantur autem dii per excelsum Olympum :
Solvere autem non poterant circumstantes : quemcumque autem apprehenderem ; Projiciebam correptum de limine divino, donec per-veniret
In terram vix spirans (31).

(31) Ibid. ver.
18.

*Haſt thou forgot, when bound and fix'd on high
From the vaſt concave of the ſpangled ſky,
I hung thee trembling in a golden chain,
And all the raging gods oppoſ'd in vain?
Headlong I hurl'd them from th' Olympian ball,
Stunn'd with the whirl, and breathleſs in the fall.*

Р О Р Е.

It was Juno's best way to appear submissive: she excused herself with false oaths, and promised to comply with the desires of her husband. The quarrel went no farther at that time. I ought not to forget, that Juno was the cause of the war of the Titans. She encouraged them to dethrone her husband (32), and to restore Saturn, whom Jupiter had deposed.

(32) Hygin. cap
cle

weddings, she had, on the other, the management of their natural consequences: I mean, that she presided over child-births, and over several things depending thereon [H]. Michael de Montagne did not well know the origin of an adventure, which he takes from Plato, and expresses himself a little too wantonly [I]. Authors do not agree about the place where jealousy was then stronger than ambition; for the indignation she conceived when she saw Epaphus (33) gratified with a kingdom, made her chuse rather to be a dethroned goddess, provided her husband was so too, than to reign with him. But perhaps she proposed to herself a revenge, in which her ambition would be no loser. She might hope that by preferring the interests of her father unjustly dethroned, before those of her husband, who was an usurper, she should have a share in the government, under her father restored, and should break for ever with Jupiter. We shall see hereafter (34) another conspiracy she engaged in against her husband.

I cannot think of Juno hanging between heaven and earth, without proposing to my readers a passage which I do not understand. Hyginus (35) relates, that Vulcan having forged golden shoes for Jupiter, and the other gods, Juno was no sooner set down but she found herself hung in the midst of the air. Vulcan had notice of it, that he might come and loose his mother whom he had bound; but he answered he had no mother. He had been kicked out of heaven, and was still enraged for that ill usage. Here are the Latin words. Vulcanus Jovi ceterisque Diis soles aureas ex adamante cum fecisset, Juno cum sedisset subito in aëre pendere cepit. Quod cum ad Vulcanum missum esset ut matrem quam ligaverat solveret, iratus quod de cælo præcipitatus erat, negat se matrem ullam habere. I commend the critics, who have made so many learned observations upon the first words of Hyginus (36); but I could wish, they had taught me, how by means of a pair of shoes, a woman as soon as she sits down, can find herself hanging in the air. I do not see how a chair or a throne can have that effect, and especially upon a person bound. Methinks we may complain of this historian's want of judgment. Could he believe that the reader would be contented with so broken and falsified a narration? why did not he say, that as soon as Juno was set down, the floor of heaven split asunder, and her chair being no longer supported, fell towards the clouds, and stopped in those spaces which are between heaven and earth. This had been intelligible to the reader. Servius tells the story better; he says, that Vulcan made a chair, which Juno sitting upon, could not rise again (37), till she had granted Vulcan's request. It was to know, who those were to whom he owed his life. Alii dicunt quod cum Vulcanus parentes suos diu quaereret, nec inveniret; sedile fecit tale, ut cum eo qui sedisset surgere non posset; in quo cum adsedisset Juno, nec posset exurgere; Vulcanus negavit se soluturum omnino, nisi prius parentes suos fibi monstrasset, atque ita factum est ut in Deorum numerum reciperetur (38).

Others say, that when Vulcan had sought his parents a long time, and could not find them, he made such a chair, that whoever sat in it, could not get up out of it; in which Juno happening to sit down, and not being able to rise up again, Vulcan protested he would not free her, till she had informed him who were his parents; by which means he was received into the number of the gods. Consult Paulanias, and you will find, that Vulcan designing to be revenged of Juno, sent her a throne of gold, to which she found herself tied, as soon as she sat down on it (39). None but Bacchus could persuade Vulcan to return into heaven (40); and he was even obliged to make him drunk to engage him in that voyage. The Athenians had a picture which represented Bacchus bringing Vulcan back to heaven (41); and the Lacedæmonians had a piece of sculpture, which represented the same Vulcan untying his mother (42).

[H] She presided over child-birth, and over several things depending thereon.] When Terence supposes, that Glycerium the courtesan being in labour, made use of this prayer, Juno Lucina ser opem, serva me, obsecro (43); he manifestly shows, that Juno was the deity that presided over that affair. She was called (44), Opigena & Lucina, under that function, sive te Lucinam quod lucem nascentibus tribuas, ac Lucetiam convenit nuncupari (45). She had other particular names given her, according to the different services that were expected from her in these conjunctures; for she was called Fluonia, as being able to prevent too great a loss blood. Fluoniam Junonem mulieres colebant, quod eam sanguinis fluorem in conceptu retinere putabant (46). She was called Februa, as presiding over the ceremony of the purification of child-bed women. These are the limitations which Martianus Capella gives to the surnames Fluonia and Februa: for he introduces Philology, who declares, that being a virgin, she has no need of invoking the goddesses Juno in those two respects. Nam Fluoniam Februaque ac Februum mibi poscere non necesse est, cum nihil contagionis corporeæ sexu intemperate pertulerim (47). She might have wanted her help in another respect, since St Augustin affirms, that Varro said that Juno presided over the flowing of the menstrual blood. Ibi est & Dea Mena, quæ menstruis fluoribus præest, quavis Jovis filia, tamen ignobilis. Et hanc provinciam suorum menstruum, in libro selectorum deorum ipsi Junoni idem autor assignat quæ in diis selectis etiam regina est: & hic tanquam Juno Lucina cum eadem Mena privigna sua eidem cruori præsidet (48). I know very well, that many authors make the goddesses of child-births distinct from Juno; for some say, that Lucina was her daughter (49), and others affirm, that Diana was appointed to assist women in labour (50). But without insisting on the hypothesis, that Lucina, Ilithya, Diana, Luna, and Juno, were the same deity (51), I say, it is very probable, that Juno was considered, as the chief of this function, and as having deputies, and substitutes in different places (52). If you will not therefore acknowledge her directly and immediately for the goddesses Levana, who caused the new-born infants to be acknowledged by their fathers (53); nor for the goddesses Rumina, who presided over the action of giving them suck; nor for the goddesses Cunina, who presided over their cradles; nor for the goddesses Nundina, who presided over the imposition of their name; nor for the goddesses Vaticana, who presided over their cries (54); nor for the goddesses Fabulina, who presided over the first loosings of their tongue, that is, over the first words they pronounced; believe at least, that all these goddesses were subdelegates to Juno, the superintendent-general. The same ought to be said of the goddesses Prosa, and the goddesses Postverta, who were worshipped, that children might not take an ill posture, when ready to be born. Quando contra naturam forte conversi (pueri) in pedes, brachia plerumque diductis retineri solent; ægriusque tunc mulieres enituntur. Hujus periculum si deprecandi gratia ære statuas sunt Romæ duabus Carmentibus: quarum una Postverta nominata est, Prosa altera; à recti perversique partus & portellæ te & nomine (55). — When the posture of children in the womb happens to be unnatural, it is with difficulty their mothers bring forth. To deprecate which danger, there are two altars in Rome dedicated to the two Carmentas; one of whom is named Postverta, the other Prosa, from the power and name of a right and perverse birth.

[I] Montagne . . . expresses himself a little too wantonly.] It was from some poet that was in great want, and very greedy of this sport, that Plato had this story. That Jupiter one day being in a violent fit of love, and not having patience till his wife had got into bed, tumbled her on the floor, and through the vehemence of the pleasure, forgot the great and important resolutions he had been taking with the other gods in his celestial court, boasting that he had found that bout as good, as when he first got her maidenhead unknown to her parents (56). So far Montagne. He is to blame for ascribing this notion to some poet greedy of amorous embraces, since Homer, the author of that story, does plainly declare he does not think it probable, that a husband should be in such transports for his wife. Accordingly he supposes (57) that Juno was not satisfied with putting on her best attire, but besides, had the policy to borrow Venus's Cestus, an inevitable charm, a philtre that never failed to produce its effect. It is to the assistance of that loan, that he attributes Juno's power

(33) Me was of a husband of Jupiter. Mygion, ibid.

(34) In the remark [F] of the article JUPITER.

(35) Hygin. cap. cixvi.

(36) In order to know whether we ought to read solis, or solas. Whether one may say aureas ex adamante, and whether it were not better to say, filia aurea nexa adamante, or filia ex auro & ex adamante. See Hyginus of the Amsterdam edition, 1681.

(37) Compare what is said of Theseus, in the sixth book of the Æneid, Sedit æternamque sedilem inflexa Thestis; and what the commentators say about the feat that he was placed upon. See Mr du Rondel concerning the Chénix of Pythagoras, pag. 95, & seq.

(38) Servius, in Eclog. iv, Virg. ver. 62.

(39) Paulan. lib. i, pag. 18.

(40) Id. ibid.

(41) Id. ibid.

(42) Id. lib. iii, pag. 99.

(43) Terent. in Andr. Act. III, Sc. I.

(44) Festus, pag. m. cxxxix.

(45) Mart. Capella, de Nuptiis Philologie lib. ii. pag. m. 37.

(46) Festus, pag. m. lxxiii.

(47) Mart. Capella, ubi supra.

(48) August. de Civit. Dei, lib. vii, cap. ii, pag. m. 618.

(49) Hesiod. in Theog. See Metamorphoses upon Ovid's Epistles, pag. 638, & seq.

(50) Catullus, Epig. xxxv. Horat. Ode xvii, lib. iii, & mult. ali.

(51) See Metamorphoses, ubi supra.

(52) See Kippiniana, in Antiqu. Romanis, lib. i, cap. i, n. xv, pag. m. 24, 25.

(53) This was performed by taking up the child which the midwife had laid on the ground.

(54) See Aulus Gellius, lib. xvi, cap. xvii, where he says after Varro, Deus Vaticanus.

(55) Aul. Gell. lib. xvi, cap. xvi.

(56) Montagne, Essays, book i, chap. xxx, pag. m. 309.

(57) Iliad, lib. xiv.

(*) See the remark [K].

where Juno was educated: some say it was at Samos (e): others say it was in the ocean [K]; but there was no town where she was more honoured than at Argos [L]. She of inspiring her husband with so violent a fit of love. Several other things might have been censured in Montagne's story (58), had not he had the prudence to quote Plato. Wherefore he is not to be called in question on account of the faults of this Philosopher; but we must apply ourselves to Plato.

(58) See, below, citat. (62), (63).

It is certain, that he unfaithfully relates Homer's story: his words are these. "Ἡ Δία καθευδόντων τῶν ἄλλων θεῶν τε καὶ ἀνθρώπων, ὡς μόνος ἐρηγορεῖ, ἃ ἐβελύσατο, τῶν πάντων βελύσας ἐπιλανθάνμενον, διὰ τὴν τῶν ἀφροδισίων ἐπισυμῆαν; καὶ ἔως ἐκπλαγύντα, ἰδόντα τὴν Ἥραν, ὥς μὴδ' εἰς τὸ δαμνῆτιον ἐθέλειν ἐλθεῖν, ἀλλ' αὐτὴ βυλόμενον χαμαὶ ἐσυγίγνεσθαι, καὶ λέγοντα ὡς ἔσται ὑπὸ ἐπιθυμίας ἐχέται, ὡς ἔδ' ὅτε τὸ πρῶτον ἐφοίτων πρὸς ἀλλήλους—φίλος λήθοντα τοῦ κῆρας. Jovem ceteris tum Diis, tum hominibus dormientibus omnium quæ vigilando tractaverat rerum venerarum cupiditate oblitum, & ulque adeo visa Junone percussum esse, ut nec domum venire sustinuerit, sed ibidem humi congrederi statim voluerit, dicens vehementiori se cupidine inflammari, quàm olim cum primum clam parentibus invicem congressi fuerunt (59). —

(59) Plato, de Republica, lib. iii, pag. m. 612. [A].

Jupiter, the rest of gods and men being asleep, easily forgot all his counsels, thro' the desire of venereal pleasure, and was so struck with the sight of Juno, that he could not stay till he got home, but lay with her that instant on the ground, saying, he was fired with a more ardent desire, that when they used to meet, unknown to their parents. Plato means, that one of the things, for which Homer's poems ought to be prohibited, is, that we there find, that, whilst the other gods and men are at rest, Jupiter cannot sleep for a lewd temptation, and forgets all the resolutions he had made; and that upon the sight of his wife, he is transported with such a vehement passion, as prompts him to lie with her immediately, without giving her time to go to bed, &c. I say once more, Plato alters the story: for Homer does not say, that the other gods were asleep, or that men were at rest. He says on the contrary, that the Greeks and Trojans were vigorously fighting, and that Neptune was in action against the Trojans. Neither does he say, that Jupiter forgot his resolutions; he supposes that Jupiter was polled upon the top of mount Ida, and that Juno seeing him there, formed a design of inspiring him with a desire of lying with her. He supposes, that in order to execute this project, she went and washed her body, she dressed and tricked up her self, as fine as she could, and provided her self with Venus's girdle. Whereby he undertakes to describe Jupiter as a very amorous god, since the most potent charms were contained in that girdle.

--- ἔνθα δὲ οἱ θελήτῃρα πάντα τέτυκτο.
ἔνθ' ἐνὶ μὲν φιλότῃ, ἐν δ' ἱμερῷ. ἐν δ' ἀοριεῦς, Πάρφρασις ἥτ' ἐκλεψε νόον πύκαπτερ φρονέοντων.

--- in eo autem delinimenta omnia inclusa erant:
Ibi inerat quidem amor, inerat desiderium, inerat & amantium colloquium, Blandiloquentia quæ furim surripit mentem prudentium licet (60).

(60) Homer. Iliad. lib. xiv, ver. 215.

In this was ev'ry art, and ev'ry charm,
To win the wisest, and the coldest warm;
Fond love, the gentle vow, the gay desire,
The kind deceit, the still reviving fire,
Persuasive speech, and more persuasive sighs,
Silence that spoke, and eloquence of eyes.

POPE.

I do not pretend to excuse him: I grant that Plato most justly condemns him; for in short, it is a most scandalous thing thus to play upon the chief of ones gods. For the rest, the eagerness of Jupiter was not so great, but that it gave him time to repeat a long catalogue of his mistresses. Some think that Homer does not place this story well; it is not, say they, prudence in a husband to represent to his wife his unfaithfulness to her; this is not a good way of cajoling her. Others justify Homer, by reason that it must needs be very agreeable to a wife to hear her husband say, that he feels a greater passion for her, than he ever did for such and such mistresses upon the first enjoyment. This is what Jupiter's declarations comes to:

Νῶϊ δ' ἄγ' ἐν φιλότῃ τραπέζῃ ἐννδοντες
Οὐ γὰρ πάποτε μ' ὥδε θεῶς ἔρω ἔδε γυ' ναικὸς Θυμὸν ἐνὶ στήθεσσι περιπροχυθεὶς ἐδάμασ-σεν,
Οὐδ' ὅπῃτ' ἠρασάμην Ἰξίωνος ἀλόχοιο, &c.

Nos autem age in amore convertamur in lecto dormientes.

Non enim unquam mihi sic deæ amor neque mulieris

Animum in pectoribus circumfusus domuit.

Neque quando captus fui amore Ixionæ uxoris, &c. (61).

(61) Homer. Iliad. ver. 347.

Let sister cares the present hour employ,
And be these moments sacred all to joy.
Ne'er did my soul so strong a passion prove,
Or for an earthly, or a heav'nly love:
Not when I press'd Ixion's matchless dame . . .

POPE.

I add, that Homer has preserved decorum on Juno's behalf. He brings her in representing to her husband the inconvenience that might happen, if any god should see them lying together upon mount Ida, and should go and give others notice of it; but, said she, since you have a mind to it, let us go into your chamber. Jupiter did not consent to that expedient, but he found another; which was to form about his wife a cloud so thick, that the sun itself could not see thro' it, and it was under this cloud that he satisfied his passion. He did not throw his wife upon the floor, as Montagne says; but upon the hard ground, in an open place. It is true, the earth immediately sent forth flowers and grass (62), which served instead of a good quilt. Neither Homer nor Plato make Jupiter say, what Montagne does, that he was as much pleased at that time, as when he first lay with her unknown to her parents. Homer says only (63), that Jupiter perceiving Juno, felt the same passion as when he went to lie with her the first time. I am willing it should be said, to excuse Montagne, that he did not believe there was a great difference betwixt these two things.

[K] Some say she was educated at Samos, others say it was in the ocean.] She herself affirms the latter, in her discourse to Venus, when she borrowed her Cestus (64). She tells her, that she wanted it to reconcile the ocean with his wife Thetys, who had not lain together for a long time. Her gratitude for the good education she had received with them, engaged her to make a voyage to reconcile them. She promises herself, that she shall for ever be loved and esteemed by them, if she can persuade them to lie in the same bed.

Δὸς νῦν μοι φιλότῃ καὶ ἱμερῷ, ᾧ τε σὺ πάντας
Δαμνᾷ ἀθανάτους ἡδὲ θνητὸς ἀνθρώπους
Εἰμι γὰρ ὀφειμένη πολυέριπτε πείρατα γαίης, Ὀκεανὸν τε θεῶν γένεσιν, καὶ μητέρα Τη-δόν,
Οἷ μ' ἐν σφοῖσι δέμοισιν εὐτρεφὸν ἡδ' ἀτίταλλον,

Τὴν εἰμ' ὀφειμένη, καὶ σὺ ἀκριτα νέικτα λύσω
Ἥδην

(62) See 616 what the sky to Oceanus and Thetys, as Ovid Metam. lib. ii, describing them to exclude the creation of the Bears.

(63) His words may be seen in the remark [A], citat. (61).

She was also much respected at Carthage [M], and at Olympia. There was in this last town sixteen ladies appointed overseers of the games, which were celebrated to her honour every five years. Three classes of young maids disputed there the prize of the race,

Ἦσαν γὰρ ἑπτὰ χθρὸν ἀλλήλων ἀπείχονται
Εὐνὴς καὶ φιλότῆτος, ἐπεὶ χθρὸς ἐμπέσσε θυμῷ, &c.

Da nunc mihi amorem & desiderium, quo tu omnes

Domas immortales atque mortales homines
Vado enim visura almæ fines terræ,
Oceanumque deorum parentem, & matrem Tethyn,
Qui me in suis ædibus magna curâ nutrierunt & educarunt,

Hos vado visura, ipsi ut difficiles compositu lites dirimam.

Jam enim diuturno tempore inter se abstinent
Cubili & amore, ira enim invasit animum, &c. (65).

Then grant me, said the queen, those conqu'ring charms,
That pow'r, which mortals and immortals warms;
That love, which melts mankind in fierce desires,
And burns the sons of heav'n with sacred fires.
For lo! I haste to those remote abodes,
Where the great parents (sacred source of gods)
Ocean and Tethys their old empire keep,
On the last limits of the land and deep.

For strife, I hear, has made the union cease,
Which held so long that antient pair and peace,
What honour, and what love shall I obtain,
If I compose those fatal feuds again?

POPE.

Had she had Venus's Cestus to her lot, that charm so effectual to change the conduct of married people, who lie by themselves, she had with much reason been made to preface over marriages; but she wanted to borrow the pacific method, and potent instrument of reconciliation: why was not this employment given to the goddess, from whom the Cestus was to be borrowed? I leave it to those who are at leisure, to enquire into the reasons of it.

As for her education at Samos, consult Pausanias, who says, that the inhabitants of that island maintained that Juno was born there under a little tree, which they still shewed (66). The temple of this goddess was very ancient (67). Every body remembers these words of the Æneid (68):

Quam Juno fertur terris magis omnibus unam, Posthabita coluisse Samo.

The isle was called Parthenia, because Juno was educated there, when she was a virgin (69). There it was also, that her marriage with Jupiter was celebrated; whence she came to be represented in her temple as a maid, that is a marrying, and the anniversary of her feast was kept like a wedding. Infulam Samum scribit Varro prius Partheniam nominatam, quid ibi Juno adoleverit, ibique etiam Jovi nupsit. Itaque nobilissimum, & antiquissimum Templum ejus est Sami, & simulacrum in habitu nubentis figuratum, & sacra ejus anniversaria nuptiarum ritu celebrantur (70).

[L] There was no town where she was more honoured than at Argos. The Argivi pretended, that Juno was bred up by the three daughters of the river Asterion. One of them was called Euboea; whose name was given to the mountain upon which Juno's temple was built: Eupolemus, a native of Argos, was the architect of it: In the porch of it stood the statues of all the priestesses of that goddess (71); their office was very considerable, as I have observed, speaking of the unfortunate priestess, who occasioned the burning of the temple (72). Pausanias says (73) she made her escape to the altar of Pallas at Tegea, and that the indignation of the Argivi did not move them to throw down her statue. He says, that the most antient image of the goddess was made of a wild pear-tree. It was carefully preserved. Piræus, the son of Argus, removed it to Tyrinthus; but the Argivi, having demolished that town, restored it to the temple of Juno (74). See Benedictus upon Pin dar (75) (74) Id. lib. 1. concerning the games that were celebrated at Argos, in honour of this goddess. See also the commentators (75) Pag. 142^a of Horace, upon these words of the seventh ode of the first book.

Plurimus in Junonis honorem
Aptum dicit equis Argos.

To honour Juno, many sing
Argos, for horses sam'd.

Silius Italicus, to shew Juno's fondness of Carthage, says that she prefers it before Argos and Mycenæ.

Hic Juno ante Argos (sic credidit alta vetustas)
Ante Agamemnoniam gratissima testâ Mycenem, Optavit profugis æternam condere sedem (76).

These favour'd walls imperial Juno chose,
To fix the exiles in secure repose.
This town she honours with peculiar grace,
And Argos and Mycenæ must give place.

According to Homer (77) the three towns that Juno loved best, were Argos, Lacedæmon, and Mycenæ. It is strange he says nothing of Samos, the only place that Virgil mentions, when he speaks of the preference she gave to Carthage.

I will say something of the founder of Juno's temple at Argos, by which we shall discover the antiquity of this edifice. Phoroneus, the son of Inachus, caused it to be built; and was the first who armed this goddess, in recompence whereof, he was the first that reigned. Phoroneus Inachi filius templum Argis Junoni primus fecit, says Hyginus in his 225th chapter. And chapter 274, Phoroneus Inachi filius, arma Junoni primus fecit, qui ob eam causam primus regnandi potestatem habuit. Some critics instead of arma will have it read aram, or sacra, but others maintain the common reading, and confirm it by a passage of Cassiodorus, in the eighteenth chapter of the seventh book Variorum. See the commentators upon Hyginus in the Amsterdam edition, 1681. As for the antiquity of Phoroneus, see Scaliger, pag. 19. of his notes upon Eusebius's Chronicon. It is sufficient to remember, that Phoroneus was cotemporary with Abraham, or wanted but little of it.

[M] . . . And so she was at Carthage.] I a long time thought that Virgil made use of a poetical licence, without any regard to history, when he represented Carthage as Juno's favourite city (78): Nor did I think my self obliged to change my opinion, on reading in Ovid and Silius Italicus, the confirmation of Virgil's assertion; for one cannot reasonably doubt, that he was the occasion of Ovid's making Juno speak thus.

Pœniteat quod non fovi Carthaginis arces,
Cum mea sint illo currus & arma loco (79):

Repenting that I turn'd an angry eye
From Carthage, where my arms and chariot lie.

As also of Silius Italicus's asserting what we have seen above (80). But having considered other passages of several authors, I began to imagine that Virgil's hypothesis was founded on tradition. Psyche's prayer is not of the least force with me: 'Magni Jovis gemina, na, says she (81), & conjuga: five tu Sami, quæ querulo partu vagituque & alimonia tua glorior, tenes vetusta delubra; five celsæ Carthaginis, quæ te virginem vectura leonis cælo commeantem percipit, beatus sedes frequentas: five prope ripas Inachi, qui te jam nuptam Tonantis, & reginam deorum memorat, inclitis Argivorum præfides mœnibus: quam cunctus oriens Zygiam veneratur, & omnis oc-

(65) Homer. Iliad. lib. xiv, ver. 198. Juno repeats the same thing upon Mount Ida, when Jupiter offers her whatever she is going. Ibid. ver. 301.

(66) Pausanias, lib. vii, pag. 209.

(67) Id. Ibid.

(68) Lib. i, ver. 25.

(69) Schell. Apollonius, in lib. iv. He says upon the 187th verse of the first book, that the Imbreus, a River of Samos, was called Παρθένιος, because Juno was brought up there when she was a maid.

(70) Lactant. lib. i, cap. xvii, pag. m. 54. See also St Augustin, de Civitate Dei, lib. vi, cap. vii.

(71) Ex Pausan. lib. ii, pag. 59.

(72) See the article CHRYSIS.

(73) Pausan. ubi supra. See also lib. iii, pag. 86.

(76) Silius Italicus, lib. i, ver. 26.

(77) Iliad. lib. iv, ver. 51.

(78) Æneid. lib. i, circa init.

(79) Ovid. Fast. lib. vi, ver. 45.

(f) A kind of gown or veil.

(g) Ex Pausanias, lib. v. cap. xvi, pag. m. 417.

race, and came down to run at the Olympic games, and took almost all the time. The victorious ladies received a crown of olive. The same ladies made a peplus (f), which they consecrated to this goddess every five years (g). For the rest, Jupiter's unfaithfulness to his wife was so much the more inexcusable, because Juno had the secret of growing a maid again every year [N]. Her love for Jason has not been much talked of [O]. She with honour got out of the snares that Ixion had laid for her [P]. If we believe some authors, she had no child by her husband; and whenever she conceived, she

• cident Lucina appellat: sis meis extremis casibus
• Juno Sospita, meque in tantis exantlati laboribus
• defessam, imminenti periculi metu libera. —
• Great sister, and wife of Jove: whether thou inhabitest
• the ancient temples of Samos, which glories to have
• given you birth, and nourished you in infancy; or frequentest
• the happy seats of Carthage, which worships
• thy virgin deity, drawn by lions through the heavenly
• road: or, near the banks of Inachus, who now commemorates
• thee, wife of the thunderer, and queen of
• gods, thou presidest over the famed walls of Argos:
• whom the whole east worships under the name of Zygia,
• and the west calls Lucina: be to me, in my greatest
• difficulties, Juno the preserver, and free me, tired with
• so great labours, from the fear of impending danger.

This concerns Juno directly, and without ambiguity. Herodotus's passage concerning Urania (82) of Carthage, does not seem to have the same weight; for it induces us to believe that this Urania was not Juno, but the moon. Now I do not consider here the Theology of those who reduce many of the Pagan gods into one; I only keep to the public notions, according to which, Juno was worshipped as the sister and wife of Jupiter, and as a distinct object from Minerva, Diana, the moon, Proserpina, &c. For the rest, I cannot think on the worship that was paid to this goddess in so many places (83), and with so much pomp, without believing there were mixed with it, I know not what impressions of the custom, which is observed with respect to women. When a woman has a share in the government, she is much more attended, honoured, and respected, than a man in the same authority. Consider how the wives of the governors of provinces are courted, when they are known to have a great interest. The honours that are paid to them exceed those that are given their husbands. This is the practice of the earth, and it is carried into heaven. Jupiter was served as a king, and Juno as an ambitious, haughty, and revengeful queen, who divided with him the government of the world, and assisted in all his councils.

Οὐτ' ἐστ' εἰς εὐνὴν Διὸς ἡλυθε μετρίοντα, Οὐτ' ἐστ' εἰς δῶκον πολυδαίδαλον, ὥς τοιπαρῶν ἄνθρωποι ἐρεζομένην πυκινὰς φρεσὶ σκετο βολὰς.

Nunquam ad cubile Jovis venit consiliarii,
Nunquam ad thronum varium, sicuti antea
Cum ipso sedens, sapientia consultans consilia (84).

(84) See Homer in the Hymn to Apollo, where he says that Juno left her husband for a year, by reason of Minerva's birth.

(85) Erasmus in Ecclesiast. apud Coleman, Rome Protestante, pag. 25.

(86) Called Canathus. It was in Peloponnesus. See Pausanias, lib. ii. sub fin. pag. 80.

(87) César de Rochefort. Diction. Général & Curieux, pag. 612, 613.

I dare say that the extravagances that Christians are fallen into, towards the Virgin Mary, which go beyond all that the Heathens invented in honour of Juno, are owing to the same original, I mean to the custom of honouring women, and making court to them, with greater zeal and reverence than to the other sex. We cannot be without women either in a civil or religious life. He that should take from the Romish communion the devotion to saints, and especially to her whom they call the queen of heaven, and the queen of angels, would leave a frightful gap in it: the rest would fall in pieces, and would be arena sine calce, scopæ dissolutæ. Erasmus blaming the custom of saluting the Virgin Mary in the pulpit, after the beginning of the sermon, says, That it is contrary to the example of all the antients, who were rather to be imitated, than such sort of people, as perhaps to please women, have herein trod in the steps of the Heathens (85).

[N] She had the secret of growing a maid again every year. This she did by only washing herself in a fountain (86). Juno took great care, says the writer of a dictionary (87), to wash herself every year in the fountain Canathus near Nauplia, which at present is called Napoli di Romania, where she constantly recovered her virginity, which made her beloved by Jupiter, Pausan. lib. 8. It is not true that Pausanias observes that she hereby made herself beloved by Jupiter. He only says that the Argivi spoke of this return of Juno's virginity, and founded what they said upon the practice of their occult ceremonies in the mysteries of this goddess. There are many writers, who quoting an author, are guilty of making him say whatever they think he should have said. This was the occasion of imputing to Pausanias what he did not say. The author of this false imputation, was probably full of what he had been relating: 'Diego de Torrez, in his history of the Cherifs, says, that amongst the felicities the Turks hope for in another life, they believe their wives will bring them new maidenhands, cap. 74.' The fountain of youth, so celebrated by our old poets and romancers, had not a virtue comparable to that of Canathus.

[O] Her love for Jason has not been much talked of. Some authors say that Jason owed the friendship and protection of this goddess to a good service he had done her, without knowing, who she was. Juno disguised like an old woman, desired him to carry her over a river: he did it, and lost one of his shoes by the bargain. But others say he owed to his beauty the interest he had in her. Juno could not withstand so many charms, but grew passionately fond of that handsome youth. 'Οτι δὲ εὐπρεπὴς ἦν ὁ Ἰάσων δῆλον ἐκ τῆς καὶ τὴν ἑξῆς κατὰ τινὰς αὐτῶν ἐπιμαρτυρίας. Jasonem fuisse perpulchrum hinc patet, quod juxta quosdam ipsa Juno infans amore eum prosecuta fuerit (88). These are the authors who mention the other story. 'Pelias . . . forte vidit Jasonem nudo pede venisse, qui dum Junonem transmutatam in anus speciem credens mortalem petentem per vadum fluminis transferret, alteram ex caligis in limo amisisset (89). — Pelias . . . happened to see Jason arise, with one foot bare, who, whilst he was carrying Juno, transformed into an old woman, whom he took for a mortal, across a river, lost one of his sandals in the mud.' You will find in Hyginus (90) the same particular more largely described, with the marks of gratitude which Juno gave him. Valerius Flaccus supposes that it was in very bad weather, that she received this kindness; and he adds that Jason discovered her to be a goddess, by the fright that seized her, because she knew the thunder to be the voice of Jupiter, who called her home. It was therefore at a time of elopement: she had left her husband, and had no great inclination to return.

Omnipotens regina, inquit, quam turbidus atro
Æthere cæruleum quateret cum Jupiter imbrem,
Ipse ego præcipiti tumidum per Enipea nimbo
In campos & tuta tulli, nec credere quivi
Ante deam, quam te tonitru nutuque reposci
Conjugis, & subita raptam formidine vidi (91).

Celestial queen, whom when tempestuous Jove
In storms descended from the gloom above
In a thick cloud, unwittingly I bore
Thro' swollen Enipeus to a safer shore;
Nor deem'd thee goddess,
Till fear betray'd thee, from thy consort fled,
And now recall'd by thunder to his bed.

[P] She with honour got out of the snares that Ixion laid for her. Ixion having committed a parricide (92) of which he could find no body to absolve him, received at last this good office from Jupiter himself. For which he was so ungrateful, as to attempt to graft horns on his benefactor's head: he fell in love with Juno, and earnestly pressed her to the point. But she refused him, and complained of the affront to Jupiter, who desiring to be witness of this baseness, formed a cloud just like his wife, and left it to Ixion's discretion, who used it as amorous people used to do. Hence came

(88) Schol. Pindari, in Pyth. Ode 4, apud Meuricium, Not in Epit. Ovid. pag. 540.

(89) Servius, in Eclog. iv. Virg. ver. 34.

(90) Hygin. cap. xxii. See also cap. xlii. Apollon. Rhodius, lib. iii, ver. 66.

(91) Valer. Flaccus, Argos. I, ver. 81.

(92) He had treacherously killed his wife's father.

she did it in a manner altogether extraordinary [Q]: but she had milk as is usual; and this may well be supposed, since she suckled a bastard of her husband's. He was obliged to use stratagems to bring her to it; and then they say was formed in the sky what people call the Milky Way [R]. Some of those who put the word regina in the number of Juno's epithets, are guilty of a childish error [S]; tho' under that name she was the protectress of the Veientes (b), and placed at Rome upon one of the seven hills. I question whether those who say she first began to favour the Romans in the second Punic war [T], are in the right. She was honoured at Rome, under some other

(b) See the remark [U].

came the race of the Centaurs. He boasted afterwards to have lain with Juno; which, as is said, putting Jupiter out of patience, made him throw him into hell, and condemn him to the punishment of the wheel (93). He did not act like a jealous husband: for is there any Italian who would suffer his wife's galants to gratify their passion with her figure? He would hinder, if he could, their diversion with her in imagination or in a dream.

[Q.] She always conceived in a manner extraordinary. According to the common opinion, she was mother but of three children, Mars, Vulcan, and Hebe. As for Mars, she conceived him by the touch of a flower, which Flora shewed her. She had a mind to be revenged of her husband, who had produced Minerva without her assistance, and to shew him that she could do as much without the concurrence of any male.

Proturn herentem decerpit pollice florem,

Tangitur, & tacto concipit illa sinu.

Jamque gravis Thracen & læva Propontidos intrat,

Fique potens voti, Marisque creatus erat (94).

I pluck'd the flow'r: it's wond'rous virtue such,
She touch'd it, and grew pregnant at the touch:
Then enter'd Thrace, and the Propontic bore,
Where, mistress of her wish, god Mars she bore.

As to Vulcan, she conceived him by the wind, by an influence like that of the Spanish mares (95). "Ομοία δὲ πέποις καὶ περὶ τῆς Ἥρας ἄδουσιν ἀνὰ τὴν ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀνδρὸς οὐλίας ὑπὸνέμιον αὐτὴν παῖδα γενέσθαι τὸν Ἥραϊον. His autem similia etiam de Junone canunt, nempe hanc citra virilem congressum subventaneo conceptu gravidam puerum edidisse Vulcanum (96). — They tell just such another story of Juno; namely, that, without the help of man, and being impregnated by the wind, she brought forth Vulcan. She became with child of Hebe, by feeding heartily upon lettuce. This daughter was the goddess of youth, and served for a cup-bearer to the gods, till an unfortunate accident that happened to her at a great feast. She fell down, and shewed the gods all that was hid under her petticoats. She lost her employment by that accident (97). I know that according to others, she was the daughter of Jupiter and Juno, in the common way.

Natalis Comes ought here to be confuted, who probably has mislaid some Lexicographers. He says that Juno, resenting the birth of Minerva, prayed heaven and earth, the celestial and infernal gods, to grant she might be a mother, without the conjunction of a male. She struck the ground with her hand, and at a certain period of time it brought forth Typhon (98). To prove this, he cites some Greek verses, which manifestly signify that Juno brought forth Typhon. How well does he understand what he alleges? — Ομοία δὲ πέποις καὶ περὶ τῆς Ἥρας ἄδουσιν ἀνὰ τὴν ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀνδρὸς οὐλίας ὑπὸνέμιον αὐτὴν παῖδα γενέσθαι τὸν Ἥραϊον. Εὐτ' ἄρα δὲ Κρονίδης τεκνυδὲα γένειν: Ἀθήνην ἔν κορυφῇ. Hunc (Typhona) irata Jovi patri Juno edidit olim, Quam fuit illius de vertice nata Minerva.

Juno, enraged, the monster Typhon bore,
When from Jove's head the blue-eyed goddess sprung.

Homer in his hymn to Apollo tells this story so plainly, that we may well wonder how so many authors came to take the one for the other. He says that Juno invoking heaven and earth, and all the infernal gods, to grant her a son, without the assistance of Jupiter, struck the earth, and made it tremble, and took that earthquake for a good omen; upon which she left her husband a whole year, at the end whereof she had a son who resembled neither men, nor the gods: and this was Typhon.

Ἡ δὲ ἔτεκε ὅτε θεοὶ ἐναλίγκιος ἔτε βεβ-τοῖσι.
Δεινὸν τ' ἀργαλέον τὲ τυφάνα, πῦμα βεβ-τοῖσιν.

Hæc autem peperit neque diis similem, neque mor-
talibus,

Gravemque difficilemque Typhaona, damnum mortalibus (99).

[R.] Then the Milky Way was made in the sky. It was Hercules she gave suck to: but this child, whose strength was already prodigious, so squeezed her breast, that she could not endure it; and as she hastily snatched it from him, some of her milk dropped.

From this matter was formed the circle, which the Greeks call γαλαξία, and the Latins orbis lacteus, vía lactea, &c. (100). The Poet Manilius has touched upon this fable: Nec mihi celandæ est famæ vulgata vetustas

Mollior: è niveo lactis, fluxisse liquorem

Pectore Reginæ Divum, cœlumque colore

Infectisæ suo. Quapropter lacteus orbis

Dicitur, & nomen causâ descendit ab ipsa (101).

It is fabled, that a milky liquor flow'd

From Juno's breasts, and stain'd the heav'nly road.

From hence a Milky Way amidst the stars,

The name descending from the cause appears.

Some say that the milk, which made this circle, fell from Hercules's mouth, who had suck'd Juno too greedily (102). These stories suppose that Juno was then in heaven; but the Thebans did not allow that: they shewed the place where this goddess, deceived by Jupiter, gave suck to Hercules (103).

[S.] Some of those who put the word regina in the number of her epithets, are guilty of a childish error. For they bring (104) for a proof of it a passage of Virgil (105), in which there is no particular epithet. The father of the people, the magnificent, the great, the just, the wife, &c. are epithets or titles of distinction given to certain princes; but that cannot be said of the title of king of France: nor can it be said of that of queen of France. Now Juno in these words of Virgil, is called the queen of the gods, just as Anne of Austria, wife of Lewis XIII, was called queen of France. Juno was the wife of Jupiter the king of the gods and of men, Divum pater atque humanum rex (106), as she styles him herself in the Æneid (107). Elsewhere (108) she tells him, that he rules over all the gods, ὅς δὲ πᾶσι μετ' ἀθανάτοισιν ἀνάσσει. If proofs had been looked for in Livy, good ones might have been found there. See the following remark, where I relate what he says of Camillus, about the taking of Veii. These words of Juvenal nivæam Reginæ cœdimus agnam (109), would have been a better proof, than what is pretended to be found in the first book of the Æneid.

[T.] I question whether those are in the right who say she first began to favour the Romans in the second Punic war. Camillus preparing to assault the Veientes, offered the tenth part of the booty to Apollo, and implored Juno, the protectress of the besieged, to forsake them, and to come to Rome, where she would

(100) Achilles

Tatius, in Iliad

ex Eratosthene in Cata-

merismo, apud

Lloyd, voce

Juno.

(101) Manilius,

lib. i, pag. m.

24.

(102) See Philo-

ponus, in I. Me-

teor, apud Philo-

ppum Cæsum,

in Cælo Astro-

nomico-Poëtico,

pag. 15.

(103) Pausanias,

lib. ix, pag. 300.

(104) Francis-

Pomey, in Pan-

theo Mythico,

pag. m. 92.

(105) At ego,

quæ Divum inco-

do regina, Jo-

visque

Et foror, & con-

jux . . .

Virgil. Æneid.

lib. i, ver. 46.

(106) Aristotle,

lib. de Morib. 9.

shews that Homer

by these words,

πατὴρ ἀνδρῶν

τε θεῶν τε,

which denote

Jupiter, declares

him to be king

of the gods and

of men. See

Virgil, cum notis

Parier. Ed. L.

Londæ, 1680.

Æn. lib. i, ver.

65.

(107) Æneid.

lib. i, ver. 65.

(108) Iliad. lib.

iv, ver. 61.

(109) Sat. XII,

ver. 13.

have

(93) Taken from Natalis Comes,
Mytholog. lib.
vi. Abating some few circumstances, all this is to be found in Diodor.
Sicil. lib. iv,
cap. 71. See also Lucian, in Deor.
Dialogis, pag.
132, & seq.
Tom. I.

(94) Ovid. Fastor.
lib. v, ver. 255.
I pluck'd the flow'r: it's wond'rous virtue such,
She touch'd it, and grew pregnant at the touch:
Then enter'd Thrace, and the Propontic bore,
Where, mistress of her wish, god Mars she bore.

(95) See the article HIPPO-MANES, at the end of this work.

(96) Lucianus,
de Sacrificiis, pag.
352, Tom. I.
They tell just such another story of Juno; namely, that, without the help of man, and being impregnated by the wind, she brought forth Vulcan. She became with child of Hebe, by feeding heartily upon lettuce. This daughter was the goddess of youth, and served for a cup-bearer to the gods, till an unfortunate accident that happened to her at a great feast. She fell down, and shewed the gods all that was hid under her petticoats. She lost her employment by that accident (97). I know that according to others, she was the daughter of Jupiter and Juno, in the common way.

(97) Servius,
ad Virg. voce Hæc.

(98) Natalis Comes ought here to be confuted, who probably has mislaid some Lexicographers. He says that Juno, resenting the birth of Minerva, prayed heaven and earth, the celestial and infernal gods, to grant she might be a mother, without the conjunction of a male. She struck the ground with her hand, and at a certain period of time it brought forth Typhon (98). To prove this, he cites some Greek verses, which manifestly signify that Juno brought forth Typhon. How well does he understand what he alleges?

(98) Quæ cum mano humanum percussisset, sequenti postea tempore natum
est ex ea terra
Typhon. &c.
Natalis Comes,
Mytholog. lib. vi,
cap. xxi, pag.
m. 644. You will find the same thing in Lloyd's Dictionary.

(99) Virgil. Æneid.
lib. i, ver. 13.
Hæc autem peperit neque diis similem, neque mortalibus, Gravemque difficilemque Typhaona, damnum mortalibus (99).

(100) Achilles
Tatius, in Iliad
ex Eratosthe-
ne in Cata-

merismo, apud
Lloyd, voce
Juno.

(101) Manilius,
lib. i, pag. m.
24.

(102) See Philo-

ponus, in I. Me-

teor, apud Philo-

ppum Cæsum,

in Cælo Astro-

nomico-Poëtico,

pag. 15.

(103) Pausanias,

lib. ix, pag. 300.

(104) Francis-

Pomey, in Pan-

theo Mythico,

pag. m. 92.

(105) At ego,

quæ Divum inco-

do regina, Jo-

visque

Et foror, & con-

jux . . .

Virgil. Æneid.

lib. i, ver. 46.

(106) Aristotle,

lib. de Morib. 9.

shews that Homer

by these words,

πατὴρ ἀνδρῶν

τε θεῶν τε,

which denote

Jupiter, declares

him to be king

of the gods and

of men. See

Virgil, cum notis

Parier. Ed. L.

Londæ, 1680.

Æn. lib. i, ver.

65.

(107) Æneid.

lib. i, ver. 65.

(108) Iliad. lib.

iv, ver. 61.

(109) Sat. XII,

ver. 13.

have

(7) Livius, lib. viii, cap. xiv. See the beginning of the remark [7].

other titles, as that of Moneta [U], Sospita, &c. They were not contented to join with the inhabitants of Lanuvium in the year 416, in worshipping her under this last title (i): she had moreover a temple built to her in the Forum Olitorium in the year 560. Caius Cornelius (110) T. Livius, Dec. I, lib. v, cap. xxi.

have a temple worthy of her. 'Tuo ductu, inquit, (Dictator) Pythice Apollo, tuoque numine instinctus pergo ad delendam urbem Veios: tibi que hinc decimam partem prædæ voveo. Te simul Juno Regina, quæ nunc Veios colis, precor ut nos victores in nostram tuamque mox futuram urbem sequare: ubi te dignum amplitudine tua templum accipiat (110). — Directed, and inspired by thee, O Pythian Apollo, (said the Dictator) I set forth to demolish the city Veii, and I dedicate to thee the tenth part of the plunder. I likewise supplicate thee, O Juno, who now inhabitest Veii, that thou wouldst follow us the conquerors to our city, hereafter to be thine own, where a temple worthy thy dignity awaits thee.' After the plundering of the town, they proceeded to the removal of the gods, and behaved themselves with a great deal of reverence in it. One asked the statue of Juno, whether she was willing to go to Rome: she made a sign that she was; nay, it was pretended that she said yes. There was no trouble in removing her; one would have thought that she put herself in motion to follow the victorious. Camillus consecrated a temple to her, upon mount Aventinus (111), according to the promise he had made her. The words of Livy are so fine and remarkable, that all those, who understand Latin, will be glad to read them, without the trouble of turning to that author. 'Cum jam humanæ opes asportatæ egeatque à Veiiis essent, amoliri tum Deum dona ipsorum Deos, sed colentium magis quam rapientium modo, cœpere. Namque delecti ex omni exercitu juvenes, purè lotis corporibus, candida veste, quibus deportanda Romam Regina Juno assignata erat, venerabundi templum inire, primo religiose admoventes manus: quod id signum more Etrusco nisi certæ gentis sacerdos attricare non esset solitus. Deinde quum quidam, seu spiritu divino tactus, seu juvenili joco, Visne Romam ire Juno? annuisset cæteri Deam conclamaverunt: inde fabulæ adjectum est, vocem quoque dicentis, Velle, auditam. Motam certè fede sua parvi molimenti adminiculis, sequentis modo accepimus levem ac facilem translatum fuisse: integramque in Aventinum æternam sedem suam, quò vota Romani dictatoris vocaverant, perlatam: ubi templum ei postea idem, qui voverat, Camillus dedicavit (112). — The wealth of Veii being removed, they began to carry off the dedications of the gods, and the gods themselves, but more after the manner of worshippers than spoilers. For a select band of youth of the army, having washed their bodies, and being dressed in white garments, to whom the care of transporting the goddess Juno to Rome was assigned, entered the temple with reverence, at first religiously touching her: for, by the custom of Etruria, a priest of a certain family had the sole privilege of handling that statue. But one of them, whether inspired, or jestingly, saying, Will you go to Rome, Juno? the rest cried out, that the goddess nodded: whence it was fabled, that a voice was likewise heard, which said Yes. It is certain, she was very easily removed, and translated entire to mount Aventin, her everlasting residence, whither the vows of the Roman dictator had invited her, where the same Camillus afterwards dedicated a temple to her.' Plutarch makes Livy say, that Camillus intreating Juno to come to Rome, touched her statue, and that she answered she consented to it, and would gladly follow him. Δις δὲ φωνὴν εὐχόμεναι μὲν τὸν Καμίλλου ἀπομένον τῆς δεῦ καὶ παρακαλεῖν, ἀποκρίνασθαι δὲ τινὰς τῶν παρόντων ὅτι καὶ βέλτεται καὶ συγκαταίνει, καὶ συγκαταίνει τῇ προστάσει. Livius tradit inter precandum ait: Deam & invitasse: inde velle & annuere ac sequi libentem respondisse ex adstantibus nonnullos (113). Compare this with Livy's words, and you will clearly see that Plutarch has not understood them; or rather that he has quoted them without book, and that he has disfigured the circumstances: and as he probably trusted to his memory on many occasions, I fear that in several particulars, we find in his books not what he had read, but the notion, which the histories he had read, left in his imagination. The prayers that Livy ascribes to Camillus, with relation to Juno, were before the taking of Veii. How then could he say that Camillus prayed, laying his hand upon the statue? What I am going to say, comes nearer to my text.

Plutarch adds, that they who maintain that Juno's statue answered either by signs, or by words, that she consented to Camillus's petition, have a very strong argument to alledge, that is, the prosperity of Rome: for that town, says he, so little as it was, could never have raised itself to such an height of power, without the continual favour of a tutelary god. Οἱ δ' ἱσχυρίζονται καὶ τῷ παρὰ δόξαν βονθέντι, μετρίως μὲν ἔχοντι συνήγορον τὴν τύχην τῆς πόλεως, ἢ ἀπὸ συμφοράς καὶ κατὰ φρονέμενης ἀρχῆς ἐπὶ μεγάλα δόξης καὶ δυνάμεως περὶθεῖν δόξα. Δὲ πολλὰ καὶ μεγάλα ἐπιφανείας ἐκείσε συμπάρηται, ἀμύχανον. Ceterum hoc miraculum adfueritibus & defendentibus fortuna magnopere suffragatur urbis, quæ ex parvo & humili exordio, sine numinis perpetuo ex multis & magnis signis presentis favore, evadere ad eam gloriam & potentiam baudquaquam potuisset (114). He believes therefore that Juno being removed from Veii to Rome, made the Romans prosper, and procured that train of victories, which rendered them so formidable: and therefore Jupiter's prediction, that Juno should at last favour the Roman nation, must have been fulfilled in the year of Rome 359 (115).

— quin aspera Juno,

Quæ mare nunc terrasque metu cœlumque fatigat,
Consilia in melius referet, necumque fovebit

Romanos rerum Dominos gentemque togatam (116).

— e'en she, who now

Embroils with anxious fear heav'n, earth, and sea,
E'en sullen Juno then shall bend her thoughts
To better counsels, and with me promote Rome's lordly sons, the nation of the goon.

TRAPP.

And yet, because some Poets have been pleased to bring down this epocha to the second Punic (117) war (118), the commentators rather depend upon this fiction, than upon the authority of the historians. I observe, that besides the temple that Juno had at Rome upon mount Aventinus, she had part of the temple of the capitol with her husband and Minerva (119). The temple of Juno Moneta, which I speak of in the following remark, affords me a good proof.

[U] She was honoured at Rome, under the title of Moneta. It appears from several passages of the antients (120), that the epithet Regina was given to that Juno whom Camillus brought from Veii, and to whom he built a temple on mount Aventinus. As for Juno Moneta, she had her seat in the capitol. Valerius Maximus is perhaps the only author who has confounded these two Junos. I doubt not but this is one of the mistakes which are so plentiful in Valerius Maximus. 'Nec minus voluntarius, says he (121), Junonis in urbem nostram transitus. Captis à Porio Camillo Veis, milites jussu Imperatoris simulacrum Junonis Moneta, quod ibi præcipua religione cultum erat, in Urbem trahunt, sede sua movere conabantur. Quorum ab uno per jocum interrogata Dea, an Romam migrare vellet, velle se respondit. Hac voce audita, lusus in admirationem verius est. Jamque non simulacrum, sed ipsam cœlo Junonem petitam portare se credentes, læti in ea parte montis Aventini, in qua nunc templum ejus cernimus, collocaverunt. — Nor was the translation of Juno to our city less voluntary. For Furius Camillus having taken Veii, the soldiers, being commanded by the general to transport to Rome the image of Juno Moneta, which was there particularly worshipped, endeavoured to remove it, one of whom jestingly asking the goddess, whether she would go into Rome, she answered, yes. Hearing this, their jesting was turned into admiration. And now, believing that they carried not the image of Juno, but the goddess herself, they joyfully placed her in that part of mount Aventin, where we now see her temple.' What he says is sufficient

(114) Id. Ibid.

(115) In which the town of Veii was plundered.

(116) Virgil. Æn. lib. I, vers. 279.

(117) Which began in the year of Rome 535.

(118) Quis belli Punico secundus, ut ait Ennius, placuit Juno capiti ferre Romam. Servius, in hunc locum Virgilii. See Silvestri Italici, lib. xii, pag. m. 520 Horace, lib. ii, Ode i.

(119) See Dio Cassius, apud Silvestri Italici, lib. x, pag. 431.

(120) Decretum est Junoni Reginae in Aventino Junonem ipsam Lanuvii majorem hostibus fecit. Liv. lib. xxi, cap. xxxvii, where he describes the ceremony that was performed in honour of Juno Regia in Aventino. They say that the ceremony was performed by the poet Livy. Livy, lib. xxi, cap. xxxvii, where he describes the ceremony that was performed in honour of Juno Regia in Aventino. They say that the ceremony was performed by the poet Livy.

(121) Valer. Max. lib. I, cap. viii, n. 7.

Cornelius Cethegus, who had vowed it four years before, when he was consul, and made war with the Infubres (k), consecrated it when he was censor (l). This temple was repaired in 663, which was occasioned by a woman's dream (m). Juno's worship at Rome was very antient [X]. The honours she received in other towns of Italy were very great [Y]. She wrought there many miracles. She had a temple at Falerii, be-

(k) Id. lib. xxvii. cap. xxix.

(l) Id. lib. xxxiv. cap. liii.

(m) Cicero, de Divinat. lib. i. init. fol. 304, B, & fol. 311, B.

(122) Lib. vi. cap. lii. n. 2.

(123) Livius, lib. vii. cap. xxviii.

(124) See Valer. Maximus, cum notis Variorum, put out by Thysius, lib. i. cap. viii. n. 3, pag. 105.

(125) Plutarch. in Camillo, pag. 143. C.

(126) Cicero, de Divinat. lib. i.

(127) See Dionys. Halicarnassensis, lib. iv. cap. lix. Dauguetius, in Silium Ital. lib. 2, pag. 455.

(128) It appears from Livy, lib. iii. pag. m. 79, that Juno, in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, was firnamed Regina.

(129) Antiquit. Rom. lib. ii. cap. vi.

(130) Dionysius Halicarnassensis, lib. ii. cap. lii.

sufficient to shew his confounding things; for in another book (122) he says, that the temple of the goddess Moneta was in the capitol, in the place where Manlius's house had been. Now according to Livy, the temple that was built where that house stood, was consecrated to Juno Moneta, at the time of the war with the Aurunci. It was consecrated the year after, that is, in the year of Rome 413 (123). Ovid, in the sixth book of the Fasti, perfectly agrees in this with Livy. The verses in which he speaks of it, inform us, that it was Camillus who consecrated that temple. Hereupon a critic observes (124), that nevertheless Plutarch says nothing of this vow of Camillus, but is contented to say, that Manlius's house was rased, and that the temple of the goddess Moneta was built in the place where that house stood. This critic doubtless thought, that the Camillus mentioned by Ovid, is the same whose life is written by Plutarch; he, I say, who mightily strove to bring Manlius to punishment. I do not believe that Ovid was so grossly mistaken. He who consecrated the temple of Juno Moneta, was Camillus the son. Therefore it is not to be thought strange, that the historian of the father should say nothing of this consecration; but he may be blamed for his careless relation of the fate of Manlius's house. He says (125) that the Romans having demolished it, ordered the temple of the goddess Moneta to be built in the room of it, and decreed, that from thenceforth no patrician should live in the capitol. Is there any reader but would from such a narration conclude, that these three things were performed at the same time? who could imagine, that this temple was not consecrated till above forty years after Manlius's punishment? there is something in Cicero, that a little perplexes this matter; which is, that Juno, who had a temple in the capitol, was firnamed Moneta, because she advised the people of Rome to sacrifice a big-bellied sow. 'Scriptum à multis cum terræ motus, factus esset ut lue plena procuratio fieret, vocem ab æde Junonis ex arca exiisse, quocirca Junonem illam appellatam Moneta' (126). Many have recorded, that, there being an earthquake, a voice was heard from the shrine in the temple of Juno, commanding to sacrifice a pregnant sow; whence that Juno was called 'Moneta'. According to this, it ought to be said, that there was a temple of Juno in the capitol, before the dictator Camillus the son consecrated the temple of Juno Moneta; or else it must be said, that he only consecrated a temple to Juno, but that in process of time this goddess had the firname Moneta given her by reason of the advice she gave in this temple. The first of these two hypotheses has no foundation in any author; and the second would charge the historians with an extreme negligence, since they expressly observe, that the dictator Camillus consecrated a temple to Juno Moneta, which was built in the same place where Manlius lived. Perhaps this obscurity might be removed, by supposing that the place where Juno gave the advice, was the chapel which had been built for her in Jupiter's temple, in the Capitol (127). From that time she might have been (128) firnamed Moneta, without having a particular temple with that epithet; but during the war with the Aurunci, Camillus would have built a temple to her under that firname, which she had already. This would be an argument that she had given advice to the people of Rome, before the year 413; and consequently, that her friendship for Rome preceded the second Punic war. Rosinus (129) makes Cicero to say, that the earthquake which was the occasion of Juno's advising the sacrifice of a big-bellied sow, happened before the Gauls took Rome. Cicero does not say this: Rosinus is in an error.

[X] Juno's worship at Rome was very antient. Tatius, the colleague of Romulus, had appointed the honours that were to be paid to Juno Quirita or Quiritis (130). We find that in the reign of Tullus Hostilius, the pontiffs being consulted concerning the expedition of involuntary murders, erected two altars, and performed the ceremonies they thought proper to purify Horatius, who had killed his sister. One of those altars was consecrated to Juno (131), and the other to Janus (132). It is said (133) that before that time there was at Rome a temple of Juno, built by Numa Pompilius, who desiring to gain the favour of this goddess, forbade, by a formal law, all lewd women to enter into that temple . . . or even to touch it. These are the words of the law. Pellex ædem Junonis ne tangito. Si tangat Junoni agnum sceminam demissis crinibus cædito. This was the reparation they were obliged to make, by sacrificing a lamb to her, with their hair hanging loose. In a word, we may say, that it was not by too bold an hyperbole, that Virgil introduced Jupiter promising his spouse, that the descendants of Æneas should serve her more devoutly than all the other nations. This dialogue is one of the finest passages of the Æneid. Juno engages to persecute Æneas no longer, and asks a favour as a recompence for her desisting. I advise my readers to go to the fountain head: I shall only produce these four verses.

Hinc genus, Aufonio mistum quod sanguine surget,
Supra homines, supra ire Deos pietate videbis.
Nec gens ulla tuos æquæ celebrabit honores.
Annuit his Juno, & mentem lætata retorfit (134).
This blended lineage, from th' Aufonian blood
Deriv'd, in piety you shall behold
Excelling men and gods; nor any race
Shall equal honours to your altars pay.
Juno assents, and pleas'd retorts her mind.

TRAPP.

[Y] The honours she received in other towns of Italy were very great. She was worshipped under the title of Sospita, with great devotion at Lanuvium, near Rome, in the Via Appia. The Romans were so fond of this worship, that their consuls were obliged in the beginning of their consulship, to go and pay their homages to this Juno. Nolite à sacris propriis Junonis Sospitæ, cui omnes Consules facere necesse est, domesticum & suum Consulem potissimum avellere (135). When the inhabitants of Lanuvium were made Roman citizens, it was ordained that this worship should be common to them with the people of Rome. Lanuvini civitas data, sacraque sua reddita cum eo ut ædes lucusque Sospitæ Junonis communis Lanuvinis Municipibus cum populo Romano esset (136). There was a treasure in the temple of this goddess, out of which Augustus took great sums, and promised to pay interest for it (137). It is thought that this temple was founded by the Pelasgi, who came originally from Peloponnesus, which opinion is supported by Ælian's calling this Juno of Lanuvium, Juno Argolica (138). Here is the attire of this goddess. 'Nostram Sospitam . . . tu nunquam ne in somnis quidem vides nisi cum pelle caprina, cum hasta, cum scutulo, cum calceolis repandis (139). — You never see our goddess, Juno Sospita, even in dreams, without her goat-skin, her spear, her shield, and her shoes, with the ends bent backwards.' It is not observed in this passage, whether the goat's skin was adorned with horns; but there are very learned men who do not doubt of it. 'It is certain that Juno of Lanuvium had her head veiled with a goat-skin, set off with true horns, which is plainly to be seen in Goltzius's Roman medals, and in that mentioned by Vigenere, in his annotations upon Livy.' Thus Mr de Girac speaks in the sixty fifth section, and five hundred and fifty sixth page of his reply. You will find in the margin of his book the following passage: Romani Junonem Sospitam co- * Lud. Nonnus, lebant, ejus caput pellis caprina cum cornibus exornabat. Mind this: the serpent of the temple of Lanuvium was something miraculous; it knew whether young women had lost their virginity or not. See Ælian (140).

(131) Overfeer of the sisters, says Dionysius Halicarnassensis; but she is firnamed Sororia, apud Festum, quem vide pag. m. cclxii, voce lororum tigillum.

(132) Id. Dionys. lib. iii. cap. xxviii.

(133) See Du Baulay's Theatre des Antiquitez Romaines, pag. 149.

(134) Virgil. Æn. lib. xii. ver. 838.

(135) Cicero, Orat. pro Muræna, sub fin.

(136) Livius, lib. vii. cap. xiv.

(137) Appian. lib. v. de Bello Civil. pag. m. 399.

(138) Ælian. Histor. Animal. lib. xi. cap. xvi.

(139) Cicero de Nat. Deor. lib. ii. cap. xlix.

(140) Ælian. Ubi supra. See also Propertius, Eleg. viii. lib. iv.

Juno

fore Rome was built. It was like that of Argos, and the same ceremonies were used in it as the Argivi had consecrated to her worship. This we learn from Dionysius Halicarnassensis in the twenty first chapter of the first book.

I would

Juno LACINIA, whose temple was six miles from Crotona, was wonderfully famous. This temple was twice as large as the largest in Rome (141). It was covered with marble, part whereof was brought to Rome to cover the temple of Fortuna Equestris, which the censor Quintus Fulvius Flaccus was building: but as he came to a miserable end, the senate ordered the marble to be carried to the same place it was taken from (142). Annibal did not execute the design of carrying away the column of gold, which was in the temple of this Juno (143). Pliny tells us, that the ashes which were left on the altar of this goddess, being exposed to all the violence of the weather, never moved from their place (144). Servius tells another miracle; if any one engraved his name upon the marble covering of this temple, the Letters vanished away when that man died. In hoc templo illud miraculum fuisse dicitur, ut si quis ferro in tegula templi, istius nomen incideret, tamdiu illa Scriptura maneret, quamdiu is homo viveret qui illud scripsisset (145). Livy speaks of another miracle, which is, that the beasts of every kind, that were consecrated to this goddess, fed on the meadows of the temple, without any one's keeping, and retired at night of themselves, being undisturbed either by wild-beasts or thieves. Læta in medio pascua habuit (Lucus) ubi omnis generis sacrum dea pasciebatur pecus sine ullo pastore: separatimque egressi cujusque generis greges, nocte remanebant ad stabula, nunquam infidituri ferarum non fraude violati bonum (146). He gives sufficient intimation, that he would not swear to the truth of it; and that the story of the unmoveable ashes had no greater certainty.

(141) See, below, citat. (152).

(142) Valer. Maximus, lib. i, cap. i.

(143) Cic. lib. i, de Divinat. See the article SILENIUS.

(144) In Lacinia Junonis ara sub dio sita, cinerem immobilem esse perstantibus undique procellis. Plin. lib. ii, cap. xvii. Valerius Maximus, lib. i, cap. viii, in Exempla. Extern. n. 18, says the same thing. See Livy hereunder.

(145) Servius, in Æneid. lib. iii, ver. 552.

(146) Livius, lib. xxi, cap. iii.

(147) Inclytum templum divitis etiam, non tantum sanctitate fuit. Id. ib. See also Strabo, lib. vi, pag. m. 180.

(148) Servius, ubi supra.

(149) In Valerius Maximus, published by Thyfius, pag. 27, they make Livy say, that the temple was in the town, in urbe nobile templum, ipsa urbe erat nobilior.

(150) Livius, ubi supra.

(151) Valer. Maximus, lib. i, cap. i, n. 20.

They almost always, says he, ascribe some miracles to such sort of places. Miracula aliqua assequuntur plebique tam insignibus locis. Fama est aram esse in vestibulo templi, cujus cinerem nullus unquam moveat ventus. No body understands this better than the Christian Monks. He adds, that this temple was famous, not only for it's holiness, but also for it's riches (147). It is no wonder, that there have been different opinions concerning the founder of this temple, and the occasion of it's foundation; for all people are inclined to invent a thousand pretty things on such matters. See Servius (148), who relates, amongst other opinions, that king Lacinus caused it to be built, in honour to Juno, because she hated Hercules, whom he had refused to lodge. But if these variations ought not to surprize us, we cannot however but wonder, that authors are not agreed about the situation of this building. Livy places it six miles from Crotona: 'Sex millia aberat ab urbe' (149) nobile templum ipsa urbe nobilior, Lacinia Junonis, sanctum omnibus circa populis (150). — Six miles from the city was a noble temple, more magnificent than the city itself; sacred, among all the neighbouring people, to Juno Lacinia. But Valerius Maximus says, it was at Locri, which is not the only point wherein he differs from Livy. His words are these: 'Q. Fulvius Flaccus impune non tulit quod in censura tegulas marces ex Junonis Lacinia templo in ædem Fortunæ Equestris, quam Romæ faciebat, transfudit. Negatur enim, post hoc factum, mente constitisse: quin etiam per summam ægritudinem animi expiravit, cum ex duobus filiis in Illyrico militantibus, alterum decessisse, alterum graviter audisset affectum. Cujus casu motus senatus tegulas illico Locros reportandas curavit: decretique circumspiciatissima sanctione impium opus censoris retexit (151). — Q. Fulvius Flaccus suffered, for that, in his censorship, he transferred the marble tiles from the temple of Juno Lacinia, into that of Fortuna Equestris, which he was building at Rome: for, after this action, they say he never enjoyed his senses; nay that he even died of extreme grief, bearing that of two sons, who served in Illyricum, the one was dead, and the other dangerously ill. The senate, moved with this action, ordered the tiles to be carried back to Locri, and, by the most cautious sanction of a decree, unravelled the censor's impious work.' I have followed this narrative above, as to the motive that engaged the senate to restore the marble covering of the temple; but I reserved to myself the right of rectifying things as there might be occasion, by Livy's account. You must therefore know, that this grave historian observes, that the censor Fulvius Flaccus was extremely solicitous that the temple he built should, neither in magnificence nor extent, come behind any in Rome. He thought a marble roof would give great lustre to his edifice; for which reason he ordered half of the temple of Juno Lacinia to be uncovered (152), which was sufficient for his design. Having got that marble brought to Rome, he took care not to say what place they came from; nevertheless it was publicly known, which occasioned such murmurs, that the consuls were obliged to consult the senate upon that affair. The senate ordered Flaccus to come before them, and having suffered him to be exposed, for some time, to all sorts of bitter reproaches, they unanimously resolved, that the marble should be carried back to Juno's temple, and that the goddess should be appeased by what the ceremonies prescribed. Livy's words have so charmed me, that I am persuaded they will be very agreeable to the greatest part of my readers: the expression is admirable, and full of noble thoughts. 'Postquam censor rediit tegulæ expolitæ de navibus ad templum portabantur: quanquam unde essent fletatur, non tamen celari potuit: Premittis igitur in curia ortus est; ex omnibus partibus postulabatur, ut consules eam rem ad senatum referrent: Ut vero accersitus in curiam censor venit, multo infestius singuli univerique presertim lacerare: Templum augustissimum regionis ejus, quod non Pyrrhus, non Annibal violasset, violare parum habuisse, nisi detexisset sedem ac prope diruisset. Detrahit culmen templo, nudatum telum patere imbris putrefaciendum. Censorem moribus regendis creatum, cui sacra tellus exigere sacris publicis & loca tuenda more majorum traditum esset: eum per sociorum urbes diruentem templum, nudantemque tellus ædium sacrarum vagari, & quod, si in privati sociorum ædificiis faceret, indignum videri posset, id Deum immortalium templum demolientem facere, & obstringere religione populum Romanum, ruinis templorum templum ædificantem: tamquam non iidem ubique Dei immortales sint, sed spoliis aliorum alii colendi exornandique. Quum, priusquam referretur, appareret quid sentirent Patres: relatione facta in unam omnes sententiam ierunt, ut hæc tegulæ reportandæ in templum locarentur, piculariaque Junoni ferebant (153). — After the return of the censor, the tiles were carried from on ship-board to the temple; nor could it be kept a secret from whence they came. A murmur arose in the senate: it was on all sides demanded, that the consuls should lay the matter before the senate. But when the censor, being summoned, appeared, the whole assembly fell upon him with more rage. Was it not enough (they said) that he had made no scruple to violate the most august temple of that country, which both Pyrrhus and Hannibal had spared, but he must untile it, and almost demolish it: that the temple being uncovered, was exposed to the injuries of the weather; that a censor, created for presiding over the manners of the people, and to whom is committed, by the custom of our ancestors, the care of repairing and keeping up places of public worship; went up and down through the cities of the allies, demolishing and untiling their temples, and shewing that indignity to the temples of the immortal gods, which would be thought scandalous towards the houses of private persons: that he had laid a burthen on the consciences of the Roman people, building temples with the ruins of temples; as though the immortal gods were not the same every where, but some were to be worshipped and adorned with the spoils of others. The sentiments of the fathers appearing before the question was put, it was unanimously agreed, that the tiles should be carried back to the temple, and Juno appeased with offerings.' The decree of the senate was not executed in all it's parts; for they who were commissioned to see the roof repaired, reported, that no workman knew how to restore the marble pieces to their places, and so they were left in the court of the temple (154). Flaccus did not leave off building; he made an end of the temple, and consecrated it, and exhibited the Ludi Scenici for four days, and the Circenses one day (155). Here is a notable difference betwixt Livy and Valerius Maximus, which

(152) Prefectus in Bructis, ædem Junonis Lacinia ad partem dimidiam detegit, si satis fore ratus ad tegendum quod ædificaretur. Tit. Livius, lib. xlii, init. cap. iii, pag. m. 809. This is the reason why I said above, after Cluverius, Ital. Antiq. lib. vi, cap. xvi, that the temple of Juno Lacinia was twice as large as the largest temple in Rome.

(153) Livius, ibid.

(154) Quæ ad religionem pertinebant cum cura facta: tegulæ relictæ in arce templi, quia reportandarum ædium artificum rationem pertinebat, redempturæ non erant. Id. ibid.

(155) Fulvius ædem Fortunæ Equestris, quam Proconful in Hispania ultimam cum Celtiberorum legionibus voverat, annis sex postquam voverat, dedicavit, & senatus populi per quintiduum, unum diem in aëre fecit. Id. ibid.

I would gladly know whether any of the wise men among the heathens took notice of a thing, which methinks was not difficult to observe, which is, that no body did partake less of a happy life, a state most essential to the divine nature (n), than the greatest of the goddesses. We can scarce conceive a more miserable condition than that of Juno. I do not consider the character of her employments, though they were very toilsome and unpleasant [Z], and have given just occasion to turn the Theological system which shews that the latter has done a great injury to the Roman senate; he supposes, that they never thought of repairing the damage, till they had seen the prodigious vengeance that heaven had inflicted on the censor Flaccus. But Livy informs us, that the senate performed that pious and just action, upon the bare consideration of the fact; and before they saw any sign of the divine indignation. He does not deny the miserable end of the censor: nay, he represents it more tragical than Valerius Maximus; for he says, that Fulvius Flaccus hanged himself, and he adds, that it was said amongst the people, that Juno had deprived him of his senses. Q. Fulvius Flaccus pontifex qui priore anno fuerat censor . . . fœda morte periit. Ex duobus filiis ejus qui tum in Illyrico militabant, nunciatum alterum decessisse, alterum gravi & periculoso morbo ægrum esse. Obruit animum simul luctus, metusque: mane ingressi cubiculum servi, laqueo dependentem invenerunt. Erat opinio, post censuram minus compotem fuisse sui: vulgo Junonis Lacinie iram ob spoliatum templum alienasse mentem ferebant (156). What concerns the taking away of the marble covering from Juno's temple, is said to have happened the 579th year of Rome.

(n) Quæ nobis natura informationem Deorum ipsorum dedit, eadem inculpsit in mentibus ut eos æternos & beatos haberemus. Cicero, de Nat. Deor. lib. i, cap. xviii. See also Aristotle, de Repub. lib. vii, cap. i, pag. m. 321. E. See also the remark [N], of the article SPINOZA, num. V.

[Z] The character of her employments, tho' they were very toilsome and unpleasant. She had the superintendence of marriages, and their consequences. See Virgil's commentators upon these words:

Mañant lectas de more bidentis,
Legiferæ Cereri, Phœboque patrique Lyæo:
Juno ante omnes, cui VINCLA JUGALIA CURAE (157).

*Selected victims, with accustom'd rites,
To Ceres law-giver, and Phœbus bleed,
And father Bacchus, but above the rest
To Juno, who presides o'er nuptial beds.*

TRAPP.

They mention a hundred such like passages, and the epithets pronuba, jugalis, ζῦγια, γαμνλία, παράνομφος, &c. which were given to Jupiter's wife, because she presided over matrimonial engagements. See the following remark. This employment required great pains; the particulars of it were innumerable, and it was very difficult to perform it to her honour. If the business had been only to make matches, the difficulties would not have been so considerable: the disposition of the subjects, and the inclination of nature, might have saved the director-general a great deal of pains; but a goddess of the first rank was engaged by the interests of her reputation and glory, to see that people should marry well: I mean, that the sorting of conditions and humours should form an indissoluble bond of affection and concord, and therefore all marriages that were ill suited and unlucky, could not but give her a great deal of trouble, as being so many blots to her reputation, and just occasions of reproaching her, that the pains they had taken to invoke and worship her, on the wedding-day, were all lost labour. All those who had a mind to abuse her, had a fair opportunity; for, in short, either she did all she could to procure happy marriages, or she did not. If she did, there was reason to conclude, she was very unfortunate, since she had an employment, which exhausted all her strength and industry; and yet she could not avoid being unsuccessful on a thousand occasions. That vast number of experiments, which shewed the uselessness of her pains, was a proof either that she had a subject to labour on that was very difficult, or that her power was very inconsiderable. In the first case, her misfortune, and the deplorable cruelty of her fate, or else her imprudence, were manifest;

VOL. III. N° LXXVIII.

for if she was not not at liberty to lay down her employment, in which doing her best, she could not prevent ill success on a thousand occasions, her fate was to be pitied. But if she might have resigned her office, and yet obstinately continued in it, she wanted judgment and prudence (158), and maintained herself unjustly in a function which exceeded her strength, and which she discharged to her dishonour. It had been a poor excuse to say, that her good designs were thwarted by the capriciousness of another goddess.

Sic visum Veneri, cui placet impares
Formas, atque animos sub juga ahenea
Sævo mittere cum joco (159).

So Venus will'd, who binds in love's hard chains Unequal forms and minds, and laughs at all their pains.

This had been to confess the limitation and dependance of her power, a mortifying confession, beyond all that can be imagined for a goddess so haughty as Juno was. This was what might be said, supposing that she discharged her duty to the best of her power; but if it had been supposed, that she could have succeeded better, she would have been looked upon as guilty of extreme negligence, or malice, and consequently, as most unworthy of the honours that were paid her, and of the dignity she was invested with. These are reflexions, which the Heathens should have made. Now the result of these thoughts is to determine, that her condition was very unhappy, whether by reason of the great pains her employment required, or because of the ill success they were attended with. Her dignity and her sex, made her wonderfully sensible of contempt and disgrace; and we cannot imagine, but she had sense enough not to be ignorant of what may be said against her administration, and to believe that the other gods reflected upon her (160), and that if they had the complaisance not to do it to her face, or not to tell her what was said of her, they would not fail to asperse her behind her back, or at least to think meanly of her. There needs no more to vex one that is touchy, ambitious, and proud: if he is sensible that his faults are known to others, that is enough to disquiet him.

All the reflexions I have produced might have been made with respect to Juno, as she presided over child-births. What a trouble was this! it was the way not to be at rest one moment, and to be obliged to work in a thousand places at once. This office is subject to many unpleasant accidents. The industry of the best Surgeons does not hinder many children that come across, some one way, and some another, from dying with their mothers. These misfortunes were so many subjects of reproach for the censurers of Juno, who had been vainly invoked under particular and specific names, according to the exigency of the case (161). I know that it may be maintained with great probability, that all the deities who presided over marriages, child-births, &c. ought not to be reduced to her alone, under different names; but on the other side, it is very likely, that all the other deities ought to be looked upon as the substitutes of the superintendant-general: whence it follows, that the disorders might be well placed to the account of the goddess Juno, as the bad administration of governors of provinces is imputed to the sovereign, when he does not give a remedy for it. Besides her having so many substitutes shew, that Juno's employment was thought too painful. Now all these ideas will make one form a disadvantageous judgment of her. Add to all this, that two of the most glorious functions of this goddess's office were taken from her: for the care of reconciling married persons

(158) Metiri se quemque suo modulo ac pede verum est. Horat. Epist. vii, lib. i, ver. ult.

(159) Horat. Ode xxxiii, lib. i.

(160) The Heathens believed that jealousies, quarrels, divisions, and such like disorders happened among the gods.

(161) See the remark [H].

system of the Heathens into ridicule [AA]. I consider the necessity she found herself reduced to, of persecuting the mistresses and bastards of her husband, to seek some relief for the jealousy that devoured her. She was as much possessed with this passion as could be expected from that haughty and imperious humour, which her quality of sister and wife of the greatest of the gods inspired her with. This sensibility rendered her torment more insupportable, and put her in a continual hurry to procure to herself the pleasure of revenge. She omitted nothing to obtain it, and gave herself no rest; but she never had the satisfaction of a full and entire success [BB]. She was always to begin again. We must not

not

(162) See Valer. Maximus, lib. ii. cap. i. n. 6, pag. m. 135.

(163) See Ovid. Fastor. lib. iv. pag. m. 74.

(164) At the beginning of the remark [Z].

(165) Du Boulay, Thesor des Antiquitez Romaines, pag. 149, 150.

(166) Mart. Capella de Nuptiis Philologie, lib. ii. pag. m. 37, 38.

(167) Here is a passage of Festus Pompeius, pag. xxxv. Cinxie Junonis nomen sanctum habebatur in nuptiis, quod initio conjugii solutio erat cinguli quo nova nupta erat cincta.

(168) Augustin. de Civit. Dei, lib. vi. cap. ix. pag. m. 599.

(169) St. Augustin had been saying, that some did as guard the women lying in, lest the god Sylvanus should come and torment them. Mulieri factæ post partum tres Deos custodios commemorant (Varro) adhiberi, ne Sylvanus Deus per noctem ingredietur & vexet.

sons was committed to another deity, named Viriplaca (162); and the care of the conversion of those women, who had not by their chaste conduct deserved their husbands' affection, was committed to Venus Verticordia (163). What an affront was it to Juno to have her superintendence of marriages thus diminished?

[AA] and have given just occasion to turn the Theological system of the Heathens into ridicule.] The surnames of Pronuba, Jugalis, &c. which may be seen above (164), were not the only ones that were proper to Juno, as she presided over marriages; she had also particular surnames grounded upon her presiding over the conduct of new brides, over their husbands' houses and over the union, which the bride made upon the posts of her husband's door and because she helped the husband to untie the Zona virginialis (165). You will find those surnames in the Latin words taken from a prayer that was made to Juno (166): Interducam, or Iterducam, & Domiducam, Unxiam, Cinxiam (167) mortales puellæ debent in nuptias convocare, ut earum & itinera protegas, & in opatas domos ducas, & cum posses ungent, saustum omen affigas, & singulum ponentes in thalamis non relinquant. It was not expected, that she should stop at the door of the nuptial chamber, but her assistance was also begged in the nuptial bed, where she came under the title of Dea mater Prema, and Dea Pertunda, accompanied with Deus pater Subigus. Upon this St. Augustin has ridiculed Heathenism; and as it was very difficult to use only grave considerations, upon such a subject, he has shewn the impertinence of it in very free terms. 'Cum mas & femina conjunguntur, adhibetur deus Jugalitus.' Sit hoc ferendum. Sed momum est ducenda, quæ nubit, adhibetur deus Domiducus. Ut maneat cum viro, additur dea Manturna. Quid ultra queritur? Parcatur humanæ verecundiæ: peragat cætera concupiscentia carnis & sanguinis procurato secreto pudoris. Quid impletur cubiculum turba naminum: quando & paranymphe inde discedunt? Et ad hoc impletur, non ut eorum præsentia cogitata major sit cura pudicitiae, sed ut feminae sexu infirmæ novitate pavide, illis cooperantibus sine ulla difficultate virginitas auferatur. Adest enim dea Virginensis, & deus pater Subigus, & dea mater Prema, & dea Pertunda, & Venus, & Priapus. Quid est hoc? Si omnino laborantem in illo opere virum ab diis adjuvari oportebat: non sufficiebat aliquis unus, aut aliqua una. Nunquid Venus sola parum esset, quæ ob hoc etiam dicitur nuncupata, quod sine ejus vi femina virgo esse non desinat? Si ulla est frons in hominibus, quæ non est in naminibus? Nonne cum credunt conjugati tot deos utriusque sexus præsentibus, & huic operi instantibus, ita pudore afficiuntur, ut & ille minus moveatur, & illa plus reluctetur? Et certe si adest Virginensis dea, ut virginis zona solvatur: si adest deus Subigus, ut viro subigatur: si adest dea Prema, ut subacta ne se commoveat, prematur, dea Pertunda ibi quid facit? Erubescat, eat foras, agat aliquid & maritus. Valde inhonestum est, ut quod vocatur illa, impleat quisquam nisi ille. Sed forte ideo toleratur, quia dea dicitur esse, non deus. Nam si masculus crederetur, & Pertundus vocaretur, majus contra eum pro uxoris pudicitia posceret, maritus auxilium, quàm Foeta contra Silvanum (169). Sed quid hoc dicam, cum ibi sit & Priapus nimis masculus, super cujus immanissimum & turpissimum fascinum sedere nova nupta jubebatur more honestissimo & religiosissimo matronarum? These objections are very strong, and I cannot conceive how the best apologists for the Pagan religion could have eluded them. The censure that St. Augustin grounds upon the unnecessary multiplication of beings, was alone sufficient to confound them. What a diffidence of human strength was it believe that Venus stood in need of three or four other deities? We only conceive that an apologist might have answered, that St. Augustin was to blame for reproaching as a thing useless, and which left nothing for the husband to do, the joining of the goddesses Pertunda to the goddesses mater Prema; for according to that Theology, the one was not less or more necessary than the other, and neither of them excluded the operation of the married couple. There was then a little want of exactness in this part of St. Augustin's objections. The common answer of the Heathens at that time was perhaps to say, that the objected multiplication, was only a multiplication of the names of the same deity. A poor answer, for the books of the ancient Heathens afforded the confutation of it.

Note, by the by, that the Philosophers who undertook to answer the Christian doctors, were very much to be pitied. They bore the punishment of the folly of others: the ancient priests had committed the fault, by ridiculously transplanting the fictions of the Poets into the public worship; and the Philosophers many ages after were forced to bear the shame of all these popperies, and to torment themselves to put by the thrusts, that pierced them through. If those who framed so absurd a worship, had had as dexterous and powerful adversaries as St. Augustin was, they would have been circumspect, and not have given such a free scope to their impostures: this is a disadvantage of the unity of religion. It must be confessed that the diversity of religions, has its inconveniencies, and even such as are dangerous; but then it prevents the progress of corruption, and makes each party more cautious.

[BB] Her jealousy . . . put her in a continual hurry to procure to herself the pleasures of revenge . . . but she never had the satisfaction of a full and entire success. Consider the journey she took from heaven to earth, upon suspicion that a cloud which she discovered, might probably be the canopy under which her unfaithful husband sported with some damsel. She was not mistaken, Jupiter was then in the arms of Io. He converted her into a heifer, that his wife might not surprize him in the fact. Juno begged the heifer, and set Argus to watch her, and afterwards she tormented her with a fury that made her run over all the earth; and at last she was forced to suffer Io to resume her former shape, and to become the goddess Isis (170). Consider also the supplications Juno made to Tethys and Oceanus, when she saw the same Calisto among the stars, whom she had changed into a bear. She had used the utmost violence against this mistress of Jupiter; she took her by the hair of her head, and threw her upon the ground (171). But let us hear her monelous complaints. Nothing can be more lamentable: she is afraid that hereafter she shall be continually affronted; since the efforts she makes to revenge herself, terminate only in the glory of her enemies.

Est verò, cur quis Junonem ledere nolit, Offensamque tremat, quæ profum sola nocendo? O ego quantum egi! quàm valsa potentia nostra est! Esse hominem vetui; facta est Dea: sic ego pœnas Sontibus impono: sic est mea magna potestas (172).

Who now can fear immortal Juno's hate?
Alas! I hurt not, but advance their fate.
My baffled pow'r must to a strumpet bow:
A brute I made her; she's a goddess now.
'Tis thus I punish, thus exert my pow'r.

She was once so overwhelmed with grief, because she could not revenge her self, that she made a voyage to the bottom of hell, to demand the assistance of the three furies.

A REFLECTION upon the fate of the Philosophers, who were obliged to write in vindication of Paganism, and upon an inconsistency arising from the unity of religion.

(170) See Ovid in the second book of the Metamorphosis.

(171) Arctophron prenis à fronte capillis Stravit humi per nam. Ovid. Metam. lib. ii. vers. 477.

(172) Id. ibid. ver. 519.

Nil

not reckon among the least of her disgraces, the misfortune she had to lose her cause in

(173) Id. ibid.
lib. iv, ver. 426.
Nil poterit Juno, nisi inultos flere dolores?
Idque mihi fatis est; Hæc una potentia nostra est (173)?

*Are tears the injur'd Juno's sole relief?
No remedy but this for all my grief?*

Sustinet ire illac, cœlesti fede relicta, (Tantum odii iræque dabat) Saturnia Juno.
Quò simul intravit, sacroque à corpore pressum
Intremuit limen; tria Cerberus extulit ora,
Et tres latratus simul edidit. Illa sorores Nocte vocat genitas, grave & implacabile numen (174).

(174) ibid. ver.
447.

*Thither she hastes, from heaven's æthereal gate:
(Such is the force of anger and of hate)
Where, as she enter'd, and the threshold press'd,
The portal trembled at the heavenly guest:
Grim Cerberus wide his triple jaws extends,
And the dark vault with tripling barking rends.
She calls the dreary sisters, and implores
Th' implacable, and unrelenting powers.*

(175) Others call her Ætna.
If she ever had any reason to be satisfied, it was when she persecuted the nymph Thalia (175), whom Jupiter had got with child. The only way that was left for this nymph to escape, was to be swallowed up in the bowels of the earth; but when the term was expired, the two children, that she was big with, came out of the earth, and became afterwards two famous deities (176), which had a wonderful veneration paid them (177); and so Juno's joy was but very short. She shewed herself such an inexorable persecutor of Hercules, that Porphyrius has compared her to the most wicked devils, that persecute good men. Τὸς γὰρ Δαίμονας διαγράφων τῷ λόγῳ (ὁ Πορφύριος) λέγει πρὸς τοὺς φαυλοτάτους Δαίμονας τοὺς ἀγαθοῖς ἀνδράσι λόγους καὶ ἐνέδρας καθίζων, καὶ ἐξαίρων ἐπιτίθεσθαι, καθάπερ ἡ Ἥρα τῇ Διονύσῳ καὶ Ἡρακλῆϊ. Dæmones enim oratione describens (Porphyrius) alicubi ait: pessimos Dæmonas bonis viris insidias est pericula tendere, exque eos insidiis aggeredi, ut Juno scilicet Baccho atque Herculi (178). What did she get by it? Nothing but toil, disgrace, and confusion. She complained of it on the stage, in such a manner as was able to soften the hardest hearts. Read these verses of Seneca; in which she declares, that she is resolved to leave heaven, seeing the multitude of the concubines and bastards of her husband. She expects to see Hercules ascend thither, whom she so often attempted to ruin, and who by that means made himself immortal.

(176) They were called Palici.

(177) See Servius, in Æneid. lib. ix, ver. 585. Lutatius, in Statium, Theb. lib. xii, ver. 157. Macrobius, Saturn. lib. v, cap. xix.

(178) Æneas Guæzo, in Theophrasto, pag. m. 43.

Soror Tonantis (hoc enim solum mihi Nomen relictum est) semper alienum Jovem, Ac templa summi vidua deserui ætheris;
Locumque, cœlo pulsa, pellicibus dedi.

(179) Seneca, in Hercule Furiente, ver. i.
Tellus colenda est: pelliceæ cœlum tenent (179).

Non sic abibunt odia, vivaces aget
Violentus iras animos, & sævus dolor
Æterna bella pace sublata geret.
Quid bella? quidquid horridum tellus creat
Inimica; quidquid pontus aut ær tulit
Terribile, dirum, pestilens, atrox, ferum; Fractum atque domitum est, superat, & crescit
malis;
Iraque nostra fruitur: in laudes suas
Mea vertit odia, dum nimis sæva impero,
Patrem probavi: gloriæ feci locum (180).

(180) Id. ver. 27.

*Sister of Jove (that name alone is left me)
Exil'd from heav'n, I fly the cruel god,
Desert the widow'd temples of the skies,
And yield my throne to barlots: earth, receive me,
Since vobres command in heav'n, and rule the skies.*

*Yet shall not here my keen resentment cease,
But my loud griefs shall wage eternal wars . . .
What wars? . . . what's ere of horrid, dreadful, dire,
Of pestilent, and fierce, earth, sea, and air
Create, is broken and subdued by Jove:
The cruel conqueror enjoys my rage;
My hatred serves but to encrease his fame,
And my fierce rule but added to his glory.*

The satisfaction of seeing the ruin of Troy, was but an inconsiderable consolation for the torments she had suffered, during the long resistance of the Trojans; and she quickly found herself obliged to undergo new fatigues in persecuting Æneas, and preventing his landing in Italy. She left no stone unturned; she went to Æolus to beg a tempest of him; she cajoled him, humbled herself before him (181). Another time she placed herself upon a cold cloud (182), and exposed herself to the injuries of the air, during a battle between the party she protected, and the party she hated. This was lost labour. Read what despair made her say, before she had recourse to Æolus.

(181) Virgil.
Æn. lib. i.

(182) Quæ spe
gelidis in nobilibus heres? Virgil.
Æn. lib. xii,
ver. 796.
N. c. tu me aëria
solum nunc sede videres Digna indigna pati. . . . Id. ib.
ver. 810.

Cum Juno æternum servans sub pectore vulnus,
Hæc secum: Me ne incepto desilire victam?
Nec posse Italiâ Teucrorum avertere regem?
Quippe vector fatis. Pallas exurere classem Argivum, atque ipsos potuit submergere Ponto, Unius ob noxam, & furias Ajacis Oilci (183)?

(183) Virgil.
Æn. lib. i, ver.
3.

Ast ego, quæ divum incedo regina, Jovisque
Et soror, & conjux, unâ cum gente tot annos
Bella gero; & quisquam numen Junonis adoret Præterea? Aut supplex aris imponat honorem (184)? (184) Id. ver. 46.

*When Juno in her breast, Vindictive, feeding an eternal wound,
Thus with herself. And must I then desist Baffled? Nor can I back from Latium turn
This Trojan prince? Belike the fates forbid.
Could Pallas drown the Greeks, and burn their fleet,
For Ajax' phrenzy? . . .
But I, the queen
Of gods, the sister and the wife of Jove,
With this one race so many years make war.
And who will Juno's deity adore Henceforth? or honour on my altars lay.*

TRAPP.

This is but a specimen of the history of this goddess; but it is sufficient to shew that the heathens should have looked upon her, as one of the most unhappy persons that ever was in the world, and fit to be propoed as a picture of extreme misery, as Prometheus on mount Caucasus, Sisyphus, Ixion, Tantalus, the Danaïdes, and the rest of the great sinners delivered over to infernal punishments. There is nothing more true, than what Horace said, that the most cruel tyrants have not been able to invent a more intolerable rack than envy (185): Which more especially agrees to the jealousy of marriage. What is it then, when joined with continual fatigues in the pursuit of an unsuccessful revenge? a natural immortality does not sweeten the bitterness of this sad condition, but rather increases it; for the hopes that death will put an end to our pain and grief is a consolation.

(185) Invidius
alterius maceris
rebus opimis.
Invidia Siculi
non invenire tyranni Majus tormen-
tum. Horat.
Epist. ii, lib. i,
ver. 57.

Nec finire licet tantos mihi morte dolores,
Sed nocet esse Deum, præclusaque janua lethi Æternum nostros luctus extendit in ævum (186).

(186) Ovid.
Metam. lib. i,
ver. 651.

*It is my curse that I must never dye,
But drag a wretched immortality:*

The

in a dispute concerning beauty [CC]: the resentment she expressed for the affront which she thought she had received from Paris, the judge of that trial, was very violent, and attended with a thousand fatigues and many afflictions. This doubtless was a more smarting wound than that of the three pointed arrow, which she received from Hercules

*The gate of death is shut against my woe,
And thro' eternity my griefs must flow.*

The pompous title of queen of heaven, the sitting upon a fine throne, with a sceptre in the hand, and a diadem on the head, is all insignificant to the inward distempers of the soul. Nay, a person is more sensible of these misfortunes, when in the highest posts and dignities. We may say at least that discontent is like a fever, which is not more easily cured in a good bed than upon straw.

(137) Lucret.
lib. ii, ver. 34.

*Nec calidæ citius decedunt corpore febres
Textilibus si in picturis, ostroque rubenti
Jactaris, quam si plebeja in veste cubandus sit* (187).

*Nor sooner health is to the rich restor'd,
In pomp extended on a silken bed,
Than to the lab'rer on his humble couch.*

It is not riches that can drive away a fever, or the uneasiness of the mind.

(183) Horat.
Epist. ii, lib. I,
ver. 47.

*Non domus, & fundus, non æris acervus, & auri
Ægroto domini deduxit corpore febres,
Non animo curas* (188).

*'Tis not in house, or farm, or heaps of gold,
To cure a fever in the owner's blood,
Or heal his cares.*

Note, that if the Heathens did not make the reflexions, which I have set forth in the preceding remark and in this, they are wholly inexcusable: for it was not only by the poets that they were informed of this unhappy life of Juno: the public worship had adopted those stories, and monuments were found of them in their temples; the consecrated statues, the pictures of devotion, those objects which are called the books of the ignorant, informed every body of the jealousies of this goddess, &c.

[CC] The misfortune she had to lose her cause in a dispute concerning beauty. Minerva and Venus were her two competitors. Every body knows that Jupiter (189), not willing to sit as judge in so nice a trial, ordered these three goddesses to be conducted to mount Ida, in order to plead their cause there, and that Paris should decide the dispute. Juno dressed her self as splendidly as was possible, and made great promises to Paris in case he adjudged the apple to her, which was to be the lot of the greatest beauty. Minerva and Venus did their best both in dressing themselves, and promising rewards to their judge. The trouble of tricking up themselves, and making speeches, was all to no purpose: Paris declared, that he would see them all naked before he pronounced his judgment.

(189) See Lucian, in Deorum Judicicio, pag. m. 161.
Tom. I, Oper.

Car vostre discord gît à vos formozitez,
De contempler vos corps, vos naïves beautez,
Prudemment discerner le choix, l'équipolance,
Laquelle est la plus belle in face, & corpulance.
Les Déessees alors eurent timidité,
Parce qu'il leur falloît monstrier leur nudité.
Toutesfois à l'ombrage un peu se retirèrent,
En lieu d'une antichambre, ou se deshabillerent
A part l'une de l'autre, ou leurs Nymphes avoient
Qui honorablement en cela les servoient.
Quand eurent defublé escoffions & guimpes,
Leurs couronnes tourets, destaché leurs espingles,
Morriion & chapeaux, ceintures, fermaillets,
Chefnes, bagues, carquans, bullettes, bracelets,
Robes, & cotillons, leurs manteaux & cuirace,
Leurs habits pleins d'odeurs, de tresgrande efficace.

Toutesfois retenoient leurs escarpins dorez,
Bravement enrichis decoupez & ouvrez,
De peur que l'aigu bout des pointues herbettes
Leurs plantes n'offensât fort tendres & douillettes.
Ainsi nues estant toutes trois vont marcher
Devant le beau Paris, & droit si vont ranger (190).

*Your quarrel from your beauties doth arise:
To guide my choice, your native charms display,
That I may weigh them in an equal scale.
Fear seiz'd the goddesses, compell'd to show
Their naked charms: together they retir'd,
And, in the covert of a shady bower,
Disrob'd, assist'd by th' attendant nymphs.
And now each part of dress was laid aside,
Girdles untied, and ev'ry pin pull'd out.
Head-cloaths, and stomachers, bracelets and rings,
Gowns, petticoats, and mantles, all persum'd
And breathing heav'nly odour, lay confus'd.
Their slippers, richly gilded, they retain'd,
To guard their feet against the pointed thorns.
Thus, naked, before Paris they appear,
March in his sight, and ev'ry charm disclose.*

The French poet who gives us this description, forgets a very material thing, which is, that these three goddesses washed their bodies in a fountain. Euripides tells us this particular (191), and there are some epigrams on it in the Anthologia (192). Juno must therefore submit to very disagreeable conditions; for after all, she made profession of modesty, she was grave and majestical, she knew how to maintain her rank, and yet she found her self obliged to shew her self naked before a mortal: and the worst of it was, that another appeared handfomer to the judge, and Venus obtained the golden apple. He did not make it appear, that he found any reason of preference in the face or shape of these three litigants: on the contrary, he declared, that whilst he saw them dress, he thought them equally handsome. Having then pronounced against Juno, after comparing what their cloaths concealed, it was a sign he discovered in her some notable imperfections. This might at least be suspected, and it could not but be a terrible mortification to this goddess (193). This was enough to make her mad. I wonder that Lucian has not bestowed some of his biting wit upon it in his dialogue about the judgment of Paris. See the margin (194). Our Scarron has not been so discreet, see how he jests in the first book of his Virgile travesti:

Ce que craignant la bonne Dame (195),
Et gardant encor en son ame
Le beau jugement de Paris,
Et l'insupportable mépris, Qu'en faveur de Venus la belle Il eût pour Pallas & pour elle,
Outre qu'il avoit revelé,
(Heureux s'il n'eût jamais parlé)
Qu'elle avoit trop longue mamelle,
Et trop long poil dessous l'aiselle,
Et pour Dame de qualité
Le genoüil un peu trop croté:

*This the good ay fear'd, we find,
And still preserving in her mind
The sight, which Paris put upon her,
And haughty Pallas' injur'd honour,
When he adjudg'd the queen of love
The golden prize, for which they strove:
Besides, that Paris had revealed;
A secret, he shou'd have conceal'd;*

(190) Christopher Duffras, Esq.
lord of the Ja-ziere, and of the Chobstanterie, near Nyort in Pacifica, bold si-of his Histories
des Portes, lib.
22, verso,
printed at Niort, 1595. He only puts here into the Mouth of Belges had said a gross. Mithras de Gaulle, lib. i,
cap. xxxiii, pag.
308.

(191) Eurip. in Helenæ ver. 614,
& in Andromachæ
ver. 253.

(192) In the eleventh chapter of the fourth book
pag. m. 745.
746.

(193) See, above, citat. (181), of the article HEN-RY III.

(194) Lucian, in Deor. Dial. pag.
514, Tom. I, did not forget to introduce Jove saying, that Diana recovered herself on seeing for no other reason, but because she was afraid
he would divulge the mortification
he had discover'd, when he saw her naked.

(195) Thus,
Jove.

Hercules in her right breast (o). It has been said, that after the consummation of her marriage, she washed herself in a fountain situated betwixt Tigris and Euphrates, and that from that time the waters of that fountain had a most agreeable smell, which perfumed the Air round about it [DD]. Juno was handsome, and for that reason Jupiter's

(o) See Homer, Iliad. lib. v. ver. 392, & seq. who says, it was a very painful wound. Τὴν αὖ μιν ἀνήμερον λάβει δάγας. Tunc ipsam gravissimus occupavit dolor.

That Juno's breasts hung down too far,
Had near her arm-pits too much hair,
And, for a dame of quality,
Was not so clean about the knee.

An author, who flourished in the beginning of the XVth century, pretends, that Juno did not appear quite naked. She and Minerva, says he, (196) being surprized with shame, and not willing to do it, answered not a word, when it was signified to them, that they must be at the pains of putting off their noble robes, since the dispute lay in a comparison of the beauty of their divine bodies, and in a prudent distinction of the preference of their illustrious members. But Venus the boldest of them, said, that things were gone so far, that there was no denying of it, and began to untie her girdle. 'Then Juno seeing this said, 'certainly, Lady Venus, we have no mind to refuse it, for fear of being baffled: but I think it is indecent for immortal and chaste goddesses; for Pallas who is a maid, and for me, who am the wife of a king and emperor, to shew ourselves naked to any mortal man, as little account as you make of it, as being used to keep company with men. But however since it must be done, we will not be the last' (197) Queen Juno full of a maternal gravity, and modesty, kept on none of all her ornaments; only she took a fine handkerchief, long, broad and thin, all hemmed with gold and silk fringes, with which one of her nymphs was decked. And she put it upon her left shoulder hanging like a scarf, and tied in a knot upon her right side. And because the ends fluttering in the air flew up whether she would or no, by her motion, she held one of her hands upon her breast, and the other lower.' I believe this is a mere fiction of this author. Lucian insinuates nothing like it. However it be, Juno expressed an extreme repentment for the desperate affront that she thought her judge had put upon her. This was a wound that bled for a long time, and disquieted her mind all the rest of her life.

Nec dum etiam causæ irarum ævique dolores Exciderant animo: manet alta mente repositum Judicium Paradisi, spretæque injuria formæ (198).

Nor were as yet the causes of her rage,
And keen resentments, by her restless soul
Forgotten: deep within her bosom lay
The judgment giv'n by Paris, and th' affront
Of her scorn'd beauty.

TRAPP.

I shall observe, by the by, that Macrobius is mistaken in one of the differences he mentions betwixt Virgil and Homer. These are his words: 'Nullum commemorationem de judicio Paradisi Homerus admittit: idem vates Ganymedem non ut Junonis pelicem à Jove raptum, sed Jovialium poculorum ministrum in cœlum à diis ascitum refert, velut Ἰσοπεπτός. Virgilius tantum deam, quod cuius de honestis feminæ deforme est, velut speciem victimæ Paride judicante doluisse, & propter catamiti pellicarum totam gentem ejus vexasse commemorat (199).' It is certain that Homer has mentioned Paris's judgment, and assigned it as the cause of Juno's implacable anger against the Trojans (200): it is not therefore true, as Macrobius pretends, that Virgil has departed from Homer upon this point. It would signify nothing here to say, that Euripides (201), and Coluthus (202) have mentioned the same judgment of Paris.

[DD] She washed herself in a fountain and that from that time the waters of that fountain had a most agreeable smell. Ælian has preserved this story. He says (203), that this fountain was transparent to the bottom, and that the inhabitants of the country, and the Syrians also, had among them the tradition just mentioned, and attributed to it the agreeable smell that was all round the place. Ἐξ οὗν ὁ χάρος εὐωδίας ἀναπτύσσει, καὶ πᾶς ὁ ἀέρ χύκλῳ ταύτῃ κίεῖται. Unde locus etiamnum suæ odorem spiret qui in vicinum etiam aërem circumquaque distribuitur (204). This shews the character both of a superstitious and fabulous spirit. People are easily led to derive from a celestial origin all the singular properties that are found in certain places of the world: and as the heathens suffered themselves to be abused with a chimerical, and foolish tradition of the amours and marriages of the gods, they believed that Juno, being willing to wash her body the next day after her wedding, chose a very clear fountain, and left there some marks of her presence. Note, that according to Turnebus, they fancied that the divine beings made themselves known by their smell (205).

Omnia finierat: tænes secessit in auras.
Manit odor: posses scire fuisse Deam (206).

She spoke no more, and vanish'd in the wind;
The heavenly fragrance, she left behind,
Betray'd the goddess.

This is what Ovid says, speaking of Flora, and here follows what Virgil says, speaking of Venus.

Dixit, & avertens roseæ cervicæ refulsit,
Ambrosiæque comæ divinum vertice odorem Spirare (207).

She said, and, as she turn'd, her rosy neck
Shone bright: her hair a fragrance divine Ambrosial breath'd.

TRAPP.

John le Maire de Belges follows this opinion: for he affirms (208), that all terrestrial beings kept silence and expressed a respectful admiration; during the appearance of the divine bodies (209), which had already perfumed the circumambient air with their fragrant, divine, and ambrosial odour. The Heathens would have easily believed that the spittle, &c. of the gods, was rose-water at least. Balzac (210) observes, that the Poet Furius makes Jupiter spit snow (211); and that another Poet makes Nectar enough to proceed from him to form the rivers of the golden age. Balzac adds, 'that he whom Matthieu's history names the Chrysolom of France, said, preaching before the late king Henry the Great: Sir, though your majesty shed pearls instead of tears, and spit emeralds, though rubies and diamonds proceeded from you whenever you sneeze and blow your nose, &c.' It would not have been difficult to persuade the Heathens, that the gods actually did all this. Thus children are made to believe that Urganda, for example, or some other fairy, getting her head combed, and asking what is it that falls from my head? heard with pleasure this answer, gold and silver. Most of those who believe this in their infancy, would believe it all their lives, if they were not undeceived when they are grown up, or if they saw that these things were the common opinion in matter of faith. There are many natural properties, which the traditions of the Christian people attribute to miraculous causes, as the Heathens attributed to Juno the fragrance of the fountain before mentioned. Behold, said one to me one day, that little tract of land where the grass is so pale: it was that way a martyr went, when he was led from the prison to the place of execution. All the way he went bears the marks of it ever since. The wheat, the grass, whatever is sown there has a tincture of it, and never acquires the verdure which you see on the right and on the left.

8 A

There

(196) John le Maire de Belges, Illustrations de Gaule, & singulière de Troie, livr. i. chap. xxxiii, pag. 108. Lyons, 1549, in fol.

(197) Id. ibid. pag. 109.

(198) Virgil. Æneid. lib. i. ver. 25. See also the 36th verse of the same book, cum Juno æternum servans sub pectore vulnus.

(199) Macrobius. Saturn. lib. v. cap. xvi, pag. m. 407.

(200) Homer. Iliad. lib. ult. ver. 25, & seq.

(201) Eurip. in Troadibus, ver. 924, & in Helena, ver. 23.

(202) Coluthus and that from that time the waters of that fountain had a most agreeable smell.] Ælian has preserved this

(203) Ælian. Histor. Animal. lib. xii, cap. xxx.

(204) Id. ibid.

(205) Turneb. Advers. lib. xxx, cap. xxxix. I am not very well satisfied with the proofs he alludes to, viz. the passage of Virgil, and that of Ovid, which I have set down.

(206) Ovid. Fastor. lib. v, ver. 375.

(207) Virgil. Æneid. lib. i, ver. 402.

(208) That is, of John le Maire de Belges, ubi supra, pag. 109.

(209) That is, of John le Maire de Belges, ubi supra, pag. 109. See the remark [HH] of the article MAHOMET, what the followers of that false prophet say of his sweat.

(211) Jupiter hi-bernas cana nive conspuat Alpes.

Jupiter's adulteries may be said to be the more inexcusable [EE]. It would be meer wrangling to criticize Arnobius, who has judged of it in this manner. The superstition of the Romans was so great, that some women honoured Juno by pretending to comb her and dress her, and hold a looking-glass before her [FF]; but others were in little fear of her, for they went and seated themselves in the Capitol by her husband, fancying themselves to be his mistresses. See my last remark.

There is hardly a parish, where you will not hear such stories. I wish some travellers would make a large collection of them. They are contented to collect what concerns great towns, but a collection of what concerns the country parishes would have its value too. And hereupon I remember I heard a man of judgment say, that his taste was not like that of an antient father, who wished he had seen at Rome a triumph. I rather wish, said he, I had been present for some months at the conversations of the Roman citizens, and that I knew how the women practised their devotions, and how they talked of Jupiter and Juno; what was their common discourse on a wedding-day, on a day of child-birth, or of a general procession, a day of Læstifernum, &c. concerning the gods and goddesses, Subigus or Subiga, Fabulinus, Perunda, and the rest. Books do not teach us those particulars, it is only by conversation that we come to the knowledge of them.

[EE] Juno's beauty made Jupiter's adulteries more inexcusable. It is thus Arnobius argued: 'Et quid Regi Saturnio matrimonii fuerat cum alienis rei? Non illi fuerat satis Juno, nec fedare impetum cupiditatum in regina poterat nimum, cum nobilitas eam commendaret tanta, facies, oris dignitas & ulnarum nivei marmoreique candores (212). — And what bad Jupiter to do with other mens wives? Was not Juno enough for him; and could he not satisfy his lust with the queen of the gods, so famed for her graceful air, beauty, and white hand?' A cavilling Sophist might attack this argument of Arnobius, and say that at a certain period of time, the beauty of women loses all its charms with respect to their husbands, the nature of things being such, that they no longer affect us, after we are used to them, ab assuetis non fit passio. He would maintain, that this political axiom, that the best methods of preserving dominion, are those that have been made use of to obtain it (213), is false in the empire of beauty: for if beauty makes a conquest, it does not preserve it; a husband who fell in love only because his mistress was handsome, will not continue in love, because his wife continues to be so: custom hardens him against that sort of charm, and he makes every day some steps towards insensibility: Some come sooner to it, others later; but at last all arrive at it, and the affection which may be, and is frequently preserved, is not grounded upon beauty, but upon other qualities. Experience shews that the husbands, whose love is most lasting and strong, are not for the generality those who have handsome wives. Look elsewhere than in beauty for that charm, which unites the hearts, and keeps them afterwards united (214). A Sophist might heap up many other observations of the same nature; but after all, he ought to be looked upon as a caviller; for it is certain that Arnobius's remark is grounded upon a kind of common notion. All the neighbours are much more scandalized with the intrigues of a man, who has a handsome wife, than with those of another, whose wife is ugly. A whole nation, though never so numerous, will be more indulgent to the galantries of a king, when the queen is deformed, and loathsome, than when he is married to a princess of a rare and excellent beauty. Some body has inserted in the Scaligerana a story which has some affinity with this. Porthaise, a famous preacher, preaching at Poitiers, and having heard of the debaucheries of a Physician, named Lumeau, who though he had a handsome wife, sometimes went elsewhere, pointing at him one day, very pleasantly in the pulpit, when having spoke against this vice in general, he came to particulars, he said, nay, we have heard with great concern, that there are some men who are so profligate, as to commit adultery, though they have wives in their own houses, who are such, that for our part, we should be well enough contented with them (215).

[FF] Some women honoured Juno by pretending to comb her . . . and hold a looking-glass before her. What a misfortune it is that we have not the book, in which Seneca condemned this base superstition, and many others like it. St. Augustin has cited it. 'In Capitolium perveni, said Seneca (216), pudebit publicatæ de-mentiae, quod sibi vanus furor attribuit officii: alius nomina Deo subijcet, alius horas Jovi nunciat, alius licitor est, alius unctor, qui vano motu brachiorum imitatur ungentem. Sunt, quæ Junoni ac Minervæ capillos disponant, longè à templo non tantum à simulachro stantes, digitos movent ornatum modo. Sunt quæ speculum teneant . . . Sedent quædam in Capitolio, quæ se à Jove amari putant, nec Junonis quidem, si credere poetis velis, iracundissimæ respectu terrentur. — I came to the Capitol: you will be ashamed of the public madness, which they practise under the notion of honouring him: one gives the god a list of names; another tells Jupiter the hour of the day; another is licitor, another anointer, who counterfeits the action of one that anoints. Some are employed in disposing the hairs of Juno and Minerva, standing at a distance, not only from the temple, but also from the image, and move their fingers as if they were adorning the statues. Some women hold a glass . . . Some sit in the Capitol, thinking Jupiter is love with them, nor are terrified with the sight of Juno, though full of resentment, if you will believe the Poets.' We may confirm this by a passage taken from a book which is still in being. Deum colit qui novit. Vetemus lintea & strigiles Jovi ferre, & speculum tenere Junoni (217). — He worships a god, who knows how to worship him. I allow no one to carry napkins and combs to Jupiter, or to hold a glass to Juno.

(215) Scaligerana, pag. m. 192.

(216) Seneca, contra Superstitiones apud August. de Civitate Dei, lib. vi, cap. x. pag. m. 605.

(217) Seneca, Epist. xxi, pag. m. 396.

JUPITER, the greatest of all the Heathen gods, was the son of Saturn and Cybele. There was no crime, but what he was defiled with; for besides that he dethroned his own father, that he castrated him, and bound him in chains in the deepest hell [A], he

[A] He dethroned his own father, . . . and bound him in chains in the deepest hell. Saturn was dealt with according to the Lex Talionis, since he had usurped the empire of the world, which his father Cælus possessed (1); but Jupiter was nevertheless guilty of a horrible usurpation; it is not lawful to punish one crime by another; one cannot absolve himself by imitating the wicked. It is remarkable that Cælus was betrayed by his own wife; for it was the earth, heaven's wife, who excited her children to rebel (2), and who put a sickle into the hands of the youngest (3) which he made use of to castrate him. Saturn who had done that exploit, was treated so exactly in the same manner, that Jupiter used the same instrument to cut off his privy parts, as he had used for the castration of Cælus (4). Note, that Saturn's party made a long resistance: it was not vanquished till after ten years war (5). Saturn being conquered, was loaded with chains, and thrown into Tartarus, the darkest and deepest dungeon of hell. It was as remote from the earth, as the earth is from heaven. Τὸ πρῶτον δὲ τῶν ἐπε-Cælus ἐστὶν ἐν ᾧ δὲ, τοῦτον ἀπὸ γῆς ἔχον διδεσμα, ὅσον ἀπ' ἐξάνθ' γῆ. Is locus est ad Inferos tenebrosissimus, qui tantum à terra distat, quantum à caelo terram abesse ferunt (6). The chains were not very heavy; for they were made of wool (7). He had every year some days of liberty allowed him, during the Saturnalia; a time in which slaves were permitted to do what they pleased (8). Some say, that Saturn escaped from prison, and retired into Italy to king Janus. Others say, that his son was contented only to expel him. Virgil is of this last opinion:

Primus ab ætherio venit Saturnus Olympo
Arma Jovis fugiens, & regis exul adeptus (9).

Firſt

(9) Virgil, Æa-
lib. viii, ver. 319.

(212) Arnobius, lib. iv, pag. m. 341.

(213) Imperium facile iis artibus retinetur quibus initio partum est. Sallust. in Peram. Belli Catil.

(214) Hæc res & junctis servat amicos. Horat. Sat. III, lib. i, ver. 54.

(1) Apollodorus, lib. i, init.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) It was Saturn.

(4) Natalis Comes, Mythol. lib. ii, pag. m. 86.

(5) Apollodorus, ubi supra.

(6) Id. ibid.

(7) Apollodorus in Perſide, apud Natal. Comiten, pag. 85.

(8) Age libertate Decembris. Quando ita majores voluerunt uter. Horat. Sat. VII, lib. ii, ver. 4.

he committed incest with his sisters, daughters, and aunts [B], and even attempted to ravish his mother. He debauched a great number of maids and wives; and to compass his designs, he borrowed the shapes of all sorts of beasts. He was guilty of the unnatural sin; for he stole away the beautiful Ganymede (a), and preferred him to the office of cup-bearer to the gods, that he might have him at hand, as often as his heart desired. Treacheries and perjuries, and in general, all actions that

(a) See the article
GANYMEDE.

First exil'd from Olympus Saturn came,
Flying his kingdom, and the arms of Jove.

TRAPP.

But Statius is not, since he speaks of the liberty that was granted to Saturn once a year.

Saturnus mihi compede exoluta
Et multo gravidus mero December,
Et ridens jocus, & sales protervi Adfuit (10).

(10) Statius.
Silva VI, lib. i.

Come Saturn, from thy fetters loosed,
December, reeling in thy cups,
With pleasantries, and wanton wit.

(11) Lib. iv,
pag. m. 143.

To which you may add these words of Arnobius (11):
"Numquid patricidii causa vincum esse Saturnum, & ablu diebus stans, vinculorum ponderibus & levare."
"That Saturn was chained on account of patricide, and that he was washed, and freed from his chains, on certain days." I forgot to say, that after the complete victory that Jupiter's party had obtained, Apollo sung upon his lyre a poem which he had made in praise of the conquerors. Tibullus informs us of this circumstance in an elegy, which he inscribes to Apollo (12).

(12) It is the fifth of the second book.

Sed nitidus pulcræque veni, nunc indue vestem
Sepositam, longas nunc bene peste comas,
Qualem te memorant, Saturno regis fugato Victori laudes concinuisse Jovi.

But come, adorn'd in all thy beauty's pride;
Resume thy shining garment laid aside;
Deck the long ringlets of thy flowing hair,
And in full majesty of dress appear;
At erst, when Saturn driv'n from heav'n above,
Thou sang the praises of the victor Jove.

The best allegories that may be found under these fables, is to say, that the Ancients meant by them that ambition stifles all natural affection, and the duties of friendship and alliances (13), and that Poets and Orators are always ready to declare for the party that is uppermost.

[B] He committed incest with his sisters, daughters, and aunts. He lay with his sister Juno, without staying till she was his wife, and afterwards married her. I speak of it in another place (14). He debauched his other sister Ceres, and had Proserpina by her. He lay with three of his aunts, namely, Themis, Dione, and Mnemosyne. From his incest with the first came the Horæ and the Paræ: by the second he begat Venus, by the third the nine Muses (15). Seeing his mother one day asleep, he attempted to lie with her by surprise; but as she awaked, and put herself in a posture of defence; he made use of force, and would probably have accomplished his abominable design, if the ardour of his passion had not evaporated in his struggle to overpower his mother (16). Arnobius very justly exclaims upon it: "O rerum imaginatio indecora! ô

(13) Natalis
Comes, who is every fond of all-gories, speaks thus,
pag. 85. Nulla sunt enim vel naturæ vel ami-citie, vel bene-ficientie satis firma vincula ubi majestatis & imperandi furiosum desiderium inva-serit: illa omnia liquidem facilitate conculantur & proster-nantur.

(14) In the remark [A] of the article of JUNO.

(15) Hesiodus, in Theogon. Apolloder. lib. i.
pag. 9.

(16) Arnob. lib.
v, pag. 161.

(17) Arnob. lib.
pag. 162.

habitus sœdus Jovis ad obscœni certaminis expeditionem parati! Ergone ille rex mundi, cum incautus & properus obreptionis esset rejectus à furto, in impe-tum se vertit: & quum rapere voluptatem insidiosa fraude non quivit, vi matrem aggressus est, & aper-tissimè corpi venerabilem subruere castitatem? Collu-ctatus ergo diutissimè cum invita est, victus, fractus, superatque deficit: & quem pietas dijungere ab infando matris non valuit appetitu, effusa libido di-junxit (17)? — O indecent image of things! O filthy posure of Jupiter, prepared to enter the obscene lists!
Did then this king of the world, when he could not compass his design by stealth, have recourse to violence, and openly attempt his mother's chastity? He struggled a long time with the unwilling goddess; but, vanquished at last, was obliged to desist; and, whom filial piety could not keep from impiously lusting after his mother, passion extinguished prevented from accomplishing his desire. He observes that the Heathens made advantage of those vain efforts of Jupiter; for they said, that a stone grew with child by him, and brought forth a son ten months after. Et sane hoc loco fru-galitatis magnæ viri, & circa res etiam flagitiosas operis parciore, ne sancta illa semina frustra videantur effusa, silex, inquit, ebibit Jovialis incontinentiæ fœditatem. Quid deinde, quæso, consecutum est, di-cite? In sinu medio lapidis, atque in illa cotis duritie informatum atque animatum est infans, Jovis magni futura progenies, &c (18). Such a sort of propagation hath been observed about the attempts Jupiter made to debauch his daughter Venus. This maid, who was otherwise so bountiful in her favours to other men, made a vigorous resistance to Jupiter. I explain this in the margin by the words of a modern author, which are somewhat coarse (19). Arnobius makes mention of another wicked attempt of Jupiter, wherein he succeeded. But it is according to the opinion of those, who said that Ceres was the mother of this

god. Quondam Diespiter, inquit, cum in Cererem suam matrem libidinibus improbis atque inconcessis cupiditatibus, æstuet, nam genitrix hæc Jo-vis regionis ejus ab accolis traditur, neque tamen auderet id, quod procaci appetitione conceperat, aper-tissima vi petere, ingeniosas comminiscitur captiones, quibus nihil tale metuentem castitate imminueret ge-nitricem: fit ex Deo taurus, & sub pecoris specie sub-fessoris animus atque audaciam celans: in securam & nesciam repentina immittitur vi furens, agit incestus res suas, & prodata per libidinem fraude, intellectus, & cognitus evolat (20). — Jupiter, they say, once lusting after his mother Ceres (for the inhabitants of that country pretend she was his mother) and not daring openly to gratify his desires, ingeniously contrived to rob her of her chastity by surprise: he was transformed into a bull, and, concealing himself under that brutish form, attacked her, when she was off her guard, committed the incest, and, being discovered by the lustful action, fled away. Ceres was angry to little purpose; that action made her big with Proserpina, who went through the same trial as her mother: Jupiter got the maidenhead of Proserpina, his daughter. Quam (Proserpinam) cum verveceus Jupiter bene validam, floridam, & succi esse conspiceret plenioris, oblitus paulo ante quid malo-rum & sceleris esset aggressus, & temeritatis quantum, redit ad priores actus: & quia nefarium videbatur fati, patrem cum filia comminus uxoria conjugatione misceri, in draconis terribilem formam migrat: ingentibus spiris pavescant colligat virginem; & sub obtentu fero, mollissimis ludat atque adulatur amplexibus (21). — Jupiter, seeing Proserpina strong, florid, and healthy, forgetting the crime he had a little before attempted, returned to his former practices: and because it looked ill for a father openly to use his daughter as a wife, he took upon him the terrible form of a serpent: he wreathed his monstrous folds about the affrighted virgin; and, under this savage appearance, embraced and toyed with her in the softest manner. Meziriac (22) quotes several authors, who say, that Jupiter, transformed into a serpent, got the maidenhead of his daughter Proserpina, by whom he got the first Bacchus, surnamed Zagreus. I will conclude this remark with a passage of Arnobius.
Quid tantum, quæso, Jovis deo to the Heathens (23), de vobis Jupiter iste, quicumque est, meruit, quod genus est nullum probri infame, adulterium nullum quod in ejus non caput, velut in aliquam congeritis vilem luteamque personam? — What has this Jupiter, whoever he be, deserved so greatly of you; he, who stuck at no crime, no adultery, like the vilest of mortals? This is to nonplus Paganism.

(18) Id. lib.

(19) Nonnus, book xiv, says, that the other Centaurs were begotten by the seed of Jupiter which fell upon the earth when he was transformed into a bull, &c.
Meziriac on Ovid,
pag. 173.

(20) Arnob. lib.
pag. 170.

(21) Id. pag. 172.

(22) Id. pag. 419.
He quotes Nonnus,
lib. v, & vi.
Arnobius, lib. v.
Clement Alexandrinus, in Pro-treptico. Tzetzes upon Lycophron.
The Scholiast upon Pindar, in the seventh Isthm.
The author of the Great Etymologi-con, at the word Ζαγρεύς. The Scholiast upon Aristophanes, in Ran. Didorus
Siculus, lib. iii.
Arianus, lib. ii,
de Exped. Alex-
andri. Hyginus,
cap. clv, & clvii.
Cicero, lib. iii,
de Nat. Deor.

(23) Arnob. lib.
v, pag. 171.

[C] Some

(b) See the preface which Natalis Comes gives for his Mythol. lib. i.
cap. xviii, and Archibius, quoted below, in the remark [D].

are punishable by the laws, were familiar to him (b). They had gone so far, as to say, that he devoured one of his wives [C]; and therefore nothing can be more monstrous, than the religion of the Pagans, who looked upon such a God, as the supreme governor of the world, and suited to that notion, the religious worship that was paid him. The fathers of the church have laid a great stress upon this argument, to prove the falshood of the Pagan religion; and it may be said, that this system was very proper to corrupt morality [D]. I shall say nothing about the fables, that concern the birth or education

(24) Ζεύς δὲ
θεῶν βασιλεὺς πρώτην ἄστρον
θεῶν Μηνῆν.
Uxorē primam Metim sibi Jupiter addidit.
Hesiod, in Theog.
ver. 886.

(25) Natalis
Comes, Mythol.
lib. ii, pag. m.
90.

[C] Some went so far as to say that he devoured one of his wives. Hesiod observes, that the first wife Jupiter married, was called Metis (24). Seeing her big with child, he devoured her, and became himself big with child by that means, and afterwards brought forth Minerva. Joannes Diaconus his verbi: Καὶ ἔχον τούτην ποινδμένην, καταπίνει αὐτήν, ἵνα μὴ ἄλλῃ τις τῶν θεῶν ἀποκνησθῇ παρ' αὐτῆς ἀναίδης, καὶ ἀπόδαλῃ: quam cum gravidam fecisset, deglutit, ne quis alius Deorum nasceretur ex ea impudens ac fatuus. Ex eo cibo mox ipse Jupiter pro uxore gravidus factus Palladem armatam ē capite peperit (25). — Having got her with child, he devoured her, as Joannes Diaconus has written in these words: having got her with child, he devoured her lest any other impudent and foolish god should be born of her. By this food Jupiter himself becoming pregnant, brought forth from out of his head the armed Pallas.

Since the first edition of this Dictionary, I have more exactly examined this, and I have found, that Natalis Comes advances nothing, but what is grounded upon the words of Joannes Diaconus, whom he cites. This Diaconus is a Greek author, and a Christian, who composed allegories and scholia upon Hesiod's poem, intitled Θεογονία, the Generation of the Gods. He positively says, that Jupiter having swallowed his wife Metis, brought forth Minerva, καὶ τούτην καταπίνων ἀποτίκτει ἐκ τῆς ἐαυτοῦ κεφαλῆς τὴν τρίτογενεῖαν Ἀθηνᾶν. He makes use, I say, of these words immediately after those contained in the passage of Natalis Comes, which I have quoted; and thereby he manifestly declares, that he would have it thought that Minerva sprung from Jupiter's head, because Metis being with child, had been devoured by Jupiter her husband. But Hesiod does not lead us to this thought, nor does he so much as insinuate, that the tragical end of Metis contributed to the birth of Minerva. Here follows the substance of what he says (26). Metis, Jupiter's first wife, was ready to be delivered of Minerva, but Jupiter hindered her; he used a flattering discourse, which deceived her, and swallowed her into his belly. Caelus and the earth had given him this advice, and had cautioned him, that unless he did it, he would lose his sceptre, since the destinies declared, that Metis after she had brought the wife Minerva into the world, should lie-in of a brave boy, who should rule over the gods and men. Jupiter avoided the fatal blow; he shut up Metis in his bowels, before she became a mother; he shut her up, I say, that she might forget him good and evil (27). He afterwards married Themis, by whom he had many children: he had also many by his mistresses. He had by Eurynome the daughter of Oceanus, the three Graces; afterwards he lay with Ceres, who brought forth Proserpina. After this he fell in love with Mnemosyne, and made her the mother of the nine muses. He had by Latona a son and a daughter, namely Apollo and Diana, and at last he married Juno, who brought him three children, Hebe, Mars, and Lucina; and as for himself, he conceived Minerva in his head, and was delivered of her. Thus you see, that if Hesiod had intended his readers should think, that he meant that this birth of Minerva was an effect of Metis's being shut up in Jupiter's belly, he had done all that was necessary to frustrate his design; for he puts between this effect, and this cause, such an interval as leads our thoughts to quite another thing from his intention. Let us say then, that he had no such intention, or else, that he excelled in the shameful art of giving a wrong account of a thing, and expressing it obscurely. Note, that if the nineteen verses which we find in one of Galen's works (28), were Hesiod's, we could not blame this Poet for being too obscure. It plainly appears from them, that the same Pallas, who was born from Jupiter's head, was conceived in Metis's womb. But it ought to be observed, that she was

(26) Hesiod, in Theog. ver. 887,
& seq.

(27) Ἄλλ' ἄρα
μὲν Ζεὺς προβέν ἔδην ἐγκά-θετο νηδύν, ὥς
εἴ οἱ φράσσαίτο θεῶν ἀγαθόν τε
κακόν τε.
Sed illam sane Jupiter ante in suum condidit ventrem.
Ut nempe ei indicaret dea bo-namque malum-que. Id. ibid.
ver. 899.

(28) Galenus, de Hippocr. & Pla-
tonia, Placitis,
lib. iii, cap. viii,
pag. 131. Edit.
Paris 1679.

not conceived, till after Metis had been swallowed up by Jupiter. This is a variation, which deserves to be taken notice of. I add, that it is not probable these are Hesiod's verses; for if they were, there would be in his poem of the Generation of the Gods a chaos which the critics do not complain of. Galen is somewhat to blame, for not putting it out of doubt whether the pronoun αὐτοῦς ipse, which precedes the nineteen verses, refers to Hesiod or Chrysippus. I believe it relates to the latter, and that this great Philosopher, after he had produced Hesiod's verses concerning Metis, cited those of another Poet, in which the conception of Minerva was described somewhat differently. If you ask me, to what end Chrysippus alleged these verses of Hesiod, and the others, I answer, that it was to shew, that his opinion concerning the seat of the rational soul, was not contrary to the tradition of the birth of Minerva. He placed the rational soul in the heart, and yet Minerva, that is Reason and Wisdom, was born from Jupiter's brain. This was the objection Chrysippus examined; he took advantage of the circumstance of Minerva's being conceived by Metis, after she was swallowed by Jupiter, and he maintained, that this signified, that reason was formed in the breast, and that the delivery of Minerva signified speech, that is to say, that reason proceeds from the head, in as much as the mouth is the organ, by which the thoughts conceived in the heart, are outwardly produced. Galen (29) thinks it very strange, that Chrysippus should trouble himself to give a serious explanation of poetical traditions (30). He cannot be too much blamed for spending his time so ill.

[D] The system of the Pagan religion was very proper to corrupt morality (31). Christian authors have drawn potent arguments from these infamous actions of Jupiter, to convict the Heathens of the falsity of their gods; as may be seen in many places of Lactantius, Tertullian, Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and several others. For besides that such horrid crimes are inconsistent with the deity, the Gentiles might thence take a just pretext for giving themselves up to all sorts of wickedness . . . not believing themselves criminal, whilst they imitated their gods. This is what Ion means in a tragedy of Euripides, that bears his name.

- - - Οὐκ ἔτ' ἀνθρώπου κακῶς λέγειν δίκαιον, εἰ τὰ τῶν θεῶν κακὰ μιμῶμεθ', ἀλλὰ τὸς διδάσκοντας τὰδε (32).

Blame not the wretch, who imitates the gods,
But charge the crime on those, who set his example.

Meziriac makes this reflexion upon a passage of Ovid, where Phædra (33) observes, that incest was scrupled in the rustic time of Saturn, but that under the reign of his successor, a woman might be permitted to lie with her son-in-law. Jupiter, says she, authorises all by his marriage with his sister.

Nec quia privigno videar coitura noverca
Terruerint animos nomina vana tuos.
Ista vetus pietas, ævo moritura futuro
Rustica Saturno regna tenente, fuit.
Jupiter esse pium statuit quodcumque juvaret,
Et fas omne facit fratre marita foror

Let not the name of step-mother affright;
What now seems wrong, when Saturn reign'd was right.
Jove teaches us, whate'er we like, to prove,
And bids a sister meet a brother's love.

Ovid falls here into a very gross mistake (34), since it is certain that Saturn was married to his sister, just

(29) Id. ibid.
pag. 133.

(30) See, above,
citations 41) and
(68) of the article
CHRYSIPIUS,
the Philosopher.

(31) See M. Ar-nould, in the fifth Denonciation de Peché Philosophique, pag. 34.

(32) Meziriac
upon Ovid, pag.
419, 420.

(33) In Epist. ad
Hippolytum.

(34) Meziriac,
pag. 419, makes this observation.

education of Jupiter (c). Moreri has mentioned something of it; and this is to be found in a great many books, which school-boys have daily in their hands. I shall only speak of the eagle that brought him Nectar [E]. This particular is not so commonly known. Mr Charpentier does not faithfully relate a thing, for which he quotes Homer [F].

What the Heathens have said of Jupiter's original; seemed to me for a long time so unaccountable, that the more I thought on it, the more monstrous it appeared to me, and such, in a word, as I could not apprehend how the Philosophers could maintain it; but I have at last discovered, that they might be led into that error, by a sort of reasoning [G], the weakness whereof it was no easy thing for them to find out. They did as Jupiter was to his. One might add to the passage of Euripides, quoted by Meziriac, a hundred others of the same force. Nothing is more common in the ancient poets, than to see people, in order to excuse their crimes, maintain, that they have only imitated the gods, or that the gods have instigated them to do evil (35). But not to dissemble the truth, it must be said to the glory of the Heathens, that they did not live according to their principles. It is true, that the corruption of manners was very great among the Heathens; but many of them did not follow the example of their false gods, and preferred the ideas of virtue before so great an authority. What is strange is, that the Christians, whose system is so pure, come but a little short of the Heathens in their vices. It is a mistake to believe, that the morals of a religion answer the doctrines of the articles of faith.

[E] I shall only speak of the eagle that brought him Nectar. A woman named Moero, author of a poem intitled Memory (36), says, that Jupiter, unknown to all the gods, was bred up in a cave in the isle of Crete, by pigeons that brought him Ambrosia, and by an eagle that brought him Nectar. The Ambrosia came from the ocean, and the Nectar was drawn from a stone. Jupiter having dethroned Saturn, immortalized this eagle, and translated it into the heavens.

Νέκταρ δ' ἐν πτέρυγας μέγας αἰετὸς αἰὲν ἀρῶσσαν.

Ταυφὴν δὲ φέρεσκε [πτερῶν] Διὶ μῦθον.
Τὸν καὶ νηχέας πατέρα Κρόνον εὐρύστα Ζεὺς,
Ἀθανάτων ποινὰς καὶ ἑρῶν ἐγκάτασσαν.

Nectar verò ex saxo ingens aquila semper bauriens,
Advolans portabat consulto prudentique Jovi.
Eam viro patre Saturno Juppiter alifonus, Immortalitate donatam, in cælo habitare voluit (37).

[F] Mr Charpentier does not faithfully relate a thing for which he quotes Homer. I speak of Mr Charpentier of the French academy. He expected to harangue the king at the head of the academy, after the taking of Mons; but that prince would have no harangue at that time. That of Mr Charpentier was inserted in the Mercur Galant for the month of May, 1691. We read in it, that the king is like Homer's Jupiter, against whom all the other gods are united, and who after having upbraided them with the vanity of their design, shews them by experience, that his force is not to be shaken; and whilst they all pull against him, he lifts them up altogether with the globe of the earth. By his leave, Jupiter in Homer (38) does not put this in practice; he only boasts of it, and threatens to do it.

The other gods were not persuaded, that his boasts were well grounded: they only believed, that in a single combat he would be too hard for them. His menace appeared ridiculous to Mars, who remembered that it was not long since Neptune, Juno, and Minerva, having undertaken to seize Jupiter, and bind him, put him into a horrible fright, and had actually bound him, if Thetis had not had pity of him, and called to his relief Briareus with his hundred hands (39). If Mr Charpentier had known the satirical wit of our libel writers, he would probably have abstained from comparisons. He would have thought on Lucian.

[G] They might be led into this error, by a sort of reasoning. Let us see first of all, what Hesiod says of the genealogy of the gods (40). He begins with the Chaos; this is the first being he lays down; afterwards he brings in the earth and love: he adds, that Erebus and the Night were begotten by the Chaos and that Æther and the Day proceeded from the marriage of Erebus and Night; and that the Earth, without any marriage begot Heaven and the Sea, and afterwards being married to Heaven she produced Oceanus, Rhea, Themis, Tethys, Saturn, &c. This extraordinary fruitful marriage gave but little comfort to the earth; for Heaven, her husband, shut up all her children as they were born. She encouraged them to revenge, and did it so effectually, that Saturn with a stroke of a scythe cut off his father's nameless parts, and cast them into the sea (41). They produced a froth, from which sprung the goddess Venus. The children of Saturn and Rhea, were Vesta, Ceres, Juno, Pluto, Neptune, Jupiter (42). This is what I take from Hesiod's poem. Some other Genealogists (43) said that Æther and the Day, children of Erebus and of the Night, were the father and mother of Heaven, and had for their brothers and sisters, Love, Fraud, Fear, Labour, Envy, Destiny, Old Age, Death, Dark ness, Misery, Dreams, &c. We have seen in another place (44) how Carneades made use of this genealogy to confute the Theology of the Stoics. I shall only say now, that according to this tree of consanguinity there must have been necessarily some god, whose father was not a god; for if on one hand it had been granted to Carneades, that Heaven, Æther, the Day, Erebus, the Night, were gods, they would have denied on the other, that the Chaos, which was antecedent to all these divine beings, was a god, and consequently they were forced to say, that the gods had been made of a matter, which was not a god, and without an efficient cause which had the nature of a god. This is certainly a thought, which contradicts the most solid and the most evident notions of natural reason; nevertheless, some great Philosophers have supposed the generation of the gods, and have assigned them a cause of their being, which was not a god. 'Anaximenes omnes rerum causas infinito aëri dedit, nec deos negavit aut tunc: non tamen ab ipsis aërem factum, sed ipso ex aere ortos credidit' (45). — Anaximenes ascribed the causes of all things to the infinite air, nor did he deny, or say nothing of the gods; yet he did not believe that the air was made by them, but that they sprung from the air. By these words of St Augustin, we better understand the doctrine of Anaximenes, than by these of Cicero: 'Anaximenes aëra deum statuit, eumque gigni, esseque immensum & infinitum, & semper in motu' (46). — Anaximenes supposed the air to be god, and that it was immense and infinite, and always in motion. Cicero does not seem to have well related the opinion of this Philosopher; for since Anaximenes made the air the principle of all things, and ascribed to it immensity and infinity, we must believe, that he supposed it eternal, and unproduced, and that if he called it god under this notion, he did not believe the generation of god in that respect. When therefore he said, that the infinite air was the cause of all beings, and that the gods themselves were produced from it he did not ascribe to it the name and nature of god, in the same sense, that he ascribed it to the gods, which owed their origin and existence to the air. Perhaps he meant this: he was willing, in order to avoid all disputes about words, to give the name of god to the immense and infinite air, which he looked upon as the principle of all things; but he did not pretend, that Saturn, Rhea, Jupiter, Juno, Neptune, Minerva, and the other gods, which the Heathens adored, were that air, or had produced it: he supposed on the contrary, that that air was their principle, as well as that of other beings which compose the universe. He gave this principle a perpetual motion, from whence it may

(c) I shall say something of it in the article METEORIC.

(41) Id. ibid. ver. 130.

(42) Id. ibid. ver. 453.

(43) See Cicero de Natura Deorum lib. iii, cap. xvii.

(44) Citation (87) of the article CARNEADES.

(45) August. de Civit. Dei, lib. viii, cap. ii, pag. m. 711. See, above, citat. (15) of the article DIOGENES, of Apollonia.

(46) Cicero, de Natura Deorum, lib. i, cap. x.

(35) See the article HELENA, remark [C].

(36) Athen. lib. xv, pag. 490.

(37) Id. ibid. pag. 491.

(38) See the eighth book of the Iliad, at the beginning.

(39) Taken from Lucian, in Deor. Dialogis, pag. 173, 174. Tom. I. See Homer, Iliad. lib. i, ver. 398, & seq.

(40) Hesiod. de Deor. Generat. ver. 116.

did not believe, that any thing could be created, and acknowledged no substances wholly distinct from extension. Now when once these two hypotheses are laid down, it is almost as easy to imagine, that a subtilized matter might become a god, as to believe the soul of man to be material, as most Philosophers believed. See the remark [G]. There was in Arcadia a temple of God the Good. Pausanias conjectures that it was consecrated to Jupiter: his reason is because that epithet ought to belong by way of pre-eminence be concluded, that he took it for an immanent cause, which produced in itself infinite effects, without end; and he reckoned amongst those effects, not only the stars and meteors, plants, stones, and metals, but also the gods and men. Such a doctrine was at the bottom a meer Spinozism; for, according to this opinion, God, or the eternal and necessary being of Anaximenes, was the only substance, of which heaven and earth, the animals, &c. were but modifications. Thales perhaps was of such an opinion, who taught that water was the principle of all things (47). Perhaps he called it god on that account. This was the god he meant, when he said, that god having not been produced, was the oldest of all beings (48). He added, that the world being the work of God, was the beautifullest of all beings (49). Spinoza would acknowledge this; he does not deny that God is the cause of all things, that is to say, the immanent cause, which modifies itself a thousand different ways, from whence results what we call the world, and the whole universe in general. If Thales said also that the world is animated, and full of spirits (50), this signified perhaps, that water, the principle of all things, the unproduced god, had so modified itself, that it had formed a soul dispersed through all the bodies, and the particular spirits like the gods, which were adored by the Heathens. This would help us to comprehend, what we have seen elsewhere (51), and which is doubtless very surprizing, namely, that Thales and the other Natural Philosophers, who lived before Anaxagoras, explained the generation of the world, without interposing the direction of a divine intelligence. Thales and Anaximenes could not admit it, if they supposed, the one that water, and the other, that air was the principle of all things, a principle eternal, and unproduced; for though to avoid contention about words, they called this universal and uncreated principle, god, they could not consider it as an intelligent cause antecedently to the particular beings, which it formed since it produced them in itself, and from itself, as an immanent cause, and not as a cause external, and distinct from it's matter. But because Anaxagoras was the first (52) who acknowledged a spirit distinct from the matter of the world, a pure spirit, and unmixed with body, he must have reasoned otherwise than the Natural Philosophers his predecessors: he might say, arguing consistently, that the world had been formed by the direction of a spirit, that disentangled and put the parts of matter into order. His hypothesis admitted an intelligence antecedent to the formation of the world; the other hypotheses supposed nothing before the world, except the chaos, or water, or air, &c. And so they were to give a beginning to intelligent beings, as well as to the coarsest creatures. All things proceeded from the first principle by way of generation or production. Jupiter the greatest of the gods, Saturn his father, and Heaven his grandfather, Æther his great grand-father, and all the genealogy upwards, was a particular being, which owed it's origin, birth, and existence, to eternal and uncreated matter, the principle of all things, the chaos according to Hesiod, water according to Thales, and air according to Anaximenes. But, you will say, did not Thales acknowledge, that the gods knew the very thoughts of men (53). I answer, that we can only conclude from it, that he ascribed a vast extent of knowledge to some of the beings, which the water had produced, and which were called Jupiter, Juno, Venus, Neptune, &c. Note, that Homer, who so pompously describes the power of the gods, says, that all proceeded from the ocean.

Ὠκεανὸν τε θεῶν γένεσιν καὶ μητέρα Τηθύν.

Oceanumque Deorum parentem & matrem Tethyn (54).

The great and prodigious absurdity of those hypotheses consists in saying, that the gods, endowed with great knowledge, were formed from a principle, which knows nothing; for neither the chaos, nor the air, nor the sea, are thinking beings. How then could they be the total cause of those divine natures, which, in the system of the Poets, and of the most ancient Natural Philosophers, know so many things? but though those hypotheses be never so false and absurd, I no longer wonder, as I did, how they could be admitted by Philosophers. Most of them supposed that the soul of man was material (55). They believed therefore, that it was formed of the subtlest parts of the blood, or of the seed. Now when once this step is made, one may go a great way in a little time. Set experience aside; consult only the ideas of the Theory, and it will not appear more easy for matter received in the womb to be converted into a child, who by eating and drinking grows into a man of great understanding, than for a child to be born of a tree. From thence a Heathen thinks it possible, that at the beginning men were born either from the mud of the earth, or from some liquor dropped from heaven (56). When this seems to be possible, it is easy to go on, and to believe what the Poets did of the birth of Venus (57). It is no longer thought strange, that by the fermentation which cleared the chaos, or formed the different degrees of rarefaction and condensation in the infinite extension, the stars should begin to exist in the firmament, and the gods in heaven, as plants and animals on the globe of the earth. The common opinion of the Heathens about the divine nature made but a difference of more or less between the gods and men. Now in consequence of this, nothing hindered them from imagining, that the finest and subtlest parts of matter had constituted the gods, since those which remained massive and gross, and which as the lees and sediments of all, had composed the earth, were nevertheless converted into men. Note, that they thought, that some spirituous particles falling from heaven, were sufficient to animate these gross and terrestrial parts: hence it is that Lucretius acknowledged that living bodies have a celestial original.

Denique cœlesti sumus omnes semine oriundi
Omnibus ille idem Pater est, unde alma liquenteis Humorum guttas Mater cum Terra recepit,
Fœta parit nitidas fruges, arbutaque læta.
Et genus humanum, & parit omnia sæcla ferarum Pabula cùm præbet, quibus omnes corpora faccunt,
Et dulcem ducunt vitam, prolemque propagant.

Quapropter merito Maternum nomen adepti'st (58).

Lastly, we all spring from celestial seed:
The universal father he, from whom
When mother earth receives the watry drops,
She teems with shining fruits, and flowering herbs,
Gives birth to men and beasts, and food prepares,
By which they live, and propagate their race.
Hence does she justly claim a parent's name.

We may infer from all this that there is nothing more dangerous or contagious, than to lay down a false principle. It is a bad heaven, which though it be but small, may spoil the whole lump. One absurdity once laid down, draws after it many others. If you only err concerning the nature of the human soul; if you falsely think that it is not a substance distinct from matter; that falsity will lead you to believe that there are gods, who at first were born from fermentation, and afterwards multiplied by marriage. I cannot conclude, without observing a thing at which I am amazed. Nothing appears to me grounded upon clearer and more distinct ideas than the immateriality of every thinking being, and yet some Christian Philosophers maintain, that matter is capable of thinking (59); and they are Philosophers of great parts, and

(47) Diog. Laërt. lib. i, n. 27.

(48) Προσβύ-πτου τῶν θεῶν θεός ἀγεννητον γὰρ καλλίστου κόσ-μου ποιητὰ γὰρ θεὸς. Antiquissimum eorum cunctum que sunt, Deus; in-genitus enim.
Pulcherrimum
mundus; a Deo
enim factus est.
Id. ibid. n. 35.

(49) See the foregoing quotation.

(50) Τὸν κόσμον
ἐμψυχον καὶ δαίμονον πλά-σας. Animatum mundum se di-monibus plenum Diog. Laërt. lib.
i, n. 27. See also Aristotle, de Anima, lib. i,
cap. v.

(51) In the remark [D] of the article ANAX-AGORAS.

(52) See the same remark.

(53) Ἡρώτης
τις αὐτὸν εἶπάειν θεῶν; ἐν-θρονος ἐδύναν.
Ἄλλ' ὅδ' αὖτε
νοήσαντος ἔφη.
Interrogatus late-ret ne Deos homo male agens: ne
cogitans quidem, inquit. Laërt.
lib. i, n. 36.

(54) Homer.
Iliad. lib. xiv,
ver. 201.

(55) See Pli-narch. de Placit.
Philosoph. lib.
i, cap. iii, pag.
898, and Aristotle
in the first book de Anima.

(56) See, above, remark [B] of the article ARCHE-L AUS, the Philosopher.

(57) See, above, remark [C] of the article DIO-GENES, of Apollonia.

(58) Lucret. lib.
ii, ver. 990. To which may be added the words of Virgil, Georg.
lib. ii, ver. 345.
Tum pater omnipotens fecundis imbribus arbor Conjugis in premium læte let-centis, & omnia Magnus alis mixtus corpore factus.

(59) See, above,
remark [A] of the article DIO-GENES, of Apollonia.

(d) In the article
P E R I E R S.

(c) In the article HERCULES; citat. (13).

spent for other reasons. The French have said in one of their Opera's :

Jupiter vient sur la terre Pour la combler de bienfaits :
Il est armé du tonnerre ;
Mais c'est pour donner la paix.

That is,

*Jove comes on earth,
To heap blessings on it :
He is armed with thunder,
But 'tis to give peace.*

I know not whether they have found that notion in the monuments of antiquity that are extant.

[K] It was said that he required human sacrifices. There was scarce any temple of Jupiter, more celebrated than that which was built on mount Lycæus, in Arcadia. The tradition of the country imports (68), that he was educated upon that mountain by three nymphs, one wherof gave her name to a fountain, which had a wonderful property ; for when any long drought wafled the fruits of the earth, they never failed of a plentiful rain, provided the priest of Jupiter Lycæus threw an oaken branch upon the surface of that fountain, after the requisite prayers and sacrifices (69). There was upon the fame mountain, a court consecrated to this god, and famous for wonderful qualities ; for the men and the beasts, that went into it, cast no shade. Every body was forbidden to set his foot into it ; and if any had the boldness to go in notwithstanding the prohibition, he necessarily died before the year expired. Arcas having purified as far as that place the bear, into which his mother was metamorphosed, had been put to death with her, if Jupiter had not placed them among the stars.

(68) Pausan. lib.
viii, cap xxxviii,
pag 678.

(69) Id. itid.

Heathens had of the goodness of Jupiter, and of the other gods.

filiv cum venaretur (Arcas) inscius vidit matrem in ursa speciem converiam, quam interficere cogitans, persecutus est in Jovis Lucei templum: quo & qui accessisset, mors poena erat Arcadem lege. Itaque cum utrumque necesse esset interfici, Jupiter eorum misertus, ereptos inter sidera collocavit (70).—
Arcas, hunting in the woods, saw his mother, whom he knew not, transformed into a bear, whom, thinking to kill, he followed into the temple of Jupiter Ly-caeus, whither, by a law of the Arcadians, it was death for any one to approach. It being therefore necessary they should both be slain, Jupiter taking pity of them, snatched them away, and placed them among the stars. St Augustin informs us of what concerns the sacrificing of infants. * Nominatim exprellit (Varro) quendam Demanetum, quum gustasset de sacrificio, quod Arcades immolato puero deo suo Lycæo facere solebant, in lupum fuisse mutatum, & anno decimo in figuram propriam restitutum, ad pugillam sese exercuisse, & Olympico vicisse certamine (71).
Varro has mentioned by name one Demanetes, a boy, having tasted of the sacrifice, which the Arcadians, slaying a boy, were wont to offer to their god Lycæus, was turned into a wolf, and after ten years restored to his own form, and exercised himself at boxing, and came off victor in the Olympic game. This sacrifice had a strange effect, it metamorphosed those who tasted it, into wolves. Porphyrius (72), observes, that the custom of sacrificing men in Arcadia at the feast of the Lupercalia, remained in his time. Note, by the way, that Saturn was not the only deity that delighted in human victims (73). Jupiter his son would not degenerate in that respect.

(70) Hygin. in Astronomico,
cap. 4, pag. m.
362. See also
cap. i, pag. 357.

(71) August. de Civit. Dei, lib.
xviii, cap. xvi,
pag. m 589.

72) Porphyry.
ib. i, de non dendis Animal.

73) See the Pen- tes diverses sur
Cometes, n.
2.

[L] Jupiter

spent nine nights in the production of the Muses [L], and he applied this to a quite different subject, I mean, to the adventures of Alcmena. Authors, who have a quick and lively fancy, are subject to the like mistakes. Jupiter made love both in heaven and upon earth, he took all that came, whether goddesses or women; it was all one to him. Arnobius did not forget this, and observed that the bodies of mortal women, though transparent with respect to Jupiter, had yet sufficient charms to inspire him with a leud passion [M]. It is not improper to observe, that the ridiculous stories which the poets had vented concerning that God, served as a foundation for the Pagan religion, and that some grave men endeavoured to explain them either by allegories or by the principles of Natural Philosophy; but their labour was as ridiculous as that of the poets [N], and

(74) Hesiod, in
Theogon., ver. 135.

[L] Jupiter spent nine nights in the production of the Muses. Mnemosyne, Saturn's sister, having lain nine nights together with Jupiter her nephew, lay-in of the nine Muses upon mount Pierus (74).

Τὰς ἐν Πιερίῳ Κρονίδῃ τέκε πατρὶ μῆτις
Μνημοσύνη
Ἐννέα γὰρ οἱ νύκτας ἐμίσσετο μνηϊέτα Ζεὺς, Νόσφιν ἄν' ἀθανάτων, ἱερὸν λέχος εἰσαναβαίνων.
Ἄλλ' ὅτε δὴ ῥ' ἐνιαυτὸς ἔην, περὶ δ' ἔτραπον
ῥέει
Μηνῶν θινόνων, περὶ δ' ἤματι πολλὰ ἔτελυσθη,
'Η δ' ἔτεκ' ἑννέα κέρας ὁμόφρονας, ἥσιν δοιδὴν Μέμελεσσαι.

Quas in Pieria Saturnio peperit patri mixta
Mnemosyne
Novem enim ei noctes mixtus est prudens Jupiter, Scorsim ab immortalibus, sacrum lectum concendens.
Sed cum jam annus exactus, circumvoluta vero effent tempora
Mensium decrefcentium, diesque multi transacti effent,
Ipsa peperit novem filias concordēs, quibus carmen
Curæ est (75).

(75) Id. ibid.
ver. 53.

Begot by Jove on fair Mnemosyne.
Nine nights apart from the celestial choir,
He climb'd the sacred bed, and press'd the dame,
Who, when the year had fill'd it's circling course,
Bore the nine sisters, who preside o'er verse.

A scholiast upon Hesiod pretends that Mnemosyne was Jupiter's daughter; but it is not thus that the words of that Poet ought to be understood. We must not find in them that the Muses owed their birth to an incest so odious. The same scholiast proposes a doubt to himself: How, says he, could Hercules get fifty one sons in a night, whilst Jupiter stood in need of nine days to beget the nine Muses? he answers, that Jupiter not being ignorant, that the love of the Muses arrives slowly to it's perfection, resolved to make use of a perfect number. If this Scholiast deserves no commendation for the solidity of his thoughts, he at least deserves to be praised for his brevity upon a subject, that might have afforded an allegorist infinite observations and moral precepts.

[M] Arnobius observed that the bodies of mortal women, though transparent with respect to Jupiter, had sufficient charms to inspire him with a leud passion. Perhaps, says he, his adulteries might be tolerated, if he had minded only the goddesses; but what could he find worthy of him in human bodies? ought he not to have an aversion for those objects, which are under the skin, and which are not hid from his piercing eyes? ought not the sight to produce in him the same disgust, which the bare imagination can produce in all others (76)? 'Et tolerari forsitan male tractatio hæc posset, si eum saltem personis conjungeretur comparibus, & adulter à vobis immortalium constitueretur deum. In humanis verò corporibus quidnam queso inerat pulchritudinis, quid decoris, quod irritare, quod flectere oculos posset in se Jovis? Cu-

(76) Arnob. lib.
iv, pag. m. 142.

tes, viscera, pituita, atque omnis illa proluviæ intestinorum sub involucriis constituta: quam non modo Linceus ille penetrabili acie possit horrescere, verumetiam quivis alter sola vel cogitatione vitare (77). O egregia merces culpæ! ô digna & pretiosa dulcedo, propter quam Jupiter maximus cygnus fieret, & taurus, & candidorum procreator ovium! O egregius reward of guilt! O worthy and precious pleasure, for the sake of which the supreme Jupiter becomes a swan, a bull, and a progenitor of steezy sheep! This objection of Arnobius is a good one, and a hundred times more forcible than if a great king was censured for debauching not only princesses but also the meanest women. I shall set down what Juno told Thetis, shewing her the reason of her affection for her.

Οὐρεκεν ἐκ ἔτλης εὐνῇ Διὸς ἱεμένοιο Λέξασθαι (κείνῳ γὰρ αἰεὶ τὰδε ἔργα μέ-μλεν
'Ἢε σὺν ἀθανάταις ἢ ἐνυτῆσιν ἰαίνειν.)

Propterea quod noluisse Jovis quamquam optantis cu-bile Usurpare (quoniam hoc illi studetur opus, Ut vel æternas infomnis vel amplectatur huma-nas) (78).

Because you shunn'd th' embrace of amorous Jove,
He, who promiscuously divides his love
With mortal nymphs below, and goddesses above.

(78) Apollonius, Argon. lib. iv,
ver. 793, pag. m.
453, 454.

[N] Some grave men endeavoured to explain the stories of the Poets either allegorically, or physically; but their labour was as ridiculous as that of the Poets. We have seen in another place (79) how Cicero ridiculed the Philosopher Chrysippus, who had taken great pains to reconcile the fables of the ancient Poets with the Stoical Theology. Here is a passage that will give us a specimen of that attempt: 'Hic locus à Zenone tractatus, post à Cleanthe, & Chrysippo pluribus verbis explicatus est. Nam vetus hæc opinio Græciam opplevit, exfectum Cælum à filio Saturno; vinctum autem Saturnum ipsum à filio Jove. Physica ratio non inlegans inclusa est in impiis fabulis. Cælestem enim altissimam, æthereamque naturam; id est, igneam, quæ per sese omnia gigneret, vacare voluerunt eâ parte corporis, quæ conjunctione alterius egeret ad procreandum. Saturnum autem esse voluerunt, qui cursum, & conversionem spatiorum, ac temporum contineret . . . Saturnum autem esse appellatus, quod saturaretur annis: ex se enim natos comesset fingitur solitus, quia consumit ætas temporum spatia, annisque præteritis insatubilliter expletur. Vinctus est autem à Jove, ne immoderatos curius haberet, atque ut eum siderum vinculis alligaret (80).

— This topic was handled by Zeno, afterwards by Cleanthes, and explained at large by Chrysippus. For the old tradition obtained all over Greece, that Cælus was castrated by Saturn, and that Saturn himself was bound in chains by his son Jupiter. There is an elegant physical meaning in these prophane fables: for they intended by them, that the celestial, supreme, and æthereal, that is fiery, nature was void of that bodily part, which stands in need of the conjunction of another, in order to procreation: but by Saturn they meant that being, which contains the course and revolution of time . . . And he is called Saturn, because he is filled (saturatur) with years; he is said likewise to devour his children, because time consumes it's several periods, and is filled, without being satiated, with past years. But he is bound by Jupiter

(79) Cicero (49),
de Nat. Deorum,
lib. ii, cap. xxx.

(80) Cicero, de
Nat. Deorum,
lib. ii, cap. xxx.

and terminated very often in serious impieties. See the remark [N], where I shall speak

Jupiter, that he may not run to immoderate lengths, and that he may restrain him by the limits of the stars. This is sufficient to shew the folly of those explications. We cannot read them without pitying the Philosophers who have so ill employed their time; and if we deplore on one hand the mischievous consequences of the fictions of the Poets, and the unruly licentiousness with which they have sported upon a subject, that deserved to be reverently treated; we cannot but be diverted, on the other, with their agreeable inventions, whilst we consider them as witty conceits. But when we see some Philosophers very gravely undertake to find mysteries in these follies, we can no longer bear their extravagance: and these words may well be applied to them.

Turpe est difficiles habere nugas,
Et stultus est labor ineptiarum (81).

*'Tis labour misapply'd, and ill-judg'd toil,
When trifles only waste our time and oil.*

The greatest mischief is, that whilst they endeavoured to avoid one impiety, they fell into another; for by rejecting the gods of the Poets, animated and living gods, they brought in others destitute of life and knowledge. Cicero upbraids them with it. Hic idem (Zeno) alio loco æthera Deum dicit esse, si intelligi potest nihil sentiens Deus, qui nunquam nobis occurrit neque in precibus, neque in optatis, neque in votis. Aliis autem libris rationem quandam per omnem naturam rerum pertinentem ut divinam, esse affectam putat. Idem astris hoc idem tribuit, tum annis, mensibus, annorumque mutationibus. Cum verò Hesiodi Theogoniam interpretatur, tollit omnino usitatas perceptasque cognitiones Deorum, neque enim Jovem, neque Junonem, neque Vestam, neque quemquam qui ita appelletur, in Deorum habet numero: sed rebus inanimatis, atque mutis per quandam significationem hæc docet tributa nomina (82). — This same Philosopher (Zeno), in another place, says the æther is God; if we can suppose an insensible God, who never occurs to us in our prayers, our wishes, or our vows. But, in other books, he supposes a certain divine reason diffused through the whole nature of things. The same Philosopher ascribes the same thing to the stars, to years, months, and the changes of years. But when he would explain Hesiod's Theogony, he quite takes away the usual and received notions of the gods; for he neither allows Jupiter, nor Juno, nor Vesta; nor any so called, to be gods; but teaches, that these names are ascribed, in a certain signification, to things inanimate and mute. By these false interpretations they used men to take the sacred skies for Jupiter. Hunc Ennius nuncupat ita dicens,

Aspice hoc
Sublime candens, quem invocant omnes Jovem.

Planiusque alio loco idem,

Qui, quod in me est, execrabor hoc, quod lucet, quidquid est.

Hunc etiam Augures nostri, cum dicunt, Jove fulgente, tonante: dicunt enim celo fulgente, tonante. Euripides autem, ut multa præclare; sic hoc breviter:

Vides sublime fufum, immoderatum æthera,
Qui tenero terram circumjectu amplectitur:
Hunc summum habeto Divum: hunc perhibeto Jovem (83).

This Ennius mentions in these words:

Look up, and see
The azure vault, which we invoke as Jove.

And the same Poet more plainly in another place:

I will curse this that shines, be't what it will.

VOL. III.

This our augurs mean, when they say, Jove lightening, thundering: for they say, the heaven lightening, thundering. But Euripides, as he expresses many things excellently well, so in brief this:

*See'st thou yon wide, extended, vault of heav'n,
Which clips around this earth: 'tis the great god,
Supreme of deities, 'tis Jove himself.*

As for Juno they reduced her to the air, as Cicero informs us. Ær autem, ut Stoici disputant, interjectus inter mare, & cælum, Junonis nomine consecratur, quæ est foror & conjux Jovis, quod & similitudo est Ætheris, & cum eo summa conjunctio. Effeminarunt autem eum, Junonique tribuerunt, quod nihil est eo mollius (84). — But the air, as the Stoics pretend, diffused between the sea and the heaven, is consecrated under the name of Juno, who is the sister and wife of Jupiter, because it resembles both the Æther, and is closely united to it. But they effeminated it, and ascribed it to Juno, because there is nothing softer than air. Whatever they might say, there was no avoiding of absurdities or impieties in that system. Which I prove thus: let us ask these Philosophers some questions. You believe that Jupiter so much celebrated by the Poets; and he whom you adore in the capitol, and every where else, is that great space wherein we see so many stars; and that Juno, sister and wife of Jupiter, so jealous, so haughty, and powerful, to whom the Argivi and other nations pay so many honours, is the air that encompasses the earth, and gets into the lungs of animals, and in which the clouds, the rain, &c. are formed? but is it not evident that this celestial space, and this air, are a portion of the matter of the world, and that matter, as matter, cannot think? Do not we clearly know that the air has no more life or knowledge than snow and hail? If therefore Juno is nothing but the air, it is ridiculous to direct prayers, and offer sacrifices to her; for she hears and knows nothing, and therefore your doctrine overthrows religion; it is a material Atheism; you rob Juno of all her Divinity; you only leave her the vain and indeterminate name of a goddess; and you are more absurd than Epicurus, since you worship an illusive and imaginary name. Juno is only an instance; but Jupiter and Neptune, and all the other deities fall in the same manner, by the force of the same argument. If you say that you do not consider the air as a meer body, when you maintain that Juno is the air, explain to me, I desire you, what other notion you have of it. Do you pretend that the air is united to the goddess Juno, that she is the soul of it, that the said air is the body of the deity? But is not this to suppose, a sort of animal, of which we have no idea? Does not the notion of an animal imply a conjunction of parts, which constitute one entire continuum? Does it not exclude what we call discrete quantity? And is it not certain that the parts of the air are continually separating from one another, and that the least stone that is cast into it, makes a solution of it's continuity, which must be a very smarting wound, if the air be an animal? To what inconveniencies do you expose the Divinity of Juno, in making her the soul of the air? Does she not perpetually receive an infinite number of wounds? If you answer me that this deity is united to the air, not to be it's soul, but only to influence it, you fall into another absurdity, which is no less ridiculous, than if we should say, that a pilot is a ship, and that a rider is a horse. Will you answer, that there is a great deal of difference betwixt these things, since a pilot is not united to the ship, as Juno is to the air? Explain therefore that union, and observe how Aristotle puzzles you, when he says, it is against reason, that the air and fire should be animals; but that if they have a soul, it is an absurdity to say, they are not so. Consider well these words: Διὰ τίνα μὲν γὰρ αἰτίαν ἐν τῷ αἰέρι, ἢ ἐν τῷ πυρὶ δῶκα ἢ ψυχῇ, ἐποικίει ζῶον ἐν δὲ τοῖς μικτοῖς, καὶ τὰ τὰ βελτίων ἐν τέτοις εἶναι δοκῶσα; ἐπιζητήσετε γὰρ ἀντίς, καὶ διὰ τίνα αἰτίαν ἢ ἐν τῷ αἰέρι ψυχῇ, ἢ ἐν τοῖς ζῴοις βελτίων ἐστὶ καὶ ἀθανάτω τέρα. συμβαίνει δὲ ἀμφοτέρως ἀποτον καὶ παράλογον καὶ γὰρ τὸ λέγειν ζῶον τὸ πῦρ, ἢ τὸν αἶρα, τῶν παραλογωτέρων ἐστὶ καὶ μὴ λίγην

8 C

(81) Martial.
Epig. lxxxvi,
lib. ii.

(82) Cicero, de Natura Deor. lib.
i, cap. xiv.

(83) Id. ibid. lib.
ii, cap. xxv.

speak of those who said that Juno was the air, and Jupiter the Æther.

ἡν ἡ ψυχή ἐν ἀέρι, ἄτονον. Quam enim ob causam anima in aëre quidem vel igne si inest, non facit animal, in mistis autem facit; præsertim eum, in illis videatur esse præstantior! Quæret etiam quispiam quam ob causam anima ea, quæ est in aëre, præstabilior est ac immortalior ea, quæ in animalibus inest. Utrobique autem emergit quoddam absurdum & rationis egrediens metas, nam ignem aut aërem animal esse dicere, rationis egreditur fines, & asserere rursus animalia non esse, si inest in ipsis anima, per absurdum est sane (85). — If there be a soul in air or fire, why does it not constitute an animal, as well as in mixt nature; especially as it seems to be more excellent in them? It may likewise be asked, why that soul which is in air, is of a more excellent and lasting nature, than that which is in animals. In both cases, there is something absurd, and irrational; for to say that fire or air is an animal, is irrational, and again to assert they are not animals, if they have a soul, is certainly very absurd. Thus you find yourselves between two precipices. If Juno is the soul of the air, and if the air and she do not constitute an animal, it is an intolerable absurdity; but if they compose an animal, it is both an absurdity, and a horrible impiety. Carneades, with that strength of reason which was his peculiar talent, confuted invincibly the pretended existence of this kind of animal (86).

I shall conclude with an observation which Pausanias has furnished me with. He tells us that he disputed one day with a Sidonian in the temple of Æsculapius. That man maintained that the Phenicians were much more skilled than the Greeks, in matters relating to the deity, and in others also. They say, added he, that Æsculapius is the son of Apollo, and they do not suppose that he had a woman for his mother; for he is the air, the fountain of health, both for men and beasts. Apollo, who is the sun, is justly esteemed Æsculapius's father, since by the vicissitudes of the seasons, which his motion brings about, he makes the air healthy. Pausanias granted all this; but he maintained, that they did not belong to the Phenicians more than to the Greeks, and that it is manifest even to children, that the health of men is an effect of the sun's motion (87). Judge by this of the orthodoxy of the Heathens. Those who pretended to understand best theological doctrines, made it appear when they explained themselves clearly, that they acknowledged no other gods, besides the air, the stars, &c. This was at the bottom a true Atheism; it was to convert the necessity of nature into God. I have observed in Euripides, a passage in which Jupiter is invoked, without knowing truly what he was. He is said to govern all things justly by occult ways; but he who speaks these words, adds, that it is very difficult to know him, and that he knows not whether he be the necessity of nature, or human understanding. What a faith is this! A Spinozist would not much scruple to subscribe to it.

Ὁ γῆς ὄχημα, καὶ πῆ γῆς ἔχων ἐδραν.
Ὅς τις πῶτ' εἰ σὺ δυστάπασθαι εἰδέναι
Ζεὺς, εἴτ' ἀνάγκη φύσει, εἴτε νόσ βεστάν, Προσνέξασθαι σε, πάντα γὰρ δι' αἰθέρα βαίμων κελεύει, καὶ δίκην τὰ θνήτ' ἀγείν.

O terræ vehiculum, & in terra habens sedem,
Quicumque tandem es, impervestigabilis animis nostris
Jupiter, sive es necessitas naturæ, sive mens mortalium,
Te invoco, omnia enim per arcanam
Vadens viam ducis mortalia iuste (88).

O vehicle of earth, in earth residing,
Whoe'er thou art, being unsarchable,
Necessity of nature, or the mind
Of mortals, I invoke thee, Jupiter,
Who human actions and events dost guide,
Thou' fate's inextricable maze, aright.

JUSTINIANI (AUGUSTIN), bishop of Nebbio in the isle of Corsica, was born at Genoa in the year 1470. He became a dominican the twenty fifth of April 1487, and applied himself to his studies with so much earnestness, and under such able masters, that he became a very learned man. He understood Philosophy, Mathematics, Divinity, Greek, Hebrew, Arabic, and Chaldee. He taught in the province of Lombardy eighteen years with great advantage to his hearers; he was made bishop of Nebbio the fifteenth of November 1514, at the recommendation of cardinal Bendlino Saoli, his cousin, and received his bulls before he knew the good offices this cardinal had done him. He assisted at the council of Lateran, and opposed some articles of the Concordate agreed upon between France and the court of Rome. Nevertheless Francis I. invited him to Paris, and made him his almoner. He made use of this prelate's great skill to set up the study of the oriental tongues in the university of Paris. Justiniani finding himself so near England, took a voyage thither, and was very much caressed by Henry VIII. He collected a very fine library, and left it by his will to the republic of Genoa [A]. He made many reparations in his bishopric, and increased the revenues of it; he so beautified his cathedral church, dedicated to the Holy Virgin, that Maracci placed him among her faithful servants. He also translated into the vulgar tongue some Latin works, the reading whereof might be useful to clergy-men (a). He lost his life at sea, in passing from Genoa to the isle of Corsica, in the year 1536 (b) [B]. He was not only a learned prelate,

(a) Trasportando ancora da Latino in volgare de' libri per giuvenimento del suo Clero. Vie abbot Michael Justiniani, ubi infra, pag. 27.

(b) Taken from the abbot Michael Justiniani, gli scrittori Liguri descritti, pag. 26, & seq.

[A] He collected a very fine library, and left it by his will to the Republic of Genoa. It was especially valuable for the great number of antient manuscripts in all languages, and sciences, which he had collected with vast labour and expence. But some of them he had without any cost or pains: I mean those which Andreolo Justiniani, his grandfather, left him. It is remarkable that the republic made no advantage of this will; for those manuscripts are only to be found in the libraries of some private persons, who, to conceal their theft, have taken off from the title pages the marks of that prelate. Benche al presente non si trovi verun vestigio di essi nel Palazzo publico, ma presso diversi particolari, che, per non esser scoperti, gli han levati nel frontispizio i contrafigni di quel buon Vecchio (1).

(1) Michael Justiniani, gli scrittori Liguri descritti, pag. 28.

[B] He lost his life at sea . . . in the year 1536. The abbot Michael Justiniani (2) proves, this by the registers of dominicans of Genoa, and from the bishopric of Nebbio's being given to cardinal Jerome Doria the fifteenth of November 1536. Vossius says (3), it is not known whether Justiniani perished at sea, or fell into the hands of the pirates; that it is only certain that he was never seen since the year 1530, when he embarked to go from Genoa to his bishopric. I doubt not but he is mistaken as to the year. Paul Jovius says in general, that it was never known, whether this bishop was shipwrecked, or taken by the pirates of Barbary. In cursu fluctibus obrutus, aut a Pœnis prædonibus interceptus creditur, quum nulum siquam naufragii, aut piratarum prædæ vestigium apparuerit (4).

(87) Taken from Pausanias, lib. vii, cap. xxiii, pag. 585.

(88) Hecla, and Euripidem in Troilus, ver. 814, pag. 107.

(2) Id. lib.

(3) Vossius, de Hist. Lat. lib. iii, cap. xlv, pag. 681.

(4) Paulus Jovius, Eclog. cap. cxxi, pag. 275.

[C] The

but very laborious, as it appears by the works he composed, and by those which he caused to be printed [C]. I mention them in a remark. He designed to publish a Polyglot Bible, and the Pfalter which he printed may be looked upon as part of it. He was at great charges for the edition, and finding that he could not get his money by the sale, and that princes did not favour his design, he complained of the ingratitude of his age [D].

[C] The works he composed, and those which he caused to be published. His Precatio pietatis plena ad Deum omnipotentem composita ex duobus & septuaginta nominibus divinis Hebraicis, & Latinis cum interprete commentariis, was printed at Venice in the year 1513 in 8vo. He published there the same year Enne Platonici de immortalitate animarum deque corporum resurrectione aureus Libellus, cui titulus est Theophrastus. He published at Paris in 1520, in folio, Chalcidii viri clarissimi luculentæ Timæi Platonis Traductio, & ejusdem argutissima Explanatio; as also Victoria Porcetti adversus impios Hebræos in qua tum ex sacris litteris, tum ex dictis Talmud, ac Cabalistarum & aliorum omnium Auctorum quos Hebræi recipiunt, monstratur veritas Catholicæ fidei; moreover Rabi Mossei Egyptii Dux seu Director dubitantium aut perplexorum. He spent five years upon writing a history of Genoa, with an extreme application; but death did not permit him to put the last hand to it. It was published in the

(c) At Genoa, in folio. They pretend that his manuscript was interpolated in several places, by the person who put it to the press. Scrisse gl' Annali della sua patria, con grandissima diligenza, e ottima fedeltà i quali in molti luoghi dopo la morte di lui furono corrotti (6). This is the testimony of Francesco Zazzera, which is confirmed by George Justiniani, in an epistle dedicatory: 'Magnam profecto inde me voluptatem cepisse fateor, & in eodem plane sensu fuisse gaudeo ipsius nepotem Augustinum Justinianum, illum scilicet qui postea ad Nebensem Pontificatum evelsus, rerum nostrarum Annales orditus est, quos post ejus obitum imperitus, omnique eruditionis expertus, horridos sane & incultos, ut hodie leguntur, ex defuncti Schedis divulgavit (7). — I confess it gave me great pleasure, and I rejoice that his grandson Augustin Justiniani was of the same opinion, him I mean, who being afterwards advanced to the bishopric of Nîmes, began the history of our affairs, which, after his death, an unskillful and illiterate person published, in the rude, unpolished, manner we now read them, from the papers of the deceased.' These interpolations of the manuscript gave Paul Jovius occasion to censure this history (8); but he is in the wrong to say, that the author made too much haste in publishing it; for it was not printed till after our Justiniani's death. Paul Jovius's words are very offensive. 'Scribendæ patriæ historiæ negotium suscepit, adeo ineptis ad id ingenii viribus, ut præcipitate editionis male audiendo pœnas daret (9). — He undertook to write the history of his own country; but was so unequal to the task, that he suffered in his character by a hasty edition.' I shall speak hereafter of his Polyglot Bible. Here is a passage taken from his Life, written by himself, in which you will see a specimen of his labours: 'Hò fatto imprimere in Parigi dodici opere in utilità de Studiosi; hò tradotto più cose in materna lingua per utilità di Chierici della mia Diocefi, che sono tutti ignari di lettere: hò tradotto l'Economico di Senofonte per instructione di mia cognata, e de miei nepoti: hò descritto molto minutamente l'Isola di Corsica per utilità della patria intitolata al Principe Andrea d'Orta, e messa poi la descrizione in distinta pittura hò donato al magnifico Ufficio di S. Georgio (10). — I have caused to be printed at Paris, twelve pieces for improving youth: I have translated several things into Italian, for the benefit of the ecclesiastics of my diocefi, who are all illiterate: I have translated the economics of Xenophon, for the instruction of my sister-in-law, and of my nephews: I have made a very exact description of the island of Corsica, for the service of my country: I inscribed to the prince Andrea Doria, which description I afterwards presented to the office of St George.' The last work mentioned in these Italian words, is in the library of the Vatican. It is a manuscript.

[D] The Pfalter which he published. he complained of the ingratitude of his age. It was printed at Genoa in the year 1516, in folio, in eight columns, 'Quarum prima habet Hebræam editionem; secunda Latinam interpretationem respondentem Hebrææ de verbo ad verbum; tertia Latinam communem; quarta Græcam; quinta Arabicam; sexta paraphrasim, Sermonem quidem Chaldaeo, sed literis Hebraicis conscriptam; Septima Latinam respondentem Chaldaeo; ultima vero, id est octava, continet Scholia, hoc est annotationes sparsas & intercasas (11). — The first of which has the text in the Hebrew, word for word; the third the common Latin; the fourth the Greek; the fifth the Arabic; the sixth the Paraphrase, in Chaldee, but written in Hebrew letters; the seventh the Latin answering the Chaldee; but the last, that is the eighth, contains the Scholia, that is, scattered annotations.' The author dedicating it to Leo X, tells him, that he designs to publish the whole bible in that manner, and that he does not question to go through it, if the Pope approves it, and promotes the impression. This is the sense of these words (12). Quod si tu rem ipsam probaveris, & dignam editione duxeris, in promptu erit nobis universo operi manum extremam imponere, & utrumque instrumentum, isdem distinctum linguis, eademque serie & structura, tradere impressoribus mandandum, &c. He intimated in a letter, that he wrote to cardinal Bendinello Saoli, that all the New Testament was finished, and that the old would soon be ready, and he intreated him to get the whole work printed (13). He gave leave to Pellican, who was at Rome, in the year 1517, to transcribe the preface of his new Testament into eight languages, with the first verses of St Matthew's gospel (14). Gesner ascribes Justiniani wrote to that cardinal. He has also inserted part of that preface in his Bibliotheca. This honest prelate was at great charges for the impression of the Pfalter; he caused two thousand and fifty copies to be printed off, and presented it to all the princes of the world, Infidels as well as Christians; he caused fifty to be printed upon Vellum; he expected not only to be praised, but also to get a great deal by it; and he had already designed his gain for the relief of his relations. He hoped that the good success of this specimen would engage the prelates and the princes to be open-handed for the impression of the whole bible, but unfortunately he got nothing but praises. His Pfalter was commended, and not bought; he had much ado to sell the fourth part of the edition, and was not in a capacity of printing the rest of his work. Let us hear his complaints (16). 'Feci stampare in Genoua alle mie spese con quel travaglio, e con quella spesa, ch'ogni letterato può giudicare due mila volumi del Davidico Pfalterio in le predate cinque lingue Hebræa, Chaldaea, Græca, Latina, & Arabica, parendomi di quest' opera dover' acquistare gran laude, e non mediocre guadagno, il quale pensavo esporre in la souvenzione di certi mei parenti, ch'erano bisognosi, credendomi sempre che l'opera dovessi havere grande uscita, e che i Prelati ricchi, o Principi si dovessero muovere, e mi dovessero aiutare in la spesa di far imprimere li restante della Bibbia in quella varietà di lingue; ma la credulità mia restò ingannata, perchè l'opera fù da ciaschedun laudata, ma lassata riposare, e dormire, perchè a pena si sono venduti la quarta parte de i libri, come che l'opera sia per valent huomini, e per ingegni elevati, che sono al mondo rari, e pochi, e con stento puoi ricavar i danari, ch'aveva poste in la stampa che furono in buona quantità, perchè oltra i due mila volumi stampati in papero, ne feci imprimere cinquanta in carta vitellina, e mandai d'essi libri à tutti i Rè del Mondo, così Christiani, come Pagani.' Paul Jovius was so barbarous as not to pity his unhappy fate. Nay, he takes delight in insulting him for it, and will not allow at least, that he received the praises of the public. If we believe him, that honest bishop was at great charges, and got neither money nor glory by it (17).

(11) Gesner, in Biblioth. fol. 104, verso.

(12) August. Justin. Pref. Pfalter. apud Gesner. ibid. fol. 105, verso.

(13) In altera quoque epistola ad eundem, novum testamentum jam absolutum esse testatur, vetus autem brevi futuro paratum: & hortatur ut corret totum opus prælia excudi. Gesner. ibid.

(14) Id. ibid.

(15) Ibid.

(16) August. Justiniani, in the account of his Life, apud Lancellotti di Perugia, Hoggidi, Part. I, disgan. no. xxvii, pag. 273, 274.

(17) Gravi quidem sumpto & tenal cum laude quum impressa domi prelati volumina emptores rarissimos invenirent, sic ut temere conceptum spem lucri inanes inite rationes elasserint Jovius, ubi supra.

KECKERMAN

K

(a) Konig places his birth in the year 1571, and his death in the year 1609. Vossius, de Scient. Mathem. pag. 262, says, he lived forty two years.

KECKERMAN (BARTHOLOMEW) a native of Dantzic, was professor of Philosophy there towards the beginning of the XVIIth century. He had been before professor of the Hebrew tongue at Heidelberg. He wrote a great many books, in which he discovered more method than wit [A]. He was a Calvinist. He died in the year 1609, being thirty eight years of age (a). His books are full of Plagiarisms, and have been pillaged by the plagiaries.

[A] He wrote many books, in which he discovered more method than wit. He made systems of almost all the sciences. Here is Vossius's judgment of him. Parum idoneè judicat de eo (Diogene Laërtio) vir cæteris eruditus, sed novellorum scriptorum quam antiquitatis studiosior Bartholomæus Keckermannus. At ille libro suo de historia, scripsisse Laërtium laudat & frigidè, sæpe tamen non inutiliter. Quæ frigida profecto laus est operis utilissimi & auro contra non cari. Quippe ex quo discere sit cum alia tam multa ad historiam temporum pertinentia; tum præclara tot veterum apothegmata quorum Keckermannus, malo sanè exemplo, Erasmodum laudare mavult autorem, quam Plutarchum, Laërtium & similes (1). Bartholomæus Keckerman, otherwise a very learned man, but more conversant in modern, than ancient authors, passes a wrong judgment on Diogenes

(1) Vossius, de Histor. Græcis, pag. 223.

Laërtius. He says, in his book concerning History, that Laërtius wrote without life and spirit, but often usefully. This is in truth a cold commendation of a most useful and most valuable work. For we learn from it, not only many things relating to History, but also many famous sayings of the ancients, which Keckerman, setting an ill example, abuses rather to praise Erasmus for recording, than Plutarch, Laërtius, and such like authors.

[B] His books are full of plagiarisms, and have been pillaged by the plagiaries. I have mentioned in another place (2), the complaint of a Scotch writer, who had been pillaged by Keckerman. Another Scot (3) did just the contrary, he pillaged Keckerman, as Thomasius observes in his collection of plagiaries (4). He charged (5) some other writers with the same fault, with respect to Keckerman.

(2) In remark [B] of the article DONALDSON.
(3) Called Andrew Aldrich.
(4) Nov. 346, pag. 153.
(5) Ibid. in 354

(a) It is one of the four foreign towns.

(b) Called James Hailbrunner.

KELLER (JAMES), one of the best writers amongst the Jesuits of Germany towards the beginning of the XVIIth century, was born at Seckingen (a), in the year 1568. He became a Jesuit in the 1588, and after he had taught Classical Learning, Philosophy, Moral, and Scholastic Divinity, he was made rector of the college of Ratibon, and afterwards of that of Munich. The first of these two employments lasted two years; but he continued in the second sixteen years together. He was a long time confessor to prince Albert of Bavaria, and to the princess, his wife, and he was often consulted and employed by the elector Maximilian in important affairs. He disputed publicly with the most famous minister (b) of the duke of Neuburg; and if we may believe his brethren, he had the better of him [A]. He published some books of controversy [B], and several political pieces upon the affairs of that time. He appeared under [A] He disputed . . . with Hailbrunner, and if we may believe his brethren, he had the better of him. Alegambe and Southwell say, that James Hailbrunner found himself so pressed in that dispute, that he was almost reduced to silence, and that he fell sick the night following, or pretended to be so, that he might not be obliged to enter the lists again the next day. Tam fortiter pressus est, ut tantum non obmutuerit, morbumque reipso nocte illa contraxerit, vel ne cogeretur iterum in arenam descendere, callide simulavit (1).

(1) Alegambe & Sotuel, in Biblioth. Script. Societatis Jesu.

This conference, as to the subject, was much like that of Du Perron, and du Plessis Mornai; for it run upon the accusation brought against the Lutheran minister, of having quoted several passages of the Fathers with a thousand falsifications, in a High Dutch book, intitled, Papatus Catholicus. The conference of Keller and Hailbrunner, was held at Neuburg, in the month of June, 1615 (2), and if we may believe the Lutherans, the innocence of their minister appeared with the greatest evidence. Ex inspectione & examinatione dictorum patristicorum, innocentia Hailbrunneriana luculentur patuit. Vid. Straten. Theatrum historicum, pag. 1111. D. Dorst. in Kircher. dev. prælim. 100. usque 106 (3).

(2) Andreas Carolus, in Memor. Ecclesiast. seculi xviij, pag. 384.

(3) Id. ibid. pag. 385.

[B] He published some books of controversy. These are the titles of them: Tyrannicidium, seu scitum Catholicorum de Tyranni interfectione adversus inimicos Calviniani Ministri Calumnias in Societatem Jesu factas, at Munich, 1601, in 4to, in Latin and High Dutch.

Papatus Catholicus, seu demonstratio fundamentalis veritatis Ecclesiæ Catholicæ Romanæ contra Jacobum Hailbrunner, at Munich, 1616, in two volumes in Folio, in High-Dutch. Compendium ejusdem operis, in the same place, at the same time, in 4to. Agonia seu sudor mortualis Jacobi Hailbrunneri, hoc est refutatio Hailbrunneri qui extremam anæthem infestus fuerat scripto libro, in the same place, 1618, in 4to, in High-Dutch. Fusciculus solidus 50 fusciculorum, id est absurditas prædicantium in Colloquio (4) Ratibonensi. He took the name of Jacobus Silvianus in this work, printed in the year 1604, in 4to (5). He took the same name in a book printed at Ingolstadt, in 1607, and intitled, Philippica in anonymum quandam prædicantem qui Societatem Jesu mendacis oneravit. The writers of the Jesuits Bibliotheca, have not mentioned this book of James Keller, Placcius (6) tells us, that it was an answer to a book in High-Dutch, wherein the author had collected several passages taken from the seditious books of some Jesuits. The author of the collection confuted Keller's Philippica, in the year 1608: his answer is intitled, Anti-Philippica; it is a High-Dutch book, in which the author completed the collection of the seditious things that are to be found in the writings of the Jesuits (7). The author of these two collections was counsellor to the Elector Palatine, and his name was Michael Loeffenius (8). I have read in the third volume of the Morale Prati-que, that our Keller is the author of Cavea Tartarica. The reader will be glad to see here Mr Arnould's own words

(4) And see Collegio, as it is in Placcius, de Plac. doctum, pag. 261.
(5) Taken from Alegambe and Southwell, ubi supra.
(6) Placcius, ubi supra.
(7) Id. ibid.
(8) Decibel, de Scriptis adfectis, pag. 153.

under a disguised name, in the title of his political writings [C]. He died at Munich the twenty third of February 1631 (c).

(9) Arnould, Morale Pratique, Tom. III, pag. 112.

(10) Goussier de Vries, in Differtation de Lanca, pag. 112.

(11) Jo. Frider. Mayerus, de Fide Bellarmini suspecta, pag. 197, 198.

(12) Keller, in the Appendix Cancellariae Anabaptinae, says that this is false.

(13) Nicolas Hartlein denies it in the preface of his Responsio Apologetica to the Ajax of Fabius Hercynianus.

(14) Alegambe has mistaken that name; for he says Helfit, and that he was chancellor. Father Southwell has not corrected those two faults: he says Helfit, &c. Placcius, de Anonymis, n. 256, pag. 71, has not corrected them, and falsely places this work among the anonymous ones, not knowing that the author took the name of Fabius Hercynianus.

words: (9) Gravina . . . a learned Dominican, having complained with a great deal of modesty in his Vox Turturis, that cardinal Bellarmine had spoke sharply of the ancient orders in his book De Gemma Columbae; and having represented that it was no wonder if they had abated of their authority in the space of so many ages since their foundation: your father James Keller answered him haughtily in his book, intitled, Cavea Turturis, ch. 14. Societati Jesu non est periculum, ne post aliquot annorum centurias sibi multum dissimilis appareat. Habet enim aromata in putredine perseverantia. — The society of the Jesuits is in no danger of degenerating from itself after some centuries: it has spices and perfumes to preserve it from putrefaction.

Mr Mayer ascribes the Cavea Turturis to some other authors. His words are these. Cui (Voci Turturis) esse D. Riedelius, Ecclesiae Landshutanae Decanus, aut sub Riedelii nomine Jacobus Balde, Jesuita, Caveam Turturis opposuisset, Gravina Vocem congemmantem Turturis publico dedit, &c. (10).

[C] He appeared under a disguised name, in the title of his political writings.] The bloody war, which desolated Germany from the year 1618, to the peace of Munster, was doubtless a religious war; for the league which the Protestants formed, against which the Roman Catholics opposed a league, whereof the elector of Bavaria was the head, owed its birth to the suspicions they had conceived, that the Imperial court, animated by the Jesuits, had a mind to break the peace of Passau. The elector of Bavaria, a very able prince, would not suffer the Catholics to lie under that imputation. He caused some books to be published, in which the Protestants were accused of having confederated for pernicious designs, and particularly to oppress the Romish church. This accusation came out in the year 1621, in a book intitled, Cancellaria secreta Anabaptina, id est, Occulta Confilia, Inaudita Proposita, Periculosa adinventiones, & prodigiose Machinationes Capium ad Directionem unionis correspondentium in Germania, occasione Rebellionis Bohemicae ad ejusdem Coronae, & Imp. Rom. pernitiem agitata. Post nuperam illam, omnibus posteris memorabilem Viatorum Pragensem, 8. Novemb. 1620, in Originalibus Scripturis ac documentis Cancellariae Anabaptinae, Divina Providentia deprehensa. The Protestant princes caused this book to be refuted, which was said to have been compiled by William Jocher, counsellor to the elector of Bavaria, and by Dr Leickard.

(11) It was thought, that these princes made use, for that end of Volrad Pless, counsellor to the elector Palatine (12). Our James Keller believed it; for he consulted their consultation, in a work printed in the year 1624, and intitled; Palradi Plessii (13) Heidelbergensis olim Consilarii Ajax post oppugnatam frustra Cancellariam Anabaptinam in spemiam incumbens, five Appendix Cancellariae Anabaptinae, auctore Fabio Hercyniano J. C. Alegambe, and his continuator, knew not, that Keller had taken the name of Fabius Hercynianus in this work. He had taken it, the foregoing year, in the answer to a book, published by Lewis Camerarius, in the year 1622, and intitled, Cancellaria Hispanica: adjecta sunt Acta publica, hoc est; Scripta & Epistolae authenticae, à quibus partim infelicitas belli in Germania, partim Proscriptionis in Electorem Palatinum scopus praecipuus apparet. Adjecti sunt sub finem

Wlone Scoppiani, ex Clossio belli sacri. This work has another title after the index, viz. Viva demonstratio causarum praesentis in Germania belli religionis ergo suscepti. Keller's answer to this book of Camerarius is intitled, Litura, seu Castigatio Cancellariae Hispanicae, à Ludovico Camerario Excancellario Bohemico, Exconsiliario Heidebergensi, &c. inscripta. Auctore Fabio Hercyniano J. C. There was a new edition of it in 1624, with this title: Cancellariae Anabaptinae, pars secunda. In qua non ita pridem à quibusdam edita Cancellaria Hispanica nervose simul & lepide refutatur: tum ex quibusdam interceptis ad Gaborem literis, Hungaricorum qui sequuti sunt & adhuc durant motuum inventores seu auctores demonstrantur. Auctore Fabio Hercyniano J. C. Alegambe, and his continuator, were ignorant, that James Keller took this false name in the title of this work. They were not ignorant of it, with respect to two pieces, which were intitled: *Rhabarbarum domandae belli quam in Apologia sua prorsilavit Ludovicus Camerarius propinqua à Fabio Hercyniano J. C. anno 1625. Tabula Galileana, habescentibus Ludovici Camerarii oculis, in litura Hispanica Cancellariae male advertentibus, ad claris videndum tornatus, à Fabio Hercyniano. Aditis in fine testimonii causa, & pro tuba, & pro Rhabarbaro, ipsius Camerarii epistola anno 1625. Nicolaus Hartlein, answering the Ajax or the Appendix Cancellariae Anabaptinae, observes, that the Jesuit, who was the author of it, was very much accustomed to disguise himself. Nihil huic homini insolens esse, ut veritatem, ita nomen suum pervertere: & modo sub Aurimontii (à matre sua Golbergera) modò sub Didaci Tamias, modò sub Fabio Hercyniano (à sylva Hercynia, five Nigra, prope quam supra Basileam in oppido Seckingen natus est) nomine fallere, & his literis, J. C. quae non Jurisconsultum, ut alias, sed Jacobum Cellarium denotant, lectori imponere (14).*

As he made no scruple of perverting truth, neither did he of falsifying his name: for sometimes he disguised himself under that of Aurimontius, from his mother Golberg's sometimes under that of Didacus Tamias; and at other times that of Fabius Hercynianus, from the forest Hercynia, or the black forest, near which, above Baxil, in the town of Seckingen, he was born: he likewise imposed upon the reader by these letters J. C. which denote, not Jurisconsultus, as upon other occasions, but Jacobus Cellarius. These disguises were unknown to the two Jesuits, who compiled the Bibliothèque of the writers of their order. The same Nicolas Hartlein informs us, that James Keller was the author of the Mysteria politica (15), a work, which made a great noise (16), and which was very injurious to the court of France. But he ascribes (17) to another Jesuit a work intitled, Secreta secretorum Galileo-Turcica, the author of which had concealed himself under the name of Honestus Cogmandolus. He who answered him, in a book intitled, Secreta secretorum Turco-Papisticæ, took the false name of Justinus Justinopolitanus, instead of Ludovicus Camerarius, his true name. The contents of writers about the affairs of the time, were then more grave, than they are in this present war (18), and as vehement in their kind, as those of warlike times. At present, we see hardly any thing but scurrilous satires.

(c) Taken from Nathaniel Southwell, in the Bibl. Scriptor. Societ. Jesu, pag. 373.

(14) Nicolas Hartleinus, in Praefat. Responsionis Apologeticae, printed in 1625.

(15) Legat mysteria politica nuper à vobis, & quidem à te Jacobo Kellere (ut multorum fuit opinio) edita.

Nicolas Hartlein. Apolog. pag. 8.

In the Mercure François, Tom. XII, pag. 1662, & seq.

(16) See the Mercure François, Tom. XI, pag. 1662, & seq.

(17) Hartleinus, ubi supra, pag. 10.

(18) I write this in October, 1695.

(19) Taken from Gassendus, in Vita Tychoonis Brahe, lib. v, pag. m. 451.

(20) Id. Gassendus, pag. 456, & 459.

KEPLER (JOHN) one of the greatest Astronomers of his age, was born at Wief in the country of Wirtemberg, the twenty seventh of December 1571. He began to study Philosophy at Tubingen, in the year 1589, and two years after he studied Mathematics in the same university, under the famous Michael Mœstlin. He made so great a progress in that Science, that, in the year 1595, he wrote an excellent book, which was printed at Tubingen the year following, with this title, Prodromus Dissertationum de proportionibus orbium caelestium, deque causis colorum numeri, magnitudinis, motuumque periodicorum genuinis & propriis, &c. He had been already invited to Gratz in Stiria, to teach Mathematics (a). Tycho Brahe being settled in Bohemia, and having obtained of the emperor all sort of conveniencies to perfect Astronomy, passionately desired to have Kepler with him, and wrote to him so many letters upon this subject, that he engaged him to leave the university of Gratz, and to remove into Bohemia with his family and library, in the year 1600 (b). Kepler in this journey got a quartan ague, which lasted seven or eight months, so that he could not do Tycho Brahe all the services he was capable of. He was even not well pleased with the reservedness with which Tycho

(c) Ib. pag. 460.

(d) See the remark [F].

(e) Gassendus, ubi supra, lib. vi, pag. 471.

(f) They came out with that title.

(g) Gassendus, ibid. pag. 472.

Brahe treated him (c), for he did not communicate to him all his knowledge. And as that great Astronomer died in the year 1601, Kepler could not in that short time be very useful to him, nor improve much by him. From that time Kepler had the title of Mathematician to the Emperor all his life (d), and acquired more and more great reputation by his works [A]. The emperor Rodolphus put him upon finishing Tycho's Tables (e), which were to be called Rodolphine (f). Kepler set heartily about them; but the king's treasurers were so ill affected towards him [B], that he could not publish them till the year 1627. He died, in November 1630, at Ratibon, where he was endeavouring to get the arrears of his pension paid him (g). LEWIS KEPLER, his son, a Physician at Koningberg in Prussia, finished the impression of his father's Somnium, Lunarifve Astronomia; and he was in great fear that it would occasion his death [C]. John Kepler's opinions

[A] He acquired . . . a great reputation by his works. I shall only set down the titles of some of his books. Harmonices mundi libri V. Apologia pro sua harmonica mundi contra demonstrationem analyticam Roberti de Fluctibus. De Cometis libri tres. Ad Visitationem Paratipomena, quibus Astronomiae pars optica traditur. Epitome Astronomiae Copernicanae. Astronomia nova, seu physica coelestis tradita commentariis de motibus stellae Martis ex observationibus Tychoonis Brahe. Cibilis logarithmorum in totidem numeros rotundos. Supplementum Cibilis logarithmorum. Nova Stereometria solidorum vinariorum & Stereometriae Arithmeticae supplementum. Dioptrice. De vero natali anno Christi. Eclogae Chronicae de tempore Herodis Herodiadumque, baptismi, ministerii, passionis, mortis & resurrectionis Christi, deque tempore belli Iudaei. Tychoonis Brahe Hyperaspistes adversus Scipionis Claramontii Anti-Tychoinem in aciem productus. This is sufficient to shew, that our John Kepler was not one of those genius's who only move in a narrow sphere; his activity extended to a great many objects. See, in the text of this article, the title of the first book he published. It is the same with his Mysterium Cosmographicum, and it is that which, of all his works, he most esteemed. He was so charmed with it for some time, that he declared he would not renounce the glory of the discoveries of that book for the electorate of Saxony. Thomas Lansius in Mantissa orat. pag. 792. memorat, Keplerum aliquando à se rogatum, quem ex editis à se libris loco dignaretur praecipuo, primum dedisse Mysterium cosmographicum, testatur in illo scripto quinquaginta quatuor corporum regularium sublimis secretum tot saeculis absconditum pandi: inventum autem illud cum adhuc recens esset, tanti se fecisse, ut, si eodem tempore Saxoniae electoratus sibi dono oblatus fuisset, addita conditione, alterutrum, aut donum ut inventionem repudiandi; amplissima, & tot metallorum copias sibi provincia excidere, quam invidenda & perpetuam gloriam secum ductura inventionem carere maluerit (1). — Thomas Lansius, in Mantissa, orat. p. 792. relates, that Kepler, being asked by him, which of his works he esteemed most, gave the preference to the Mysterium Cosmographicum, affirming, that the sublime secret of the five regular bodies, hidden for so many ages, was laid open in that work; and that he set such a value on that discovery, being yet new, that, if at the same time, the electorate of Saxony were offered him, on condition of rejecting either the gift or the invention, he would prefer the immortal honour of that discovery to that large and rich country.

[B] The treasurers were so ill affected towards him. Wo to the learned, who depend on those gentlemen, and cannot perfect a work without the good humour of the Intendants of the Finances; a sort of men, who to serve their prince well, must tire his pensioners with a thousand difficulties. They leave him by that means whilst it costs him but little, the glory of being liberal. I use Gassendus's expressions, to shew Kepler's dissatisfaction. Alacriter quidem ille se accinxit; verum illae brevi, ac aliae deinceps, partim ex operis natura, partim ex tergiversatione Praefectorum aërii, subortae fuere difficultates, ut priusquam Tabulae perfectae, evalgataeque fuerint, annus saeculi XXVII. adventarit. Conquestus est certe ab annis II. ac III. configi se limis Praefectorum oculis; & cum anno IX. specimen laboris insigne, Commentaria de motibus Stellae Martis edidisset, ac Rodolphus praeter editionis impensas, perfolvi illi concessum mandasset, tum stipendiorum residua, quae inquit, ad duo millia monetæ argenteae majoris excreverant, tum alia insuper duo millia; expostulabat tamen adhuc biennio post, decreta Rodolphi in se munificentissima nullum eventum consequi, ac se incautum facere sumptus, pulsareque jam Camerae Silesiaca, jam Imperialis aërii fores (2). — He set about it with a good will; but he met with such difficulties from time to time, partly from the nature of the work, and partly from the backwardness of the treasurers, that, before the tables were completed and published, the twenty seventh year of the century was come. It is certain, he complained, from the second and third years, of the cold looks of the Financiers; and when, in the ninth year he had published a noble specimen of his works, viz. Commentaries on the motions of the planet Mars; and the emperor Rodolphus, besides the expence of the publication, had ordered the immediate payment, both of the arrears of his pension, which, he says, amounted to two thousand crowns, and of two thousand over and above; yet he complained two years after, that the bountiful orders of the emperor were fruitless, and that he knocked at the doors of the Imperial chamber, and that of Silesia, to no purpose. Kepler was no less discouraged by the Financiers under the emperor Matthias, than under Rodolphus (3). He had occasion still for his patience, under the reign of Ferdinand; but at last he received his arrears. Perseveravit adhuc querela post exactum XIX. quo Ferdinandus Mathiae successit, etiamque post XXI. quo edidit partem doctrinae Copernicanae theoricam juxta quam deductio tabularum foret: quousque optimus Imperator rebus licet nondum penitus compositis etiam vetera quae Antecessores debebant stipendia persolvit, ac ut necessarii ad maturationem editionemque operis sumptus suppeditarentur mandavit (4). — His complaints still continued after the year XIX, in which Ferdinand succeeded Matthias, and even after the year XXI, in which he published the theoretic part of the Copernican doctrine, according to which the tables were to be deduced: till at last that good emperor, tho' his affairs were yet unsettled, discharged even the debts of his predecessors, and ordered the necessary expences for completing and publishing the work to be defrayed. The payment of his pension was interrupted; for the reason why he went to Ratibon in the year 1630, was to solicit the payment of his arrears (5).

[C] LEWIS KEPLER . . . was in great fear that the publication of his father's Somnium would occasion his death. The last work that Kepler composed, was the description of the moon; he had not the satisfaction of publishing it, because he died whilst it was printing. James Bartichius, his son-in-law, and his faithful follower in Astronomical opinions, took care of the book, and continued the impression; but death interrupted it again. Lewis Kepler, the author's son, was so surprized at these accidents, that it proved a very difficult thing to persuade him to meddle with this work. He feared he should lose his life in it, as his father, and brother-in-law, had done; and his mother-in-law, John Kepler's widow, who was poor, and had many children, was obliged to use a great many intreaties and arguments to engage him to that undertaking. At last she obtained her desire. A learned Professor of Utrecht made use of these circumstances to cry down the doctrine of John Kepler concerning the world in the moon. Unum, says he, praeterire nequeo, quod spectat Selenographiae Keplerianae natales, unde jure merito male ominor Levaniae, ejusque incolis. — One thing I cannot omit, which relates to the nativity of Kepler's Selenography, whence I bode ill to Levania, and it's inhabitants. He relates the death of the author, and that of Bartichius, and then adds: Illa vero ut intellexit Ludovicus Keplerus, Johannis filius, noverca viduae inopis ac liberis onusta precibus atque erga patrum nomen affectu, vix vinci potuit ut belli

(a) Gassendus, ubi supra, lib. vi, pag. 471.

(1) Licet non inopinate Mathias Rodolphus successit, & extingui speraretur, quousque optimus Imperator rebus licet nondum penitus compositis etiam vetera quae Antecessores debebant stipendia persolvit, ac ut necessarii ad maturationem editionemque operis sumptus suppeditarentur mandavit (4).

(4) Ib. ibid.

(5) Cum . . . anno XXX. . . ad Comitia Ratibonensia, ut stipendiorum residua persolverent, se contulisset, & ex ea occasione laborio Decebris, ut cum ad David tam scriptis Berengerius, cum & estimo Eichstadius ad me scripserat, fuisset cum ea thoro extinctum, quem apothematam quendam cerebri obnitionem percrebrant. Id. pag. 472.

nions are sometimes very singular; one would think that he ascribed to the earth a soul, endowed with sense [D]. It is pretended, that he afforded very good hints to Des Cartes [E]. We may place him among those authors, who have said, that they

(6) Gerardus de Vries, in Dissertatione de Lunicolis, pag. 253, 254. It is printed with the Physiologia of Daniel Fictus, at Utrecht, 1688.

(7) Martinus Schoockius de Scepticismo, lib. iv, pag. 387, 388.

(8) Vossius, de Origine & Progressu Idolatriæ, lib. ii, cap. lxiii, sub fin. pag. m. 641.

'belli inchoatæ editioni absolvendæ manum admove-
'ret, territus (quod ipse fatetur) improvise & patris &
'affinis obitu, metuensque ne cum illis in Levantiam
'relegaretur (6). — Lewis Kepler, the son of John,
'bearing of these accidents, was hardly prevailed up-
'on by the intreaties of his mother-in-law, who was 'left a widow, poor, and burthened with children, and
'by filial affection, to finish the publication of the book,
'being alarmed (as he himself confessed) with the 'sudden death of his father and brother-in-law, and 'fearing lest, with them, he should be banished to Le'vania.' I have hardly met with any author so violent against Kepler as Schoockius; as if this great mathematician had made himself the most ridiculous man in the world, by endeavouring to apply mathematical speculations to Natural Philosophy. I do not believe, that this design can ever succeed; for the object of Mathematics, and that of Physics, are things irreconcilable: the one is a quantity, which only exists in idea, and cannot exist any other way; the other exists out of our mind, and can never be really in it. However it be, I shall set down Schoockius's words: 'Ubi Mathematicus, nemo eodem (Joban-nes Kepler) melior & subtilior, ubi vero Physicus,
'nemo eodem pejor atque ineptior, ut æpissime do-
'learn, si non ingemiscam, virum tam eximium, di-
'vinam illam Matheseos nugamentis suis Physicis adeo
'fœdè commaculasse. Quid absurdius enim vel fer-
'bricitans anus in somnio videat, quam quod terra
'ingens animal sit, quæ per montium crateres & ca-
'minos, ceu os aut nares, ventos expiret? & hoc
'tamen expresse docet, lib. 4. Harmonicæ, cap. 7.
'ubi serio quoque probare nititur, quod terra cum
'cælo sympathiam colat, & naturali instinctu siderum
'posturam cognoscat. Similiter in scripto de Motibus
'Martis fol. 173. contendit solem magnum magne-
'tem, seu magneticum corpus esse, supra proprium
'centrum diurno motu circumactum, quod secundum
'speciem quandam diffusam, omnes reliquas Planetarum
'sphaeras commoveat, & in orbem agitet. Nec sic Ke-
'plerus solum, per Matheseos imprudenter & infelici-
'ter Physicæ applicatam, in errorum præcipitum ruit;
'sed cum eo multi quoque alii quorum indicem alio
'in scripto, si Deo placerit vitam prorogare, exhi-
'bebo (7). — Where Mathematicians were concerned,
'no one excelled John Kepler; where Natural Philo'sophy, no one was so unskillful; insomuch that I have 'often lamented, that so great a man spoiled that di'vine science with his physical follies. For what greater 'absurdity could a feverish old woman dream
'of, than that the earth is a huge animal, which
'breathes out winds through the crannies and crannies
'of the mountains, as thro' a mouth and nose? Yet
'this he expressly teaches, in the fourth book of 'his Harmonica, ch. 7. in which he gravely endea'vours to prove, that the earth maintains a sympathy 'with the heavens, and perceives the position of the 'stars by instinct. In like manner, in his treatise of 'the motions of Mars he contends, that the sun is a 'large load-stone, or magnetic body, revolving by a di-
'urnal motion on it's own centre, and giving motion
'to the whole system of planets, by a certain diffused
'power. Nor has Kepler erred alone, by rashly ap'plying Mathematics to Natural Philosophy; but ma'ny others with him, a catalogue of which, if God
'grant me life, I will give in another work.'

[D] One would think that he ascribed to the earth a soul endowed with sense.] Vossius observing the absurdity of placing the earth among the gods, the earth, I say, which all the world took for a body, trampled under foot, and covered with all sorts of filth, adds, that the wiser sort were well aware of this absurdity, and said, the earth was either an animal, or part of a great animal, called the world (8).
Kepler, continues he, was not far from this opinion for he not only said, that the diurnal motion of the earth proceeds from the earth, but also, that the earth perceives beforehand the appearance of comets, that it sweats for fear of them, and that thence proceed great rains. 'Audiamus eum loquentem libro de cometis
'anni post millesimum & sexcentisimum septimum, at-
'que item duodevigesimi: Facultas mundi sublunaris
'cometam PERSENTISCIT, ET OBSTUPESCIT,

'unaque facultates cæteræ omnium rerum sublunarium.
'Ac postea: Facultas telluris, insolenti Cometæ appa'ritions CONSTERNATA, uno terrestri superficie
'loco multum exsudat vaporum, pro qualitate illius
'partis sui corporis, hinc diuturnæ pluvie, & elu-
'viones (9). — Let us hear what he says in his book (9) Id. Ibid.
'of the comets of the years 1607 and 1618: The fa'culty of the sublunary world PERCEIVES the 'coming of a comet, and is TERRIFIED, and to'gether with it the other faculties of sublunary things.
'And afterwards, the faculty of the earth, AF-
'RIGHTED at the unusual appearance of a comet,
'sweats out a large quantity of vapours from one part
'of the terrestrial surface, according to the quality of 'that part of it's body, whence proceed great rains.
'Gassendus observes, that, according to Kepler, all the 'stars are animated, and that, as animals move by means of their muscles, the earth and the planets have also muscles proportioned to their bulk, which are the instruments, by which they move. He gives the sun a most noble and active soul, and will have it, that the beams of the sun put the souls of the planets in action. 'Ad-
'noto dumtaxat Keplerum ita sidera fecisse animata,
'ac ut instrumenta motus in Animalibus sunt fibræ
'digestæ per musculos; sic censuisse illum esse
'& in Terra, & in Planetis cæteris ingenteis fibras
'aliquas pro ratione molis cujusque, per quas Anima
'vim suam motricem exercent. Censuit verò etiam,
'præter speciales Animas, & vireis, quæ insunt id
'cæteris, esse in ipso Sole Animam nobilissimam po-
'tentissimamque, quæ dum Solem circa proprium ax-
'em (à centro Mundi propterea non discedentem) cir-
'cumagat, immateriatas species (sic enim appellat) ir-
'radiando, circumfundit, quibus, Planetæ velut corres-
'pondenti, ipsi Soli circumducantur (10). — I only ob'serve, that Kepler supposed the stars to be thus animated 'and as in animals the instruments of motion are the
'fibræ digestæ thro' the muscles, so he supposed there 'were in the earth, and the other planets certain large
'fibræ, in proportion to their respective magnitudes, by 'which the soul exercises it's motive force. He believ'ed likewise, that, besides the souls and forces, which 'are in the rest, there is in the sun a most noble and 'powerful soul, which, whilst it carries the sun round
'it's own axis, keeping it thereby in the centre of 'the universe, darts all around immateriated species
'(so he calls them), which, seizing on the planets,
'whirl them round the sun.' Here is what I quote out of Mr Leibniz, and observe, that it would be pretty difficult to confute Kepler's hypothesis; for we are no more in a condition of knowing, whether the earth be animated, than a louse is of knowing, whether we are living creatures. 'Tantarum tamque
'conflantium veritatum causas dare nondum potuit
'(Keplerus) tum quod Intelligentiæ aut sympathiarum
'radiationibus inexplicatis haberet prædeditam men-
'tem, tum quod nondum illius tempore Geometria
'interior & scientia motuum eo quo nunc profecti-
'sent (11). — Kepler could not yet assign the causes
'of such great and constant truths, both because his mind
'was perplexed with intelligencies and radiations of 'sympathies, of which he could give no account, as 'also because at that time, the interior Geometry, and
'the science of motion, had not arrived to their pre'sent perfection. A louse is contented with feeding on what it draws from the surface of our bodies: it knows not whether we think, nor can it discover the secret springs that move us. Can we make more discoveries upon the question, whether the earth thinks and whether it has sensations, which, like ours, determine certain inward springs to move themselves in a certain manner?

[E] It is pretended that he afforded very good hints to Des Cartes.] Kepler, says Mr Baillet (12), had 'particularly cultivated Astronomy and Optics, and tho'
'he left many things to be discovered, or perfect'ed, yet it must be confessed, that the reading of his 'writings has not been useless to Des Cartes. In ano'ther place (13) he mentions three things, which seemed to have been common to Des Cartes and Kepler.
'The first is the knowledge of the celestial vortices,
'which it is pretended Kepler had at least a confu-
'ed idea of, as well as Jordanus Brunus. The second 'is, the explication of gravity, which Kepler gave the
'first

(10) Gassend.
Physica, Sect II,
lib. iii, cap. vi,
Oper. Tom. I,
pag. m. 655.

(11) Act. Erudit.
Lipsienf 1689,
pag. 82, 83.

(12) Vie de
Des Cartes, Tom.
I, pag. 226.

(13) In Tom. II,
p. 344. He quotes
O. G. Leibniz
Tom. I, Art.
Erditor. Lips.
Indeed Mr Leib-
niz speaks thus,
pag. 187. Cl.
Speissius . . .
notat solemne
fuisse Cartesii præterite nomina auctorum, & ex-emplum asserit mundanorum vorticum, ad quos Jordanus Brunus & Johannes Keplerus
ita digitum intenderent, ut tan-tum istud voca-bulum ipsis defuisse videretur.
... Speissius observat, that Des Cartes was content to conceal the names of authors, and be influenced in the mundane vortices, which Jordanus Brunus and John Kepler had so described that they seem to have wanted
the name.

they valued a production of the mind above a kingdom (b). Moreri has been guilty of more faults of omission than of commission [F].

* Tom. III, of the Letters, pag. 397. (14) Acta Erudit. Lips. 1689, pag. 83. (15) In Censura Philosoph. Cartesianæ, cap. viii, pag. m. 216.

first of all, by the comparison of small pieces of straw, which, by the motion of water circulating in a vessel, gather in the center. The third is the knowledge of Optics, in which Des Cartes has owned Kepler for his master in the year 1638. Here is the testimony he gave of it to Father Merenne. He says he, who accuses me of having taken the Ellipses and Hyperboles of my Dioptries from Kepler, must be ignorant or malicious. For as to the ellipses, I do not remember, that Kepler speaks of it; nor, if he does, it is, no doubt, to say, that it is not the anacastic, which he looks for. And as for the hyperbole, I remember very well, that he pretends to demonstrate, that it is not that neither, though he says, it is not very different from it. Now I leave you to judge, whether I could learn, that a thing was true, from a man, who endeavoured to prove, that it was false. Which does not hinder me from acknowledging, that Kepler was my first master in Optics, and that he knew more of it than all those that went before him. Mr Leibniz, whose words I have mentioned concerning the Vortices, says something in another place about the subject of gravity. He pretends, that we are indebted to Kepler for the cause of that Phenomenon, and he accuses Des Cartes of having made use of that excellent discovery, without ascribing the invention of it to its true author. Ipsi (Kepler) primum indicium debetur veræ causæ gravitatis, & hujus naturæ legis, à qua gravitas pendet, quod corpora rotata conantur à centro recedere per tangentem, & ideo fi in aqua festucae vel palæ innatent, rotato vase, aqua in vorticem acta, festucas densior, atque ideo fortius quam ipsæ, excussa à medio, festucas versus centrum compellit; quemadmodum ipse diserte duobus & amplius locis, in Epitome Astronomiæ exposuit; quanquam adhuc subdubitabundus, & suas ipse opes ignorans, nec satis conficius quanta inde sequerentur; tum in Physica, tum speciatim in Astronomia. Sed his deinde egregie usus est Cartesius, cui more suo autorem dissimulavit (14). — We are indebted to Kepler for the first discovery of the true cause of gravity, and the nature of that law, on which gravity depends; to wit, that bodies whirled round endeavour to recede from the centre in a tangent; and therefore, if straws swim in water, and the vessel be whirled round, the water, being driven into a vortex, and being denser than the straws, and therefore forced more strongly than them from the centre, drives the straws towards the centre; as he has expressly taught in two or more places, in his Abridgement of Astronomy; tho' still expressing his doubts, and ignorant of his own ability, nor well aware what consequences follow from thence in Natural Philosophy, and especially in Astronomy. But Des Cartes afterwards made an excellent use of this discovery, tho', according to custom, he says nothing of the author. See the bishop of Avranches (15), who cites some passages of Kepler, accusing Des Cartes of having stolen several things from this German.

[F] Moreri has been guilty of more faults of omission than of commission. The faults of the first kind will easily appear to all those, who will be at the pains of comparing his article with this; and much more, if it were compared with an article, containing those things, which I have not observed. Here are his faults of commission. I. The emperor, who succeeded Rodolphus, was not called Mathew, but Matthias. These two names are very different, and no body should have known it better than Moreri, who, as a priest, read every day his Breviary. Are not the seals of St. Mathew and St. Matthias distinct? II. He should not have said, that Kepler died about the year 1620, but in the year 1630. An error of ten years is inexcusable in speaking of a great man of our age. III. He should not say, that John Kepler is different from Lewis Kepler, he should say that Lewis Kepler was John's son. Moreri might easily have avoided the first fault, since Vossius, whom he copied, speaks thus: 'Primum Rodolphi Imperatoris, exinde MATTHIAS, tandem & Ferdinandi Cæs. Mathematicus fuit (16).'

— He was Mathematician, first to the emperor Rodolphus, then to MATTHIAS, and lastly to Ferdinand. I shall occasionally say here, that, before Kepler had that title, he had been professor at Gratz in Stiria. His engagement with Tycho Brahe had like to have been broke, because the States of Stiria did not approve of it (17). Tycho gave Kepler to understand, that he had procured him a greater salary at the court of the emperor, with the character of Mathematician to his Imperial majesty, so that the loss of his salary in Stiria ought not to stop him (18). Hereupon Kepler left the university of Gratz. The emperor Rodolphus made him his Mathematician: but he obliged him to serve Tycho as an Arithmetician (19). I find, that the emperor Matthias gave Kepler a fixed settlement at Linz, and that he ordered him a salary from the States of the Upper Austria, which was paid for sixteen years. Neque enim sibi satis esse, quod Cæsar etiam ante Imperium decrevisset idoneam, fixamque sedem Lincii; ac adjecisset exhibendam à Proceribus Austriæ super Anstanz stipendia, quibus donec res pacatiores evaderent, sustentaretur; uti & fuit illis reipsa per annos sexdecim sustentatus (20). You see the reason why Vossius, speaking of the Steurometry that was printed in 1617, calls Kepler 'Cæsaris Mathematici & illustrium Ordinum Archiducalis Austriæ supra Onasum Mathematicus (21). — Mathematician to the emperor Matthias, and the States of arch-ducal Austria, above the Onasus.' I find also, that Wallstein settled Kepler at Sagan in Silesia, and there it was that this Astronomer caused the continuation of his Ephemerides to be printed in the year 1630 (22). 'Deinceps autem anno xxx. post editas Sagani Silesiorum (ubi Dux Meckelburgi) Wulstemi (23) sedem illi tribuerat) Ephemeridas (24) ad Comitum Ratisbonensia . . . se contulit.' (25) This is only to be understood of the second part of the Ephemerides; for the first was printed at Linz, in 1617.

KERMATIAN, a sect in Arabia. See the remark [A] of the article ABUDHAHER.

KESLER (ANDREW), a Lutheran Divine, was born at Coburg in Franconia, in the year 1595. He did not follow his father's profession, which was that of a Taylor (a); he applied himself to study, and distinguished himself by his wit, and the progress he made; which was doubtless the cause that John Casimir, duke of Saxony, who had erected a famous school at Coburg, gave him a pension (b). This enabled him to maintain himself in the university of Iéna, and afterwards in that of Wittemberg. In the later, he was admitted into the faculty of Philosophy, and shewed by several theses he maintained, that he was well versed in Logic, and that he successfully employed this science in refuting the Socinians [A]. He was prevailed upon to leave

Wittemberg

[A] He was well versed in Logic, and successfully employed it in refuting the Socinians. He published a tract de principiis Logici quæ in Photinianorum librorum lectione occurrunt, containing thirteen disputations which he had maintained in the university of Wittemberg. He dedicated it to his Mæcenas prince John Casimir of Saxony. The Epistle Dedicatory is dated from Wittemberg the first of August 1621. He gave a second edition of this work in the same town, in 1624, in 4to. It is intitled, Logice Photiniane examen, seu Principiorum Logicorum quæ in Photinianorum scriptis occurrunt, Consideratio: cui præmissus est tractatus brevissimus de illegitimo Photinianorum disputandi modo, & legitima ratione pie philosophandi. A new edition Wittenberg (c), to accept of an employment (d) in the college of Coburg, and at the end of a year and half he was made pastor and superintendent of Eisfeld. He discharged this office well, and this was the reason why prince John Casimir would not permit him to accept the superintendence of all the churches of the country of Eisenach. He took his doctor's degree, and accepted an invitation to Steinfurt. He was offered the superintendence of the church: he declined it; but he readily accepted it after the misfortune he had to lose his library, when the Imperial troops sacked the town of Eisfeld in the year 1632. Beside the superintendence of the church, he had likewise at Steinfurt the direction of the college, when he was called to Coburg, to succeed the superintendent of the churches. He discharged this employ with applause. His sermons were very much followed on account of his eloquence and his doctrine. He was seized with an Apoplexy in the very pulpit (e), and died, after languishing some months, the fifteenth of May, 1643 (f). He composed some books [B], some in Latin, and others in German, only part of which have been published.

(c) Spizelius, ubi
supra, pag. 256.

(d) That of professor of Logic.

(e) Taken from Spizelius, ubi
supra, pag. 156.

(f) Henn Witte,
in Diario Biographico.

(1) At Wittenberg.

edition of it in 8vo, was published at Wittenberg in the year 1642. Michael Wendelerus, professor of Philosophy (1), prefixed to it a small preface, in which he placed among the Socinian authors Smiglecius, one of the Jesuits who have the most strongly refuted them. Kessler next attacked the Socinian Metaphysics in a work, intitled Metaphysicæ Photinianæ partis generalis examen, seu principiorum ad generalem Metaphysicæ partem pertinentium quæ in Photinianorum scriptis occurrunt, Consideratio. I have seen only the third edition of it, which is that of Wittenberg, 1648, in 8vo, but I conjecture, that the first is of the year 1623; for the Epistle Dedicatory is dated from that town the tenth of March, 1623. The Metaphysicæ Photinianæ partis specialis examen, seu principiorum ad specialem Metaphysicæ partem pertinentium quæ in Photinianorum scriptis occurrunt Consideratio appeared, if I am not mistaken, in the year 1626; for the author's Epistle Dedicatory is dated from Eisfeld the fourteenth of January of that year. I have seen only the third edition, which is that of Wittenberg, 1648, in 8vo. He attacked likewise the Physics of the Socinians: the Epistle Dedicatory of his Physicæ Photinianæ examen, seu principiorum Physicorum quæ in Photinianorum scriptis occurrunt, Consideratio is dated from Eisfeld the first of January 1628. I have seen only the edition of Wittenberg, 1656, in 8vo. There is a good deal of method and exactness in these writings.

[B] He composed several books. We see the titles of them in Spizelius's Templum Honoris referatum (2), and in Henningus Witte's Diarium Biographicum; but without any mark of the time or place of the edition. I have remedied this fault as much as I could with regard to the books, which I have mentioned in the foregoing remark. I cannot go on with regard to the rest, which are Tractatus de Consequentia: Quadrigena Discursum Philosophico-Theologicorum: Historia Epiphanicæ Dominicæ: Responsio belli ubiqueficti Laurentio Forero opposita, &c.

(2) At Pag. 160.

KILIANUS (CORNELIUS), a native of Brabant, was an excellent corrector of the press, for the space of fifty years, at Plantin's Printing-house. He did not content himself with exactly correcting the proofs of other peoples works; but he wrote some books which were esteemed [A]. He had no ill success in making Latin verses, as it appears from his Apology for the Correctors against Authors [B]. He died very old on Easter-day in 1607. Most of the things I have been speaking of will be verified in the remark, wherein I insert his epitaph [C].

(1) Athen. Belg. pag. 190.

[A] He wrote some books which were esteemed. Swertius (1) begins the list of them with these words. Scriptit Etymologicon Teutonicæ Linguae, five Dictionarium Teutonico-Latinum à Justo Lipsio laudatum. Typis Moreti 1599, in 8vo. — He wrote an Etymologicon of the Flemish tongue, or a Dictionary of Flemish and Latin, cited by Justus Lipsius. Printed for Moret, 1599, 8vo. His other works are Latin verses, and a Flemish translation of Philip de Comines, and of Lewis Guicciardin (2).

(2) Description of the Netherlands.

(3) Tom. VII, pag. 327.

(4) Pag. 203.

THE faults in books are not always to be imputed to the Printers.

[B] His apology for the correctors against authors. It is an epigram of eighteen verses, which we find in Beyerlinch's Theatrum vitæ humanæ (3). Mr Chevilier has inserted it in his Origine de l'Imprimerie de Paris (4), after having said a thing, which deserves to be mentioned. 'We will not however charge the Printers or Correctors with all the faults that are in the printed books. They have their excuse upon the authors. Faults remain sometimes in an edition through the ignorance, or negligence, of the writer, or the publisher. He gives a very incorrect copy, which is faithfully printed, and consequently with the faults of the manuscript: but it happens, that the learned, who judge without flattery, censuring what deserves it; he, who is not guilty, is accused, though the fault be entirely in the author. An excellent corrector of Plantin's press, called Cornelius Kilian, made an apology for the Correctors against the authors, who, being mistaken for want of learning and judgement, and giving incorrect copies, do nevertheless blame the innocent.'

[C] I insert his epitaph. It was made by Francis Swertius, his friend, and consists of these words: 'D. O. M. CORNELIO KILIANO Duffæo, constantis laboris, & perennis industriæ laude ornato & amato viro. L. ann. Plantin. Typographiæ correctorem fessit. Quam fideliter, perite, doctè, ipsos rogare libros elegantia, nitore, fama æternæ artis primos. Nec semper alienos tractavit, cum & suos reliquerit, Latina oratione disertus, versificatu felix, patriam quoque eloquentiam excoluit, cultumque ejus & proprietatem revocavit. Obiit ætate operibusque gravis MDCVII ipso paschatis festo (6) — To the memory of the very industrious and beloved CORNELIUS KILIANUS. He was fifty years corrector of the press to Plantin; how faithfully, skillfully, and learnedly, the elegant and beautiful editions he was concerned in sufficiently shew. Nor was he wholly conversant with other writers; since he left works of his own, being an eloquent Latinist, an happy Poet, and a restorer of the purity of his native tongue. He died full of years and works, in the year 1607, on Easter day.'

(5) Mr Chevillier, pag. 196, calls him Peter.

(6) Franc. Swertius, Athen Belg. pag. 189, 190.

KIRCHER (JOHN), a native of Tübingen in the duchy of Wirtemberg, studied with great success in the university of his country, and raised very great hopes of himself; but, having chosen another sort of life, and seeing no probability of a settlement in it, he changed the Lutheran for the Romish religion, and went into Hungary (a). This was about the year 1640. He published, according to custom, the motives of his change, to which were made several answers [A]. I can proceed no farther in my account of him; and

(a) Joh. Georgius Doricheus, Epist. Dedicat. Hodegetici Catholic.

[A] He published the motives of his change, published is intitled, Ætiologia in qua migrationis suæ ex Lutherana Synagoga in Ecclesiam Catholicam veras

VOL. III.

8 E

and I should be to blame, if I did not own it, since the learned Mr Baillet made no scruple to acknowledge, that he was ignorant of this person's adventures [B].

veras & solidas rationes succinctè exponit, & perspicuè, ac distinctè omnibus & judicandi dexteritate pollentibus ritè, accuratè & modestè considerandas proponit. It was printed at Vienna in Austria, in the year 1640, and dedicated to Emeric Loff, archbishop of Strigonia. This work turns upon these two hinges; one is, that the Lutheran religion ought to be quitted, because it has no infallible authority to direct us to judge what we ought to believe: the other is, that Popery ought to be embraced, because we find in it such an authority (1). He was confuted. Consult Mr Baillet (2) who will tell you, that John Conrad Schragmüller published an Anti-Kircher in High-Dutch in the year 1654, and that Abraham Calovius put out an Examen Anti-Kircherianum at Königsberg in Prussia, in the year 1643. He does not there mention (3) the book of John George Dorscheus, professor of Divinity at Strasburg, though it may be reckoned an Anti-Kircher. The title of it is; M. J. Kircherus devius, five Hodegeticus Catholicus, quo ostenditur M. Johannem Kircherum Tubingæ Wirtembergicæ migrationis suæ ex synagoga, quam vocat, Lutherana in Ecclesiam Catholicam institutione ivisse, non qua eundem est sed qua ita. It was printed at Strasburg in the year 1641, in 12mo, and contains two parts, the running titles whereof are 1^o. Hodeget. Cathol. Antikirch. prælim. 2^o. Hodeget. Cathol. Antikirch. Dorscheus maintains the perspicuity of the scripture, which is the foundation of the Protestant faith, and shews, on the other hand, that neither the councils, nor the decisions of the Popes, can be a good foundation of certainty. The citations take up more than half the book, and especially in the places, wherein are examined Kircher's complaints, that the Protestants impute to the Catholic church all the impertinencies of particular authors. This book of Dorscheus was answered by a German Jesuit, called Henry Wangnereck, who published an Anti-Dorscheus in the year 1653, and, in his turn, was confuted by an Anti-Wagnereck, which Balthasar Bebelius (4) published by way of Theological Thefes in the year 1682.

[B] Mr Baillet made no scruple to acknowledge, that he was ignorant of this person's adventures. As there is a good deal of wit in his confession, I will relate at large what he says (5). 'You would have no occasion to reproach me for it (6), if I could have discovered the register of his baptism or burial. Of the four German Kirchers, whom I know to have been authors, and whereof two were Jesuits, ours whose name was John, is he, whose life and employments I am least informed of. I believe, that if he had died a Lutheran, Mr Henning Witten would have done him the honour to place him in his memoirs, with so many others, who did not deserve it better than he; another of his fraternity would have made his funeral oration, or published an historical eulogy on him. Perhaps also, if Kircher, when he turned from Lutheranism to the church of Rome, had become a monk, some Bibliographer, or other curious person of his order, would have been at the pains of collecting his actions and writings, and of placing him among the famous men of his order. But I have too good an opinion of your memory, to repeat what I have told you upon this subject in the article of the Anti-Cochleus, when you was desirous to know, why the Protestant writers are generally better known to us than the Catholics, and why, among the latter, the Monks, of whatever order they be, are commonly better known than the other Catholics.'

KIRCHMAN (JOHN), famous for his works, was born at Lubec the eighteenth of January 1575. He studied in his country till he was eighteen years of age, after which he went to Francfort upon the Oder, where he spent four years, constantly attending the lectures, and avoiding the amusements and debaucheries, in which most scholars lose their time [A]. He studied afterwards in the university of Iëna, and then in that of Strasburg. He desired to travel into foreign countries; but having not sufficient means for that, he was forced to refrain his desire. He was not long under that constraint; for he was made governour to the son of a burgomaster of Luneburg, and went with him into France and Italy. He returned into Germany in the year 1602; and, being at Rostoch, he so well discovered his capacity, that he was made professor of Poetry the year following. The work he published in the year 1604, de Funeribus Romanorum, procured him the reputation of a very learned man, and contributed, perhaps, to his meeting with a good match as readily as he desired; for he had no less an inclination to increase the number of the inhabitants of the world [B], than that of his books.

[A] He avoided the amusements and debaucheries, in which most scholars lose their time. It has been a dispute for many ages, whether it be better to educate children at home, or to send them to the universities (1). There are reasons on both sides; but that which is most plausible against sending them to the universities, is the great danger of being drawn into debauchery. Studious scholars are very scarce; but those who disturb others, either by their bad example, their solicitations, or their raileries, are very numerous. See what is said of our Kircher, and of most of his schoolfellows. 'Ibidem per quadriennium fere sublitit; non cibos & potiones tantum percolando, non Charadrii viam agendo, non ludicris aliorum exagitationibus, aut lascivis Gynæcei lustrationibus se oblectando, non securilibus Lurconum nugis optimum juventutis florem pessime corrumpendo, quibus egregiis, scilicet exercitiis, deplorato & exulcerato hoc seculo, maxima (2). pro dolor! Academicorum pars dedita est; sed lectiones & disputationes publicas diligenter visitando, cum viris doctis familiariter conversando, & interdiu nocturneque bonis literis, quibus animum totum applicuerat, strenuè incumbendo (3). — He continued there almost four years, not spending his time in feasting and diversions, which is too much practised in most of our universities, but in attending public lectures and disputations, in conversing with learned men, and applying himself with the utmost diligence to his studies.'

[B] He had a great desire to increase the number of the inhabitants of the world. It is here necessary, more than in other places, to set down the very words of my author. 'Quemadmodum prole animi bonas litteras promovere studuit Kirchmannus, ita etiam prole corporis humanum genus angere apud se constituit. Quamobrem eodem anno, quo Funera Romanorum publici juris fecit, illique nominis sui funera planè exterminavit, vitæ sociam sibi elegit Virginem castissimam & pudicissimam, Emerentiam; Joachimi Schellii, Senatoris Rostochiensis prudentissimi, filiam (4). — Kirchman, as by the offspring of the mind he endeavoured to promote learning, so by the offspring of his body he resolved to increase the human race. Wherefore, the same year that he published the Funerals of the Romans, by which he immortalized his name, he took to wife a most chaste and modest lady, Emerentia, the daughter of Joachimi Schellius, a Senator of Rostoch. Here you see a man, who very much regarded the public good; he confined not his zeal to the advantage of the Republic of Letters; he laboured also for that of the state, by the procreation of children; he consecrated both his body and mind, to the benefit of mankind. The learned Helena Piscopia Cornara had very different notions; for, to shew, that she trod in the steps of Minerva, the goddess of science, who always preserved her virginity, she got herself admitted into the academy of Gli insecundi. But then the most learned Tiraguelus was

(1) Taken from Dorscheus's Hodegeticus Catholicus, pag. 1, & 329, 330.

(2) Baillet, in the first Tome of the Anti, n. 25, pag. 224, 205.

(3) Note, that he speaks of it in the 267th page of the same Tome, but not under the notion of Anti-Kircher.

(1) See Quintilian, Instit. Orat. lib. i, cap. ii, and Mr Ducler's Remarks upon the Life of Numa Pompilius, at the end, and the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, for June 1700, pag. 886.

(2) See the remark [D], citat. (12). See likewise the article ERFORT, remark [D].

(3) Jacob Stollertus, Orat. Funebri Johannis Kirchmanni, apud Witten Memor. Philol. Orator. &c. pag. 525.

(4) Professor of Divinity at Strasburg. See the Acta Eruditorum, in 1682, pag. 249, and Mr Baillet, ubi supra, pag. 268.

(5) Baillet, ubi supra, pag. 206, 207.

(6) That is, for saying nothing of that Kircher's Life or Death.

(4) Idem, Stollertus, pag. 530.

books. It was therefore very fortunate for him, to find a wife the same year that he set up for an author, especially since the wife he met with made him attain the end he aimed at; for she brought him children; besides, she lived with him with great union and concord [C]. Being looked upon as a man who educated youth well, and suffered not his boarders to commit any irregularity in his house [D], he had many scholars sent him from the other towns of Germany; and at last, when the magistrates of Lubec saw, that their school wanted a new rector, they intreated him to take upon him that employment. One of the reasons that engaged him to accept it, was, his fear of offending God, if he should refuse so lawful a request [E]. He took possession of that employment in the year 1613, and continued it all the rest of his life, with wonderful industry, though he had the mortification of being exposed to many slanders [F], under pretence, that the school visibly decayed. It is alleged that it was not his fault. He died the twentieth of March, 1643 (a). I will give a catalogue of his works [G].

(a) Taken from his Funeral Oration, pronounced by James Stalterhous, his son in law. Witten has inserted it in the Memoria Philo-sophorum, pag. 516.

(5) For Novemb. 1682, art. XII, pag. 977.

(6) Orat. Funeb. apud Witten, Memor. Philo. pag. 531.

(7) Id. ibid. pag. 530.

(8) See his article remark [C].

(9) Orat. Funeb. ubi supra, pag. 530.

(10) Utinam id fecum probe voluerent illi, qui conjugium, quod debet esse, eritatis vinculum, faciunt certamen, rixosum, quo seipsos excarnificunt, & quotidiani quasi morte molestant! Satiis istis esset, non quam matrimonio contraxisse, quam contractum tam fide deturpasse. Id. ibid. pag. 531.

(11) Est quedam fere voluptas: Exolevit lacrymis, exsuperatque dolor. Ovidius, Trist. lib. 10, Elg. iii, ver. 37.

an example to our Kirchman; for it is said, he produced every year a book and a child. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (5), on the subject of Mrs le Fevre. The following words shew, that our Kirchman was not disappointed in his good intentions. 'Quoniam vero præcipuus conjugii scopus quo Kirchmannus collimavit est procreatio liberorum. . . . etiam hunc scopum attigit, & conjugium ex benedictione divina uti jucundum, ita & lætandum habuit. Ex uxore quippe suavissima, nunc proli dolo! Vidua mœlissima, quinque liberos suscepit, filios tres & filias duas (6). — But, whereas the chief end of matrimony, at which Kirchman aimed, is the procreation of children. . . . he attained this end, and, by God's blessing, met with a wife, both agreeable and fruitful. For she brought him (though now a most disconsolate widow) five children, viz. three sons and two daughters.'

[C] They lived together with great union and concord. The funeral oration says, that for thirty seven years that their marriage lasted, they had no need of a reconciliation. 'Quod conjugium felicibus auspiciis coeptum felici etiam successu non caruit. Tanto enim amore hi conjuges se mutuo sunt complexi, tantâ concordia septem & triginta annos transegerunt, ut nunquam in gratiam redire, aut ad aram Bonæ Deæ litare necesse ipsis fuerit (7). — Which match, happily begun, proved so in the end. For they lived together thirty seven years, in such mutual affection, that they never stood in need of a reconciliation or bad occasion to sacrifice at the altar of the Bona Dea.' Pomponius Atticus had the like good fortune with his sister, and with his mother (8), but not with his wife. The author of the funeral oration pretends that this conjugal concord proceeded from this, that both the husband and the wife well understood, that it was pleasing to God and men, and that the inconveniences of marriage, great enough in themselves, ought not to be aggravated by dissensions, but rather sweetened by an agreeable conversation. Nimirum uterque ipsorum probe intellexit, Deo hominibusque gratum; si bene inter maritum & uxorem conveniat, nec conjugii molestias, alias sat graves, odiosis rixis & acerbis concertationibus cumulas, sed suavisimâ potius oblectatione, & jucundissimâ conversatione leniendas esse (9). Hereupon he makes a very pathetic wish: would to God, says he (10), that all those, who do not live well together, would consider this great truth. I do not believe this author has hit upon the true cause. This great truth is universally known; even those families, where discord reigns most, are fully convinced of it: but they are not governed by this persuasion; and I question whether the quarrelling part be not pitched upon as the least inconvenient; they would be more tormented by their discontent and antipathy, if they kept them within their breast. Scolding is like tears (11); it swages the grief, with which one is oppressed.

[D] He permitted not his boarders to commit any irregularity in his house. There are some professors so covetous, that for fear of having their boarding cried down, they are very cautious how they cross their boarders in their pleasures. Young men, to revenge themselves of the restraint they are kept under, would make their relations believe a thousand lies, in order to remove to some other place. Kirchman did not govern himself by such apprehensions. 'Non enim Bacchanalia cum convitiis suis Kirchmannus vivebat, non scyphos ad ordinem evacuat; non ad mensuras sine mensura vivebat, non noctem Baccho ut perviligem ducerent domesticis suis permittebat, quemadmodum nunc nonnulli in Academicis Professoribus & Juventutis censes, egregios scilicet! facere audimus; sed ita in omnibus se gerebat, ut studiis moribus convenienter irent; ipsiusque domesticis, adeoque omnes literis humanioribus addidit vivum haberent exemplum, ad quod vitam, mores, & res suas omnes examullum componerent (12). — For Kirchman did not revel with his boarders, did not put the glass about, did not live irregularly, did not suffer his family to sit up all night drinking, as we are informed some professors in our universities (excellent instructors of youth, truly!) do at present; but he always took care to polish the manners, as well as direct the studies, of his pupils, and to set his family, and all men of letters, a lively example of good behaviour and conduct.'

[E] He was afraid of offending God, if he should refuse so lawful a request. This is a proof of a very nice conscience. Many reasons dissuaded him from leaving Rosloch; but this is the first thing that he opposed to them. 'Contra vero ab hac parte non minus sollicite secum perpendebat divinam & legitimam vocationem, quam si contemptum repudiaret, in gravissimam Dei iram & certissimam ejus vindictam incurreret (13). I think he was too scrupulous: his call was not like that of Abraham; and he might have refused to answer it, without any danger of provoking heaven.'

[F] He was exposed to many slanders, under pretence that the school decayed. When the scholars plaid any mad tricks, the rector was blamed, and publicly censured for it. 'Statim bonus Kirchmannus cum suis Collegis vulpabat, & neglecti officii ac disciplina reus agebatur. Neque hæc cantilena in convivii, transitu, & privatis congressibus tantum à vulgo, cui neque judicium, neque veritas, identidem canebatur; verum etiam in publico sæpius Vir optimus acerbè perstringebatur ab iis, quorum officium potius fuisset, Kirchmanni & Scholæ nostræ causam agere, ipsiusque Authoritatem & existimationem, si qua à malevolis arderetur, defendere (14). He bore it patiently, and courageously despised those injurious reflexions (15). His son-in-law enlarges much upon this, and, without denying that Kirchman had his faults (16), he maintains, that the decay of the college proceeded from introducing into the town the use of domestic tutors. 'Qui primum clancularios præceptores in nostram civitatem introduxit, quis quis etiam fuerit, & quot domos tot ferè scholas in nostra urbe aperuit, hunc violentas huic Lyceo manus intulisse, & ad prosterendum primo ictu petiisse, tam confidenter assevero, ut nihil confidentius. Quid præterea accesserit, & scholæ nostræ fundamenta pendè everterit, unusquisque ipse secum reputet, in animo enim mihi non est omnia rescribere, & Camarinam, quod avertit, movere (17). — Whoever he was, that first introduced private tutors into this city, and opened in it as many schools as there are houses, I will venture to affirm, that he laid violent hands on this Lyceum, and first attempted its ruin. What farther contributed to its downfall, every one will recollect; for I have no mind to rub up old sores.'

[G] I will give a catalogue of his works. It is at the end of his funeral oration (18). Oratio funebri Amplissimo Viro, Jacobo Bordingo, Consuli Reipublicæ Lubecensis, scripta: Roskocbii 1616, in 4to. De Funeribus Romanorum libri quatuor: Hamburgi 1605, in 8vo. Lubecæ, 1623, 1637. Brunsvigæ, 1661. Francof. 1672.

(12) Orat. Funeb. pag. 533.

(13) Ibid. pag. 535.

(14) Ibid. pag. 540.

(15) Ut magni & nobilis erat animi, more magne fide latius mihi necurum canum securus excutiebatur, & ut cultem, aut muscam moleste circumstrepentem levem manu, & citra iracundiam abigimus: sic ipse perverse iudicantium calumnias nulla tristitia eludebat, pr. be. intelligens, f. plenam virum per eas quibus petiit, illustrari. Ibid.

(16) Ibid. pag. 542.

(17) Ibid.

(18) Apud Witten, pag. 553.

1672, in 8vo. Ludg. Bat. 1672, in 12mo. De ira cohibenda disputatio: Rostoch. 1611, in 4to. Oratio de vita & obitu Pauli Merulae: ibid. 1607, in 4to. & Ludg. Bat. 1672, in 12mo. Εὐχαριστικὸν, de Pacificatione Boitzenburgensi ad Legatos Ordinum Unitarum Belgii Provinciarum: Lubecæ, 1620, in 4to. Oratio de vita & obitu Georgii Stampelii, Ecclesiæ Lubecensis Superintendentis, habita: ibid. 1622, in 4to. De Annulis liber singularis: ibid. 1623, Slesvigæ, 1657.

Francof. 1672, in 8vo. Ludg. Bat. 1672, in 12mo. Rudimenta Rhetorica: Bremæ, 1652, in 12mo. Rudimenta Logica Peripatetica: Lub. 1669, & sepius in 8vo. Tabulæ Logicae & Rhetoricae: ibid. in Folio. Genetliacum Illustrissimi Principis, Adolphi Friderici, Ducis Megapolitani, Primogenito Filio scriptum: ibid. 1624, in 4to. He designed to publish a manuscript, with notes, which did not come out till 1684, by the care of his grandson (19).

(19) See the Nouv. de la Rep.
des Lettres, February, 1685, arts II.

(a) Qui cum indolem hominis viderent, animi verbis & exemplis addiderunt, ut pertenderet, atque istas literas, quæ nondum inter Christianos debitum cultum & nitorem acceperant, à barbarie vindicaret ac liberali manu afferret. Idud magno fore Reipub. literariæ bono, & sibi ornamento illustriori. Orat. Funeb. Kirstenii, apud Witten, Memor. Medicor., pag. 114.

KIRSTENIUS (PETER) professor of Physic at Upsal, and Physician extraordinary to the queen of Sweden, was born at Breslaw, the capital city of Silesia, the twenty fifth of December 1577. He learned, in his own country, Latin, Greek, a little Hebrew and Syriac, Natural Philosophy, Anatomy, and Botany; after which he went to see the universities of Leipsic, Wittemberg, and Iëna; and, having improved much in four years time, under the professors of those three universities, he travelled into the Low-Countries, and into France. He had heard say, that, in order to be eminent in the practice of Physic, it was necessary to understand Avicenna; whereupon he was very desirous to learn Arabic, for he knew that the translation of that Physician's works was very bad. He therefore applied himself to the study of Arabic, and designed to read not only Avicenna, but also Mesue, Rhafis, Abenzoar, Abukafis and Averroës. He was confirmed in this design by Scaliger and Casaubon, who thought him capable of mastering that language, to the great advantage of the Republic of Letters (a). This inclination did not retard his desire of travelling. He saw Italy, Spain, England [A], and spent seven years in his travels, before he came home again. He took his degree of doctor of Physic at Basil, being twenty four years of age. A little after his return into Silesia, he went to Iëna, and married there; afterwards he was invited by the magistrates of Breslaw, to be director of their college, and schools. A fit of sickness obliging him to quit that painful employment, which besides he was weary of, he applied himself wholly to Physic, and the study of the Arabic. Nay, he gave the preference to that language [B], and made it appear, that he was born to succeed in it. He added a great deal of piety to the practice of Physic [C]. We are not told why he removed with his family into Prussia; but that removal proved advantageous to him; for it gave him an opportunity of being admitted into chancellor Oxenstiern's house, who took him into Sweden, where he was honoured with the professorship of Physic in the university of Upsal, in the year 1636; and was also made Physician to the queen. He would have discharged much better the duties

[A] He saw Italy, Spain, and England. The funeral oration stops there, and speaks not of Kirstenius's travels in Greece and Asia. But they are mentioned in his epitaph. 'Neve huic fatis fuit tot vidisse populos Europæ celeberrimos, ni matrem olim artium permearet Græciam, & Alcurani sedem permigraret. Asian, vinolamque per Hungariam reverteret (1).'
(1) Apud Witten, Memoriæ Medicorum, pag. 122.

[B] He even gave the preference to the Arabic. For he not only bellowed on that study all the time that he stole from the practice of Physic, but also spent, upon the impression of Arabic books, all that he saved out of his gain. 'Quicquid succisivi temporis laboriosæ praxi Medicæ suffurari potuit, hoc excolendæ Arabicæ linguæ totum destinavit: adeo ut cum lingua isthæc, velut cæteræ, superiorum facultatum, ut vocant, & imprimis Medicinæ ministra esse debuisset, contra praxim Medicæ illi linguæ sæpe serviret: dum quicquid herus inde lucri redundantis abradere potuit, illud Arabicæ typographiæ adornandæ, & monumentis in illa edendis impendit (2).' His Panegyrist had reason to say, that few men make such an use of their gain. They, who have a profitable profession, are infinitely more careful to buy lands, or put their money out at interest, or to eat and drink well, than to be at the expence of printing books. 'Raro sane & laudando exemplo. Quales sunt hujus ævi mores, plerique si rem faciant, aut sœnori eam locant, aut fundis emendis, aut gulæ deputant. In publicandis ingenii monumentis sumptus facere, rem sterilem esse credunt, & quæ nihil hæredem juvet (3).' To the shame of learning, the professors of it are wholly bent on growing rich in lands and money:

(3) Ibid.

(4) Horat. Sat. II, lib. i, ver. 13.

Dives agris, dives positus in sœnore nummis (4);

and they follow this bad maxim,

Vos sapere & solos aio bene vivere, quorum
Conspicitur nitidis fundata pecunia villis (5).

Wisdom and happiness is theirs alone,
Whose wealth in villas and estates is shown.

[C] He added a great deal of piety to the practice of Physic. This would be no less a rarity, than his disinterestedness, if the common reports concerning the religion of Physicians are to be believed. It is said, that Kirstenius expected nothing from remedies, without the divine assistance, and made the success of Physic depend on the blessing of heaven. 'Auspiciis suorum laborum à pietate Christiana fecit, quam Eculapius ignorabat. Noster autem senex sciebat, virtutem herbarum & usum medendi inutilem esse sine virtute divina: itaque à Deo, cui soli est potestas summa in omnia à se creata, in ipsam vitam & mortem hominum, Medicinæ felicitatem & successum petendum esse (6).' Nay, it seems that commonly he Kirstenius did not undertake to cure his patients, till after they were reconciled to God (7). He used likewise to encourage them, by exhorting them to trust in God, who in a moment can cure the most desperate diseases, unless he thinks fit to translate his children from this vale of tears into heaven. 'Ægroti malo ex lege humanitatis indolebat, eumque bono animo esse Deoque fidere jubebat, etiam in morbo dubiæ salutis, quod cum Comico sciret, bonum animum in re mala diutius esse mali. Ægrotum jam à Medico desertum, vel solo Dei nutu facile ad sanitatem reduci posse, si Deo volenti, ipsi saluti esset. Aut ex hac calamitosa vita ad meliorem transferri (8).' He was very careful to frequent pious exercises; he began and ended the day with the reading of the Bible; and he had read that sacred book sixteen times from the beginning to the end. 'A Bibliorum lectione diem ordiens & claudens, multoties illa pervolutavit. Sedecies ab illo perlecta liberi ferunt (9).'
(10) Ibid. pag. 121.

(5) Idem, Epith. XV, lib. i, ver. 45, 46. Compare the remark (8) of the work HORSTIUS (JAMES).

(6) Orat. Funeb.

(7) Ita agere non minus Deo reconciliatis, etiam agere. Ad agendum tamen animi rectitudinem adhibere recentem quam in morbo diutius esse mali.

(8) Ibid. pag. 121.

(9) Ibid. pag. 121.

(10) Ibid. pag. 121.

[D] He

duties of his professorship, if the strength of his body had been answerable to the vigour of his mind; but he was very much worn out, and lived but till the eighth of April 1640 (b). He published several books [D]. It is said in his epitaph, that he understood twenty six languages.

[D] He published several books. The following catalogue is to be found at the end of his funeral oration (11). Decas Sacra Canticorum & Carminum Arabicorum ex aliquot MSS. cum Latina interpretatione. Bressæ, 1609. Evangelistarum quatuor ex antiquissimo Codice MSS. Arabico Casareo erute. Francof. 1609. in Folio. Tria Specimina Characterum Arabicorum, nempe Oratio Domini nostri Jesu Christi, Psalm. L. &c. ibid. 1609, in Folio. Grammatica Arabica, ibid. 1609, in Folio. Liber Secundus, de Canone Canonis à filio Sina studio, sumptibus ac typis Arabicis, quâ potuit fieri fide, ex Asiatico & Africano exemplari MSS. Casareo Arabici per partes editus, & ad verbum in Latin. translatus, notisque textum concernentibus illu- stratus, ibid. 1610, in Folio. Epistola S. Judæ ex MSS. Heidelbergensibus Arabico ad verbum translata, additis notis ex textuum Græcorum & versionis Latinæ vulgaris collatione, Bressæ, 1611, in Folio. Liber de vero usu & abusu Medicinæ, Francof. 1610. & Germanicæ, ibid. 1611, in 8vo. Oratio Introductoria in Gymnasio Uratislaviensi habita, ibid. 1611, in 4to. Notæ in Evangelium S. Matthæi, ex collatione textuum Arabicorum, Syriacorum, Egyptiacorum, Græcorum & Latinorum, Bressæ, 1612, in Folio. Ἐπιστολὴ, sive informatio Medicæ artis studiose perutili, aliquandâ in Pharmacopoliâ versaturo Caspary Peveri, edita à MSS. Petri Kirstenii. Upsaliæ, 1638, in 8vo.

(b) Taken from his Funeral Oration delivered by John Leccenius, his colleague, professor of the Civil Law. Witten has inserted it in his Memorie Medicorum.

KNOT (a) (EDWARD) an Englishman, born in Northumberland, turned Jesuit at twenty six years of age; which was in the year 1606, being already a priest. He taught a long time at Rome in the English college; afterwards he was made sub-provincial of the province of England, and, after he had exercised that employment out of the kingdom, he was sent thither to perform the functions of provincial. That employment was twice conferred upon him. He assisted in the quality of provincial at the general assembly of the order held at Rome in the year 1646, and was elected Definitor. He died at London the fourteenth of January, in 1656 (b). Alegambe placed, among the works of this Jesuit, a piece which concerns the hierarchy [A], and displeased the bishops. Southwell has left it out. We shall see in one of the remarks his catalogue of the books of Edward Knot [B].

(a) Vero nomine Mathias Wilfons. Sotuel, ubi infra.

(b) Sotuel, in Bibl. Script. Soc. Jesu, pag. 185.

[A] Alegambe has placed, among his works, a piece, which concerns the hierarchy. Alegambe speaks thus. Scriptis doctissimum libellum, qui sub nomine Nicolai Smithei est editus hac epigraphæ, Modesta & brevis discussio aliquarum assertionum D. Douais Kellisoni, quas in suo de Ecclesiastica Hierarchia tractatu probare conatur, ex Anglico in Latinum à Georgio Wrighto conversa, & plurimis Doctorum atque adeo Catholicarum Universitatum suffragiis approbata (1).

— He wrote a very learned piece, which was published under the name of Nicolas Smith, with this title; A modest and short Examination of some Assertions of Dr Kellison, which he endeavours to prove in his Treatise of the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, translated out of English into Latin by George Wright, and approved by several doctors and Catholic universities. This book was printed at Antwerp, in the year 1631, in 12mo. I am satisfied, that most of my readers will be pleased to find here the occasion and progress of this hierarchical dispute. You must know then, that Richard Smith, bishop of Chalcedon, having received the authority of an ordinary over the Catholics of England, in the year 1626, went into that island a little after. He undertook to extend his jurisdiction over the Jesuits, and the other Regulars; but he met with so many obstacles, that he was obliged to desist, and to return into France. They perceived, that the charities, which were bestowed upon this prelate, that he might keep up the dignity of his character, came no longer to them, which did not please them; therefore they formed a party so artfully, that they obliged the bishop to retire. This retreat was quickly followed by a furious paper-war. The first that entered the lists, was Dr Kellison, professor at Douay; he wrote in defence of the bishop's authority. Knot, provincial of the Jesuits, answered him under the name of Nicolas Smith (2). A little after, a book came out upon this subject (3), the author whereof took the name of Daniel à Jesu, though his name was John Floyd. He was a Jesuit, professor at St Omer. The archbishop of Paris censured the books of both these Jesuits: the Sorbonne, and the general assembly of the clergy of France, did the same: (4) Which was so far from stopping the mouths of the Jesuits, that it engaged them to reprint their books in the Latin tongue, with great approbations. They published also a remonstrance against the bishop of Chalcedon, in the name of the Catholics of England. The secular clergy published, the same year, 1631, three pieces, in England (5), in opposition to the Jesuits, who were so far from quitting the field by reason of the number of their enemies, that they began a fresh combat against both the Sorbonne doctors, and the French clergy, under the feigned name of Hermannus Loemelius, whose chief author was the above-named Jesuit Floyd, with the assistance of his brethren, as the diversity of the style shews. And another book came out against the faculty of Paris, in vindication of Knot, or Nicolas Smith, with many approbations of bishops, universities, and private doctors, and in vindication of the propositions of Ireland, which had been likewise censured at Paris. Another book came forth, under the name of Edmondus Ursulanus, whose true name was Macmahone, prior of the Franciscan convent in Louvain. About the same time the Jesuits published their censure (6) of the Apostolical Creed, in imitation of the censures, at Paris, against their doctrines (as though their doctrines were as certain as that, and themselves as infallible as the apostles:) wherein they charge the bishops, their enemies, with reviving old heresies, and broaching new ones. The Jesuits, having now done such great things, triumph unreasonably in all places, as having utterly overthrown their enemies, and beaten them out of the field: when, in a little time after, Hallier and Le Maître, two doctors of the Sorbonne, undertake the quarrel against them; but none was so highly magnified, and infinitely applauded by the French clergy, as a person under the disguised name of Petrus Aurelius; whose achievements in this kind they celebrated, next to those of the Pucelle d'Orleans, and printed all these works together at their own charge: and wrote a high eulogium of him, which is prefixed to them. The secular clergy of England sent him a letter of congratulation on his triumphs, subscribed by John Colleton, dean of the chapter, and Edmond Dutton, secretary; wherein they sadly lament the discords that have been among them here, and the heresies broached by their adversaries, occasioned by them. The main of this controversy related to the dignity, necessity, and jurisdiction of the episcopal order; as appears by the censures of the bishops of France, and by Aurelius, who says, "that although the dispute began on occasion of the bishop of Chalcedon, and the English clergy, yet it was now carried farther, to wit, whether the episcopal order was necessary to the being of a particular church? whether it was by divine right, or no? whether confirmation might be given without bishops? whether the episcopal order was more perfect than the monastical? whether the regulars were under the jurisdiction of bishops (7)?"

[B] We shall see . . . Alegambe's catalogue of the books of Edward Knot. Mercy and Truth; or, Charity maintained by Catholics. It is a book printed & seq.

(6) See, above, remark [A], of the article GE-DICUS.

* Petri Aurelii, Opera, Tom. I, pag. 62.

(7) Taken from a book of Dr Stillington, intitled, A Discourse concerning the idolatry practised in the Church of Rome. London, 1676, pag. 427, & seq. See also the Letters, intitled, Les Imaginaires, letter iii, pag. m. 499.

(11) Apud Witten, ubi supra, pag. 124.

(1) Alegambe, Biblioth. Script. Societ. Jesu, pag. 99.

DISPUTE concerning episcopal jurisdiction between the Jesuits and the other Catholics.

(2) A Jesuit, who was lately dead.

(3) Intituled, Apologia S. Sedis Apostolicæ quod modum procedendi circa regem Catholicorum in Angliâ, 1631, in 8vo. Alegambe, pag. 242, mentions it; but Southwell says nothing of it.

(4) Stillington, ubi infra, citat. (7), pag. 394.

(5) Idem, pag. 394, 395, 396.

at St Omer, in 1634, in 4to, against Dr Potter, who had charged the church of Rome with want of charity, in maintaining, that Protestantism destroyeth salvation. Christianity maintained, against the reply of Chillingworth, at St Omer, in 1638, in 4to. A Direction to be observed by N. N. (i. e. Chillingworth), at London, 1636, in 8vo. Infidelity Unmasked: or, the confuta-

tion of a book of Mr Chillingworth, intituled, The Religion of Protestants, a safe way to salvation, at Ghent, 1652, in 4to. His Monita utilissima pro patribus Missionis Anglicanae (8), have not been printed. We may easily guess, that some political reasons hindered the publication of this last book.

(3) See Nathan, Southwell, page 185.

KNOX (JOHN) a Scotch minister, was one of the principal instruments in the work of the Reformation, in his own country, in the XVIth century. He had been a disciple of John Major, one of the subtlest schoolmen of that time; whose steps he followed so successfully, in teaching school Divinity, that, in some things, he was more subtle than he; but, having examined St Jerom's and St Augustin's books, he quite altered his taste, betook himself to a plain and solid Theology, discovered abundance of errors, and published a confession of faith, which made him pass for a Heretic. He was imprisoned [A]; and, had he not fortunately escaped, he had died upon the scaffold. He retired into England, where he was so much esteemed by king Edward, that he might have been made a bishop: but he was extremely angry when they offered him a bishopric; he rejected it as a thing, that favoured too much of Antichristianism [B]. After the death of that prince, he left England, that he might not fall into the hands of the persecutors, and retired to Francfort, and afterwards to Geneva, where he preached to the refugees of his country, and entered into a strict friendship with John Calvin. He returned into Scotland in the year 1559, and laboured to establish the Protestant doctrines with an extraordinary zeal, both by word of mouth and in writing. His enemies having expelled him from Edinburgh, he retired to St Andrews, where the devil raised him many enemies, and especially when he opposed certain persons, who conspired against the royal majesty (a). The news of the Paris massacre overwhelmed him with grief; but he quickly found himself comforted by the success of affairs in Scotland. The banished were recalled to Edinburgh and he among the rest (b), where he resumed the functions of the ministry. They granted him the colleague he desired, and he installed him, the ninth of November 1572, and this was the last sermon that he preached. He fell sick a little after, and, till the twenty fourth of November following, which was the day of his death, he was altogether taken up with pious discourses to his wife, his servant, and those who visited him (c). He lived fifty seven years (d). Nothing can be more abusive, than what Moreri says of our John Knox, from Spondanus. Those passages have been left out in the Dutch editions. The misfortune is, that the episcopal clergy of England agree with the Popish authors

(a) Quo ut primum venit multos illi Satanas excitavit hostes, praesertim cum se illis qui contra regiam majestatem conspirant opposuisset. Melch. Adam. in Vit. Theol. Exter. pag. 138.

(b) It does not appear, that Beza knew he had been expelled from thence.

(c) Taken from his Life in Melchior Adam, ubi supra.

(d) Beza, in Iconibus.

[A] He was imprisoned.] Melchior Adam gives us here but a lame account, and in some things contrary to that of Beza. Let us rectify it, and say, that John Knox, not being contented with renouncing the school divinity, but having also very freely censured several other things, was forced to leave Edinburgh, and escape to Hamelton, the only sanctuary of the faithful at that time (1). He there (2) published a confession of faith, the consequence whereof was, that David Beaton, archbishop of St Andrews, caused him to be condemned for contumacy, as a Heretic, and degraded him from the priesthood (3), and that he would have been assassinated, had not a Scotch gentleman saved him. Great revolutions followed. This archbishop, who was also a cardinal, was killed: the French made themselves masters of the fortrefs of St Andrews: Knox fell into their hands, and obtained his deliverance, and betook himself to Berwick, an English town on the borders of Scotland. He there disputed, according to Beza, with the bishop of that place (4) illius civitatis pseud-Episcopo: their dispute was referred to the parliament of England, who adjudged the victory to Knox. 'Utroque ad supremum Angliae senatum rejecto, (tum autem Eduardus regnare coeperat) tantum effecit ut victoria penes veritatem stante, damneretur quidem 'falsae religionis pseud-episcopus, ipsum vero tum pietas, tum diligentia magnopere commendaret (5).' I cannot tell whether this dispute was not the same with that which happened to John Knox in the diocese of Durham. He was obliged to speak his thoughts concerning the mass, and he exposed, in a sermon, with so much strength, the blasphemy and idolatry of that sacrifice, that bishop Tontal, and his doctors, could give him no good answer. I suspect they have made two events of one. However, here is the proof of what I have said concerning this sermon. 'Specimen ejus illustre depositum tum alias, tum anno 1550, in terra Dunelmensi: quando coactus coram Episcopo Tontali & ejus doctoribus super Missa Pontificia opinionem suam exponere: pro concione illius idololatrias & horrendas blasphemias tam solidis argumentis demonstravit, ut adversarii, quod vere opponentes, non

'haberent (6).' Perhaps, Knox's life (7), which I have not by me, if consulted, would clear this matter. We shall, in the next place, see what the king did for him.

[B] He might have been made a bishop; but he rejected it as a thing, that favoured too much of Antichristianism.] His zeal against the hierarchy appeared upon that occasion, for this we find in Melchior Adam, at the 137th page of the lives of foreign divines. 'Cum Episcopus de Regis voluntate Cnox esset oblatu, indignabundus Cnoxus non solum honorem recusavit, sed etiam Oratione gravi titulos illos improbat, vit, quasi regni Antichristiani quiddam redolentes. His refusal of such an office is very much praised by Beza, who, doubtless, whatever some modern ministers may say of it, was fully persuaded, with his colleagues, that the equality of pastors is of divine right, and that therefore the ecclesiastical hierarchy is a fundamental corruption. Here are some sharp strokes of Beza against episcopacy. 'Inde Novocastrum ac deinceps Londinum ad Regem accito (Knox) quum Episcopus quidam offerretur, tantum abest ut illum receperit, ut etiam in totam illam verè Satanicam potestatem graviter sit invehens, ut quæ divino jure nullo nitatur, ac ne ex veteribus quidem canonibus administraretur: qua in re, etsi non obtinuit (quod si in Anglia & alibi factum esset, id est si causa illa Tyrannidis omnis Ecclesiasticae præcipua & primaria esset sublata, longè alia facies Ecclesiarum esset) conscientiam tamen suam singulari cum Christianæ Modestiae exemplo liberavit (8). — Knox, being sent for by the king to Newcastle, and afterwards to London, and being offered a certain bishopric, was so far from accepting it, that he inveighed heavily against degrees of episcopal all that truly diabolical power, as not founded on divinely right, nor even supported by the ancient canons: in which though he did not prevail (which if it were brought about in England, and elsewhere, that is, if that principal cause of ecclesiastical tyranny, were taken away, the church would wear a quite different face) yet he discharged his conscience with a singular instance of Christian modesty.'

[C] The

(6) Melch. Adam. ubi supra, pag. 142.

(7) Written by Thomas Storer.

(8) Beza, in Iconibus. A little after he has these words: Non veram tantum doctrinam, sed etiam veram & ad divini verbi normam certum disciplinam pulchrum tum verbis, tum re ipsa statuerit. . . . Sibi non in ulla gradu pseud-Episcopatus tyrannide cui merito fuit inimicissimus, sed in Evangelico ministerio una cum reliquis Collegis & Professoribus æquo procius jure administrando, Joannem Londinium successorem designatum amplexus. . . . He disapproved not only true doctrine, but even true ecclesiastical discipline, both in words and fact. . . . Beza, for by the king to Newcastle, and afterwards to London, and being offered a certain bishopric, was so far from accepting it, that he inveighed heavily against degrees of episcopal tyranny, and rightly disapproved his modesty.

(1) Hameltonum unicum tunc piorum asylum per fugere coegerunt Beza, in Iconibus.

(2) And not at Edinburgh, as Melchior Adam affirms, in Vitæ Theol. Exter. pag. 137.

(3) Melchior Adam is guilty of a considerable omission, in not saying, that Knox was a priest.

(4) Berwick is not an episcopal town: Beza expresses himself wrong.

(5) Beza, ubi supra.

thors in aspersing him as an apostle, who established his reformation by fire and sword [C], and who taught the most seditious doctrines [D]. I have not been able to verify by the reading of his works, whether all that is imputed to him be true: but when I consider the answers that are made for him [E], I cannot doubt, but that his opinions concerning

[C] The bishops of England agree with the Papists, in aspersing him as an apostle, who established his reformation by fire and sword. Spondanus, having said that Knox, an apostate priest and Monk, a corrupter of many women, and even of his mother-in-law, and a Magician, was returned into Scotland with full instructions from Calvin, in the year 1559, adds what follows. 'Adeo prædicationibus suis & invecivis rem auxit, ut non solum passim templa & monasteria destructa fuerint, sacra conculcata, imagines confractæ, ornamenta & bona expilata, exturbati monachi, sacerdotes pulsi, Episcopi ejecti; verum etiam omnis obedientia Regenti renunciata, omnisque auctoritas abrogata, & in quorundam, quos tanquam consiliarios eligebant, translata (9). — He so far prevailed

(9) Spondanus, ad ann. 1559, n. 30, pag. 587.

(10) Ad ann. 1567, n. 3, pag. 690.

(11) Idem, Spon. ad ann. 1539, n. 7, pag. 456.

(12) Joannes Brexleius Sacerdos Anglus in Apologia Protestantium pro Romana Ecclesia, Tract. III, sec. ii, pag. 623, 624.

* Vide Holinsheadi magnam Chron. ultimæ editionis, pag. 340, initio § fine; & Bancrofti in lib. Propositiones, Sc. pag. 15, ante medium, ubi ait: Hortens illa Card. & Archiepiscopi Sancti Andree, quippe qui & ante fuerat & tunc erat præfractus (novi scilicet Evangelii) adversarius, & ejus cædes anno 1545 perpetrata, nuper scripto defenditur, tanquam facinus pium, aliique ad paria facinora audendum excitantur per Knoxium in Historia Scotiæ, pag. 187. — The horrid murder of the cardinal and archbishop of St Andrews, a zealous adversary of the new Gospel, perpetrated in the year 1545, has been lately defended in writing at a pious action, and others are exhorted to the same attempts by Knox, in his History of Scotland.

† Holinsheadus, ubi supra, pag. 366, b. lin. 14, 15, &c.

by his sermons and invecivies, that not only churches and monasteries were demolished in many places, images broken to pieces, ornaments destroyed, the Monks, priests, and bishops driven out; but all obedience to the Regent renounced, all authority abrogated, and vested in certain persons, whom he pitched upon as his counsellors. He says in another place (10), relating the different opinions of those, who voted concerning the destiny of queen Mary Stuart, that some, by Knox's advice, were for putting her immediately to death. Lastly, he says, that king James recommended it to his son not to read Buchanan's libels, nor Knox's chronicle, but on the contrary to punish severely such as kept those pernicious books, and to suppose, according to the doctrine of Pythagoras, that the souls of those seditious authors were transmigrated into the bodies of such as read them, or maintained their opinions, and that therefore they deserved the same punishment, as would be justly inflicted upon those authors, if they were raised from the dead. 'Haud tam famulos libros Buchananii, aut Knoxii Chronica evolueret: sed si quod ejusmodi scriptum inveniret, cum ejus depositarii ex legis severitate ageret. In eo Pythagoræ discipulum se profiteretur; ut exstimaret ipsos manes istorum seditum flabellorum templa chosi quadam in eorum corpora transisse, qui eorum vel libros retinerent, vel dogmata defenderent: eoque non minori supplicio plestendos, quam si ipsi auctores jam à mortuis essent resuscitati (11).' He cites the second book of the Basiliæ Doron: I have consulted it, and find nothing in it but what follows. 'I do not mean those histories full of gall and invecivies, those defamatory libels, which ought neither to be read nor kept by your subjects under great penalties, which you ought to lay upon them. For in this case I would have you, as a disciple of Pythagoras, believe that the souls of those infligators of sedition are passed into those that keep their writings, and defend their opinions; who ought to be punished neither more nor less than the authors themselves.' These are king James's words; see the Basiliæ Doron. Spondanus goes beyond the bounds of an historian, when he makes king James expressly quote these two authors: he should have been contented to say by conjecture, that this prince meant them. Let us see what the episcopians cited by Brexley say; for, not being able to come at their books, I have been forced to depend on him, and to transcribe what he cites, whether in the body of the page or in the margin (12). 'Et primo quidem de Joanne Knoxio . . . notum atque ipsorum Protestantium testimonio confirmatum est, eum postquam Geneva in Scotiam rediisset, Religionem vi & armis ad phantasmam suam ibi reformare aggressum esse. Cumque Caltrum Sancti Andree clanculariis insidiis occupasset, & Cardinalem horrendo assassinatu in cubiculo suo occidisset, & ob id vocatus fuisset, nec compareret, perduellium declaratum esse. Ille vero audaciam non deponens, sed confirmans, mox Perthæ turbas ciere. Magistratum Sancti Joannes & Dundee cum plebe ibidem tumultuante ut imagines, & Altaria, per omnes Ecclesias, & monasteria, aliisque Religiosorum domiciliis undique per circuitum diruerent, hortari: ipse autem post concionem qua talia auditoribus suavit, habitam, Carthusianorum, Prædicatorum, & Carmelitarum Domos subvertere, Imagines & Altaria Fidei, Angulæ, Mernæ, & aliis in locis destrueret, & sic omnes Religionis illius Ecclesias (novo scilicet modo) reformare pergebat. Post hæc inquit Bancroftius (qui & ipsius Knoxii Chronicon citatis istis suis ubi singula facta narrantur, in testimonium adducit). Alia vice coierunt reformatores ad Sancti Andree, ubi ex instigatione Knoxii pro concione tam fratrum Religiosorum domos, quam reliqua illius oppidi Monasteria spoliarent, dejecerunt, vallarunt. Idem Scoti, Strylingæ, Lithquo, & Edenburgi pararunt: Regina ob metum fugam capescente, duobus mensibus in campo castra metati sunt, & monetæ cudentæ instrumenta diruperunt, & factum defenderunt, &c. Regnam mentiam esse sæpe conviciati sunt, eamque indignissimis latoris onerant, eique obedientiam præstare renuerunt, immo eam omni autoritate regali exuerunt, expresse instrumento ad id a Knoxio exarato. — And first as to John Knox . . . it is known, and confirmed by the testimony of the Protestants, that, after his return from Geneva into Scotland, he attempted to reform religion there, after his own fancy, and by force; and, that having by treachery seized the castle of St Andrews, and barbarously murdered the cardinal, and being sent for by the queen to Sterling, to answer for that crime, and not appearing, he was declared a rebel. But he, not in the least terrified, soon after raised commotions at Perth. He exhorted the magistrates of St John and Dundee, together with the tumultuous mob, to demolish the images and altars in all the churches and monasteries round about, together with other religious houses: and he himself, after a sermon, in which he advised his hearers to do so, destroyed the houses of the Carthusians, preaching Friars, and Carmelites, and threw down the images and altars at Fife, Angus, Merns, and other places; and thus went on, in this new manner, to reform all the churches of that religion. After this, says Bancroft, (who alleges the chronicle of Knox himself, and the very pages, where each fact is mentioned, in proof of what he says). Another time, the Reformers met at St Andrews, where, at the instigation of Knox, they pulled down, and plundered all the monasteries of that town. They did the same at Scoone, Sterling, Lithgow, and Edinburgh. The queen flying away thro' fear, they encamped two months in the fields, and seized on the mint, &c. They often reproached the queen with a lie, insulting her after a shameful manner, refusing obedience to her, and even deprived her of the regal authority by an express instrument drawn up by Knox.

[D] . . . and who taught the most seditious doctrines.] Let us hear Brexley again, page 625. 'Summa autem opinionis ejus, ut ex scriptis suis colligitur, & ex ipso solo pro quolibet horum assertionum citato patet, his propositionibus (quas citat Bancroftus) continetur, †† Proceres tenentur si modo Rex non lit, Religionem reformare. Plebs †† est Religionem reformare. †† Deus constituit Proceres ad effrenes Principum appetitus coercendos.  Principes ob justas causas deponi possunt. ††† Si Principes adversus Deum ac veritatem ejus tyrannice se gerant, subditi eorum à juramento fidelitatis absolvuntur. Cum plerique aliis id genus dogmatibus. — The sum of his opinion, as is collected from his writings, and appears from the very leaf, cited for each of these assertions, is contained in these propositions, quoted by Bancroft; The nobility are obliged, if the king will not, to reform religion. It is the business of the vulgar to reform religion. God appointed the nobility to restrain the unbridled appetites of princes. Princes may be deposed for just reasons. If princes behave themselves tyrannically against God, and his truth, their subjects are absolved from their oath of fidelity. With many the like tenets.' Compare with this the words of Petra Sancta, which shall be cited in the following remark.

[E] When I consider the answers that are made for him.] The first thing I am to say, is, that those, who defame the actions and opinions of our Knox, maliciously † Bancroftus, in libro cui titulus, Assertionem scandalosam, &c. pag. 12.

† Ibid. pag. 13, initio, & Sundry in Responsum ad libellum quendam supplicem, pag. 193, prope finem quærit à Puritanis, Num rationes à Knoxio & Wollocko allatæ satis probarent, nempe Principem, seu Gubernatricem legitime constitutam, à subditis deponi posse, quemadmodum ipsi de facto Reginam Scotiæ gubernatricem regno abdicant? — Sundry . . . Puritani, consider the reasons, alleged by Knox and Wellock, sufficiently prove, that a prince, or lawful governor, may be deposed by the subjects, as they in fact deposed the queen of Scotland.

 In lib. cui titulus Assertionem scandalosam, &c. pag. 14, 15.

†† Knoxius, Appellat. fol. 25.

†† Idem, ad plebem, fol. 49, 50.

†† Idem, Hist. pag. 343.

 Idem, Hist. pag. 371.

††† Idem, ad Angliam & Scotiam, folio 76.

concerning the royal authority were such as the episcopal clergy, and the Catholic party

(13) See Spondan, ad ann.
1559, n. 30.

+++ Sic Bancroftus in Assertionibus, seditiosis, pag. 10, initio.

††† Calvin. in Epist. cccv. fine & pag. 565. in conclusionē illius
Epistolæ quæ ad
Knoxium scribi-
tur, ubi sic habet
Vale eximie vir, & ex animo co-lende frater.
Et Beza, in Epist.
Theolog. Epist.
Ixxiv. sic habet
*Joanni Knoxi Evangelii apud
Scotos reſtauratori fratri, & symmista observando.*

* Vide hoc in Hift. Ecclefiaſt.
Scotiae per Vautrouilleſium,
pag. 213, & citatur à Sutcliffe in Reſponſ. ad Libellum ſuppli-cem, pag. 192, & 71. In Affirtionibus, &c.
pag. 10.

† Calvinus, ut supra, ad ††† :
& vide Calvin.
Epist. cccvi, ubi
eum virum exi-
mum vocat, fra-
tre colendum, & Knoxio coadjuto-
rem fidelem.

† Calvinus, Epist. ubi supra,
pag. 566, circa
med. ait, Strenuè
operam suam Christo & Ecclesiæ impendit.

† Calvinus, ubi supra, Epist.
ccv, Joanni Knoxio, pag. 565, ait: Evangelium apud vos tam fe-lices lætosque progressus facere vehementer, ut
par est: lætor:
certamina vobis
moveri non no-vum est, sed eo
clarius refugit
Dei virtus, &c.
quando ad resistendum pares nunquam fuissetis, nisi à cælis vobis opem tulis-set, qui superior est toto mundo.

(14) Quoting Bexa's own words.

maliciously presuppose, that he acted in concert with Calvin, and brought from Geneva the notions that he advanced in Scotland (13). With this view, they affect to produce the encomiums, which Calvin and Beza bestowed upon him. We must hear Berley, page 619. '*Hinc Joan. Knoxius [scholæ] Genevæ discipulus (quem Calvinus) Virum infignem vocat & fratrem suum reverendum doctrinæ Calvini præconius, ex opinione Calvini & aliorum quorundam Ministrorum Genevæ commemorant (teste * Sutelciffi & Bancrofti) docuit: Licere subditis si Principes nollent, immo si id ipus esset, vi & armis Religionem reformare. Hinc est quod licet doctrina & facta Goodmanii & Knoxii sic conjurationis faciant, ut id nulla tergiversatione celari possit, eos tamen ambos Calvinus † fratres suos venerandos nominet, & eandem Knoxii in eo genere temeritatem laudet ‡, quem egregium Christo & Ecclesiæ operam navasse ait, ¶, & se vehementer lætari dicit, quod tam felices & lætos progressus fecerit. — Hence John Knox, a disciple of the school of Geneva, (whom Calvin calls an excellent man, and his reverend brother) being well acquainted with Calvin's doctrine, taught, agreeably to the opinion of Calvin, and other ministers residing at Geneva, (as Sutelciff and Bancroft witness): that subjects are at liberty, if princes refuse, and there be occasion for it, to reform religion by force. Hence it is, that tho' the doctrine and actions of Goodman and Knox are so favourable to conspiracy, that they cannot pretend to deny it, yet Calvin calls them both his reverend brothers, and commends the bold rashness of Knox, who, he says, was of great service to Christ and the church, and he rejoices greatly, he says, at the happy success of his endeavours.' They do not forget that Beza, in Icones, calls him the apostle of Scotland. 'A quibus (Angli), says Spondanus under the year 1559 n. 30. (14) ad Scotos transeuntibus primus occurrit magnus ille JOANNES KNOXUS, quem si Scotorum in vero Dei cultu infaturo and velut Apostolum quendam dixerō, dixisse me quod res est existimabo, & sequens vera ipsius vitæ narratio testabitur.' Cardinal Richelieu, when he was yet but bishop of Luçon, published a book of controversy, where-in he made great use of John Berley's collections, and particularly in what relates to Knox's seditious opinions. I have consulted the answers that were made to this book of the bishop of Luçon; but I confess, I could find nothing in them to make me suspect the credit of Berley's citations.*

Peter de la Vallée, minister of Fontenai le Comte, published a book at Rochelle, in 1619, in 4to, intitled, 'An apology for the epistle of the ministers of the gospel at Paris, inscribed to the king; in answer to the book, written against them by Armand John du Pleffis de Richelieu, bishop of Luffon: containing a summary decision of the principal controversies of this time, concerning religion, by the authority of the scripture, and the testimony of the ancient doctors of the church; with a brief defence against the reproaches, which are made against the Protestants, on occasion of the troubles and wars, that have happened in France, Germany, Scotland, and Denmark. extracted for the most part from the history of James Augustus Thuanus, president in the parliament of Paris, or from the very historians acknowledged and approved by the bishop of Luffon.' He quotes the very words of the objection. 'I could, says the bishop, prove your opinion in this matter by a great number of authors, if what you teach upon this subject was as advantageous, as it is prejudicial to you. I am contented to desire the reader to consult a book intitled Apologia Protestantium, one of the most useful books that has been printed for a long time; in which he will find more passages upon this subject, and some, amongst others, which prove, that some of your writers have written, that by divine and humane laws, it is permitted to kill impious kings; that it is a thing agreeable to the word of God, that a private person, by a special instinct, may kill a tyrant; a doctrine every way detestable, which will never enter into the thoughts of the Catholic church.' Here follows the answer to that objection. 'There was no need here, where we are only concerned in the search of truth, of such rhetorical flourishes

'which are only fictions and falsties; for how is it possible, that he should have so many authors at hand who make us guilty of so detestable a doctrine, and yet not produce one that speaks a word of it? Nay, to produce the weak proof that he has advanced, he was forced as it were to run over all the earth, and to go into the other world among the savages, and bring Buchanan to life again, who had his birth there: And who, yet, never made profession of Divinity. How is it credible, that the bishop should be so moderate as not to produce those many authors, because it is not to our advantage, but to our prejudice; since he has undertaken to write against us? It is a prevarication to conceal what is detrimental to one's Antagonist, and adverse party, and to alledge what is advantageous to him. Such dissimulations are not becoming a bishop, who professes to speak the truth; he should not have spared us, since the business was to make us acknowledge our fault in so important a point; he should not have referred us to the Apologia Protestantium, which book I never saw, nor know where to find it, but I know very well, that the author of it, if he be one of ours, does not speak as the bishop says he does; but if he be one of their writers, he advances this of his own head, and has no good proof for it (15).' It is manifest that this answer does not at all clear John Knox. Another minister (16), much more learned than he of Fontenai le Comte, answered the bishop of Lufflon: he had (17) read John Brexley's book, and gives a satisfactory answer to the objections grounded on some passages of Calvin: but he forsakes John Knox, and maintains, that the encomiums, which Calvin and Beza give him, no ways concern his notions about the royal authority, nor his particular actions, in which some footsteps of rebellion might be found. This minister's words are these (18). 'As for Knox, Goodman, and Buchanan, the occasion and time, in which they wrote, lessen in some measure the odium of the doctrine, which they spread in Scotland, inconsiderately and against the truth; which their anger, natural to that nation, and the general troubles of the state, hindered them from distinctly discovering; according to the custom of men, who chafe rather, even with sharpness and obstinacy, to defend an ill thing, in which they are engaged thro' passion, and without any ill will, than to confess what has been ill done, or ill contrived, either by themselves or their party. Notwithstanding those excesses, they were all three great men, and in other things very serviceable; Buchanan particularly in tutoring the king of Great Britain, and the others in the work of the ministry, to which they should have been entirely and wholly dedicated. Granting then that Calvin  (in the letters that he wrote to them) called the two first Brethren and excellent men; and that Beza gave . . . the first . . . the title of Restorer of the gospel in Scotland; doth this prove, that they subscribed to their opinions concerning the supreme authority of kings, or that they were communicated to them, or that they so much as knew what passed in Scotland after the change of religion, or that our adversaries go upon good grounds, in affirming, against the truth, that the books of Knox and Goodman were printed at Geneva with the approbation of Beza and Calvin. If those gentlemen are pleased to prove what they certify upon their bare word, and to aver, that the ministers of Geneva communicated with the above-named in other than ecclesiastical things, or that they were informed of their particular opinions concerning the rights of kings, or that they truly understood, and afterwards approved, what they have taught concerning politics, then they shall have liberty to complain. But, on the contrary, it appears, from the letters cited in the bishop of Lufflon's little book, that the ministers of Geneva never gave, nor received advice from foreigners, except in matters purely ecclesiastical; and particularly (from those, which Beza wrote to Knox) that at Geneva they had no certain news of the Scotch transactions . . . If therefore Calvin, Beza, Whitaker, or some others of our religion, have called Knox and Goodman their brethren, it does not follow from thence that they adopted their opinions, but only that they called them

r (15) La Vallée, Apologie, pag.
544.

(16) *David Blondel. His answer, printed at Sedan, 1619, in 8vo, is intituled: Modeste Declaration de la Sincerité & Verité
des Eglises Reformées de France.*

(17) See his answer, pag. 287.

(18) Blondel,
pag. 294.

There are but five Letters written to Knox; three of Calvin; and two of Beza: One of Calvin to Goodman, and one of Beza to Buchanan. There is not one word of advice about state affairs to be found in any of them.

party charged him with. Some ascribe to him a spirit of prophecy [F]. It is, doubtless, doing some service to the memory of John Knox, to shew the extravagancies of those, who have aspersed his reputation. This obliges me to set down a passage of Thetvet wherein we shall see such gross and outrageous abuses [G], as will alone be sufficient so, with respect to the ecclesiastical office, with which they were invested. If they praised them, they did it only according to their knowledge, not because they thought them impeccable; for it is not impossible, but that, amongst those, who preach Christ (as St Paul says to the Philippians) some should preach him out of envy and contention, and mix the fervour of their zeal with their infirmities; amongst which if the lord frequently accomplishes his work, drawing light from darkness, and order from confusion; it is that the glory of what is well done may belong to his conduct, and the evil to the imperfections of his instruments. Is not this to acknowledge, that Brexley, and those he quotes, have not calumniated Knox with respect to the opinions they impute to him?

Just as the bishop of Luffon had made use of John Brexley's collections, the Jesuit Petra Sancta, some time after, made use of this bishop's book, to object against du Moulin, what several Protestants had said about the obedience of subjects. Here follows what he alleged against Knox (19): 'Si principes, inquit, aduersus Deum & veritatem ejus tyrannice se gerant, subditi eorum à juramento fidelitatis absolvuntur. Idem præter alia multa, illud, inquit, audacter affirmaverim, debuisse Nobiles, Rectores, Judices, Populumque Anglicanum, non solum resistere & repugnare Mariæ illi Jezabel, quam vocant Reginam suam; verum etiam de eâ & Sacerdotibus ejus, & aliis omnibus, quotquot auxilium tulerunt, mortis supplicium sumere, ut primum ceperunt Evangelium Christi suppressere. — If principes behave themselves tyrannically against GOD and his truths, their subjects are absolved from their oath of fidelity. He goes on: This I boldly assert, that the nobles, rulers, judges, and people of England, ought not only to have resisted that Jezabel, Mary, whom they call their queen, but even to have put to death her, and her priests, and all who were assisting to her, as soon as ever they began to suppress the gospel of CHRIST. What did Mr du Moulin reply? He made no mention of John Knox, but was contented to say, that Buchanan, whom the Jesuit also spoke of, had only treated of the right of the Scotch, and that, if other authors had run into excess, it ought to be ascribed to their particular temerity, and not to the spirit of their religion (20). Rivetus, in his answer to the same Jesuit, referred him to the two abovementioned books written against the bishop of Luffon, and expressly declared, that the Protestants disapproved the opinions of John Knox, and of others like him, who had rather acted according to the spirit of their nation, than according to the spirit of their religion. Upon which he observes (21), that of the 105 kings, who reigned in Scotland before Mary Stuart, there had been three deposed, five expelled, and thirty two killed. Nemini nostrum probantur quæ vel ex Goodman, vel ex Knoxe, vel ex Buchananis in eam sententiam describuntur, quamvis eò usque non procedant, quo Jesuitæ processerunt, vel alii qui in Gallia scripserunt de Justa Henrici tertii addicatione, & etiamnum in Belgio foverunt, ubi scribit Jesuita Romanus. Id præterea observandum est, si quæ durissimis persecutionum temporibus à Scottis & Anglis nonnullis temerè scripta fuerint, ea posse imputari non tam Religioni, quam nationum illarum, Scoticanæ præsertim, fervido ingenio, & ad audendum prompto: quod tamen valde mitigatum fuisse accensa veritatis Evangelicæ luce, ex eo constat, quod ex centum quinque regibus suis, usque ad Mariam, tres exautorantur, quinque expulerunt, & triginta duos necarunt: quod ne religioni imputetur magis vestra interest, quam nostra (22). After this, I may be allowed to believe, that Knox's books contain the propositions, which Brexley quoted out of them upon the credit of the episcopals.

[F] Some ascribe to him a spirit of prophecy. Petra Sancta having mentioned the praises, which Calvin and Beza bestowed upon Knox, adds (23), à Witakero ex unanimo Scotorum sententia, Spiritu Prophetico, & Apolitoico prædicitur appellatur. David Blondel (24) says something more particular: 'endowed with a prophetic spirit, by which as it is reported by those of his nation he foretold many things that are come to pass, as Whitaker observes in his writings.'

[G] Here is a passage of Thetvet, wherein we shall see gross and outrageous abuses. This man might pass for a stripped Monk, though he always professed himself a Catholic. No one can question that he was a bad compiler. He was so little exact, that, when he undertook to write of the affairs of Scotland, he did not so much as give himself the trouble to observe the true names of persons. You will see, that he knew not the right name of our John Knox. 'All this while, says he (25), the Scotch suffered not England to be at rest; which happened, when Henry VIII plaid his pranks with chalices, relics, and other ornaments of the English churches: which tragedies and sports have been plaid in our time in the kingdom of Scotland, by the instigation of Nopitz, the first Scotch minister of the bloody gospel. This diaphorist, who was fond of diffentions, was not contented to tread in the steps of Luther, Zuingleus, and Farel, much less in those of his master Calvin, who had lately redeemed him from the galleys of the prior of Capus, in which he had remained three years for his crimes, unlawful amours, and execrable whoredoms, and for his dissolute life, and for having been convicted of parricide and murder, committed upon the person of James de Beton, archbishop of St Andrews, by the connivance and treachery of the earl of Ropphol, James Lescle, John Lescle their uncle, and William du Coy. This Simonist, who had been a priest before in our church, and fattened with benefices, which he sold for ready money, seeing he could not prove his cause to be good, fell into the most horrid blasphemy in the world. First, he denied the power of God; he preached openly, that virginity was no better than marriage: which he had stolen from Luther's heresy, out of his new Epithalamium. Likewise he induced many devout wives, and religious virgins, to prostitute themselves. He taught likewise, that we must reject, despise, and trample under foot the holy crism, pull down images, take up and burn the bodies of saints, and seize the treasures of the church. This is not all. He did not cease for two years to animate the people to take up arms against the queen, to drive her out of the kingdom, which he said was elective, as it had been in the days of Paganism. Could the greatest Barbarians in the world say any thing more cruel and mischievous. . . . The Lutherans have temples and oratories; their ministers sing psalms and say mass; and, though it be different from ours, yet they add to it, Kyrie Eleison, Credo, Sanctus, Agnus, and other prayers like ours. In like manner their ministers in the time of divine service, wear copes, chasubles, and surplices like ours: being careful of their salvation, and of the public weal. Whereas the people of Scotland have lived these twelve years without law, without faith, without ceremonies, and without acknowledging either king or queen, any more than brutes, being better pleased with the fables of this rank hypocrite of Nopitz, a man unfaithful to God and his country, than with the purity of the gospel, the canons of the councils, and the doctrine of so many holy Greek and Latin doctors of the Catholic church. This fine preacher, after the decease of his first wife, suddenly provoked with his venomous tongue the nobility of Scotland to set up against the clergy, more than he had done before; and then the clowns assaulted, plundered, burnt, and ruined the castles and houses of the gentlemen, merchants, and others, who would not join in their debaucheries and murders. . . . It is certain, that this traitor, puffed up with the spirit of ambition, and prompted by the flesh, came into so great credit and honour with the ignorant people of that country, that he married for his second wife a gentlewoman of an ancient family, related to the Scotch princes of the royal blood. Are not authors, who write with so little judgment, well qualified to make us question the truths they advance, suppose any such escape them?

8 G

[H] The

(19) Silvester Petra Sancta, Not. in Epistol. Molinæ ad Balzæcum, pag. 104. That book was printed at Antwerp, in 1634, in 8vo.

†† In Admonit. ad Nobil. & Pop. Scot. atque Angliæ.

(20) Buchananus scripsit de jure regni apud Scotos, sed hoc nihil ad Galliam, Angliam, Germaniam, Hispaniam. Nec si quis aliquid scripsit quod modum excedat, debet continuo adscribi ejus religioni, potius quam ejus ingenio. Nam ejusmodi libri quot citat Jesuita, five veri five falsi, nullam præferunt fronte approbationem Doctorum. — Petra Molinæ in Hypographe, lib. iii. cap. xi, pag. 492.

(21) David Blondel had already observed it, ubi supra, pag. 213.

(22) Rivet. in Castigation. Notarum, in Epistol. ad Balzæcum, cap. xiii, n. 14. Oper. Tom. III, pag. 539.

(23) Petra Sancta, ubi supra, p. 105. He cites Witak. Contr. 2, q. 53, cap. xiii.

(24) Blondel, ubi supra, pag. 295. He quotes Witaker, de Ecclesiæ, 9^o 5, cap. xiii.

sufficient to prejudice us against whatever the Catholic writers have published concerning that great Scotch reformer. I wish it were as easy to confute the accusation of a Lutheran, who charges him with inconstancy [H].

[H] The accusation of a Lutheran, who charges him with inconstancy. James Thomafius, professor of Leipzig, published a little discourse, intituled, Historia affectionum se miscantium Controversiæ de Gynæocratia. He there speaks of the passions that attend the dispute concerning the government of women; and he says, that this question was warmly debated in the XVth century, when Mary succeeded Edward king of England, and Elizabeth succeeded her sister Mary. Those two queens took opposite methods, as to religion; the one banished the Non-Catholics, the other recalled them, and made the Reformation triumph. Those, whom Mary had persecuted, maintained, that it was contrary to natural right, and divine and human laws, that a woman should rule over a whole nation; but their language was quite different under the reign of queen Elizabeth. See how Schlussemburgius insulted hereupon our Knox and others. 'Qui Calvini placita sequerentur, his nihil erat magis exosum fœmineo Mariæ regimine; iisdem vicissim, ubi ad clavum Reip. feliciter erectam conspexissent Elisabetham, nihil magis venerabile, quam Regina talis. Atque ut hoc de suo Schlussemburgius*, magnæ constantiæ doctrinæque Theologus, largiatur mihi, ex eadem Calvini religione Gilbertus, Goodman & Knoxus, (qui scilicet exilium suum Mariæ imputabant) publicis libris Genevæ impressis, docuerunt, esse contra jus naturale, divinum, & humanum, ut mulier etiam in rebus politicis regnet. At ubi Mariæ imperium Elisabetha excepisset, eximia & Pontificiorum hostis, & Calvinæque auxitrix, protinus verso remigio à Reformationis Angliæ, non regina tantum in temporalibus illa est proclamata, sed etiam caput Ecclesiæ in spiritualibus. Ita spacio duorum annorum (ipsissima Schlussemburgii verba recito,) quod prius fuit Calvinistis Genevæ moratis ipsissimum verbum DEI, mox atque in Angliam redierunt, mutatum est in verbum Diaboli. Tantum videlicet potuit amor in religionem, quam sub alterius fœminæ regno conculcatam viderent, sub alterius resurgentem, ut à personis in ipsum imperii genus desectente se affectu jam prosciberent Gynæocratiam, jam dignitati ac famæ restituerent' (26). — To those who followed Calvin's tenets, nothing was more odious than the female government of Mary; and the same persons, when they saw Elizabeth happily raised to the throne, thought nothing more venerable than such a queen. And as Schlussemburgius, a divine of great constancy and learning, offers me this, so, out of the same religion of Calvin, Gilbertus, Goodman, and Knox, (who imputed their banishment to Mary) taught, in public books, printed at Geneva, that it was contrary to natural, divine, and human laws, that a woman should govern even in political matters. But, when Elizabeth succeeded Mary, an eminent adversary of the Pope's, and favourer of the Calvinists, immediately the Reformed English proclaimed her not only queen in temporal matters, but even head of the church in spirituals. Thus in the space of two years (they are the very words of Schlussemburgius) what was before, to the Calvinists residing at Geneva, the very word of God, as soon as they returned to England, was changed into the word of the devil. Such was the force of the love of religion, which they saw oppressed during the reign of one of these women, and reviving under that of the other, that, turning their affection from the persons to the kind of government itself, they one while proscribed female government, another time restored it to it's dignity and credit. Thomafius, who furnishes me with these words, pretends that the Calvinists of France changed also their maxims, after the persecution they suffered under Charles IX: and he expressly cites Lambert Danæus, who on the one hand declared against the monarchical power, and on the other for the authority of women, in favour of Elizabeth queen of England. 'Ut Anglico regimini præ Gallico faveret (Danæus) illud maxime fecit, quod suæ sectæ hominibus & sub Elizabetha laudissima esset fortuna, & sub Carolo Gallo vix aliud præter gladium, crucem, ignis expectandum. Notæ sunt Parisiæ nuptiæ † eo actæ eventum, ut ab illis † Anni 1574. maximè temporibus scriptores Galli petilentem inciperent in Politica doctrina sectam sive novam condere, sive sepultam resuscitare, quam solemus vocare Monarchomachorum. Huic nomen addidit etiam suum Danæus: ut mirari aliquis possit, quomodo scriptor ille, qui vix Regem æquo animo pati posset in solio Monarchico, ferre in eodem potuerit Reginam. Nempe vereor, ut non hic suas partes egerit hinc odium in perfidiam Galli, illinc amor tūm in felicissimam Elisabethæ gubernationem †, tūm in Religionem Calvini, cui periculum æ tampestate in illa insula satis tutum erat (27). — Danæus, that he might favour the English government above the French, brought it about, that those of his sect should expect the mildest treatment under Elizabeth, and nothing but persecution under Charles. The Parisian nuptials are well known, attended with this event, that, from that time especially, the French writers began, in their politics, either to found a new sect, or revive an old one, which we call animonarchy men, or republicans. Danæus insisted with this sect: so that one might wonder, how this writer, who can scarce bear a king on the throne of monarchy, yet can bear a queen on it. I suspect, that he is influenced, on the one hand, by resenting the perfidy of the French king, and, on the other, by affection for the happy government of Elizabeth, and the religion of Calvin, which met with an Asylum in that island.' It is certain, that, in that century, the general affairs whirled about in such a manner, both in France and England, that each party changed their maxims. See the remark [I] of the article HOTMAN. The Roman Catholics, who spoke very ill of the government of women in the reign of Elizabeth, had very much commended it in the reign of queen Mary. Knox, and some others, on the other side, had the same inconstancy. The Roman Catholics, under Charles IX, preached nothing so much as submission to the authority of the king (28): but they spoke and did quite the contrary in the time of the League, and their adversaries thought it very strange. I have read, in Savaron, a thing which I thought very curious (29). Pedro Corneio, a Spaniard... thinks it strange and wonderful, that this town (30) should have remained firm in it's fidelity to it's prince, and that the late troubles did not disturb it's constancy, nor shake it's resolution: since, says he, it is a very Catholic town, and beautified with a church, in which God is served with great modesty, ceremony, and music, and as much revered, as in any church I have seen. Generally speaking, it is a proof, that the passions make men speak either for or against the right of princes, to see the same people disputing for the affirmative or negative, just as the interests of their cause happen to change.

* Lib. iv. Theol. Calvinist. pag. 324, 325. Conf. Respons. ad Calvin. & Bez. pro Princip. Balduino, pag. 75.

(26) Jacobus Thomafius, in Prefatione c. 6, pag. 328. Edit. Lips. 1681.

(a) Oldensworth Eiderstedensis. Müller. Voyage ad Hister. Clericorum. Cimbr. Part. III, pag. 164.

KNUZEN (MATTHIAS) a native of the country of Holstein (a), arrived to such a degree of extravagancy, as publicly to maintain Atheism, and undertook great journeys to gain proselytes. He was a restless man, who discovered his impieties first at Königsberg in Prussia (b). He boasted, that he had a great number of persons of his opinion in the principal towns of Europe [A], and even seven hundred in the single

[A] He boasted, that he had a great number of persons of his opinion in the principal towns of Europe. These are his words. 'Nemo homo mihi vitio vertet, si una cum meis gregalibus, (quorum innumerus mihi numerus Lutetia, Amstelodami, Lugduni, in Anglia, Hamburgi, Hafniae, nec non Holmiae, imo

Romæ & in contiguis locis adstipulator) universa Biblia belle fabella loco habeam, qua belluar, id est, Christiani, rationem captivantes, & cum ratione insipientes delectantur (v). — No one will impute it to me as a crime, if, with my companions (an infinite number of whom, at Paris, Amsterdam, Leyden, in England

† Hoc nostris tempore (ingrat. Pule. Corvian. lib. vi, cap. iii, pag. 398.) Elizabethæ Regine Anglorum Imperio nihil ulli unquam esse vidit felicius & optatius. — At this time, Elizabeth revive an old one, which we call animonarchy men, or republicans. Danæus insisted with this sect: so that one might wonder, how this writer, who can scarce bear a king on the throne of monarchy, yet can bear a queen on it. I suspect, that he is influenced, on the one hand, by resenting the perfidy of the French king, and, on the other, by affection for the happy government of Elizabeth, and the religion of Calvin, which met with an Asylum in that island.

(27) Thomafius ibid. pag. 334.

(28) See the remark [E] of the article SAINTES.

(29) John Savaron, Traité centre les Maliques, pag. 44. Paris Edit. 1681. H. quon Breve Relation de la Liga, en Brucelles en las casas de Roger Vespicio, 1591.

(30) Clermont in Auvergne.

(b) Tobias Plannerus, system. Theologie generalis, pag. 35.

(v) Amad. Micron. Syntagma. Histor. Eccles. pag. 2291. Edit. 1699.

single town of Iēna (c). His sect was called the Conscientiaries, because he said, there was no other God, religion, or lawful magistracy, than conscience, which teaches all men the three precepts of Justice, to do no injury, to live honestly, and give every one his due. He drew up a summary of his system, in a short letter, of which several copies were spread [B]. It is dated from Rome. You will find it entire in the last editions of Micraëlius. He dispersed also some German writings (d). All this was confuted in the same tongue, by John Musæus, a Lutheran professor [C]. This sect began about the year 1673.

A book was printed against Knuzen at Wittenberg in the year 1677 [D].

England, at Hamburg, Copenhagen, Stockholm, and even at Rome, and the adjacent places, agree with me in opinion I look upon the whole Bible as a fine invented tale, with which the beasts, that is the Christians, captivating their reason, and running reason mad, are delighted. We must not imagine, that he used the stratagem of state conspirators, who, to bring more people over to their party, always pretend they have a vast number of accomplices. It is more probable he spoke in this manner, because that he was a hair-brained fool.

(2) He drew up a summary of his system in a short letter, of which several copies were spread (2). Micraëlius's continuator has reduced the contents of that letter to six articles. I. Non esse Deum neque Diabolum. II. Magistratum nihil æstimandum, templum contemnenda, Sacerdotes rejiciendos. III. Loco Magistratus & loco Sacerdotum esse scientiam & rationem cum conscientia conjunctam, quæ doceat honeste vivere, neminem lædere, & suum cuique tribuere. IV. Conjugium à scortatione nihil differre. V. Unicum esse vitam: post hanc nec præmium nec pœnam dari. VI. Scripturam sacram secum ipsam pugnare (3). — I. That there is neither God, nor Devil. II. That the magistrates are to be looked upon as nothing, the churches are to be despised, and the priests rejected. III. That knowledge and reason, together with conscience, which teaches to live honestly, to hurt no body, and give every one his own, is in the room of magistrates and priests. IV. That there is no difference between marriage and whoring. V. That there is but one life: that after the present there is neither reward nor punishment. VI. That the Scripture contradicts itself. This system, besides its horrible impiety, is also plainly extravagant; for one must be stark mad, to believe that mankind can subsist without magistrates. It is true, they would not be necessary, if all men would follow the dictates of conscience, which this impious man exhibits to us; but are they followed even in those countries, where the judges punish, with the greatest severity, the injustice done to our neighbour? I do not know but it may be said, that there is no impertinence, be it never so extravagant, but may teach us some truth or other. The follies of this German flew us, that the ideas of natural religion, the ideas of virtue, the impressions of reason, in a word, the light of conscience, may subsist in the mind of man, even after the ideas of the existence of God, and the firm belief of a life to come, are extinguished in it.

(3) He was confuted by John Musæus, a Lutheran professor. The author I have this from, observes, that Musæus engaged in this work, to remove all suspicions that might be entertained to the disadvantage of the university of Iēna: for this wretched man had boasted of abundance of associates there (4). That book of Musæus contains a great many ridiculous things, concerning the life of this spark; but, if you would have a solid apology for the scripture against the blasphemies of this man, you must have recourse to the second edition. And if you understand High-Dutch, consult, as Mr Mollerus advises (5), the book, which he names (6), and observe his reflexion. He says, that if people continue to make their enemies suspected of Atheism, as the author of this piece with a hasty zeal, and mixed with his passions, has done, they will afford matter enough to Mr Christian Thomafius, who is about an apology for those, who have been unjustly exposed to such accusations. The author of several Thoughts upon Comets has insinuated (7) the design of such a work, and given a curious idea of it. But let Mr Mollerus's words inform us of the malignity of such sort of accusers. 'Quo in opere opotandum esset ut Theol. celeberrimus (Jo. Mullerus Antistes Hamb.) suo in Antagonistas odio minus indulgisset, nec per insignem animi impotentiam, Schuppli τῷ μακαρίτῃ Demegorias, piis omnibus commendatissimas, & Christ. Hoburgii, ad extremum Atheismo contrarium, superstitionem sc. & Enthufiasmum, proclivioris, scripta collo obtorto iis, quæ Atheismum vel occultant, vel quadamtenus promovent, aggregasset. Certe, si zelo hujusmodi præcipiti, privatiq; affectibus obnoxio, Theologi Atheomastiges sibi invidios in suspicionem impietatis Atheismo assensu pergent adducere, vereor ne calamo Christi. Thomafii τῷ μακαρίτῃ, Gabr. Naudæi (qui magiæ reis est patrocinatus) exemplo apologiam pro Atheismi falso insinulatis parturienti, campus se pandat amplissimus innocentiam illorum, cum hominum cordatorum applausu, vindicandi (8). — In which work, it were to be wished, that the famous divine, John Mollerus, Antistes in Hamburg, had less indulged his hatred towards his adversaries, and had not perversely, ranked among the writers, who conceal Atheism, or in some measure promote it, the Demegoria of Schuppius, so acceptable to pious men, and the works of Christopher Hoburgius, who is more inclined to superstition and enthusiasm, the very reverse of Atheism. Certainly, if the divines, who write against Atheism, go on, through such a rash and partial zeal, to charge with atheistical principles those whom they hate, I fear, lest, after the example of Gabriel Naudé, who defended those accused of Magic, the free pen of Christopher Thomafius may find ample occasion to justify, with the approbation of all sensible men, the innocence of those, who are falsely accused of Atheism.'

(4) A book was printed against Knuzen at Wittenberg, in 1677. The title of it is, Exercitationes Academicæ II de Atheismo Renato des Cartes & Matthiæ Knuzen oppositæ. Autore Valentino Greiffingio Corona Transylvano Elector. Saxon. alumno. This I have from a book of Caspar Sagittarius (9).

KONIG (GEORGE MATTHIAS) in Latin Konigius, professor of Poetry, and of the Greek tongue, and library-keeper in the university of Altorf, deserves a place here in a particular manner; for I should be ungrateful, should I not acknowledge, that the book he published in the year 1678 (a) is of considerable use to me. I make no doubt that it is serviceable to a great many men of letters, notwithstanding the censure that was passed upon it [A]. Our Konig died towards the end of the year 1698,

[A] The censure that was passed upon it. John Mollerus, a very learned man, who published at Hamburg, in the year 1691, an Ussage ad historiam Chersonesi Cimbricæ, had given us, four years before, Cimbricæ literatæ Prodromus, wherein, according to the liberty which ought to prevail among the subjects of the Republic of Letters, he freely spoke his thoughts as to the defects which he found in Konig's book. Daniel

William Mollerus, an Hungarian, and professor of Metaphysics and History, in the university of Altorf, immediately opposed the Critic, and yet could not deny, but that part of the faults, observed by him, were real. Now see what the Critic in general pretends, as he explains himself in a preface (1). 'Innumeros in opere Konigiano autores esse omisso, de Antiquis paucissimâ satique confute in medium allata, & Recentiorum rum,

(b) See, below, citat. (4).

(d) Mollerus, ubi supra, p. 165.

(5) Ib. pag. 167.

(6) Atheismus devictus. It was printed in the year 1673. The author calls himself Jo. Mullerus, Antistes Hamburgensis.

(7) In the preface to the Addition printed at Rotterdam, 1694.

(8) Mollerus, ibid.

(9) Intituled, Introductio in Historiam Ecclesiasticam, pag. 879. It was printed in 1694, in 4to.

(a) Intituled, Bibliotheca vetus & nova, in fol. I often quote it, and sometimes I criticise upon it.

1698, being eighty two years old (b). He was son of GEORGE KONIG (c), a native of Amberg, who died in 1654, after he had taught Divinity thirty eight years in the university of Altorf.

(b) Acta Eruditor. Lips. 1699, pag. 360.

(c) Konig, Biblioth. pag. 448. See his Elogium in Witten's Memoriarum Theolog. Renovate, Decade VIII, pag. 1100, & seq.

rum, etiam Polygraphorum Scriptis quamplurimis plerumque vix unius aut alterius factam mentionem, ac raro Synopticam aliquam de Autoris patria, ætate, ac vita, librique editi loco ac tempore, narrationem adjectam, manifestius est, quam ut latere lectorem eruditum, aut negari ab homine candido possit. Nomina etiam sæpius, uti in Prodomo monui, & scripta falsa auctoribus esse attributa, circa patriam atque vitam illorum erratum, inedita pro editis venditata, & ex uno scriptore duos aut tres inepte profucos, exemplis plurimis ἀπαλαμψεῖς possem ostendere, si in expurgando hoc Augiæ stabulo tempus pariter atque operam vellem perdere, aut sordes illius in præfationem hanc convecrare. — That innumerable authors are omitted in Konig's work, that but few of the antients are produced, and those very confusedly, that of the moderns, even those who have written many works, the writings of one or two at most are mentioned, and that there is seldom added a succinct account of the author's country, age, and life, and of the time and place of the publication of his works, is so plain, that it cannot escape the learned reader, nor be denied by any man of candour. That he likewise ascribes false names, and false works, to authors, as I observed in the Prodomus, that he mistakes as to their country and life, that he pretends books were published, which never were, and ignorant-ly splits one author into two or three, I could demonstrate by many instances, if I would lose my time and my labour in cleansing this Augean stable, or transfer it's filth into this preface. He adds, that, in this, he agrees in judgment with many learned men of the first rank. Agnoverunt eandem, quotquot ex chori literarii primiceriis, de Opere Konigiano, aut eadem mecum, aut his etiam asperiora judicant. Petrus scilicet Lambecius, non alio, quam Rhapsodi, titulo Autorem dignatus †, Dan. Georg. Morhofius †, & (qui meum de eodem judicium suo verbotenus adject) Alex. Cæsa. Wilh. Ern. Tenzelius †, alii item complures, quorum verba allegare superfedo, cum rerum testimonia ipsi adversario, nolenti volenti, veritatis confessionem extorserint. Non audent enim is Bibliothecam hanc, cui patrocinatur, veterem ac novam pro accurata, aut tali, quæ Seculi applausum mereatur, venditare, sed fatetur nomen in ista interdum cum nomine esse confusum, errata nonnulla commissa, & Autores aliquot omisos, in qua ipsius confessione acquiesco. — The same has been acknowledged by such learned men, as have passed the like, or even a more severe, judgment on Konig's work. To wit, Peter Lambecius, who thinks the author deserves no other title than that of Rhapsodist; Daniel George Morhofius, and the most accurate William Tenzelius, who added, word for word, my judgment of this author to his own; with many others, whose words I forbear to alledge, since the force of truth has extorted a confession from the very adversary himself. For he dares not put off this work, which he patronizes, for an accurate performance, or such as deserves the applause of the age, but confesses, that the author sometimes confounds names, that he has committed some mistakes, and omitted some authors. Observe, that he does not rob Konig of the praise of an old professor, who had done good services to the Republic of Letters (2).

† V. Jovius celeberr. Tenzelii mox allegandum.

† P. I. Polyh. Litterarii, cap. xliii, pag. 202.

† In Collegiis mensuris versuculis, M. Moria A. 1682, pag. 316, 317.

(a) Senis de re literaria bene meriti elogium Konigio ab eadem ejus Philologicæ argumenti libella non recedit. Mollerus, præfata, Hægog.

KOORNHERT (THEODORE) a native of Amsterdam, and secretary of the town of Haerlem, in the XVIth century, made himself famous by some writings that were very singular in point of religion (a). He is ranked amongst those Spiritualists or Enthusiasts, who believed, that all the sects of Christianity had been corrupted for many ages, and that, without an extraordinary mission, authorized by miracles, no body had a right to intrude into the functions of the gospel ministry (b). Upon this footing, he publicly condemned Calvin and Luther's undertaking, though he acknowledged, that the church of Rome was no true church. He would have all Christians of whatever sect, (till it should please God to raise Reformers, like the Apostles) unite under one form by way of Interim, or provisionally [A], the model whereof was, that the Scripture should be read to the people without offering any explication, or preferring any thing to the auditors by way of precept or prohibition, but only by way of advice.

[A] He would have all Christians . . . unite under one form, by way of Interim, or provisionally. Hoornbeeck, who had read his Dutch book, explains this fancy. "Iste Coornhert passim suis libris . . . aliquod schema Ecclesiæ communis erigendæ proponit, in qua, vel solus Scripturæ textus legeretur, absque glossis & expositionibus, vel etiam admonitiones ex Scripturâ sub aliorum judicio, non autem ex auctoritate, aliquando fierent, ad modum alterius & novi Interim, usque dum novâ divinâque ad extruendam aliam Ecclesiâ missione accederent ministri, quales Apostoli fuerunt, Ecclesiâ ex Christi præscripto novam erecturi, qua jam divinâ missione ad erigendam per Reformationem aliam Ecclesiâ omnes, juxta eum, careant. Tomo primo, pag. ult. in delineatione istius Ecclesiæ sic loquitur: "Raro, aut nunquam utuntur hic humanis glossis, non quod peccatum sit, sed quia incertum, à sole ad stellâ, & à fontibus ad cisternas recurrere. Atque ita etiam nemo hic sibi (absque certâ & speciali missione) arrogat docendi officium, ut eum auctoritate mandet vel prohibeat, bene quidem ut sub meliori sententiâ admoneat, idque ex Scripturâ (1)." — This Coornhert in many parts of his works . . . proposes some plan for erecting a common church, in which, the text of the scripture alone is to be read, without glosses and expositions, and admonitions out of the scripture to be sometimes delivered as matter of advice, not authority, in the manner of a second and new Interim; till ministers should come, such as the apostles were, with a new and divine commission, to found a new church, after the institution of Christ; which divine authority, for erecting another church by a reformation, all, according to him, want. In his first volume, pag. ult. in delineating that church, he thus expresses himself: "Here they seldom or never, use human glosses; not because it is unlawful, but because of the uncertainty of running from the sun to the stars, from springs to cisterns. And thus also no one here (without a certain and special appointment) arrogates to himself the office of teaching, so as to command, or forbid, with authority, but fetches admonitions solely from the scripture." This visionary would have had the magistrates lay their injunctions on the preachers to say nothing but what was contained, word for word, in the scripture, and to oblige the laity, under the penalty of a fine, to lay aside all their divinity books. You will see this more exactly in these Latin words (2): "Hoc libello vel dialogo (3) ita sententiam suam exponit: existimo, Magistratui significandum, quæcunque scripta humana, glossas, dogmatæ quid impuri, errores & ambages continere, à quibus omnibus immunis est Scriptura, certam pandens salutis viam. Quare reverenter rogandus esset, ut vellet, ad modum novi alicujus Interim, (& hoc ad tempus usque quo concorditer decretum esset quæ doctrina sequenda foret) omnibus Concionatoribus interdiceret, ne è suggestu populum aliud quid docerent, prælegerent, dicerent, præter claram Scripturæ textum,

(a) Id. ibid. pag. 435, 437.

(3) Pra. de m. nendum Sociâ.

(1) Hoornbeeck, Summa Controv. lib. vi, pag. m. 435, 436.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 435, 436.

(c) Ex opugnata in herbis Reformatione nostrarum Ecclesiarum, præsertim nostra Catechesi, & probata sibi nec nostra Ecclesiâ, nec aliis, solum intentus carpendis omnibus, & magnis imoietis dis omnibus, Calvinum dico, Bezum, Dancum, Saraviam, alios, gloriam hinc inanem inter suos occupatos fuit. Id. ibid.

advice. He did not believe, that, in order to be a true Christian, one ought to be a member of any particular church, and he practised it accordingly [B]; for he neither communicated with the Catholics, nor with the Protestants, nor with any other sect. He wrote with great assurance against the Reformed Religion, and particularly against Calvin and Beza (c), and was accounted such a disturber of religion, that the magistrates of Delft expelled him from their town, and the States of Holland decreed many things, upon which he complained, that the Inquisition was renewed (d). Nothing appeared to him more contrary to reason and the Gospel, than to persecute those, who are not of the religion of the state. He wrote thereupon against Beza and Lipsius [C]. He died

"textum, citra unius syllabæ aut additionem aut demotionem, quomodo in Veteri Novoque Testamento solebat fieri. Hoc demum pasto sectas evanitas. Præterea populo sub multâ injungendum esset, ut omnes suos libros de Scripturâ tractantes, quæ ipsæ non essent mera Scriptura, ad manus Magistratus deferrent, ibique servarentur, ut vel redderentur postmodum suis Dominis, vel prout visum foret, de illis disponderetur. Hæc Coornhertus. — In this book, or dialogue, he thus lays down his opinion: "I think, the magistrate should be told, that all human writing and glosses contain something impure, errors, and intricacies, from all which the scripture is free, which shows the true way to salvation. Therefore he is respectfully to be desired to forbid all preachers to teach, read, or deliver any thing from the pulpit, to the people, besides the plain text of the scripture, without adding, or taking away, one syllable, as was wont to be done in the Old and New Testament; and this, till it be unanimously decreed what doctrine is to be followed. By this means sects will be at an end. Besides, the people should be obliged, under penalty, to give into the magistrate all their books of Divinity, but such as are meer scripture, to be kept by him, and afterwards returned to the owners, or otherwise disposed of, as shall be thought proper." Thus Coornbert.

[B] He did not believe, that one ought to be a member of any particular church, and be practised it accordingly.] Not believing, that there was any Christian society upon earth, that was pure, and directed by true pastors, he no where communicated at the Lord's table. He denied not, but that, for the security of the weak, there ought to be an external communion appointed; but he pretended, that no body ought to ascribe to himself a heavenly mission, or teach the necessity of the use of the sacraments. This is the sum of the following Latin words. Coornhertus palam scribebat inter omnes sectas se nullibi Christi Ecclesiam deprehendere; Romanum nostrâ, quam ne quidem Ecclesiæ nomine dignabatur, meliorem esse. Tom. I. in Dialogis, fol. 484, nec S. Cœnam ullibi id circo participabat, quia veram Ecclesiam, & legitimos ministros scilicet desiderabat: unde & communio illam esse necessitatem, quæ vulgo docetur, negabat. Tom. I. lib. Confessorium, in initio. Tom. III. in Delineatione impartialis Ecclesiæ: ubi statim à principio docet, posse nunc quem esse verum Christianum, utcumque non sit membrum visibilis alicujus Ecclesiæ: Rogatusque, quid præstaret, an extra visibilem Ecclesiam vivere, quousque ipse Deus per certos Ministros Ecclesiam restauraret; an Ecclesiam, infirmorum gratiâ, non valentium vivere absque externâ illâ formâ, quin ad Sectarum partes prolabantur, colligere? respondit: prius quidem esse magis certum; at secundum videri sibi necessarium. Collapsam quidem esse Dei Ecclesiam, sed non apparere manifestum mandatum eam restaurandi: attamen ovile aliquod pro infirmis, adversus varios lupos defendendis, sub tali nempe libertate, qua nemo sibi arroget, à Deo se ad docendum missum esse, & Sacramentorum Baptismi ac Cœnæ usus relinquatur liber, pro infirmis habendum: nullum verò istorum urgeri debere præceptum, aut necessitatem (4). — Coornbert openly declared in writing, that, among all the sects, he no where found the church of Christ; that the Romish was better than ours, which he did not think worthy the name of a church; nor did he communicate with any, because he could not find a true church, or lawful ministers: whence he denied there was that necessity of communicating, which is commonly taught; Tom. I. lib. Confess. at the beginning: Tom. III. in Delineat. impartial. Eccles. where he begins with laying it down, that one may, now, be a good Christian,

(4) Hoornbeck, ibid. pag. 438.

"without being a member of any visible church; and being asked which was the best, to live without the pale of a visible church, till God should restore it by proper ministers, or to unite a church, for the sake of the weak, who are unable to live without that external form, and must otherwise fall off to the sects? he replied, that the first was more sure; but that he thought the latter necessary: that the church of God was fallen; but that there did not appear an evident command to restore it; nevertheless, that there must be a fold for the weak, to defend them against the many wolves; to wit, under such a liberty, that no one should pretend a commission from God to teach, and that the use of the sacraments of Baptism, and the Eucharist, should be left free, for the sake of the weak; but that no precept or necessity should be pleaded for such things."

[C] He wrote concerning persecution against Beza and Lipsius.] There is something to be found fault with in these words of Voëtius: "Coornhertus qui Latino Dialogo contra Lipsii politicam hanc causam agit eundemque Dialogum postea contra Lipsii responsum (cui tit. adversus Dialogistam) defendit, idem Belgico scripto Processum de Hæreticidâ edidit contra Bezam (5). — Coornbert, who, in a Latin dialogue against Lipsius's Politics, pleads this cause, and afterwards defends the same dialogue against Lipsius's answer, intitled Adversus Dialogistam, published, in Dutch, a piece against Beza, intitled, Processus de Hæreticidâ." It is not true, that Koornhert's dialogue against Lipsius's Politics is in Latin: it is in Dutch (6). Voëtius himself acknowledges it in a passage which I shall presently cite. Note likewise, that the title of that Dutch book answers to Lit. seu Processus de Hæreticidâ. Koornhert's Reply is in Latin (7); it had been larger, if he had lived longer (8). The title of it is: Defensio Processus de non occidendis hæreticis contra tria capita libri IV Politicorum J. Lipsii: ejusque Libri adversus Dialogistam confutatio. Sub extremum mortis fatum per suæ patriæ libertatis studiosissimum THEODORUM VOLCHARDUM COORNHERT conscripta. The edition I make use of is of Hanaw, 1593. If you desire to see what perplexity Lipsius was thrown into by that reply, read what follows: "Lipsius petitus libello Belgico à Diederico Volckero Coornbert, postea libro, de Una religione dicto Died. Coornbert reposito addidit, se veram & probam intelligere: sed non explicat, & explicaturum se negat, quænam sit vera & proba religio. Hinc dictus Coornhertus in refutatione libelli Lipsiani anno 1591. tit. Defensio processus de non occidendis hæreticis, &c. ita constrinxit Lipsium, ut à Papiistica, aut Ethnico-Machiavellica (quarum alterutram pectore premebat, quamvis tunc Leidæ conciones publicas frequentaret) se liberare non potuerit. Et hanc unam putant ex causis præcipuis fuisse, cur statione Leidensi turpiter deserta hypocriticos larvam deponeret, ad partes hostiles transfugeret, atque ibi Papiismi professionem susciperet (9). — Lipsius, being attacked in a Dutch book by Theodore Volcker Coornbert, afterwards in his book, of the one Religion, against the said Coornbert, added, that he meant the right and true religion: but he does not explain, and declares he never will, which is the right and true religion. Hence the said Coornbert, in the refutation of Lipsius's book in the year 1591, intitled, Defensio, &c. drove Lipsius to such extremities, that he could not clear himself from the Popish, or Heathen-Machiavellican, one of which he concealed in his breast, tho' at that time he frequented the public sermons at Leyden. And this is thought to be one of the principal reasons, why he shamefully left Leyden, threw off the mask of hypocrisy, went over to the enemy, and openly professed the Popish religion." Add to this the remark [B] of the article L I P S I U S.

8 H

[D] He

(d) Voëtius, de Politia Ecclesiæ. Tom. II, pag. 454.

(5) Voëtius, de Politia Ecclesiæ. Tom. II, pag. 386.

(6) Plebeia (scriptio) futilis, & concepta plebeio stilo. Lipsius, in Pref. libri de una Religione adversus Dialogistam.

(7) He wrote it in Dutch; but his heirs procured it to be translated into Latin.

(8) See the advertisement to the reader, at the end of that Reply.

(9) Voëtius, ubi supra, pag. 433.

(c) See the advertisement to the reader, at the end of his Reply to Lipfius. Note, that Konig has wrongly placed his death in the year 1599.

(f) Ludov. Guicciard. in Descript. Belgii, cap. de Antuerpia, pag. m. 118.

(g) He is mistaken; for Coornhert was a native of Amsterdam.

the twentieth of October 1590 (c), acknowledging the doctrine of Predestination, which he had so much opposed [D]. His works were published in the year 1630, in three volumes in folio. He began to study somewhat late [E]. Lewis Guicciardin (f), speaks of an excellent Engraver, a native of Haerlem (g), whose name was THEODORUS COORNHERT. He is doubtless the same that is mentioned in Freherus's Theatrum [F], and who makes the subject of this article. This is all I could collect from some Latin books; and I was ready to send it to the press, with the six first remarks subjoined to it, not thinking to add any thing else, when, being informed that Coornhert's Life was prefixed, in Dutch, to his works, I procured some extracts to be made out of it, which have occasioned the addition of what follows. They import, that Koornhert was born in 1522, of an antient and good family of Amsterdam; that he took a journey into Spain and Portugal when he was very young; that, at his return, he married against the intention of his father's will, and without consulting his mother; that his wife having hardly any fortune, he was obliged to get into the service of Renaud de Brederode baron of Vianen; that he became his steward, and got into his favour; but quickly left him, because he could not reconcile himself to a court life; that he settled at Haerlem, and maintained himself by Engraving; that, having some scruples about some matters of Divinity, and thinking he could find them resolved in St Augustin, and in some other fathers, he learned the Latin tongue at thirty years of age, wherein he made such a progress, that he soon found himself able to translate Tully's Offices, and several other books, into Dutch; that he understood Music and Poetry; that he was very good company at table, but his mirth was inoffensive, and that he never exceeded the rules of sobriety; that he loved to work, and made it a law to himself to be but six hours in bed; that he was made notary in 1561, and secretary to the town of Haerlem in 1562, and secretary to the burgomasters of the same town in 1564; that in 1565 and 1566, he was frequently deputed to the prince of Orange, governor of Holland; that he had several conferences with Henry de Brederode upon the subject of the troubles [G] that began to rise in the Low-Countries, and of the famous petition, that was presented to the dukes of Parma in April 1566; that he was carried away by force from Haerlem, and removed to the Hague, where he endured a long and severe imprisonment; that there he wrote several poems in Dutch, that his wife, being persuaded he would never have his liberty, endeavoured to catch the plague, that so, infecting him, they might both die together, that he severely reprimanded her for it, and commanded her patiently to submit to providence; that he vindicated himself so well, that he was released, and only prohibited to go out of the Hague; that, understanding there were fresh orders come from Brussels to re-imprison him, he privately retired to Haerlem, and afterwards into the country of Cleves, where he maintained himself

[D] He died acknowledging the doctrine of Predestination, which he had so much opposed.] He cried out, as he was dying, my God, from thee I have my soul; it is in thy power to save, or reprobate it, according to thy good pleasure; I have no reason to complain. 'Obiit a. 1590 xc, & quod valde obervandum, is qui tam impotenter de Prædestinatione multa, sibi nequaquam intellecta, adversus Theologos nostros conscripsit, sub mortem, veritatem ejus in se sentire & agnoscere coactus fuit, ad Deum exclamans: "se animam suam ab eo possidere, quam Deo integrum fit pro suo beneplacito servare, an reponere, sibi nil esse quod conquatur." Quod nil est, quam vim & summam prædestinationis divinæ in nobis aut salvandis, aut abjiciendis, pro Deo summo in nos omnes arbitrio, proprio sensu confiteri, & in morte sincerius testari, quam tot infrunitis & impetuosis adversus eam scriptis, per vitam (10). — He died in the year 1590, and, what is very remarkable, he, who had written so violently against our divines, concerning the doctrine of Predestination, which he did not well understand; at the time of his death was sensible of the truth of it, and forced to acknowledge it, crying out to God; "that he received his soul from him, which he might save, or damn, as he pleased, and that he had nothing to complain of." Which is nothing else, but acknowledging, that he felt the force of the divine Predestination in saving, or rejecting us, according to his supreme authority over every one of us, and bearing testimony to it, at his death, with more sincerity, than he had opposed it, in such vehement writings, during his life." This citation was necessary, considering the reflexions it contains, and may suggest.

[E] He began to study somewhat late.] I have seen at the Hague, in Mr Van Beuning's library, the works of Theodore Volcard (11) Coornhert, in Dutch. He was an Enthusiast, who had a very ready wit. He learned of himself Greek and Latin (12), at forty years of age, and made so great a progress in these two languages, that he translated into Dutch any author he had a mind to. He wrote several treatises of Divinity, some of which have been consulted by Calvin and Danæus. He wrote also against Lipfius, who answered him, in his book De una Religione. The Hollanders speak of him as of a wonderful man. He died in the year 1590, being sixty eight years old (13). There are some exaggerations in this passage of Colomies. I have read in a good author, that Koornhert was but thirty years old, when he began to study the Latin tongue (14). He never was a great master of it, and his writings have been in no great repute for this long time. Note, that Boxhornius (15) says most of the things contained in this passage of Colomies.

[F] In Freherus's Theatrum.] There we see, that Theodorus Cornhertzius, an excellent Sculptor, exercised his art with praise at Amsterdam, where he was born, and left many works made upon the model of Martin Hemskerck, whom he imitated. He was also a good Poet; he died at Tergou, in the year 1590, being seventy eight years of age (16). This is our Koornhert: but it should have been said, that he lived sixty eight years, and not seventy eight. See the margin (17).

[G] He had several conferences with Henry de Brederode, upon the subject of the troubles.] Koornhert had been steward to Renaud de Brederode, and had done him good services. By that he discovered himself to the best advantage to Henry de Brederode, Renaud's son. He conferred with him at Vianen, and at Utrecht, Amsterdam, and Haerlem, about the means of preserving the liberty of their country, and he engaged him to present to the dukes of Parma, the petition, which had such remarkable consequences. He was the author of the first Manifesto that prince William published in his camp (18), the title of which was, Advice to the inhabitants of the Low-Countries, for the law, for the king, and for the flock (19). Bor, who mentions that Manifesto, in the fourth book of his history, fol. 182, declared to some people that he knew very well, that Koornhert had writ it (20).

[H] Bring

(10) Hoornbeck, ubi supra, pag. 431.

(11) Volcard was his father's name, and not his own.

(12) It is said in his Life, that Dr John Balfus, who was afterwards counsellor to the prince of Orange, taught him the Latin tongue. No mention is made of the Greek.

(13) Colomies, Melanges Historiques, pag. 43.

(14) Vir ingenui quidem aliquis, sed ut æquitate quippe ut auctorem verum XXX linguam Latinam cupit addiscere, lra, &c. Horak ad Japra.

(15) Boxhornius in Theatro Hollandicæ, cap. de arte Amstelodami, pag. m. 263.

(16) Paul Freherus in Theatro, pag. 1483. He quotes the Academia Germ. Pictorem Joach. à Sandrart.

(17) Freherus should have called him an Engraver, and not a Sculptor, and should have said, that he practised his trade at Haerlem, and not at Amsterdam.

(18) In Decembris. 1566.

(19) It is the translation of the Dutch title.

(20) Taken from the extracts, imparted to me, in Latin, out of the Dutch Life of Theodorus Koornhert.

himself by his old trade of Engraving; that, the States of Holland having firmly resolved to maintain their liberty against the Spanish tyranny, he returned into his country, and was honoured with the post of secretary to the States of the province; that endeavouring to oppose the disorders committed by the soldiery, and being deputed to take information of them, he became so odious to the commanders of those insolent troops [H], that, to save his life, he thought fit to exile himself; that, having written to the prince of Orange, and to the States of Holland, the reasons of his retreat, he took refuge at Embden; that, after things were restored to a better state, he returned to Haerlem; that he engaged in disputes, wherein he was opposed by the most zealous ministers; that he published several pieces in defence of his cause, and maintained it by word of mouth, at Leyden, and at the Hague; that, to be the more ready to enter the lists, he went and lived at the Hague; that, these verbal disputes having been prohibited by authority [I], he often intreated the States, and the ministers, and particularly at the [H] Being deputed to take information of the disorders committed by the soldiery, he became so odious to the commanders of those insolent troops. The captains, who were conscious of many extortions, thought themselves of a very effectual expedient, to prevent a discovery; which was to cry down Koornhert, as a dangerous Papist, and thereby expose him to a thousand dangers. They found a very specious pretence for it; for he was continually saying, that it was just, and for the interest of Holland, not to persecute the Catholics, but to observe the promise, which the prince of Orange had made them concerning the free exercise of their religion, &c. The count de Lumet, who commanded the troops in Holland, was far from standing to this promise. Koornhert very boldly condemned this conduct; whereupon he was diffamed, as a most accursed favourer of Popery. The count de Lumet, to whom he had been represented in black colours, swore his destruction and gave orders to kill him. There was no safety for him in the highways of the country, nor in the streets of the town: he had recourse to the protection of the prince of Orange; but that was not sufficient to balance the great credit this count had with the soldiery. Wherefore Koornhert was obliged to retire into the country of Cleves (21). This happened in the year 1572. Note, that he favoured so little the cause of the Spaniards, that he was expressly excepted in the Amnity, which Lewis de Requesens caused to be published at Brussels, in the year 1574, for all those who should in two months time receive absolution in the confessional of the priests (22). Here follows a passage, which shews, that he did not love the church of Rome, and yet was for granting the Papists liberty of conscience.

The private exercise of their religion was forbidden in Holland, in 1581. Some among them employed Koornhert to draw up a petition addressed to the prince of Orange, by which they desired to be maintained in the exercise of their religion, in the monasteries of Haerlem, and in the temple, which the Protestants had quitted, after they became masters of the great church. Koornhert, being obliged to appear before the burgomasters of Haerlem, on account of that writing, delivered it into their hands, according to the order he had received, and declared, that he did not undertake the defence of it, any more than that of Popery, which he considered as a den of murder; but that, nevertheless, he was persuaded, that it was a piece of injustice to break one's word with the Roman Catholics, and to force their conscience. The burgomasters gave this petition to the prince of Orange, who sent it back to the States; these sent for the burghers of Haerlem, who had signed it, and ordered them to cancel their names. They ordered also Koornhert to tear the draught of it; all which was executed (23).

[I] These verbal disputes having been prohibited by authority. Here are some circumstances of those disputes. They began at Delft, in the year 1578; and what occasioned them was, that a certain person, who quitted the church of Rome, to embrace the Reformed, alledged such reasons for his change, as shewed he understood neither of them very well. Koornhert tells him very freely, what remains to be examined, is, whether you have chosen a religion better than that you have left. He was called to an account for this discourse; for a clamour was raised about it, and it was odiously represented: which occasioned the conference betwixt Koornhert, and two ministers of Delft, which turned upon the notes of the true church. He undertook to prove, that the churches, which followed the doctrines of John Calvin, and Theodore Beza, were false; and he grounded himself upon three points; predestination, justification, and the punishment of Heretics. The conference was scarce begun, when the States of the province put an end to it: it was renewed by their order, and in the presence of their commissioners, at Leyden, the fourteenth of April; but it lasted only a day and a half; Koornhert complaining, that his adversaries made an ill use of the secular authority against him, retired. He boasted, that he had reduced the two ministers to their last shifts, though he was not permitted to attack them upon the third point (24); he pretended that his naming Calvin and Beza served as a subterfuge to his adversaries, because the commissioners said, that he knew very well, the States would not suffer the names of those two Geneva ministers to come into the dispute, and that therefore he ought to expect their indignation. Finding himself thus threatened, he declared, he would not return to a conference, where he had not an entire liberty of speech. The ministers and commissioners failed not to appear at the place, where the dispute began. They said for Koornhert, sent to his lodgings, and took his absence for a flight, and an undoubted proof of his defeat. The States of Holland caused the magistracy of Haerlem to forbid him to write any thing concerning that dispute (25).

Some years after, he wrote against the Catechism of Heidelberg, which was received by the Reformed Churches of Holland. He addressed this piece to the States of the province, and, with a prodigious boldness represented to them the mischiefs of receiving this Catechism, and of the design, the ministers had, said he, of imposing on every body the necessity of thinking and speaking like themselves. He desired, that those misfortunes might be prevented, and offered to prove what he advanced. The ministers, on their part, presented a writing to the States, full of complaints against Koornhert, and declared themselves ready to justify their propositions. The States after mature deliberation, resolved, with the approbation of the prince of Orange, to make Koornhert dispute with the ministers before fifteen deputies. Hadrian Saravia, professor of Divinity at Leyden, was chosen to be a disputant for the ministers; a notary was appointed him, and another to Koornhert, that whatever should be said, on both sides, might be authentically set down in writing. The dispute began at the Hague, the twenty seventh of October, 1583, and continued to the third of November, when Koornhert desired leave of the commissioners to go to Haerlem, to see his wife, who was upon her death-bed. The dispute began again, the twenty eighth of November; but because Saravia, for four days together, had dictated very long writings to his notary, the deputies resolved to send Koornhert home, there to compose his answer. It were more polite than the writing of Saravia, and was confuted by a reply of the ministers, that was much longer. The States finding, that one article, among fifty, that were to be examined, took up so many sessions, thought there would never be an end of this affair, and interrupted the course of it. Koornhert boasted of his victory, and that he had settled himself at the Hague, that he might be the more at hand to dispute. The order of the States for interrupting the conferences, hindered not the parties from attacking one another in writing (26).

(24) Vie. The punishment of Heretics.

(25) Ibid. ex pag. 507, ad ann. 1578.

(26) Ibid. ex lib. xii. pag. 693, 694, 605, ad ann. 1583.

(21) Taken from the extracts, imported to me, in Latin, out of Gerard Brandt's Dutch History, Part. I. lib. ix, pag. 535, ad ann. 1572.

(22) Ibid. ex lib. xi, pag. 553.

(23) Ibid. ex lib. xii, pag. 667, 668, ad ann. 1581.

synod of Tergou, to permit that they should be continued and ended; that he presented a petition upon this subject to the prince of Orange; that he strengthened it with many arguments; that he belought him to order it so, that, if his petition was rejected, he might at least have leave to go on in modestly and christianly confuting errors, and thereby enjoy the liberty of conscience, which had been purchased with so much pains; that, in case of a refusal, he begged, as the last favour, permission to retire into some neighbouring country, in friendship with Holland, to spend the rest of his days in finishing an Index to the holy Scriptures, upon which he had laboured twenty six years, and also to prevent the oppression of his conscience, the dangers of his person, the miseries of poverty, and the scandal of the Reformed church; that he desired to have a safe conduct; that he promised he would return to the Hague, to terminate the dispute, when they should think fit to recall him; that all his requests being rejected, he nevertheless publicly declared, that he found great errors in the Heidelberg Catechism; that he got many enemies by it; that he was disparaged from the pulpit, and elsewhere; that he was loaded with invectives and calumnies; that he met with a great many troubles and vexations, this having prejudiced and provoked several people against him; that he always prudently and constantly bore up against this adversity; that there is great probability that he was protected by the prince of Orange [K]; that no one at that time wrote so strenuously as he for the liberty of the country, and for that of conscience [L]; that his writings against the doctrine of Predestination and original sin were strengthened with so many arguments, that the consistory of Amsterdam having ordered James Arminius to confute them some years after, this minister answered, that he did not see, that either he or any body else could answer them from Scripture (b); that, having almost finished his Dutch version of Erasmus's Paraphrase (i), he was seized with a distemper, in which he signalized his patience, and held most edifying discourses, till he expired, full of confidence in God, the twenty ninth (k) of October, 1590; that he was buried at Tergou (l); that he would neither be buried at Amsterdam, where he was born, nor at Haerlem, where he spent most of his time; that he has been praised by Isaac Pontanus, in the description of Amsterdam, and by Grotius, and even by Justus Lipsius his adversary. This is what I gather from the Latin extracts, communicated to me out of Koornhert's Life, written in Dutch. Some other things there are, which I shall put in the remarks. I shall also make use of some Latin extracts, taken from Gerard Brandt's book, I mean the Dutch history which he wrote concerning the reformation of the Netherlands. They have been made by the same person, who imparted to me those of Koornhert's Life, and who understands well the Dutch tongue, and is very exact. I think they may be depended on.

(b) See, below, the text of the article ARMINIUS, between citations (b) and (c).

(i) Upon the New Testament.

(k) I have quoted, above, an author, who says the twentieth, but probably this difference proceeds from that of the old and new Style, and from this, that when a man dies in the night between the ninth and tenth day of a month, for instance, some say he died the ninth, others that he died the twentieth.

(l) In the great church, with a very honorable epitaph composed by his good friend Henry Laurence Spiegel. See Gerard Brandt's History of the Reformation in the Netherlands, book xv, ad. ann. 1590.

(27) Ibid. ex lib. xv, pag. 759, ad ann. 1589.

(28) Taken from the extracts of Koornhert's Life.

(29) Ibid.

(30) Extracts of Brandt's History, lib. xv, pag. 757.

(31) Ibid.

(32) In the duchy of Cleves.

The synod of South Holland being assembled at Tergou in August 1589, Koornhert, who lived in the same town, sent a letter to the assembly, to offer them a fresh battle. The synod having read the letter, sent it back to the author, and declared they had nothing more to do with him, and that, if he desired any thing, he must address himself to the States (27). [K] There is great probability, that he was protected by the prince of Orange. It is certain, that this prince, knowing him to be a man of parts, a great lover of liberty, and a great enemy to the Spaniards, thought him a fit man for the affairs of that time. He made use of his pen on several occasions; he gave him several commissions; he desired they would recall him from his exile (28); and one can hardly apprehend, how Koornhert could have withstood his enemies, if he had not been under-hand supported by a very powerful and well-managed protection; for he observed no measures in relation to the public doctrine of the churches; he attacked the mission of their ministers, condemned all sects, and was for leaving an entire liberty to the Roman Catholics, which, considering the circumstances of those times, would have been very dangerous. His censure on the Catechism of Heidelberg was so bold and insulting, that, since the States of Holland, who had it examined by a professor of divinity, and a minister, were contented to order, that the copies should be put into the hands of the magistrates (29), he must needs have had a powerful support. If the prince of Orange had been alive, when Koornhert went to live at Delft, I do not think the magistrates would have commanded him to depart in twenty four hours, as they did in the year 1588 (30). Some persons tried to get him imprisoned for the rest of his life; but the prince and the supreme magistrates rejected that proposal (31).

[L] No one . . . wrote so strenuously as he for the liberty of the country, and for that of conscience. Whilst he was at Santen (32) in a voluntary exile, in the year 1574, he drew up the plan of a book, to shew all Christian princes, that the conduct of the provinces, which opposed the king of Spain, and the duke of Alba, was not a rebellion, nor a popular itch of pulling down images, but an emanation of the supreme authority, which the people have to defend their rights, their laws, and the liberty of conscience. Add to this what I say in the remark [H]. The acts of the pacification of Cologne, begun in the year 1579, which were published at Delft, with the licence of the States, and with excellent notes by Haggai Albada, Koornhert's intimate friend, are thought to be the work of the latter. Eusebius Philaletes ascribes all this to him, in a book printed in 1617. See likewise Koornhert's first treatise against Justus Lipsius. He wrote a piece in the year 1584, concerning the means of refuting the king of Spain, and he shewed, among other things, that it was necessary to put themselves under the protection of France. Being persuaded, that the Christian peace was one of the most important doctrines of the Gospel, and that it could not be maintained, but by reducing the truths necessary to salvation, to a small number, and by permitting the difference of opinions with respect to other doctrines, he laboured with all his might to put things upon that foot. He took the advantage of the great Erasmus's opinion (33), and agreed with two doctors of the Reformed church (34); and it seems, that prince William was somewhat inclined that way. Consult the History of Bor, book 21. fol. 107.

(33) In epistola ad Archiepiscopum Panormitanum. Operibus Hilarii presbiteri.

(34) Hubert Duvellius, and Tucco Sylvestri.

(35) That is, of professing whatever is dictated by the conscience and

and that all pious people, who, by faith in JESUS CHRIST, endeavoured to imitate him, are good Christians, and that the magistrates ought to account all peaceable people, good subjects (36). He was so full of this hypothesis, that, to the prejudice of his tranquillity and temporal interests, he made use of all his courage, parts, and learning to maintain it (37).

(36) Extracts of Koornhert's Life.

(37) The Dutch Disfich, made by Peter Hooff, to be put under Koornhert's print, imported, that he had been insatiable of knowledge and liberty.

KORN MANNUS (HENRY) a German Civilian, author of some curious treatises [A], of which there are several editions. He lived in the beginning of the XVIIth century.

[A] He is author of some curious treatises. That, which is intitled, de Virginitatis jure Tractatus novus & jucundus, ex Jure civili, canonico, Patribus, Historicis, Poëtis, &c. confectus; and that which is commonly printed with it, with this title, Linea Amoris, sive Commentarius in versiculum Gl. visus, colloquium, convivius, oscula, factum, have been often printed. The oldest edition I know of them, is of Francfort, 1610. It is a great and fruitful subject; but the author runs over it, and examines nothing to the bottom, and what he says is very common. He may please those, who love brevity. His other works are, Templum naturæ historicum, seu de natura & miraculis quatuor elementorum, De miraculis vivorum, seu de natura, proprietatibus, &c. hominum vivorum, at Francfort 1614. De miraculis mortuorum, &c. It has been said, that Kirchmannus, in his book de Funeribus Romanorum, borrows a great deal from this last work of our Kornmannus (1). And yet I do not find, that the book de Miraculis mortuorum, came out before the year 1610; whereas the book, intitled de Funeribus Romanorum, was printed in 1604. It is true, the author gave a new edition of it in 1625, and he might have made use of our Kornmannus's work for his additions. This we may examine another time, if we have leisure.

(1) Anton. Borremans, Varior. Lectio. cap. IV, pag. 32.

KORTHOLT (CHRISTIAN) doctor and professor of Divinity at Kiel, was born the fifteenth of January 1633, at Burg in the isle of Femeren (a). He was instructed both in piety and learning, with great care, at his father's house, and in the school of Burg, till he was sixteen years of age; after which he was sent to Sleswic, where he pursued his studies for two years. He afterwards studied in the college of Stetin, where he gave public proofs of his progress; for he maintained two Theses (b), one De veracitate & taciturnitate, the other, De natura Philosophiæ, ejusque in Theologia usu. He was author of the latter. Being come to Rostoch, in the year 1652, he was a diligent attendant on the professors lectures, and successfully maintained two other Theses (c), of which he composed the first. The death of his father obliged him to leave this university, at the years end; but he returned thither some months after, and gave new proofs of his knowledge, both by the Thesis de Christo θεανθρώπῳ, which he composed, and publicly defended, and by the lectures he read at home in Logic, Metaphysics, and Hebrew. He solemnly took his degree of doctor in Philosophy, in the year 1656; and then he went to study in the university of Iëna, where he acquired great reputation by the academical acts, in which he was sometimes Respondent, and sometimes Moderator, and by the private lectures he read upon Philosophy, the Oriental tongues, and Divinity. He left the university of Iëna, in 1660, and visited those of Leipzig and Wittemberg, and afterwards returned to Rostock, where he shewed his capacity several ways; so that, in February 1662, he was made professor of the Greek tongue. He took his doctor of Divinity's degree in November the same year. Not long before, his parts and learning discovered themselves, in three disputes with the Roman Catholics [A], in the presence of Christian, duke of Mecklenburg. He married on the twenty sixth of April 1664, and was invited the following year to be second professor of Divinity in the university lately founded at Kiel. He was created Vice-chancellor in the year 1666, and in 1675 he succeeded Peter Musæus, who had the first Divinity chair. He was so desirous to make this new university flourish, and had so much gratitude for the kindness, which the duke of Holstein, his master, shewed him, that he refused all the preferments that were offered him in several places, though they were noble and honourable. This prince procured him the professorship of Ecclesiastical Antiquities, in 1680, and declared him perpetual Vice-chancellor of the university in the year

(a) Near the Baltic Sea, in the country of Holstein.

(b) That is, two dissertations, and not meer positions.

(c) One was de supposito & personis, and the other de sphaera activitatis.

[A] His parts and learning appeared in three disputes with the Roman Catholics. These are the particulars we find upon that subject in his funeral programma. "An. MDCLXI. à Serenissimo Duce Mecklenburgico, CHRISTIANO, Principe eruditione, facundia, comitateque singulari prædito, per Cancellarium ejus, D. CHRISTOPHORUM KRAUTHOFIUM, invitabatur in aulam Suerinensem, ad colloquium cum Pontificio Austriaco, EGGEFELDIO, viro quidem docto, sed admodum supercilioso, de religionis negotio, habendum. Quod & in conspectu multorum aulae Procerum, ac peregrinorum etiam, qui fortè tunc aderant, institutum, ac postero die cum alio Pontificio Polono, ELLERNIZKIO, continuatum est Stinchenburgi, ipso Principe præsentem, qui cum illuc accessit clementerque acceptum toto officio secum retinuit. A quo & sequenti anno MDCLXII. denuò ad certamen, cum Pontificio quodam Parisiensi, cui nomen de la BUISSON (1) erat, ibidem instituendum, provocatus comparuit, in eoque de gravissimis religionis controversiis cum omnium applausu per aliquot dies disputavit. — In the year 1661, CHRISTIAN, duke of Mecklenburg, a prince of singular learning, eloquence, and affability, invited him, by his chancellor, CHRISTOPHER KRAUTHOF, to the court of Suerin, to a conference, to be held, concerning the business of religion, with EGGEFELD, a Roman Catholic of Austria, a learned man indeed, but very supercilious. Which was begun in the presence of many of the courtiers, and also strangers, and continued, the next day, with another Roman Catholic, a Polisher, named ELLERNIZK, in the presence of the prince himself, who, having invited, and received him graciously, retained him with him eight days. And being again called by the same prince, the following year 1662, to dispute with a Roman Catholic of Paris, named du BUISSON, he appeared, and disputed some days, with universal applause, concerning the most important controversies of religion."

(1) It should be de Buisson.

[B] He

(d) It is, at the bottom the same thing with rector, because there was no other rector at Kiel, but the prince himself, who founded that university.

year 1689. He discharged the duties of all those places, and of that of Vice-rector (d), (which fell five times to him) with great ability, application, and prudence. His death, which happened the thirty first of March, 1694, was a very great loss to the university of Kiel, and to the Republic of Letters, which he had enriched with a great number of books [B], to which he might have added many more, if he had lived longer. He left two sons, who tread very worthily in his steps (e) [C].

[B] He enriched the Republic of Letters with a great number of books. I have seen the catalogue of them, which was printed at Kiel in the year 1694. Some are in High-Dutch, and others in Latin. The titles of the Latin are these: Tractatus de Origine & Progressu Philosophiæ Barbaricæ. Jenæ in 4. 1660. Tractatus de Persecutionibus Ecclesiæ primitivæ, veterumque Martyrum Cruciatibus ibid. in 8. 1660. Prodiit longe accuratior, & triplo auctior, Kilonii ann. 1689. in 4. Valerianus Confessor, hoc est, solida Demonstratio, quod Ecclesia Romana hodierna non sit vera Christi Ecclesia; deducta ex Valer. Magni, Capucini, Apologia Anti-Jesuitica. Rost. in 12. 1662. Opusculum illud auctior Kilonii in 4. est editum 1666. Dissertatio de Nestorianismo. ibid. in 4. 1662. Tractatus de Calumniis Paganorum in veteres Christianos. Rostochii, in 4. 1663. Longe auctior publicatus est Kilonii anno 1668 novoque plane habitu, in tres Libros distinctus, brevi, V. D. & Typographeo Kiloniensi proditurus est (2). Exercitatio in Historiam Judith. Rostoch. in 4. 1663. Exercitatio in Præfationem Hieronymi in Judith. ibid. in 4. 1663. Tractatus de Canone Scripturæ, Bellarmino, ejusque propugnatoribus, Gretsero & Erbemannio Jesuitis, oppositus. Rostochii, in 4. 1665. Tractatus de Religione Ethnica, Muhammedana, & Judaica. Kilonii, in 4. 1665. Oratio de Scholarum & Academiarum ortu & progressu, præsertim in Germania, inter solemnia inaugurationis Academiæ Kiloniensis habita. Sleiv. in fol. 1666. Dissertatio Historica de Philippo Arabis, Alexandri Mamæ, Plinii Junioris, & Annæi Senecæ, Christianismo. Kil. in 4. 1667. Apologia pro Valeriano Confessore, adversus Capucinum Salisburgensem, ibid. in 4. 1667. Tractatus de Variis Scripturæ sacre Editionibus. ibid. in 4. 1668. Longe auctior vulgatus est Kilonii ann. 1686. Pseudodelphia Heiniana, D. Johanni Heinio, Theologo Reformato Marpurgensi, opposita. ibid. in 4. 1669. Tractatus de Lectione Bibliorum in linguis vulgo cognitæ. ibid. in 4. 1670. Revisus & auctus Planæ recensio est anno 1692. Funus Ecclesiæ Romanæ in Clemente IX Papa defunctæ. ibid. in 4. 1670. Papa Utopicus. ibid. in 4. 1670. Tractatus de Origine & natura Christianismi ex mente Gentilium. Kil. in 4. 1672. Apologia pro Valeriano Confessore, adversus Christianum Fabrum, Gallo-Sebutianum. Kil. 4. 1673. Commentarius in Epistolam Plinii & Trajani de Christianis primævis. ibid. in 4. 1674. Commentarius in Justinum M. Athenagoram, Theophilum Antiochenum, Tatianum Assyrium. Kil. in fol. 1675. Auctior editus est Lipsiæ ann. 1686. Dissertatio de Viribus humanis in ordine ad Civilia & Spiritualia. Kil. in 4. 1676. Exercitatio anti-Salmastiana de Pane & risoria, quem in Oratione Dominica petimus. in 4. 1676. Disquisitiones anti-Baronianæ, ibid. in 4. 1677. De Tribus Impollitoribus Magnis, liber, Edoardo Herbert, Thomæ Hobbes, & Benedicto Spinozæ oppositus. Cui addita Appendix, qua Hieronymi Cardani & Edoardi Herberti de Animalitate hominis opiniones philosophicè examinatæ. ibid. in 8. 1680. Disquisitio anti-Baroniana peculiaris de Reliquiarum cultu. ibid. in 8. 1680. Tractatus de Vita & Moribus Christianis primævis per Gentilium malitiam affectis. ibid. in 4. 1683. Theses Theologicæ XXV Disputationibus publicis in Universitate Kiloniensi propositæ. ibid. in 4. 1684. Prodierunt & gentilitate sunt altera vice 1686, ac rursum anno 1692. Tractatus de Processu disputandi Papiſtico. Cui subjuncta Dissertatio de Hostiis Eucharisticis, sive Placentalis orbiculatis, quibus in S. Synaxeos administratione utimur. ibid. in 4. 1685. Exercitatio de Christo Crucifixo, Judæis scandalo, Gentilibus stultitia, Creditentibus autem Dei potentia & sapientia. 1 Cor. 1. 18, 23, 24. ibid. in 4. 1686. Exercitatio de Atheismo Veteribus Christianis, ob Templorum inprimis aversionem à Gentilibus objecto, inque eisdem à nostris retorto. ibid. in 4. 1689. Silentium Sacrum, sive, de Occultatione Myſteriorum apud veteres Christianos Dissertatio. ibid. in 4. 1689. De Studio Belli ac Pacis Dissertatio Theologica, in gratam memoriam redditæ divina clementia Cimbricis provinciis Concordiæ, restitutive feliciter Reverendiss. Serenissimique Slesvici & Holstatiæ Ducis regnantis Dn. CHR. AL-

BERTI. Ibid. in 4. 1689. De actionibus Forensibus Exercitatio Theologica. Ibid. in 4. 1690. Alexander Papa Octavus Pseudonymus. Ibid. in 4. 1690. De Magnanimitate Aristotelica, Christianæ Modellæ aliisque veris Virtutibus inimica, Dissertatio. Ibid. in 4. 1690. De Schismate, superiori seculo Protestantes inter & Pontificios enato, Dissert. Historico-Theologica, ib. in 4. 1690. Apotheosis Papæ. Ibid. in 4. 1691. In Canonem 6. Nicænum Cardd. Baronio & Bellarmino opposita Exercitatio. I id. in 4. 1691. Miscellanea Academica. Ibid. in 4. 1692. Disquisitio de Pontifice Romano. Ibid. in 4. 1692. De Rationis cum Revelatione in Theologia concursu. Ibid. in 4. 1692. De Veterum quorundam locutione illa: Filius Dei assumpsit Hominem. Ibid. in 4. 1692. De Nominibus, quibus per ludibrium & contemptum Christiani olim à profanis appellati; deque Notis occultis, quibus iidem se insignivisse crediti, Dissertatio; addita Mantissa, qua disquiruntur: Num filiola, quam octo dierum infans enixa est, Baptismi capax. Ibid. in 4. 1693. De Sacris Publicis, debita cum reverentia præsentique Numinis metu colendis, Diatribe Ascetica. Ibid. in 4. 1693.

Since his death, a tract has been published with this title, Pastor fidelis, sive de Officio Ministrorum Ecclesiæ Opusculum, at Hamburgh, 1695, in 12°. See the Acta Eruditor. (3). They have also published his Historia Ecclesiastica Novi Testamenti, at Leipzig in 1697, in 4. See the same Journal (4).

[C] He left two sons, who tread very worthily in his steps. He had ten children, five sons, and five daughters, whereof four sons and four daughters were living, when he died. The two eldest daughters were already married, one to Mr Lindeman, professor of Physics and Metaphysics at Rostock, the other to Mr Pasch, professor of Morality at Kiel (5). The eldest of the sons, HENRY CHRISTIAN KORTHOLT, studied Physic, and was then travelling in foreign countries. MATTHIAS NICOLAS KORTHOLT, and SEBASTIAN KORTHOLT, his brothers, had already given excellent proofs of their parts. JOEL JOHN KORTHOLT, the youngest of them all, studied well, and was a man of fine hopes. 'Natu minor, they are the words of the funeral programma, JOEL JOHANNES, pietatis & literarum studio diligenter incumbens, optimam de se spem excitat, quam abunde jam impleverunt ætate profectibusque multo majores, MATTHIAS NICOLAUS, & SEBASTIANUS, pluribus præclaris bonæ indolis ingenique excellentis speciminibus editis. — The younger, JOEL JOHN, applying himself diligently to piety and learning, raises the greatest hopes of himself, which MATTHIAS NICOLAUS, and SEBASTIAN, had already abundantly answered, being much his seniors both in age and proficiency, and having given many proofs of an excellent disposition and genius.' I have seen the dissertation of Poësis Episcopalis, which Mr Sebastian Kortholt printed in the year 1699, and submitted to the examination of the learned, Examini Eruditorum publico, when he was preparing to take his doctor's degree in Philosophy (6). It is a very curious piece, and it shews the great reading of the author.

Since this was printed, I have seen two other pieces of his, on which I pass the same judgment: one is intitled, Disquisitio de Entusiasmo Poëtico, and was printed at Kiel in the year 1696, in 4to; the other, De Puelis Poëtriciis emissis ab Adriano Bailleso, printed in the same place, in the year 1700, in 12mo. I have been informed also, that the author was made professor of Poetry in the university of Kiel, in February 1701, and that his brother (Matthias Nicolas) being invited to Gießen, to be professor of Eloquence and Poetry in that university, made his inaugural oration, the twenty second of June 1700. He treated De antiqua Eloquentia recentiorum perperam posposita a Carolo Peraltio scriptore libri, cujus est titulus, Parallele des Anciens & des Modernes, &c. This oration seemed to me to be very good. You may see the elogy of this professor, in a letter from Mr Majus (7), dated from Kiel the twenty second of May, 1700.

(1) Taken from his Funeral Programma, printed at Kiel, in 1694.

(2) For January 1696, pag. 7, & seq.

(3) For September 1697, pag. 438.

(4) He published in 1695, Schediasma de curiosis hujus seculi inventis quorum accuratio cultus faciem præstat antiquitatis. He is representing it with great additions.

(5) Pro summi in Philosophia honoribus imptandis.

(6) Jo. Borchardus Majus Eloquentie & Historiæ professor primarius. He is every famous for his writings.

KOTTERUS

KOTTERUS (CHRISTOPHER) is one of the three fanatics, whose visions were published at Amsterdam in the year 1657, with this title Lux in Tenebris [A]. He lived at Sprottaw in Silesia. His visions begun in June 1616. He fancied he saw [A] With this title, Lux in Tenebris I have observed, in another place (1), the occasion of this title and will not repeat it. This book was printed in the year 1657, at the expence of a rich patron (2) whom Comenius had found at Amsterdam. It contains the Revelations of our Christopher Kotterus, those of Christina Poniatovia, and those of Nicolas Drabicius. Comenius published an abridgment of it in 1660, with this title, Revelationum divinarum in usum seculi nostri faciarum Epitome. He reprinted the whole work with this title. Lux & Tenebris novis radiis aucta, &c. This last edition contains the sequel of Drabicius's revelations till the year 1666. A professor of Divinity at Franeker, a Polander, called Nicolas Arnoldus, presently wrote against this work, and replied to Comenius's apology. Marcius, professor of Divinity at Groningen, wrote against the same book, in his thesis de tribus Videntibus, in the year 1659; and when, ten years after, he published an answer (3) to a piece of Comenius concerning the Millennium, he reproached him more than once, and with great vehemence, for printing the pieces of those three pretending prophets. This book, after some years, fell into oblivion and contempt; but when the Turks besieged Vienna, in the year 1683, it was wonderfully sought after. They, who had lodged the copies in garrets, where they had relicked a long time, fetched them out, and sold several of them at a great price; and if the Turks had taken Vienna, I doubt not but they must have made a new edition of it, tho' the copies had been never so dear. They were very much inquired for in France, the count d' Avaux sent some thither; and therefore we may very well wonder, that Mr Jurieu should suppose, in the year 1691, that Drabicius was not known at Paris. This supposition is inexcusable, since, not long before, he himself had very much contributed to spread the name of that fanatic all over the world. Besides he alleged this wrong supposition as a proof of a state crime; for he pretended, that the Avis aux Refugiez, — Advice to the Refugees, making mention of Drabicius, could not have been written in France. These are things, which my readers would scarce believe; wherefore it is necessary I should prove them, by giving an account of what was replied to him. Here is the answer made by the author he accused (4).

"The first of his proofs is, that the Avis aux Refugiez, Advice to the Refugees, was not written at Paris." Now this he demonstrates thus: "He", who wrote that advice, gives a particular account, of Drabicius's prophecies; he saw them, read them, and knows all the particulars of them. "But the learned of Paris scarce know the name of Drabicius. "Therefore the author of the advice is not at Paris. "If I should deny the first proposition, I am sure he could never prove it; because it does not appear from the Advice to the Refugees, that the author of it knew any thing more of Drabicius, than that he attempted to excite a war against the house of Austria. Any man of letters may know this without reading the books of that Prophet. "But the second proposition is still more palpably false. For, not to say, that, during the siege of Vienna, Drabicius's book was much talked of in France, and that many copies were sent for from hence (I myself was desired by one of my friends, at Rouen, to send him one) who knows not, that the great encomiums Mr Jurieu bestowed on the prophetic Triumvirate, I mean Christina Poniatovia, Kotterus, and Drabicius, in a book † more common than Almanacks, as he himself boasts of it †, using the best comparison that was ever seen; who knows not I say, that those great encomiums bestowed on Drabicius, and so likely to make this prophet talked of, have drawn upon the panegyrist some very mortifying censures from the bishop of Meaux †, and Mr Pellisson *, in some books, published at Paris before the impression of the Advice to the Refugees? Who doubts, that the satire intituled L'Esprit de Mr Arnauld, so well known since the year 1684, raised a curiosity in abundance of Frenchmen to see Drabicius's prophecies, the scheme whereof Mr Jurieu draws †† there, in such a manner as to promise the public, on one hand, from Drabicius, the ruin of the house of Austria, to the king of France the imperial crown, to the Turks the taking of Vienna, Carinthia, and Stiria, and the destruction of the republic of Venice, and of the city of Rome, and to promise, on the other hand, in the name of the Protestants, all that they can do to accomplish those prophecies? The learned of Paris must have been very stupid, if they did not enquire after a book, of which Mr Jurieu has given the following notion. "I found, says he (5), in the prophecies of Cotterus, Christina, and Drabicius, published by Comenius, something great and surprising. Kotterus, who is the first of these three prophets, is great and lofty; the images of his visions are as noble and majestic, as those of the antient prophets. They are also admirable well concerted; they are all of a piece; and there is no inconsistency, in them. It is inconceivable how a meer mechanic could have imagined such great things without the assistance of God. The two years of Christina's prophecy are, in my opinion, a train of miracles, as great as have happened since the Apostles: nor do we find any thing in the life of the greatest prophets, that is more miraculous, than the adventures of this maid. Drabicius has also his sublimity. But there is much more obscurity and difficulty in him. These three prophets conspire in foretelling the fall of the antichristian empire, as what must very soon come to pass. But then there are so many other things in them, which offend, that one cannot set his heart upon them." If this had not raised a desire of knowing Comenius's prophetic collection, at least, those would have had a curiosity, who had seen Mr Pellisson's Reflexions sur les differens de la Religion. For when a writer discovers a great deal of haughtiness, it is impossible not to feel a secret pleasure, when he happens to be mortified as Mr Jurieu was by these words of Mr Pellisson. "A prophet, and more than a prophet, a forerunner doubtless of the Millennium, which he declares to us, who at least assumes the authority of reforming, correcting, and chastising, when he pleases, such as he has formally acknowledged for prophets, and inspired men", a sort of people, whom the event has already proved to be guilty of a hundred impostures, and who have been confounded in the sight of all the world, by the taking of Buda, tho' they had assured us, as from God, that it would never return to the Christians by force of arms, but by a treaty with the Turks (6). He gave (7) formal proofs of all this, by quoting the very words of Mr Jurieu (8), and the places where Drabicius expressly said, that Buda should never come out of the hands of the Turk, but in a peaceable way. When people are affected towards an author, as they were at Paris, with respect to Mr Jurieu, they are so well pleased to see him convicted either of imposture, or Fanaticism, that they will seek for such a conviction at the fountain head. But is it true, say they, that Drabicius affirms such a thing? may not one see it with one's own eyes, that there may remain no scruple, to lessen the ridiculousness of such a scene? Then they will seek a copy of Drabicius wherever they think it may be had; and if it cannot be met with, they will however keep his name in their memory.

It cannot be said, that I digress from my subject; for, since it is a falsity in point of fact, to say that Drabicius's name was scarce known at Paris in 1690, it belongs to this Dictionary, and I was obliged to use all the proofs, that confute this falsity.

If Mr Jurieu had been contented to say, that, in comparison of the noise Drabicius's name would have made in France, in case the Turks had taken Vienna, he was scarce known at Paris, when the Advice to the Refugees was written, I think he would not be in the wrong; for the taking of Vienna would have made Drabicius more talked of, than the grand visier. The book, which Mr Jurieu wrote during the siege of that town, to praise and vindicate the three prophets of Comenius, by his illustrations, and learned commentaries, would have been translated into several languages, and

(1) In the article DRABICIUS, citat (r).

(2) His name was Lawrence de Geer.

(3) Initial d, Antirhetoricus, five defensor pili 2-ii, &c. contra J. A. Comenium.

WHETHER the name of Drabicius was unknown in France in the year 1690.

(4) In the Cabale Chimérique, pag. 230, & seq. of the second edition.

* Pag. 18.

† Accompliss. des Prophetes, printed in 1636.

‡ XXI Lettre Pastorale de the year 1689.

§ Hist. des Variations, lib. xiii, n. 41, printed in 1688.

 Reflex. sur les differens de la Relig. Part. II, printed in 1687.

†† Tom. II, pag. 291.

(5) Preface to the Accomplissement des Prophetes, printed in 1636.

* Christopher Kotterus, of Silesia. Christina Poniatovski, of Bohemia. Nicolas Drabicius, of Moravia.

(6) Reflexions sur les differens de la Religion, Part. II, sect. xvii, pag. 435. Edit. Amst. 1689.

(7) Ibid. pag. 501, & seq. See also Les Chimeres de Mr Jurieu, Part. IV, pag. 141.

(8) Those which I have quoted above out of the preface of the Accomplissement des Prophetes.

saw an angel in the form of a man, who commanded him to go and declare to the magistrates, that, unless the people repented, the wrath of God would do terrible executions. Tho' he had received this order six times successively, he did not execute it; His pastor and his friends dissuaded him from it. But, in April 1619, believing he saw the spirit, which threatened him with eternal damnation, if he kept silence any longer, he discharged his commission in a full assembly of the magistrates, the twenty ninth of August 1619. They laughed at him. The apparitions went on, and were followed by extasies and prophetic dreams. The elector Palatine, declared king of Bohemia by the Protestants, was concerned in these visions. Kotterus went to him at Breslaw in December 1620, and acquainted him with his commission. He went to some other places, and at last in 1625, to the court of Brandenburg (a) [B]. He got himself acquainted the same year with John Amos Comenius, who became a promoter of his prophecies (b) [C]. Now as most of those things turned upon presages of prosperity to the elector

(a) Taken from his Revelations, published by Comenius.

(b) Comenius, Hist. Revelation, pag. 16, & 19.

PEOPLES
tempers during the siege of Vienna, in 1683.

and would have made Drabicius for a long time the discourse of all companies. His performance came to nothing as to Drabicius's memory, by the raising of the siege: the great Sobieski, two or three hundred leagues off, destroyed a book, which was just ready to be put to the press. I began to know, during the siege of Vienna, how much I was mistaken in believing, that, at last, the world was cured of the chimerical hopes, which they had so often grounded upon visions. I every where met with people, that talked of nothing but of Drabicius's prophecies, and who built many castles in the air, so far as to destroy Babylon in a moment. They could not sufficiently admire how Drabicius could guess so right with respect to Tekely. This is what I wanted them to say; for I made it appear, that Tekely, who was then the great actor of this opera, made no figure in Drabicius's book, which is a plain nullity. I question not but the French had been very attentive, if the enterprize of the grand visir had succeeded. They would gladly have lent their hand to the credulous concerning Drabicius's visions, since they promised the empire to the king of France. It is therefore certain, that the name of this false prophet would have been incomparably more famous at Paris, if the Turks had taken Vienna.

[B] He was . . . in 1625 at the court of Brandenburg.] The elector George William, hearing the great noise, that was made of Kotterus's Revelations had a mind to see him. He ordered the divines of Francfort upon the Oder to examine him; after which, he sent for him twice to Berlin, first in the year 1625, and then in the year 1626. His renown, spreading as far as Strasburg, so struck one of the burgomasters, that he sent a messenger into Silesia, to intreat Kotterus, to explain to him sixty two points, and to come to Strasburg, where he might more safely exercise his prophetic ministry. Kotterus answered his sixty two questions, but excused himself from going to Strasburg, upon his having no commission for it from the spirit, and suffered his picture to be sent to the burgomaster (9).

[C] He got acquainted . . . with John Amos Comenius, who became a promoter of his prophecies.] After the edicts of the emperor, commanding the ministers of Bohemia and Moravia, in the year 1624, to depart out of the country, it was resolved in a secret assembly in March 1625, that the ministers of Bohemia should retire into Poland, and those of Moravia into Hungary, and that, some should be deputed with letters both into Poland and Hungary, to prepare a reception for them. Comenius was deputed to Poland, and, passing through Gorlitz in Lusatia, the governor of the young count Zerotin told him, as very comfortable news, that the ruin of Antichrist was at hand, as it appeared from what the Holy Ghost had revealed to a good man of Silesia, called Christophor Kotterus. He mentioned, and read several passages of it, and, because Comenius was too incredulous, he advised him to go to the place, and discourse with the prophet. Comenius, passing through Spottaw, desired to see Kotterus: his wife answered him, that he was sent for by the elector of Brandenburg. The pastor of that place (10) confirmed the same thing to him; he assured him that Kotterus was a true seer, and gave him his revelations to read. Comenius, waiting till Kotterus's return, meditated on this manuscript, and was amazed at it. Soon after, he saw Kotterus, performed his journey, returned quickly to Spottaw, translated the manuscript of the revelations into the Bohemian tongue, and was fully convinced, that they proceeded from God. He returned into Poland, and took the prophet with him, who told him in the way, that he knew by revelation, that there would be a council of all Christendom, in which the Pope would be deposed, and a canon made, forbidding every body hereafter to usurp the title of universal bishop. Comenius represented to him, that he had not read that article in the manuscript: Kotterus answered, I had no orders to write it, but however I have learned it. Returning from Poland, Comenius parted from Kotterus, and went to Berlin, where he found, that, even among the refugees of Bohemia and Moravia, they passed very different judgments on this man: some held him for a true prophet, especially when the post brought news, that the king of Denmark was raising troops. Others said, he was a cheat, who, having spent his fortune, and not knowing how to live, set up for a Prophet. Alii rursum ex iisdem meis scabiosissima de Cottero effutiebant: bel-luonem, rei suae decorem, desperationeque ad prophetandum aditantes, miraque de prophetis ipsius mendacia inter se spargentes, mibique referentes (11). This made Comenius uneasy; but Christopher Pe-largus, superintendent-general of the churches of Brandenburg, who had examined Kotterus by the elector's order, removed his doubts, by saying, that he ought not to question that man's extraordinary mission (12), nor repent of his having translated his revelations into the Bohemian Tongue. This translation was not kept secret, as the author says he desired; it was shewn to some persons, who had it transcribed, and so the copies multiplied prodigiously in Bohemia: Nor is it any wonder, since that book promised a hundred triumphs to king Frederic. Some time after, it was printed, in the Bohemian tongue at Perna, in Misnia, with commendations and marginal notes. But all the ministers did not fall into the snare. Two of them, with some elders, found fault with the transcribing of that book; the interest of the true faith, and the danger which they were exposed to, were the two reasons that made them vote for the suppression of those chimeras, as being either an ingenious fiction, or the fantastical dreams of an Enthusiast. 'Scriptum illud (sive id ab aliquo ingenioso confictum, sive ab ipso fanatico homine conscriptum esset) suppressi petierunt. Duplex enim fuisse periculum, & Conscientiarum, si se homines à certo dei Verbo ad incerta id genus figmenta abduci paterentur, & Corporis atque vitæ, si hæc in adversariorum veniant manus (13).' In the year 1626, the electress Juliana, mother to king Frederic, having acquainted a great lord of Moravia, who was as well as she, a Refugee at Berlin, that she had received a letter from the king her son, in which he enquired, whether he could have the prophecies of the man of Silesia in writing, this great lord procured a copy of them, and, not being able to present it himself, because he was sick, he employed Comenius to do it, who was then at Berlin. Comenius, instead of delivering it to the electress, went directly to the king, who was then at the Hague, desired audience, harangued him, and, amongst other things, told him, that, since his majesty and his children bore the principal part in that divine piece, they, who had this manuscript, would have thought themselves guilty of an absurdity, if they had not communicated it to his majesty. 'Cujus (Cotteri) omnia cum sint in scriptum relata, ibidemque Majestas Vestra, cum Progenie sua, tanquam primaria in hac Dei Comœdia introducitur Persona; absurdum visum est illis, qui ea suis hactenus custodierunt manibus, ad notitiam Majestatis Vestrae hæc non deduci.

(11) Comenius, Hist. Revela. pag. 21.

(12) Videri hæc Bibliothecæ morav. (infra) sive in bibl. cisterciensis ubi cum totum per Germaniam, quæ me secretis hac colligatum extiterit, intrinsecus ratum comes Authores, antiquos & recentiores confutavit, ut quid de questione illa, Utrum possit Christum & Apollinem, obsequiumque Noni Federici Comenii, ullæ notæ admittende sint, divine vel angelicæ, revelationis, sententiam sit cognoscere? Sed nemo me feropulis liberare potuit. Ego igitur ad preces coarctatus, ardente illius invocatum Deum (sæpe etiam michi surgens & me in faciem provocans) ut se preteretur illi d. Ecce hæc sunt verba Post omnia vero tandem pensatis, divinitusque suggestis, non aliter habeo quod dicam, nisi DEUM MISERERE AGNOSCE VITAM, qui nominat nobis servum suum, quæ oportet fieri citò: quæ sunt Agnoscere Verba Annot. 21, 63 Comenius, Hist. Revela. pag. 21.

(9) Comenius, in Epitome Revelationum, Append. III, pag. m. 209.

SOME particulars relating to the History of the Revelations of Kotterus.

(10) His name was Abraham Mencilius.

elector Palatine, and unhappiness to his Imperial majesty, it happened, that David Wachsmann, the emperor's Fiscal in the lower Silesia, and in Lusatia, used all sorts of means to seize Kotterus, whom he looked upon as a seditious impostor. Kotterus fell into his hands the second of January 1627. He was examined, and put into a dungeon, and the sentence of the court of appeals was expected from Prague. The Fiscal received it the twenty fifth of April; but, as he died a little after, it is not known what it contained. Kotterus was released from imprisonment, and permitted to be visited by his wife and his friends; and at last he was put in the pillory [D], and banished the dominions of the emperor, not to return upon pain of death. He went into Lusatia, which belonged to his electoral highness of Saxony, and there lived quietly till his death, which happened in the year 1647 (c). It is by an error of the press, that Moreri's Dictionary makes him ninety two years of age [E]. Comenius is inexcusable for printing such prophecies [F]. He knew, that part of them had proved false by the event.

Since

(c) Taken from the Abridgement of his Revelations, Append III, and from the Hist. rev. Revelationum, pag. 21, 22.

* Non quidem ut Majestati Vestre ista præcisè credendi imponatur necessitas: sed, Primum, ut hæc apud Majestatem Vestram tanquam in archivo sacro afferatur, in futurum testimonium: nè, si demùm post completa prædicta hæc palam fiant, ex eventu sic esse collecta, suspicari quis, aut calumniari, possit. Deinde, ut occasio sit attendendi, num fortè divina providentia tales in eventus res disponat. (Nam si de imminente rerum mutatione Politicos discursus, vel Astrologicas prædictiones, aut similes Prædientiorum conjecturas, cognoscere non aspernamur, cur hæc ab altiori venientia principio aspernari libeat?) Curantur itaque ex authentico descripti exemplar, quod Majestati Vestre per me humiliter cum observantia exhibent: simulque exhibui (14). This is not meant, adds he, to impose on your majesty the necessity of believing these things, but only to desire, that you would preserve them in your archives, to the end, that if they prove true, no body may object, that those predictions were made after the event, and that you may also have an occasion to observe, whether providence prepares the way to those great revolutions.

Here the mystery lies: they would have it, that princes, who are capable of executing a design, and interested in the execution, should form it, in hopes of succeeding in it. This is frequently the first motive of our prophets, and apocalyptic commentators, and of those, who favour them. But to return to the thread of the history.

Comenius was received, and dismissed honourably, by king Frederic, and went into Bohemia, where Kotterus met him, in October 1626, and conferred with some ministers and gentlemen (15).

Here is a passage, in which I find no exactness. Quam turpiter vero in borum (Cotteri & Drabicii) & Christinæ Poniatovæ virginis Bohemæ conatibus, qui ejusdem omnino farinæ erant, juvenis modo dictus Comenius se dederit, è Voëtii Diss. part. 2. p. 1080. liquet (16). — How shamefully the said Comenius promoted the attempts of these men (Cotterus and Drabicius) and of Christina Poniatovia, a Bohemian lady, appears from Voëtius, Diss. part. 2. pag. 1080. These are Mr Hartnac's words, in his new edition of Micræus's ecclesiastical history. He had been condemning the pretended prophecies of Kotterus, and Comenius, who published them; he had been saying, that Drabicius's hand and head were cut off, who well deserved that punishment (17); and then he adds, that it appears, by the 1080th page of the second tome of Voëtius's disputations, that Comenius committed a most shameful fault in publishing the revelations of those persons. I have consulted that place of Voëtius; but there is nothing relating to Comenius, either in the 1080th page, or in the following.

[D] He was put in the pillory.] These are Comenius's words. Post aliquot adhuc mensium deliberationem ignominie pena affecerunt tali. Eductum carcere collocarunt ad cippum fori, ferreo adstrictum collari, affixaque supra caput scheda, cui inscriptum fuit: Hic est Pseudo-propheta ille, qui prædixit quæ non evenerunt. Horæ spatium sic spectaculo relictus, per Lißtorum urbem fuit eductus, exireque patriæ, nec in Cæsaris ditones redire sub capitis pœna, jussus (18). After some months deliberation, they sentenced him to this ignominious punishment. Being brought out of prison, they set him in the pillory, with this inscription over his head; This is the false prophet, who foretold things, which have not come to pass. Being thus exposed an hour, he was led out of the city by an officer, and commanded to quit his country, and not return into the emperor's dominions, on pain of death.

[E] It is by an error of the press, that Moreri's Dictionary makes him ninety two years of age.] His birth is placed there in the year 1585, and his death in 1647; he therefore lived 62, and not 92, years. But the Printers do often confound the figures 6 and 9.

[F] Comenius is inexcusable for printing such prophecies.] God forbid, I should pronounce judgment on what passes in the heart of my neighbour: those mysteries belong only to God: but on some occasions, one may speak one's thoughts upon appearances. Much more may I be permitted to relate historically, what others have thought of the conduct of Comenius. Whilst he lived in Prussia, they deliberated about him in the courts of some princes, and it was made a case of conscience, whether he did not deserve the punishment, which the law of God decreed against false prophets. He was suspected to have been counsellor and secretary to those, who intended to make an irruption into Bohemia, which they would have executed, if the English (19) had furnished them with the supplies, which they demanded. He, and those of his temper, were accounted the abettors of the war, which Ragotski, and the princes Radzivil, undertook against Poland. The delivery of the church of God from Papal tyranny, was the object that was set before their eyes, to make them take up arms. I say nothing, but what I have a good authority for: read these words of Arnoldus to Comenius. Prævaricatio illa, quam dicis, tanti tamen non fuit, ut super ea in aula Principum deliberaretur, casus conscientie formati viris doctis decidendi mitterentur, an sim falsus Prophetæ, & consequenter, an in me pœna divinitus in falsos Prophetas statuta animadvertendum non esset, quod de te in Borussia cum adhuc morarer per scriptum memini, & forte autographum illarum literarum adhuc possideo. Tanti, inquam, non fuit illa prævaricatio, ut propter eam ἀποστασίου ἀκούειν, ac desertâ statione mea Professoria, Magnatibus pro flabello in concitandis motibus bellicis essem, uti de te rumor est, qui à manu & consiliis intimis fuisse illis diceris, qui in Bohemiam irruptionem ante annos moliebantur, si modo annuissent illorum votis Angli sollicitati. Ego id non dico, quam stylus literarum tuo non sit ab similibus. Jam per rumores in Borussia (ut nisi me omnino fallat memoria illinc ad te per scripti,) audiveram, Principes Radzivilios & Rakocium à vobis fuisse inductos, qui arma contra Polonos capefferent, spe liberandæ Ecclesiæ à tyrannide Pontificia, cujus rei haud exigua passim in volumine illo triuno extant argumenta. Ego tamen non definio (20). — Yet that prævarication you speak of, was not so great, as to occasion debates thereupon in the courts of princes, and cases of conscience to be drawn up, and proposed to the decision of learned men, whether I am a false prophet, and consequently, whether the punishment, appointed by God for false prophets, ought not to be inflicted on me: which I remember was written concerning you, whilst I continued in Prussia, and, by chance, I still have a copy of those letters. I say, that prævarication was not so great, as to procure me the appellation of a busy meddling fellow, who, deserting my post of professor, excite the great to take up arms: as it is rumored of you, who are said to have been the chief abettor of those, who, some years ago, designed an irruption into Bohemia, if the English, whom they solicited, had assisted them. I do not affirm this, though the stile of the letters is not unlike yours. I had al-

8 R

(20) Arnoldus, in Discursu Theologico contra Comenium, pag. 10.

(15) Taken from the Historia Revelationum, published by Comenius in the year 1659, pag. 155, & seq.

(16) Micræus, Histor. Eccles. pag. 1324. Edit. 1699.

(17) Interceptus in illo regno (Hungaria Drabicius) capite manaque amputatus. libro quoque cui titulus, Læx in Tuderis, infami loco combusto dignum ponam luit. Id. ibid. See citation (18) of the article DRABICIUS.

(18) Historia Revelat. pag. 28.

Since his death, they have been more and more confuted by the course of affairs in Europe. The Turks, who, according to those prophecies, were to destroy the house of Austria, have restored it to its former lustre, by their continual losses [G]. He made himself very much suspected of having a design to kindle a war. The same suspicions are ready heard, from common fame, in Prussia (as, if I remember right, I acquainted you from thence by letter) that the prince Radziwil and Ragotski, had been induced by you to take up arms against the Polanders, in hopes of freeing the church from Papal tyranny; of which there appear very strong proofs in that three-one volume, in many places. Yet I decide nothing. I do not wonder that Comenius was suspected of political contrivances, and intrigues of war; for a divine, who travels as much as he did, and who has such frequent business at the courts of princes, is a man, who is not much to be trusted. The electress, mother to king Frederic, inquires whether a collection of Kotterus's prophecies is to be had; the person, to whom she makes her application, gets a copy transcribed, and, not being able to present it himself, desired Comenius to do it: Comenius, who is at Berlin, and has but two steps to make, to present it to the electress, chooses rather to go to the Hague, that he may give it with his own hand to king Frederic, and harangue him upon the contents of the book, which, at least, said he, would make him attentive to the occurrences. This looks very much like the contrivance of a prophetic fiction (21). They foretel what they desire should be attempted, and then they leave no stone unturned, to engage in the enterprize such as they think fit for it. It is very likely, that the great pains Comenius took, to re-unite the Protestants (22), proceeded from his desire of forming a powerful party, that might accomplish the prophecies with carnal weapons. There is another thing, which did Comenius some prejudice. He was a man of parts and learning; he argued very sensibly in other matters, and in these like a man of wit; there was nothing in him that looked like Enthusiasm. This made people believe, that he was not persuaded of what he said. There may be, and there is sometimes, some imposture in exaltational grimaces; but those, who boast of inspiration, without shewing in their face, or by their words, that their brain is disordered, and without ever being put out of their natural state, are incomparably more to be suspected of a cheat, than those, who from time to time fall into convulsions, as the Sibyl more or less.

(21) See, above, remark [C], towards the middle.

(22) He owns, in his book de uno Necessario, that one of the three labyrinths where in he had intangled himself, were the pseudo-irreligion, five varietate, profligate exitio circa fidem dissidentes Christianos reconciliandi desiderium. See Somnerhus, in Inflicta Literato, pag. 1025.

(23) Virgil. Æn. lib. vi, ver. 46.

(24) Ibid. ver. 77.

(25) It was proved against him, from his own words, that he believed some of Drabicius's predictions to be false; that, for instance, which imparted, that Comenius was to be present at the coronation of the king of Hungary at Presburg. Arnoldus, ubi supra, pag. 42.

him? If God had inspired him, he would have had Ragotski to destroy the house of Austria, and to know, that heaven had designed him for that great work. But if this had been God's will, would he not have inspired that prince with the desire of making war against the emperor, or at least with some credulity for Drabicius? here is a thing, which shews the conceitedness of Comenius. His son-in-law (26) desired Arnoldus, professor of Divinity at Franeker, to assist his father-in-law with his good advice, who seemed to hesitate about the impression of the three prophets. Arnoldus advised him not to print them (27); the son-in-law gave the same counsel (28), which he grounded upon very strong arguments. But how could Comenius adhere to the advice of two persons, since he had no regard to the decree of the Polish churches, which, having examined the pretended revelations of Kotterus, and Christina Poniatovia, condemned them to be suppressed for ever (29).

[G] The Turks, who, according to those prophecies, were to destroy the house of Austria, have restored it to its former lustre by their continual losses.] See hereupon the indecent insults of the author of the Advices aux Réfugiés. — Advice to the Refugees. 'It is certain, says he (30), that the glory and happiness of his Imperial majesty, in this war against the Turks, are wonderful; and that, to the eternal confusion of the prophecies of your DRABICIUS, God has given greater success to this prince, than to the emperor Charles V. This false prophet, more eager to curse than Balaam, who even, when a neighbouring king importuned him with great promises, would do nothing rashly, pronounced, for the space of several years, against the house of Austria, the most terrible curses he could think of, and devoted it, as we may say, to the furies and infernal gods, Diris & numinibus inferis, because it had persecuted your religion. But the event has shewn, that he did not understand that trade, and that he had no good hand at cursing. No man did ever deserve less the encomium that was bestowed upon Balaam, He whom thou blestest shall be blessed, and be whom thou curstest shall be cursed; and, if all your prophetic imprecations are like those of Drabicius, people will be forward hereafter to desire your curses, and you will be sought for with greater importunity to utter them, than the king of the Moabites used to make Balaam, the false prophet, curse his enemies.' Since the impression of that Advice, the success of the emperor's arms has been sometimes interrupted (31); but this has been but a short respite for the Turks; their bad fortune quickly began again to display all its fury. She was near over-whelming them the last year (32); she made them every where feel her indignation, in Dalmatia, in Hungary, in Poland, upon the Archipelago; and, if we may believe our news-writers, they lost two naval battles, in a little time, last winter, though the victors did not think fit to pursue their victory, but rather to quit the idle of Chios. The new Sultan raises in some manner the hopes of the Porte. They apply to him what Florus said of Trajan (33); but hitherto it does not appear by the relations of our news-writers, that he has had great success. And as for Tekeli, who, during the siege of Vienna, was given out for Drabicius's hero, we have lately been told in the Gazettes, that the Turks, weary of the obnoxious malignity of his stars, have shut him up in the seven towers.

This is what I was saying in the month of October 1695, whilst we saw a kind of suspension of the great and glorious fortune of the Imperial arms in Hungary. The Paris Gazettes daily amplified the victory which the Sultan had lately obtained; the other Gazettes continually diminished it. It was not as yet known to what party, according to the news-writers, the consequences of this battle would be favourable. The progress of the Turks would have confirmed the relations of Paris, and confuted those of Holland and Germany. But they made none at all; they retired, a little after, into their own territories, without shewing themselves as conquerors, and hereby the contest was ended, to the confusion of the Paris Gazetters. The fortune of

(26) His name was Figulus.

(27) In D'iculus Theologus, pag. 5.

(28) Ibid. pag. 50.

(29) Cotterianus & Poniatovianae visiones ut vane ad silentium & tenebras forent ab illis condemnate. Arnoldus, ibid. pag. 26.

(30) Pag. 157.

(31) For example, when the Turks retort Belgrade in the year 1694.

(32) I write this in October 1695, when our news-writers tell us that the loss of the Imperialists at the battle of Lopus is very considerable.

(33) Quibus interea Caninum quasi comitibus, quæ decemque milia quodlibet Trajano principem movere lacertis, & greater spem omnium, lacertis imperii, quasi reditis inventuræ, reviviscit. Florus, in Proemio, &c.

are entertained of a minister, whose prophecies are of a later date [H]. Advantage has been taken of some words, which he has dropped in his book, and by which it is pretended, his Imperial majesty was uppermost afterwards, and especially in 1697, by a defeat of the Ottomans, so compleat, so shameful, and pernicious to them, that there is hardly any like it in their annals. The Sultan who was there in person, was so mortified with this blow, that he thought of nothing but peace, and accepted it the year following, on what conditions they would prescribe him, which were most glorious and advantageous to his Imperial majesty. No false prophecies did ever receive such bloody affronts, as those, which the prophecies, published by Comenius, received by this glorious treaty of peace. The emperor, whom they did so much threaten, mortified, humbled, and trod under foot the haughtiness of the Ottomans, to whom they had promised so many conquests over the house of Austria. He added the lustre of an advantageous peace, to the glory, which had attended his arms, and made him triumphant, by reducing the strongest places, and gaining several battles. He does whatever he pleases in Transylvania; he has made a kingdom hereditary, which had been always elective (34), and is in possession of that whole kingdom, whereas before he only possessed part of it. What shall we say of the advantages and glory he obtained by the treaty of Ryfwic, by the recovery of so many countries which had been taken from the empire, or his allies, and by the re-union of Friburg and Brisac to the hereditary states of the house of Austria? if this prince is happy abroad, he is no less at home; fecundity, marriages, &c. make his family prosper; his second son is to inherit almost the whole monarchy of Spain, by such transactions as France itself has consented to (35). Take warning by this confusion of Comenius's false prophecies, you, who have the confidence to threaten with the Apocalypse those that do not please you.

[H] The same suspicions are entertained of a minister, whose prophecies are of a later date. What I have said of Comenius, I say also of a famous divine at Rotterdam, who has explained the prophecies of the scripture, pretending confidently to be inspired. I do not pretend to judge of his heart, and I am willing it should be believed, that he did not act against his conscience; but no body ought to take it amiss, if I say, that he has been suspected to have no other design than to make people take up arms, and put Europe in a flame. They go upon this, that there appeared no sign of confusion in him, when the event gave the lye to his prophecies, in a most undeniable manner. He had, say they, so great an opinion of his own parts and knowledge, that he would have fallen into a mortal discontent and humiliation, by so terrible a proof of illusion and ignorance, as this would be; but, being inwardly convinced, that he was not deceived, he has preserved the same good opinion of his understanding that he had before, and so the ill success of a prophecy, which was a mere juggler's trick, has not humbled him. They build also upon this, that, like Comenius, he has attempted re-unite the Lutherans and Calvinists (36), in hopes, say they, of increasing the number of troops that should attack Antichrist. Once more, I am willing that this should only be looked upon, as a faithful account of what many say and think. Let us go farther, and see what one of his adversaries has published (37). One must needs be stupid, not to perceive so gross an artifice, especially when he seems to give you notice of it himself, and to say here and there, some things whereby he may discover his secret hereafter, and secure himself from your reproaches. It is certain, says he in one place*, that often prophecies, whether fictitious or true, have inspired those, for whom they were made, with a design of undertaking the things that were promised them. Men of sense need no more to make them understand his intention, and discover his views. And elsewhere: one day, perhaps, the world shall know the principal reason that made me speak so positively, and with so much assurance upon the explication of the prophecies. We shall know it, most dear brethren, in the way he will then explain it. If he be under a mistake, as one may well believe he is, he will tell you, I had nothing but conjectures; but a good cause ought to be supported as well as it can; and our people were to be animated with some few hopes. I knew that prophecies, even such as are fictitious, are wont to produce a like effect. If, on the contrary, the present junctures, the jealousy of nations, the indignation of the Protestant states for their assaulted religion, the controversies of France with the court of Rome, should produce any important effect, which might give you new hopes; I well knew, would he say, what I said in the year 1686; an angel spoke to me: but if I had said so then, I should have been taken for an impostor; the angel himself forbade me to speak of it. He speaks to me still, and gives me liberty to declare it to you. Follow me; we are going to begin that kingdom of God, of which you doubted, and which, nevertheless, you begged of him in your daily prayer. Were it true, that Jurieu is guilty of the imposture, he is charged with, he would have been afraid, that the public had not been able to dive into his secret; and therefore, chusing to preserve the good opinion of his wit, at the expense of his honesty, he would have dropped some words (38), that might discover the mystery to the clear sighted.

The knaveries, that have been discovered amongst the little prophets of Dauphiné, have occasioned a large comment upon the passage of Mr Pellisson, before cited. We need only read a book, intitled, Histoire du Fanatisme de notre temps, &c. The history of the Fanaticism of our time, and the design there was of making the discontented Calvinists in France rise up in arms. It was printed at Paris in the year 1692. Mr Brueys, the author of it, having collected together several passages out of Mr Jurieu's book, to prove, that this minister set up for a prophet, adds immediately; However, it ought not to be imagined, that this minister was truly persuaded himself of what he would persuade others; he designedly affected to appear like a prophet. He knew well enough, that he was not; but he had a mind to impose upon the people, to make an insurrection, and to kindle a civil-war in the heart of this kingdom, in order to favour the design of our enemies. He was so full of this detestable project, when he composed his book of prophecies, that he himself cannot forbear discovering his design to the reader, who has never so little penetration. The time in which he wrote, the motives that induced him to it, and the strokes, wherein he has inadvertently scattered some drops of the venom his heart was filled with, discover the design of this false prophet (39). I will not produce the proofs he has given of each of these remarks, but will only set down what he observes concerning the last. Here is, says he (40), what he has let fall in some places of his book, which manifestly discovers, that he had no other design, than to cause an insurrection of the people. The prophecies, which are in that piece, at first scandalized the most understanding men of his party; he says to himself, in the second edition of his book. Some says he †, believe, that the hopes I gave of a Restoration, in a few years, may be very prejudicial. He attempts first to shew, that there is no reason to fear it, and then he adds: It is certain, that often prophecies, whether fictitious or true, have inspired those, for whom they were made, with a design of undertaking the things that were promised them. Could he declare more expressly the intention he had of running the hazard of venting false prophecies, to make the malecontents of France rise up in arms, and inspire them with the design of procuring to themselves the speedy deliverance, which he promised them? Those of his party were not only scandalized at his venturing to publish such prophecies, but much more at his talking so positively. He himself informs us of it. As to the reflexion, says he †, which so many people have made, that I speak too positively of things, which I should have proposed as strong conjectures: one day, perhaps the world shall know the principal reason that made me speak so positively, and with so much assurance. What then is this principal reason, which he dares not speak and which, perhaps, the world shall know one day? Is it that he is truly persuaded of the things

(34) That of Hungary.

(35) I write this in June, 1700, when the news-writers tell us of a treaty of a partition of the Spanish monarchy, agreed upon by France, England, and Holland.

(36) See the bishop of Meaux's Addition to his Histoire des Fanatiques.

(37) Pellisson, Chimères de Mr Jurieu, Part IV, pag. 184, 185, of the Amsterdam edition.

* In the second edition of the Accomplissement des Prophecies, at Rotterdam, 1686, cap. xv.

(38) The two passages, for example, quoted by Mr Pellisson out of the Accomplissement des Prophecies.

(39) Brueys, Histoire du Fanatisme, pag. 44.

(40) Ibid. pag. 54.

† Tom. I, Addition to the Avis, second edition.

† Tom. II, pag. 134.

pretended, he has discovered the secret of his design. They too much exaggerate what they impute to him [7]. My reader may judge of it by examining the passages I have things he says? This is the only reason that ought to oblige an honest man to speak positively. But if it be his reason why does he not say so? Is he afraid of speaking the truth? Let us press him no farther upon it: he is more sincere than we think; he has already told us this principal reason; does he not say, that it is certain, that often prophecies, whether fictitious or true, have inspired those, for whom they were made, with a design of undertaking the things that were promised them. This is his principal reason; we need not seek for another. This false prophet did not expect, that these two passages would be put together some time or other (41), he had separated them on purpose in two different tomes: they are now placed together, and so naturally explain one another, that he must be blind, who cannot see, that, if Mr Jurieu spoke in so decisive a manner of the approaching deliverance, which he promised the Protestants of France, it was because he thinks, that often prophecies, whether fictitious or true, have inspired those, for whom they were made, with a design of undertaking the things that were promised them.

Mr Brueys seems so fully persuaded, that he has discovered all the mystery, that he repeats this observation more than once. Nay, he is so malicious as to put his reader in mind of the artifices of the Heathens. This minister, says he, promised the Calvinists the fall of Popery, and the approaching deliverance of their church; he promised them these things in the name of God, telling them they were contained in St John's Revelation. And therefore those prophecies could not but inspire those, for whom they were made, with a design of undertaking the things that were promised them; because there is nothing that has more force upon the minds of men, than religion; and every thing appears lawful to them, when they firmly believe, that God is on their side, and that they are only executing his orders. Those who know what use the cunning Greeks and Romans made of their oracles, Diviners, Augurs, and of those priests, whom they called Haruspices, Feciales, Præpotes and Officines (42), whose functions consisted in foretelling the will of the gods, when they deliberated about any important affair; some by observing the entrails of the victims, others the singing, flying, or different motions of certain birds: those, I say, who know of what use those things were formerly, are not ignorant that men of sense and judgment gave no credit to them, and used them only to possess the people and the soldiers with a desire of undertaking what they promised them from their gods; but, at the bottom, it was nothing but what they themselves had resolved upon, before they consulted their oracles. Here you see exactly the fictitious prophecies, and the pretended persuasion of Mr Jurieu (43).

I here renew the protestation I have already made which is, that I do not pretend to be a judge: I only relate what others say. It is true, I will not end this remark, without saying, that, in all times and countries, prophecies have been forged, to induce people to revolt. I could bring a hundred instances of it; but one will be sufficient. The Spaniards, who rebelled against Charles V, spread a malicious prophecy, importing that there should reign in Castile a prince named Charles, who should ruin and burn the country; but that a son of the king of Portugal should take possession of Castile, and restore the kingdom to a good condition. The ring-leaders of the sedition got this prophecy printed, and ordered every one of [7] They too much exaggerate what they impute to him. If you consider well Mr Brueys's words, you will find an artificial Rhetoric in them, which ought to be suspected. It is not possible for Mr Jurieu's best friends to disown, that he published his predictions upon the Apocalypse, only with a design of raising the discontented Calvinists in France; that the league, which was then forming, finding the kingdom divided against itself, might more easily accomplish its utter destruction, and the Calvinists might re-establish their religion upon the ruins of their country.

Now reckon up, if you can, all the crimes and villainies of such an execrable project; the artifices, fictions, and impostures, to seduce the simple; the profanation of Holy Writ, and its sacred oracles; the impieties and blasphemies against the holy Spirit; the violation of the most holy laws of Christianity; the overturning the principles of the morality of Jesus Christ; the contempt of the constant practice of the church, and of the examples of martyrs; the forgetting his own maxims; the precepts of revolt against the powers, which God has ordained; exhortations to subjects, to Christians, to Frenchmen, to take up arms, and join with those who have conspired the ruin of their country; the horrible wishes he induces to make for the defeat of our armies, the plundering of the kingdom, the depopulation of our provinces, the burning of our towns, the effusion of blood, and the murders of their fellow citizens, friends, and relations. Lastly, all the inhumanities and barbarities, that a civil and intestine war would have added to the most furious and bloody foreign war, that was ever known.

Tantum Religio potuit suadere malorum.

Such mighty ills religion cou'd persuade.

Thus you see, to speak of things as they are, the consequences of Mr Jurieu's false prophecies, and the scope of the seditious writings of this famous defender of Calvinism, who, to restore the public exercise of his religion in France, inspires his party with great fury, and prompts them to greater cruelties, than the barbarous Mahomet caused heretofore to be committed for the establishment of his Alcoran (45).

Here I must quit the character of a meer copyist, and take up that of critic. It is false any league was forming against France, when Mr Jurieu published his predictions; for they were given out in March, 1686, above two years before he had the least suspicion of what happened in the year 1688. So that the anachronism of his adversary, is here a very gross fault (46). If Mr Brueys had consulted Mr Nicole, he would have been more equitable; he would not have been ignorant, that Mr Jurieu, in publishing his explication of the Apocalypse, believed, that arms would have no share in the events, which he predicted. See how Mr Nicole has done him justice (47).

Who would not, for instance, take for a menace of a very bloody war, these last lines of the preface to his System of the Church (48). We shall quickly establish truth upon the throne of falsehood, and the raising up of that, which has been cast down, shall be performed in so glorious a manner, that it will be the astonishment of the whole earth. Did ever an author write in such a strain? Who would not believe that such a discourse is to be followed by an army of a hundred thousand Protestants combined together, to restore the pretended Reformed Religion in France? Mr Jurieu might even be charged with a state-crime, and looked upon as a seditious man. It is therefore necessary to undeceive the world in this point, and to inform them, that this discourse is no ways grounded upon any conspiracy against France (49). All that he says here, by the way, in so dreadful a manner, is much less terrible being explained at large by his Accomplishment of the prophecies. For there we see, that this glorious restoration of the pretended Reformed shall be made without any, or with very little effusion of blood.

nay, that this will not come to pass by an army of foreigners, nor by a multitude of ministers, who shall repair into France, but by the effusion of the spirit of God, which shall re-animate the extended bodies of Enoch and Elias, that is to say, according to Mr Jurieu, the Protestants, who were formerly witnesses of the truth, and who, having cowardly forsaken it, are at present deprived of life, and stretched out in the place of the city of Antichrist, that is, throughout all France, the principal part, according to him, of the Antichristian empire.

(41) Mr Brueys often repeats the consequences, which he draws from the conjunction of those two passages. See especially, pag. 227, 230, 241.

(42) Those two names, præpotes and officines, were not given to certain priests, but to certain birds, which served for Divination.

(43) Brueys, Hist. du Fanatisme, pag. 230, 231.

(44) See, among the epistles of Antony de Goëvara, that which the Amirate of Castile wrote to the inhabitants of Seville, in the year 1520. It is the thirtieth of the third book. What I mention is pag. m. 65.

(45) Brueys, id. supra, pag. 241.

(46) This is not the only anachronism, that is to be found in Mr Brueys's book. He says, pag. 175, that Mr Jurieu being weary of writing controversial books, and political letters, resolved to take another course, and to let us see a prophet. This is wrong; for Mr Jurieu began to write his political letters, after he had published his prophecies.

Mr Brueys, pag. 24, speaks of a guess concluded in 1685; but he should have said in 1684.

(47) Nicole, face to his book de l'Unité de l'Eglise, pag. 24.

(48) This book of Mr Jurieu was printed the same year, that his Accomplishment of the prophecies was.

(49) Nicole, id. supra, pag. 24.

Mr Jurieu, part. II, pag. 173.

have quoted. The author of the Thoughts upon Comets maintains, that Drabicius's prophecies found little credit [K].

(50) Brueys, ibid. pag. 79.

(51) In a glass-house, situated upon a mountain of Dauphiné, called de Peyra. Brueys, ubi supra, pag. 76, 77.

(52) Ibid. pag. 75, 76.

(53) Ib. pag. 98.

(54) That is, the shepherd of the Cross.

(55) Brueys, ib. pag. 106.

(56) Mr Brueys had been saying, pag. 39, that Mr Jurieu, as a great prophet, would have some forerunners, viz. Kotterus, Christians Ponticovius, and Drabicius.

(57) Brueys, ib. pag. 145.

(58) Pag. 73.

There is another thing, that Mr Brueys deserves to be blamed for. He insinuates (50), that Mr Jurieu is the oracle, that was consulted, for the erecting of a school (51), wherein children were to be taught to set up for prophets. See here the description of that infamous school: 'Could this be believed, unless one had seen it? This was the first time, that a school was erected, in which the art of prophesying was taught, and to which they went to learn how to foretell things to come; and, after having gone through the necessary trials, they were persuaded they received the Holy Ghost from the impure mouth of a sacrilegious master, who pretended to breathe it with a kiss into the mouth of those miserable scholars (52).' This is so horrible a design, that it ought never to be declared, or insinuated, without good proofs, that a minister was so wicked as to suggest the model of it. Mr Brueys has given too great a scope to the consequences he draws from Mr Jurieu's care to save the honour of the prophets of Dauphiné (53). 'He could never be prevailed with to revoke what he had published at first concerning this prophecies (54), and he maintained it in all his letters with so much obstinacy, that, even after God had retrieved that maid from her errors, and she became a good and devout Catholic, and confessed to her judges how she was seduced by Du Serre; this minister persisted in what he had advanced, was constant to his shepherds, notwithstanding her unfaithfulness, and had even the imprudence to say, speaking of her, and of the other little sleeping prophets, that they might become rogues, but yet had been prophets. . . . (55). This minister openly declared in favour of the little prophets, notwithstanding what the honest people of his party could say to him; and maintained that their inspiration was true, with an invincible, but affected, obstinacy, as I have already observed, because he had his views, and designed to get successors in prophecy, as he had got forerunners (56). . . . Ought we to (57) wonder after this, that Mr Jurieu could not resolve upon forsaking those, who had so much improved by his lessons, and that, like a fond father, who does not see the imperfections of his children, he would never acknowledge the folly of those, to whom he had given birth? The consequences, that are drawn from hence, are not very just; for how many things are there, which men resolve to maintain, when they find them already done, without knowing how wickedly they have been performed, which they would never advise, if they knew it, and if those things were still to be done? thus charity will have us to extenuate, as much as possible, the faults of our neighbour, and to suspend our judgment, notwithstanding the strongest probabilities, if they do not amount to a good proof.

Mr Brueys's rashness will more evidently appear, if it be observed, that, not contented to insinuate his accusation, he proposed it in clear and affirmative terms, not only against the minister Jurieu, but also against many others. 'The most factious of the fugitive ministers, says he (58), who burned with impatience to see again what they had left in France, considering, that the stratagem, contrived by Mr Jurieu, might advance their affairs, hearing with what greediness the malecontents of the kingdom received the prophecies, which promised them a speedy deliverance, and persuading themselves, that there was no better expedient to bring on a revolt, thought they ought not to lose so fair an opportunity of kindling a civil-war in the heart of the kingdom, which might give it a mortal blow, with a prospect of seeing their religion rise again upon the ruins of monarchy, which they believed at the very brink of destruction. And these were the same ministers, who at first made a great noise against his predictions, threatened to complain of them, and were angry he had spoken so affirmatively; but the false prophet having imparted his secret to them, and giving them to understand, that often prophecies, whether fictitious or true, have inspired those, for whom they were made, with a design of undertaking the things promised them; and having told them in the ear that principal and secret reason, which should one day be known, and which made him speak so positively; they were quickly satisfied; his stratagem was approved in their secret council, and it was resolved to prophesy, in order to cause an insurrection.' Here are two things to be censured; for, in the first place, no proof can be given, that the French ministers had a hand in the horrid plot of those seducers, who taught little children to pretend to inspiration; and in the second place, it is not true, that the French ministers made a great noise against his predictions, and threatened to complain of them. Mr Brueys alleges that false supposition a hundred times over (59); tho' he has cited, at the 216th page a passage, which might easily have undeceived him. The passage is this: 'The other thing, which some have been offended at, they are Mr Jurieu's words, concerns the MILLENNIUM. Several divines of THIS COUNTRY have murmured so far, as to threaten to complain of it.' It is manifest, that those loud murmurs came from the Dutch divines, and not from the French ministers, and did not concern the promises of a sudden deliverance, &c. but the Millennium, a doctrine which was most odious to the churches of Holland, and for which Mr Jurieu had been brought into trouble, had it not been for human supports. Notwithstanding those supports, complaints were made against him in the Walloon synod, who inserted some words in an act, of which we may say what cardinal d'Ossat said of the strokes of the switch, which the deputies of Henry IV received (60).

[K] The author of the Thoughts upon Comets maintains, that the prophecies of Drabicius found little credit. He was more equitable than the person cited in the remark [G]: he acknowledged, that the Protestants made no great account of Drabicius. 'The Protestants themselves, says he (61), are not over-persuaded, that Drabicius was a prophet. Many believe, that he was a Fanatic, who had his brain turned by reading the commentaries upon the prophecies of the Old Testament, and the Apocalypse: that, being full of those ideas, he looked upon the emperors of Germany as so many Pharaohs, Sennacheribs, Nebuchadnezzars, and emissaries of the great whore, drunk with the wine of the wrath of her whore-dom; that he came at last to be persuaded, that God had appointed him to command several princes to exterminate those persecutors. They who had suffered persecution, and who thought that the divine providence would punish, sooner or later, the authors of so barbarous a conduct, might probably believe Drabicius's visions. Nevertheless, most of them made little account of them, especially having experienced that he was deluded, and that he contradicted himself frequently in the most palpable manner, and such as cannot be excused but by recurring to a multitude of glosses, which make the incredulous laugh more, than the sincere confession of that man's errors would; for by the help of such glosses, multiplied as occasion serves, there is no false prophet but may find an apology.'

(59) See page 30, 219, 220, 221.

(60) We felt them no more than if a fly had gone over our cloaths. See the article of HENRY IV, citat. (41).

(61) Pag. 785.

KRANTZIUS (ALBERTUS) a famous historian, born at Hamburg [A], had [A] He was a native of Hamburg. And not of Bamberg, as Bellarmin (1), John Gerard (2), Christian Matthias (3), David Blondel (4), and Hottinger (5) affirm. There can be no doubt about it, though a modern author has affected to suspend his judgment. Res in apico est posita, ac proinde risu digna interpretari.

(1) De Script. Eccles.
(2) In Theatro Histor.
Henrici VII, pag. 71.
VOL. III.

(3) In Patrolog. pag. 673, apud Mollerum, Isagoge ad Histor. Cherson.
(4) De Johanne Papista.
(5) Mollerum, ibid.

Mart. Disenbachii † nupera, qui litem de loco ejus natali fore quam decidere putavit consultius (6). The matter is plain; and therefore the doubt of Martin Disenbachius, who thought it better to keep up the dispute concerning the place of his birth, than to decide it, is ridiculous.

8 L

[B] Tbe/se

had no sooner gone thro' his classical learning in his country, but he went to travel. He saw the principal parts of Europe, and so studiously cultivated the sciences in his travels, that he became a very able man. He was doctor of Divinity, and of the Canon-Law, and professor of Philosophy and Divinity in the university of Rostoch. He was rector there in the year 1482 (a). Those, who say he was a canon of Naumburg are mistaken [B]. He went from Rostoch to Hamburg, where he obtained a canon's place in the cathedral. He did not enjoy this preferment, as so many others do, like a sluggard, but spent his time in preaching and reading lectures of Divinity. He was elected dean of the chapter in the year 1508, and performed the visitation of the diocese with the dispositions of a man resolved to cure the disorders he should find in it. He did the same in the year 1514. He did many good services to the town of Hamburg [C], and other Hanse-towns; and got such a reputation for ability and prudence, that the king of Denmark himself made him arbitrator in a considerable controversy [D]. He died the seventh of December in the year 1517 [E], being very sensible, that the church stood in need of a reformation (b) [F]. He wrote several good books

(a) Chytr. Part. 1. Chronici Saxonici, pag. 496, & Petr. Lindebergius, lib. v. Chron. Rostoch. cap. xi, apud Mollerum, ubi infra.

(b) Taken from Mollerus, Itagoge ad Histor. Chersones. Cimbricæ, Part. 1, pag. 95, & seq.

[B] Those who say, that he was a canon of Naumburg, are mistaken. Two very learned authors have affirmed it; but Mr Sperlingius, who is writing Albert Krantz's Life, will shew their mistake. Sunt qui in Collegio etiam Canonicorum Numburgensium aliquandiu vixisse, ac Diaconi partes obisse perhibent. & hos inter Daumviri celeberrimi, Henr. Meibomius Jun. & ac Conr. Schurtzleischius. Sed falli eos, ac Krantzium Numburgum forte nunquam vidisse, satis sibi esse exploratum. Dn. Sperlingius nobis significavit, in ipsa Krantzii Biographia prolixius sententiam hanc impugnaturus (7). — Some pretend, that he lived for some time in the college of the canons of Naumburg, and officiated as a deacon; among whom are the famous Henry Meibomius the younger, and Conrad Schurtzleisch. But Sperlingius has informed me, that he is convinced they are mistaken, and that, perhaps, Krantzius never saw Naumburg, and that he will more fully refute this opinion in the Life of Krantzius.

[C] He did many good services to the town of Hamburg, &c. Under pretence, that this town began, only in the year 1546, to have ordinary syndics, one cannot deny what is found in the Danish remonstrance, in answer to the apology of the Hamburgers, in the year 1642, viz. that Albert Krantzius was syndic of Hamburg; for that title was given, in his time, to those, whom the town deputed upon particular affairs. Now it is certain, that Albert Krantzius was deputed two or three times. He was at the assembly of Wismar, in the year 1489, in behalf of the Hanse-Towns (8); and he went into France in 1497, to desire a truce; and into England, in 1499, to desire some privileges against pirates (9). This is what we learn from Mollerus in the book I have quoted: His proofs are in the margin.

[D] The king of Denmark himself made him arbitrator in a considerable controversy. This was in the year 1500. Read what follows (10): 'Quantam vero, in reliqua etiam Cimbrica, Prudentia & Integritate singulari sibi conciliavit Auctoritatem, vel inde perspicies, quod A. 1500. Johannes, Rex Daniæ, & Fredericus, Dux Holstatiæ, Arbiui ipsi Honorarii Partes, in Controversiis quæ cum Diithmaris sibi intercedebant, decidendis, deferre non dubitaverint *.' — What esteem his singular prudence and integrity gained him in other parts of that country, appears from hence, that, in the year 1500, John, king of Denmark, and Frederick, duke of Holstein, did not scruple to appoint him arbitrator in a dispute between them and the Diithmars.

[E] He died the seventh of December, 1517. This appears from his epitaph: it is therefore a mistake to say, with Gesner's continuators, and Theodorus Zwinger, that he flourished in the year 1520. Gesner should not have been taxed with that fault by Mr Mollerus (11). The error of Father Fournier, a Jesuit, and John Andrew Bosius, is much greater. The Jesuit makes him die in 1569 (12), and the other in 1570 (13). Those faults would not come near the blunder of a famous professor of Oxford (14), if he took Albert Krantzius to be the same with Albertus Magnus, bishop of Ratisbon. But Mr Mollerus, who taxed him with it, has acknowledged his mistake, and acquits him clearly of the fault. No body had given him notice of it: he himself has discovered it, and confesses it publicly like an honest man. See the 738th and 739th pages of his treatise De Scriptoribus Homonymis.

[F] being very sensible, that the church stood in need of a reformation. He acknowledged this necessity, both with respect to doctrine and morals, if we may believe Melchior Adam. Animadverit in doctrina ejus temporis multum fuisse errorum & superstitionum: & mores Canonicorum ac monachorum acerrime reprehendit; eosque in ordinem redigere conatus est. Sed cum id frustra se tentare videret: quod perveritas illorum hominum munia esset auctoritate Pontificis, dixisse fertur: nunquam posse eos reduci ad meliorem frugem, nisi prius a vitiis doctis expugnata arce. Interrogatus cur sese ipse non opponeret tam crassiss erroribus, respondit: se neque eruditione neque ætate parem esse tantis negotiis (15). — He observed much of error and superstition in the doctrine of that time; and he severely censured the manners of the Canons and Monks, and endeavoured to reform them. But, finding his endeavours fruitless, the perverse behaviour of those men being screened by the Pope's authority, he is said to have declared, that they could never be brought to behave better, till some learned man should besiege and take their fortrefs: And being asked why he himself did not oppose such gross errors, he replied, that he was neither learned, nor young enough for such an undertaking. There is a thing in this passage, which puts me in mind of Teleseus in Velleius Paterculus. This Teleseus was general of the Samnites, and a very brave captain; he mortally hated the Romans, and approached Rome with an army of forty thousand men, fully resolved to push on; and to that end he continually animated the soldiers with these words: It is necessary to destroy this city; for the wolves, that ravish the liberty of Italy, will never be wanting as long as this forest subsists, in which they find shelter. The words of Paterculus deserve to be set down. Circumvolans ordines exercitus sui Teleseus, distansque adesse Romanis ultimum diem, voriferabatur eruendam delendamque urbem, adjiciens nunquam defuturos raptos Italica libertatis lupos, nisi silva, in quam refugere solerent, esset excisa (16). He did not argue amiss. Krantzius was likewise of opinion, that, whilst the court of Rome prevailed, it was impossible to suppress the corruption of the Monks and clergy. Here I must expose a notable piece of insincerity in Moreri; for thus his fault ought to be called. He had read Melchior Adam, who says, that Krantzius, seeing Martin Luther's positions against the doctrine of Indulgences, cried out, 'He has too powerful adversaries; he will never succeed; I advise him to desist from his enterprize, and to shut up himself in his cell, and say, Lord have mercy upon me (17).'

What has Moreri done? he has curtailed this passage, and only given us the last words of it, which he understands as if Krantzius had condemned Luther's attempt. 'Krantzius, says he, deplored, at the hour of his death, this unhappiness (18), which he had foretold in his life-time. It is affirmed, that in that moment he often repeated these words, speaking against the same Luther, Frater, abi in cellam, & dic, miserere mei Deus.' Though we should not attend to several passages of Krantzius's works, which testify his opinion of the corrupt state of the church, the words, which he pronounced, when he saw the first positions of Luther, would alone sufficiently acquaint books [G]; but all that are ascribed to him are not his [H] His reputation has been aspersed by some critics [I].

quaint us with Moren's prevarication. Consider what follows (19). 'Vitia quæ doctrinam & cultum Ecclesie Romanæ publicum deformabant, agnovit, & quanto Emendationis eorum desiderio teneretur, cum locis Scripturæ suorum plurimis, tum Vocibus hinc Cygnæis est testatus, quibus suum de Theobis Lutheri Anti-Tezelianis, in Læculo sibi Emortuali oblati, iudicium exposuit †: Vera quidem dicti, Bone Frater, sed nihil efficit: Vade igitur in Celum tuam, & dic: Misere mei Deus. — Ho acknowledged the corruptions, which deformed the doctrine and public worship of the Romish church; and be showed his zeal for reforming them, both by many passages of their writers, as also by these swan-like words, in which he declared his opinion of the Anti-Tezelian theses of Luther, which were brought to him as he lay on his death-bed: You speak the truth, good brother, but to no purpose: go therefore into your cell, and say, Lord have mercy upon me.' I will conclude this remark with a passage, which will teach us, that, if Flacius Illyricus has not made use of Albert Krantz's authority against the church of Rome, in his Catalogus testium veritatis, the compilers, who followed him, made amends for that omission; for they made a good collection of what they had read in Krantz, that favoured their design. Nay, the editors of the Francfort editions have been at the pains of observing those things in the marginal notes. Here is the passage I have promised (20): 'Ipsi theologi Protestantium cordiores Scriptoris huius, licet Pontificii, atque adeo ἀλλοφύλου, Lectionem sibi habent commendatissimam, & Arma ex illo depromunt, quibus adversus Ecclesie Romanæ Hyperaspistas haud infelicitur κατ' ἀρθρον depugnantur, Invektivas scilicet in Vitiis non Monachorum solum ac Canoniceorum, sed & Episcoporum atque Pontificum, ἀποφροντιστικὰς, crebrique de statu Ecclesie & Aulæ Pontificie corruptissimæ querelas. Quas uti à Matth. Flacio in Catalogo Testium Veritatis miror omittas, ita à Joh. Wolfio †, Joh. Conr. Dieterico †, aliisque Recentioribus, satis diligenter video esse gestas. Observationes etiam, quas Wecheliani Operum Krantzii editionibus accessisse diximus, Marginales loca ejusmodi studiose notarunt: obelo vicissim hanc ob causam notatæ, & Impietatis infusulatæ, à Rob. Bellarmino *, Joh. Bona  & Aub. Miraë ††, qui Textum etiam ipsum ab Hæreticis esse vitiatum affirmare non erubescit. — The more sensible Protestant divines approve the reading of this author, though a Catholic, and borrow arms from him, with which they successfully attack the champions of the Romish church; I mean, his investigators, not only against the Monks and canons, but even the bishops and Popes, and his frequent complaints of the corrupt state of the church, and the court of Rome. Which, as I wonder they were omitted by Flacius, in his catalogue of The Witnesses of the Truth, so I find they are carefully compiled by John Wolfius, John Conrad Dietericus, and other moderns. Likewise the marginal observations, which I said were added to the editions of the works of Krantz by Wechel, constantly refer to these kind of passages, and are, for that very reason, stigmatized as impious by Robert Bellarmine, John Bona, and Aubert Miraë, who is not ashamed to affirm, that the text itself has been corrupted by the Heretic.'

† V. J. Balch, Schuppili, Speculum penitentiae Niniivice, pag. m. 18, alioque Theologos c. m. pluræ.

(20) Mollerus, ibid. pag. 110.

† Cent. XV, Lect. memorabil. pag. 963, 977.

† In Breviario Pontificum.

* In Libro de Script. Eccles. pag. 504.

 In Catalogo Autorum, Operi de Plalmodia Divina præfixo.

†† P. I. Biblioth. Eccl. pag. 278.

(21) In the library of Reinhard, unit of Westphalia, dean of Logne.

(22) Taken from Mollerus, ubi pag. 35.

(23) Ibid.

work, translated into High-Dutch by Basil Faber, was printed at Leipzig in the years 1563, and 1582 (23). (23) Taken from III. The book intitled Vandalia, sive Historia de the Sane, pag. 100. Vandalorum vera Origine, variis Gentibus, crebris à patria Migrationibus, Regnis item, quorum vel Antores fuerant, vel Everfores, Libris XIV. à prima eorum Origine, ad A. C. 1500. deducta. The first edition, which is of Cologne, 1519, was followed by three others at Francfort (24), and one at Hanaw (25). (24) In 1575, The German version, printed at Lubeck, in the year 1600, was done by Mark Stephen Macropus (26). (25) In the year 1619. IV. The book intitled Metropolis: it contains, in twelve books, the Ecclesiastical History of Saxony, Westphalia, and Juland, with the lives of the prelates, that, from the year 780 till 1504, possessed the twelve bishoprics of that country. Joachim Mollerus, the younger, a native of Hamburg, counsellor to the dukes of Brunswick, is the first who published this work. He did it, at Melanchthon's request, from the author's original, which was the only manuscript extant of that book: Henry Bucholz, bishop of Lubeck, had given it to this Mollerus's father. This first edition is of Basil, by Oporinus, in the year 1548: it was followed by that of the year 1568, from the same press, and by two others (27) at Cologne (28), and three more at Francfort (29). V. The work intitled, Spirantissimum opusculum in officium Missæ in optimum Ordinem pro sancta & suavi Sacerdotum Ecclesie institutione digestum (30); and the book intitled, Ordo Missæ secundum ritum Ecclesie Hamburgensis, at Stralsburg 1509, in folio. Consilium de ordine & privilegiis creditorum in bonis suorum debitorum. It is inserted in the fourth volume of the Responsorum Juris, printed at Francfort in the year 1572. Institutiones Logice, compendiosæ admodum, pariterque absolutissimæ, nec minus Latine, at Leipzig in the year 1517. Grammatica culta & succineta, at Rosloch 1506. There are in the library of Leipzig some treatises of Philosophy of Albert Krantz, which have not been printed (31).

[H] . . . all those, which are ascribed to him, are not his.] He is not the author of the Tractatus de Romanis Pontificibus, & præsertim de Viâre II. alias Episcopo Eystetensi, which Father Jacob (32) ascribes to him; nor of the Life of Anigarius, which Gesner's continuators father upon him; nor of the Scriptum de Imperii Romani interitu, ascribed to him by Scherzerus (33).

[I] His reputation has been aspersed.] This motto, Per convicia & laudes, might suit him as well as many other great men. Several learned men (34) bestow great encomiums upon him; but some critics use him very severely. He is accused of venting many false stories, about the original of nations; of citing ancient authors very wrong; of transcribing whole pages from other authors, without citing any body; and of falsifying the monuments of history, to gratify his passions. Mr Mollerus (35) names the authors of those censures, and says something in his vindication; he denies not, but that Albert Krantz was a plagiarist; he only endeavours to excuse him from the practice of that age. 'Solenne præterea ei esse fatetur, Eginhardum, Wittekindum, Herm. Contraatum, Adam. Helmodum, Arnoldum Saxonem, Albertum Stadensem, Gobelinum, Blondum, Cornerum, alioque veteres, de verbo ad verbum exscribere, ac non Periodos solum, sed & paginas atque Capita integra, in sua inde scripta, nulla plerumque Autoris mentione adjecta, transferre. Observatum id nobis in Accuratori Narrationum de iisdem Rebus Collatione: Observatum & ante nos Vellejo, Reinuccio, Meibomiorum Trigæ, Vossio, Malinerotio, Conringio, Bangerto, Sigittario, Schurtzleischio, Madero, quorum Testimoniis Lectores meos nolo obruere (36). — I confess likewise, that he frequently transcribes, word for word, Eginhard, Wittekind, Hermannus Contraatius, Adam, Helmod, Arnold the Saxon, Albertus Stadenus, Gobelin, Blondus, Cornerus, and other ancient authors, and that he borrows, not only periods, but even pages, and whole chapters, for the most part without mentioning from whence he takes them. I observed this in my accurate comparison of different accounts of the same things: it was observed likewise, before me, by Vellejus, Reinuccio, the Meibomii, Vossius, Malinerot, Conringius, Bangertus, Sigittarius, Schurtzleisch, Maderus, with whose testimonies I will not trouble my readers.'

KUCHLIN

KUCHLIN (JOHN) minister and professor of Divinity, was born in 1546, in a little town of the county of Hesse, called Wettera. His father, a good and honest mechanic, tho' he had the charge of ten sons and three daughters, whom he maintained only by the labour of his hands, designed to make a scholar of him; but he died before the young boy had made any considerable progress. The minister (a) of the place took care of him, the more willingly, because he very much improved in Greek and Latin under Justus Wulfeius, rector of the school of Wettera. But when Kuchlin was fit to go to the university, he had no little difficulties to overcome by reason of his poverty. However he was not discouraged, but resolved to seek his fortune; and, to that end, he went to travel, as a young college-adventurer. He found nothing at Francfort. His landlord at Mentz carried him to the Jesuits, who kept him no longer, than 'till they saw that he would not abjure the Protestant religion. All that he could find at Strasburg, was a letter of recommendation from John Sturmius to Brentius, who was professor at Tubingen. But the latter did not keep him long, as thinking he was not sufficiently prepossessed with the Ubiquitarian notions. Kuchlin went to Heidelberg with the same letter of Sturmius, where he at last found what he wanted; for Urfinus put him in a way of living, and going on quietly with his studies. The university of Heidelberg was then in a very flourishing state. This young man made a great progress in six years; after which he was sent to teach in the school at Newstadt [A], where, amongst other colleagues, he had Fortunatus Crellius, and Frederic Sylburgius (b). At last he was admitted minister, and had the church of Tackenheim, which he faithfully served till after the death of the elector Frederic in 1576, when Lewis, his successor, expelled the ministers, who would not turn Lutherans. Kuchlin, retiring into his country of Hesse, and finding nothing there but discouragement, by the advice of his wife, took sanctuary (c) in the great ark of the fugitives, I mean in Holland. He passed thro' Emden in 1577, and staid there some time; from whence he was invited to Amsterdam to the office of the ministry [B]. He accepted it, and exercised it eighteen years: After which, he earnestly engaged in the mastership of a college of Divinity, which the States of Holland had erected at Leyden in 1591, and of which he had from that time the management for some months. It was in 1595, that he wholly left his church at Amsterdam, to fix in this college. He taught Divinity there till his death, which happened the second of July 1606. He had married his two daughters to two learned men, Peter Bertius, and Festus Hommius (d). A collection was made, in one volume in 4to, at Geneva, in 1613, of all the theses of Divinity, which he caused to be maintained at different times. Guy Patin has extremely commended him, and a little too much, for he calls him one of the most learned men of his age (e).

(a) John Pinter, brother-in-law to the professor Iperius, professor of Divinity at Marburg.

(b) He was his countryman, and relation.

(c) Meursius, whose words are quoted in remark [B].

(d) Taken from his Funeral Oration, pronounced by Luke Trulicatus. See also Meursius, Athen. Batav. pag. 182.

(e) Patin, Lettres, pag. 427, of the second volume.

(1) Henningus Witte, ad ann. 1606.

[A] He was sent to teach in the school at Newstadt. The author of the Diarium Biographicum (1) says, that Kuchlin was rector of this school; but his funeral oration, wherein such a preference would not have been omitted, says expressly, that he taught at Newstadt, when Basil Pithopæus was rector there. There is another fault in the same Diarium: it makes two different books of the Disputationes Theologicæ ad Catecheses Ecclesiarum Belgicarum explanationem, and the Disputationes de Religionis Christianæ præcipuis capitulis. They are but one and the same book.

[B] From whence he was invited to Amsterdam to the office of the ministry. Moreri did so little examine the authors he consulted, that he considered only the first part of Meursius's period. If he had read the whole period, he would have seen the quite contrary to what he affirms. He says, that Kuchlin was minister at Emden and Groningen in the Low-Countries; but it is certain he was not minister at Groningen. He had his choice of this town, and Amsterdam; and, though he had more inclination to the former than to the latter, yet he was persuaded to choose the latter.

(2) Athen. Batav. pag. 182.

Here are Meursius's words (2). 'Infinstu uxoris quæ Belgica erat in Belgium abiit, Emdamque venit anno 1577. ubi cum operam aliquamdiu tum in schola quam in Ecclesia navasset, eodem tempore ab Amstelodamensibus & à Groeningensibus evocatus fuit. Ille, cum propter Germanici idiomatis vicinitatem Groeningenses præferendos judicaret, à clarissimo viro D. MENSONE ALTINGIO gravissimis rationibus permotus fuit, ut operam suam Amstelodamensi Ecclesie addiceret. — At the instigation of his wife, who was a Dutch woman, he went into Holland, and came to Emden in the year 1587, where having officiated some time both as a school-master and a divine, he was invited, at the same time, by the inhabitants of Amsterdam and Groningen. But, though he preferred those of Groningen, on account of the vicinity of the German idiom, yet he was persuaded by MENSŌ ALTINGIUS to serve the church of Amsterdam.'

It is also great carelessness in the same Moreri to say, in general, that Kuchlin taught Divinity at Leyden. He should have specified, whether he did it in the quality of professor of the university, or of principal of the Divinity college. Meursius would have very clearly explained it to him.

KUHLMAN (QUIRINUS) one of the visionaries of the XVIIth century. He was born at Breslaw in Silesia, the 25th of February 1651 (a), and gave great hopes by his early progress (b). But his studies were interrupted by a sickness he had at eighteen years of age (c). He was looked upon as a dead man the third day of his distemper. That day he had a terrible vision. He fancied himself surrounded with all the devils in hell, and that at mid-day, being not asleep. This vision was followed by another of God himself, encompassed with his saints, and Jesus Christ in the midst of them. He then saw and felt unutterable things. Two days after, he had still these sort of visions (d); and, when he was cured of his distemper, he perceived indeed a great change as to those sights, but he always saw a circle of light, which attended him on his left side (e). He had no longer any relish for literature. He (f) had sometimes such extasies, that they hindered him from seeing and hearing those that were with

(a) Epist. Theo. sophicus Leidensis, pag. 11.

(b) See his Prodromus quinquennii mirabilis, pag. 10, 12, and the fragments of the Letters prefixed to it by him.

(c) Prodrom. quinquenn. mirabilis, pag. 5.

(d) Ibid. pag. 6.

(e) Ibid. pag. 11.

(f) Ibid. pag. 14.

with him; and he formed the design of abundance of books, which were so many methods for learning every thing, without much trouble, and perfectly. At nineteen years of age, he left his native country, where justice was not done him, and went to visit the universities. He published a second edition of his epitaphs (g), a work he had composed at fifteen years of age; and he put out a treatise of Morality (h): but, as he made an extraordinary progress every day, he found the sheets unworthy of him, which the Printer sent him, his knowledge was so enlarged, while the book was printing (i). He made no account of the public lectures and disputations in the university of Iēna, and would have no teacher but the Holy Ghost (k). His desire of seeing Holland was so strong, as not to permit him to put off his journey till he might see what would be the issue of the war, which had proved so mischievous to that country in 1672. He landed at Amsterdam (l) three days before the town of Naerden was retaken (m). He went to Leyden a few days after, and was not long there, before he met with the works of Behme [A], of whom he had never heard before. The reading of that author was casting oil into the fire; he admired that Behme had prophesied things, which no body knew of but Kuhlman himself (n). There was at that time, in Holland, one JOHN ROTHE, who pretended to prophesy [B]. Kuhlman contradicted the proverb, that people

[A] He was not long at Leyden before he met with the works of Behme. Jacob Behme, or Boehme, was an Enthusiast, of whom I shall some time or other speak more largely. He was born in a village of Germany, near Gorlitz, in the year 1575, and, when he had learned to read and write, he was taken from school, to be a Shoemaker. He began to exercise his trade at Gorlitz in 1594. He fell into an ecstasy for the space of seven days, in the year 1600, if we may believe what he published in a book, intitled, Aurora. This book was presented to the magistrates of Gorlitz, by George Richter, dean of the pastors of the place, as containing many errors of Paracelsus and Wigelius; for Behme had applied himself to Chymistry in his youth. The magistrates suppressed this Aurora as much as they could, and ordered the author to write no more. He was silent seven years; but when he found, that the director of the electoral laboratory had recommended him to several persons at court, as a good Chymist, he lifted up his head, and boldly opposed George Richter, and wrote above twenty books in five years time. He died the eighteenth of November 1624 (1). Many persons suffered themselves to be infatuated with this man's visions. Kuhlman was not the least of his admirers, as it appears from this passage (2): 'Ejus (Jo-gatore, sub intensioris devotionis specie, ita primum dementatus fuit, ut totus ei adhæreret non tantum, sed quoscunque posset, ad familiam ejus novam pertrahere totis viribus allaboravit. Verum postea, eo quod patrem forsan non ferret, nedum superiorem, quo loco Labadæum novæ devotionis artificem & præconem habere tamen tenebatur, quamdiu civitati ejus adscriptus esset, secessionem ab eo molitus est, gloriosum in Christo Regnum infando strepitu in terris, magno illo vexillifero, multo felicitius erecturus (4). He boasted of his revelations; he promised wonders to such as would lift themselves under his banner; he disturbed the church and state with his libels; but nothing came to pass of what he had foretold; and, to complete his misfortune, he was shut up in the prison of Amsterdam. See this more at large in Mr Saldenus's Narrative (5). 'Hinc numerosas vacillantium animarum copias colligere, sociis suis aureos montes promittere, Ecclesiam Rempubliamque libellorum famosissimorum plaustris conturbare, Servum Dei Joannem Prophetamque eximium seipsum indigitare, Revelationum tandem extraordinariorum universa volumina in vulgus spargere, neque erubuit neque destitit. At quis tandem omnium horum exitus?

Mons parturivit, natusque est ridiculus mus.

Eorum, quæ prædixerat, nihil evenit; evenere contra multa, quæ nec prædixerat nec prælagierat. Missio enim, quod erecturum se esse gloriatus erat, vexillo, & cum De Raatis, Somers, Richardsonis, novi Regni designatis Assessoribus, redux in Patriam factus, soluta societate tribunitiæ & schismaticæ, patriæ urbis & Imperatoris inclusus est: impetrata simul plenissima facultate & potestate, Prophetias suas ludicras & ridiculas resumendi & retractandi, periculumque faciendi, num prædicere certiuscule forsan posset, quo tempore & modo ex illo suo ergasterio liberandus tandem sit, quam multa alia prænunciavit. — Hence he neither blushed, nor ceased to gather numerous forces of unstable souls, to promise his companions mountains of gold, to disturb the church and the state with cart-loads of libels, to call himself John the servant of God, and a great prophet, and at last to disperse among the people whole volumes of extraordinary revelations. But what was the event of all this?

The mountain labour'd, and brought forth a mouse.

Nothing of what he had foretold came to pass; on the contrary, many things fell out, which he had neither foretold, nor foreseen. For the standard, which he had boasted he would set up, being thrown away, and returning home, together with the De Rats's, Somers's, and Richardson's, the designed assessor of his new kingdom, the tribunitial and schismatical association being dissolved, he was shut up in his own country prison; with full leave at the same time, to resume and revive his ludicrous prophecies, and to try, whether he could not foretell with greater certainty, than he had done many other things, when, and after what manner, he should be released from his confinement. Mrs Bourignon did not suffer herself to be seduced by

V O L. III.

8 M

the

(1) Taken from Micraelius, Hist. Eccles. pag. 1449, & seq. Edit. 1699.

(2) Micrael. ibid. pag. 1324.

(3) Ut à prima imagine summe melancholicus, ita in eligendis quas quoad religionem sequeretur partibus inconstans plane ac desultorius. Saldenus in otii Theolog. pag. 194.

(g) Ib. pag. 25.

(h) I think this book was intitled, Moralis Heralius Historicus.

(i) Prodom. pag. 26.

(k) Ibid. pag. 30.

(l) The third of November, 1673.

(m) Prodom. pag. 38.

(n) Id. pag. 40.

(4) Idem, Saldenus, ibid.

(5) Ibid. pag. 195.

(a) Figulus figulo invidet, faber fabro.

(p) His Letters to him, and those he received from him, are printed with this title, Theophrastæ Epist. Leidenæ.

(q) Multa millena millia inventa omnem ætatem ad stuporem provocantia. Pag. 33.

people of the same trade envy one another (o) [C]; for he wrote with the greatest humility to this John Rothe (p). He called him a man of God, and John III, the son of Zacharias. He begged the assistance of his knowledge, and denounced woe to those, who did not attend to him [D]. He dedicated to him his Prodromus quinquennii mirabilis, printed at Leyden in 1674, which was the forerunner of two volumes he designed to publish. He intended to put into the first the studies and discoveries he had made, since his first vision, till the year 1674. We should have found in it a thousand inventions, that would have astonished all ages (q). The latter was to have been the key of eternity, æternity, and time. He communicated his design to father Kircher; and, praising the fine works that Jesuit had published, particularly the Ars combinatoria, sive ars magna sciendi, he gave him to understand, that he had only made the first draught of what he (Kuhlman) designed to carry farther [E]. This Jesuit answered

(5) That is, God discovered to her, by experience, how far the presumption and folly of men may go in conjunction with the illusions of the devil; never suffering her to be seduced by them, for he inwardly discovered every thing to her. Vie continuee d'Antoinette Bourignon, pag. 293.

(7) Id. ibid.

(8) His name is Daniel Hartnaciuc.

(a) Microellus, Histor. Eccles. pag. 1324. Edit. 1679.

(10) In the year 1700.

(11) Ad calcem Epist. Kircheri scriptæ, pag. 51.

the whims of John Rothe; she had a sovereign preservative against such charms; she would have her prophecy to be like the privileges of the gentlemen of Germany, who hold immediately of the Empire; she would be prophets in chief, and hold only of God, without any subordination, without any collaterals. However it be, let us see what judgment she made of John Rothe, and Kuhlman. Which (6) then particularly appeared on occasion of a famous pretended prophet of Holland, who set up standards, to list under them the twelve tribes of Israel, which he was to restore, and whom some honest people actually followed, besides others, who, without following him, gave credit to his chimerical revelations. In some visits that he made to her, she easily discovered his illusion, though he assured her he had a frequent commerce with the angels, and with God, and that he should be for the future as a God to her, since God would only discover himself to her by his means. She was so weary of him, as to resolve not to see him any more, nor to open his prophetic letters, which are at present sealed up still among her papers. She cautioned her friends to beware of him, because undoubtedly he was not of God; for she applied to God on purpose to know what he was; and God, to the question she asked, Lord, is this man thy prophet? answered, No; and to the second question, Who is he then, Lord? he answered her, He is a presumptuous man, over whom the devil hath a great power. God had given her the same sentiments of those of his tribe, and particularly of one Quirinus Kuhlman, who lately printed a letter, which he addressed to this gentlewoman, to try whether he could jumble together the spirit of God, and the visions of the devil, with which this false prophet has his head filled, roving up and down to seduce those who deserved to be seduced, by reason of the little esteem they have for the truth, that comes from God (7).

We find in Micraelius's Continuator (8), that John Rothe, being the son of a man, whose name was Zacharias, boasted of being the forerunner of the son of God, with respect to the last judgment, and that, in the year 1668, he ordered, in king Melchisedec's name, the emperor, all kings, and princes, to lay down their sovereignties, for as much as the reign of Jesus Christ was at hand: that he was examined in the year 1677, and shut up in prison by order of the States of Holland and West-Friesland; and, that afterwards, being set at liberty, he was laughed at by every body, his prophecies being found contrary to the event (9). That author should have added, that he was cured of his visions, that he married, and became as usual of other people. He is still living whilst I write this (10).

[C] He contradicted the proverb, that people of the same trade envy one another. This was more edifying, take it altogether, than what we have seen since. We have seen two interpreters of the Apocalypse write one against another, though they were agreed upon the pretended myteries of the year 1689. But because they met in that point of union, by different roads, each would maintain his hypothesis, to the prejudice of his brother interpreter. This was not well; and, if the public had been less indulgent than it was, no body ought to have wondered at it.

[D] He denounced woe to those, who did not attend to John Rothe. He thundered out (11) Vae! vae! si prophetas servorum Dei spreveritis, seu Batavia olim mirabilis nunc miserabilis sprebit & moriens spernit. — Woe! woe! if you shall despise the prophecies of the servants of God, as wretched Holland despiseth, and dying continues to despise them. Hoc anno, continuæ be, & hujus anni una die veniet & mors & luctus & fames Babylonis Belgicæ, & igne exuret cœlesti, quia validus est Dominus Deus damans eam. — This year, and on one day of this year, the death, grief, and famine, of Belgic Babylon will be happen, and she will burnt with fire from heaven, because mighty is the Lord God, who condemns her. All this because they had spoke much against John Rothe, and his visions had been laughed at. Kuhlman maintained, that heaven had declared for that prophet, by the great storm on the twenty fourth of March, 1674, and by the ruins that happened in several places the twenty first of May following (12). He referred to the Gazetteer, who mentioned them, and applied to his friend the famous words of an old Poet. O miselli Theosophistæ & Diabologi! nullis verbis, calumniis, invectionibus eluditis Prophetam, nimium Deo dilectum, Cui militat æther, Et conjurati veniunt ad classica venti (13).

(13) Ibid.

— O miserable Theosophists, and diabolical speakers, with no words, calumnies, or invectives, do you deceive the prophet, highly favoured of heaven, for whom the æther fights, and under whose banners conspiring winds enlist. He apostrophized in particular Amsterdam (14), where the wind had torn up many trees; and forgot not the thunder, which fell upon the great church at Utrecht; but especially, he cried out miracle (15), because it thundered on the twenty fourth of March, the day before John Rothe left Holland, whilst there was still some snow in the streets, and ice in the canals. These storms, thunders, and lightnings, were, according to him, the fore-runners of the destruction of the country; and yet from that time the affairs of the United-Provinces went on better and better every day. It is not improper to observe all these things, in order to know the predominant spirit of such people; they make an ill use of every thing, and find their pretended myteries every where. We have instances of it of a later date.

[E] He acquainted Father Kircher that he had only made the first draught (16) of what he (Kuhlman) designed to carry farther. Father Kircher did not stand to defend his works, nor pretended to be more knowing than Kuhlman. He struck sail before him, and declared, that, having written in a human way, he pretended not to equal those who wrote by inspiration. Quod porro de arte combinatoria ceterisque paradoxis meis, tum in polygraphia, tum in musurgia, jam publicæ luci traditis meliori modo fieri potuisse contendis, nil moror cum scientiæ tuæ tam sublimis et deosâternis prorsus incapacem ineptumque me esse humiliter obsequio fitear. Quæ scripsi ego, divina aspirante gratia humano more, id est studio & labore adquisita scientia scripsi, non divinitus inspirata aut infusa, conjuncti puram inter mortales dari non existimo. . . . Non dubitem quin tu pro incomparabili ingenii tui vastitate meis nugis & majora & admiratione digniora sis proditurus. — As to what you say, that my Ars Combinatoria and Paradoxes, which are already published, might have been better performed, I confess it, and own, with great humility, my own incapacity for that sublime and celestial science you are master of. What I have written, I have written by the grace of God, after a human manner, that is, by knowledge acquired through study and labour, not divinely inspired or infused, which is not to be expected.

(16) Incommet arte combinatoria inventi pult in Medicinâ Chymicæ, rebus paradoxis suis subjunxit, sed hoc optatum (non tam libere) ut magis interna quoniam externa, ut cœcum quoniam cœcæ quævis. — It is a great many things in Physic and Chymistry may be found by the Art. you have rightly submitted to your Paradoxes; but I could wish (I take the liberty to advise you) that you would examine rather the inside than the outside, the kernel rather than the shell.

(r) In quibus majora in omni scibili erantur, quam à nobis vel
ullo homine expectantur. *Monit.
ad Lector. in limine Epist. ad Kircher.*

(s) Omnia quæ
possideo sapientie incarnate non mihi veniunt adscribenda. Ibid.

answered him civilly, and gave him good advice [F]; and particularly upon the design he had to write to the Pope [G]. The prophetic spirit had not made our Kuhlman insensible to the pleasure of being praised; for there was no encomium written to him, either by those, whom he had presented with his books, or by others, but what he published in the front of his Prodromus. As for the praises that he bestows upon his own writings, they are undoubtedly very great (r); but, as he declares, that all his knowledge proceeds from the incarnate wisdom (s), I will not be positive, that it is a sign of pride (t). I do not well know when he left Holland; but I have lately seen a book (u), wherein it is said, that he wandered a long time in England, in France, and in the East [H]; and that at last he was burnt in Muscovy, on the third day of October

expected, pure and unmixed, among men.
I doubt not but you are able, through the wonderful capacity of your genius, to produce works greater and more admirable than the trifles I have written.
Our prophet took this in earnest, and was not sensible, that the Jesuit laughed at him. He carefully published Father Kircher's answer, and used capital letters in the places where he thought himself praised.

[F] Father Kircher gave him good advice. Kircher's second letter makes it plain, that he knew the weakness of this man, and that he jeers him, when he says in a serious manner: 'Magna sanè ἀπίσα καὶ ἀνευρεῖται promittis, quæ uti supra omnem humani ingenii captum longe constituta sunt, ita ea quoque a nemine huc usque non dicam tentata, sed nec cogitata quidem fuisse audacter affirmo, atque adeo aliud mihi fulcipari non liceat, nisi talem te divino munere scientiam adeptum esse qualem sacra Pagina de PROTOPLASTO & SALOMONE testatur: explico Adamæam, Salomoniam, verbo infusam, nulli mortaliū nisi Tibi soli notam, cæteris inexplicabilem scientiam. — You promise wonderful things; which as they exceed all human capacity, so I boldly affirm they never were attempted, or so much as thought of, by any one before: and therefore I can only suspect, that, by a divine gift, you have acquired such a knowledge, as the scripture ascribes to Adam and Solomon; an Adamic, Solomonic, in a word infused, knowledge, known to no mortal but yourself, and inexplicable to all the world beside.' But what follows is charitable advice. All things well considered, Father Kircher advised him to keep that infused knowledge to himself, and not to expose himself to the raileries of an age so scoffing as this is. Indeed, our age seems to be more terrible to the Visionaries than the preceding ones. The bishop of Meaux has touched upon it in one of his books; but I question whether at the bottom the appearances are not fallacious (17).

'Quicquid fit, ita est Kircher's words, ego sane considerato rei non parvi momenti negotio, pro singulari quo te prosequor affectu, etiam atque etiam quam obnixissime contenderim, ne hanc tuam noviter obtentam scientiam Centralisque abyssi profunditatem ulli vana quadam jactantia ostenderes, ne Tertii post Adamum Salomonis dicam & cum risu nomen incurras. Potissimum hoc sæculo sarcastico, quo Criticorum, Thraconum, & Sycophantarum non parvus est numerus qui aliud non moluntur, quam ut gloriosos aliorum labores canino dente rodere, fannis ludibrisque exponere non cessent. — Whatever it be, the friendship I have for you induces me, upon mature deliberation, earnestly to advise you, not to boast of this newly acquired science, lest you be laughed at by the name of the Third Solomon since Adam. Especially in this sarcastical age, in which wou'd-be critics, brag-gadocios, and sycophants are so numerous, who make it their business to snarl at the glorious labours of others, and to expose them to mockery and laughter.' And, to make greater impression by his remonstrances, he was pleased to tell him what had happened to himself; which was, that he had found by experience, that a man exposed himself to many evils, when he rashly and inconsiderately sets up for an author. Quanta malorum Ilias ex inconsiderata scriptione resultet, ego jam 40 annorum spatio, quo in hoc omnium gentium & nationum theatro, meam utut passum personam ego, frequentis experientia comperi.

[G] and in particular upon his design to write to the Pope.] Though Kuhlman fancied, that he was the man promised by Drabicius, and though he knew, that Drabicius's promises concerned the ruin of the Roman Antichrist, yet he had a mind to write to the Pope. He thereupon consulted Father Kircher, and expressed to him the passionate desire he had of communicating to the sovereign Pontiff his great secrets for the good of Christendom. A te, Reverendissime Pater, peterem ne denegares mihi occasiōem præbere, qua Pontifici Maximi manibus propriis quedam Epistola à me insignum observantia transmittenda traderetur. Vellem enim arcana ponderosissima ad Christianæ Ecclesiæ commodum singulariter proficua, candido ore diloque candido, tam admirabili tempestate Pontifici communicare amore Reip. Christianæ impulsus. I do not know the particulars of the good advice, the Jesuit gave him upon this subject; he left them out of the answer he received; for that passage was printed in the following manner:

Quod denique de literis ad summum Pontificem dandis, eidemque propriis manibus à me consignandis Te cogitare scribis. quæ scribo ut quanta cautela & circumspectione Romæ procedendum sit cognoscas. — As to your design of writing to the Pope which I tell you, that you may know with what caution and circumspection affairs are to be carried on at Rome. But he did not strike out that part, wherein he was told, that his great work, dedicated to the Pope, would be applauded and admired, provided he left nothing in it, that might offend the censors of books, and took care not to pretend to an inspired knowledge silentio quoque suppressa divinitus Tibi inspirata scientia. This last counsel, though good in itself, was the least likely to be relished; for it is by boasting of a divine illumination, that one may strike the people with astonishment (18). Let us speak a word concerning the knavery or folly of false prophets. About the time that Kuhlman was ready to write very respectfully to the Pope, for the good of Christendom, he wrote to others, that he hoped to see quickly the destruction of the Papacy. This is the plain meaning of these words of Kuhlman, according to the file of our Visionaries. 'O Pontifex Clemens X! an figilli mei duplicatum Quinarium X excedes, mox orbis aspiciet universus? In Clemente I Petro & Lino jure præterito Episcopatus Romanus incipit: in Clemente X quid futurum sit tempus evolvet. — O Pope Clement X! will the whole world hereafter see, whether you will exceed the double Quinary X of my seal? The bishopric of Rome, Peter and Linus justly omitted, began in Clement I: what will happen under Clement X, time will shew.' I could name a man (19), who has been extremely vexed, because the public has been informed, that, whilst he furiously inveighed against Lewis XIV, he wrote some letters to a duke, full of flattery towards that prince.

[G] He wandered a long time in England, in France, and in the East.] I have lately found many little books of this Enthusiast, printed at London at his own expence, some in 1681, and others in 1682. The first of them dated from London the 24th of June, 1681, is dedicated to Lewis XIV, with this familiar inscription, Salve Ludovico XIV. Rex Liligere, salve. The author exhorts this prince to assert the Regale, which was the talk of that time, and acquaints him, that Drabicius had promised him the city of Rome (20). We find in this collection a letter, which he wrote from Lubec to Father Kircher, in February, 1676, De sapientia infusa Adamæa, Salomonæaque; and a piece, which he inscribed to Mahomet IV, De conversione Turcarum. It is dated from Constantinople the first of August, 1678. The author sets his mystical seal to it at London, the first of May, 1681, and signified to the Sultan, that the comet, which appeared the preceding winter, presaged the conversion of all nations; and he congratulated his highness on having appointed a fast throughout his empire.

'Apexilli

(r) See the Entretien sur la Caule chimérique, printed in 1691, pag. 109.

(u) Diarium Biographicum Hennigii Witte, Tom. II, pag. 168.

(18) See the bishop of Meaux's Commentary upon the Apocalypse, Dutch Edit. pag. 429.

(19) Quem verisimile non est, Signis persicille est. Horat. Sat. P. II, ver. 87. [The person intended here is Mr. Jurieu. REM. CRIT.]

(20) A Deo data scientia Romæ nunc cribans a Drabicio Tib olim promissa.

(17) See the article ABARIS, remark [1].

(x) Ob vaticinia
quedam & seditionis motum concrematus.
Id. ibid.

October 1689, for some predictions actually seditious (x). I do not know whether he caused his medal to be struck, as some other new prophets have done; but the same book informs me, that his effigies came out, under which there are so many titles given him [I], that I believe the eastern monarchs hardly give themselves more. If it be thought, that I speak too seriously, and too copiously of him, I desire it may be known, that there is a seriousness, which upon such things is worse than jesting; and it is requisite the world should be informed of the prodigious variety of Fanaticism. It is a more contagious evil than is imagined. The reading of Drabicius completed the ruin of Kuhlman [K]. Those, who have not the Prodromus of the latter, need only read three or four pages of Morhofius's Polyhistor (y), where they will see the magnificent promises and vast projects of this Enthusiast.

(y) From page
357, to pag. 361.

For the rest, he was not one of those inspired men, who pretend to continence; he was married twice, if we may call a marriage, and not a concubinage, the commerce that is between a man and a woman, without observing the formalities prescribed by the canon and civil laws. He understood well enough how to trick people out of their money, and he wrote to some persons in a magisterial and prophetic tone, that it was necessary for the advancing of the new kingdom of God, that they should send him such or such a sum, in default of which he threatened them with the most terrible punishments the avenging hand of the most High could inflict. Van Helmont was one of those, who received such letters; but he was wiser than to pay any regard to them (z).

(z) I have this from some persons, who knew Kuhlman.

‘Aspexisti ante aliquot menses, O Capitaneus grandis ab Oriente Solis, Cometam in-audite-ingentem, NUNTIUM REALEM REGNI JESUELITARUM, hoc est Reformationis Populorum omnium ad Deum Unicum & Triunum. Bene Te, quod cor tuum coram Deo flexeris, & Proclamatione Diei penitentialis Catholici in Regnis tuis, in-ceperis adimplere Verba Dei ad Prophetam Drabicius: Si Christiani voluntatem meam in destruendo Antichristianismo, Doctrinamque prava & Idololatria exequi renuent, facient id Christianis in opprobrium Turca & Tartari: quod horrore erit angelis meis & hominibus. Maeste illa indole. — You saw, some months before, O great Eastern leader, a comet of unusual magnitude, A TRUE PROGNOSTIC OF THE KINGDOM OF THE JESUELITES, that is, of the restoration of all people to the one true God. O! well is thee, that thou hast turned thy mind before God, and, by proclaiming a general fast throughout thy empire, hast begun to fulfil the words of the Lord to the prophet Drabicius: If the Christians shall refuse to perform my will in destroying the kingdom of Antichrist, and corrupt doctrine and idolatry, the Turks and Tartars shall do it, to the disgrace of the Christians; which will be an horror to my angels, and to men.’ He wrote to the Aga of Smyrna, the twenty eighth of June 1678 (21). Some months after, he dedicated to the Sieur Van Dam the mystery of Kotterus’s twenty one weeks, in which he declared, that the house of Austria was about to lose the Imperial crown. By his piece intitled De magnatibus naturæ ultimo ævo reservatis, inscribed, Ad adeptos magosque orbis terrarum, at Geneva the thirtieth of January 1682, it appears, that he was going into the Holy Land. His Arcanum microcosmicum is dated from Paris the first of November 1681.

[I.] There are so many titles given him.] Here is what I find in a book I have quoted (22): In effigie quam Andreas Lippius edidit, ita celebratur:

Alter Scaligerum, Taubmannus, Grotius, Opitz, Barthius, Iscanus, Gryphius, Muretus, Erasmus!
Henoch, Josephus, Davides, Joshua, Moses, Elias, Daniel, Salomon, Elisa, Johannes!
Cyrus, Alexander, Constantin, Karl, Fridericus!
Liligerus, Juvenis, Frigerans, Artista, Sophata:
O Pater hæc tua sunt! Hæc ad te cuncta reflexit.

In the print published by Andreas Lippius, he is thus celebrated:

Another Scaliger, Taubmna, Grotius, Opitz, Barthius, &c.

A little before, it is said, that he sometimes called himself LUDOVICUS LUDOVICI. The catalogue of his writings, as Mr Witte gives it, does not comprehend the Epistola Theosophica Leidenſis; but then, it contains nine letters written to Father Kircher: besides Epistolarum Londinensium Catholica ad Wicklesio-Waldenses, Hussitas, Zwingianos, Lutheranos, Calvinianos; besides in High Dutch, De celesti osculo amoris, sive cogitationes poeticae ex Cantico Cantorum. Discursus sacri & profani de pulcherrimis virtutum fœculis. Mortalitas immortalis, sive centum epistaphia. Caduceator Historicus. Neo-Bebmus illustratus, &c.

[K.] The reading of Drabicius completed the ruin of Kuhlman.] Kuhlman found in Drabicius’s prophecies two passages, which he applied to himself (23). The first contains these words (24). ‘Qui legit, intelligat! cum numerabitur QUINQUE finem accipient filii contumaciae, conspecto me potestatem habere in caelos, terram, mare. — Let him, that readeth, understand: when FIVE shall be numbered, the sons of contumacy shall have an end, it being seen that I have power over the heavens, the earth, and the sea.’ Here follows the other (25): ‘Abundantia benedictionis Te (Drabicius) parata expectat! Wratilaviae, ac si oculis videas tuis. — An abundance of blessing attends thee (Drabicius) at Wratilaw, as thou sawest with your eyes.’ Add to these two passages, that which he took from the Astrologico-Prophetical Prognostic, written by Paul Felgenhaver in 1647, and published in 1655. ‘Quantus error sit pacis spes, illud nobis duplicatus QUINARIUS demonstrabit, cum venerit post paucos dies. — How ill grounded are the hopes of peace, the double Quinary will shew, when it shall come after a few days.’ He imagined, that he was that double Quinary, whom Felgenhaver had promised, being convinced of it by two reasons; first, because his name was Quirinus, secondly, because, in 1674, it was five years since he had received an infused science (26). He therefore believed, that then the time promised by Drabicius was come, cum numerabitur quinque, finem accipient filii contumaciae; so that he hoped quickly to throw down Antichrist and Babylon with his pen. Let us hear the Hallelujah’s, which he sung before hand: ‘Corruet Antichristus proprio suo iudicio, & Babylon excidium suum properabit cum admiratione populorum. Hallel. Quem Cæsares armis potentibus non debellavere, juvenis inermis debellabit in virtute Jesu Christi prælians. Hall. Stant Mercatores Antichristi horrore procul tremantes, desent iterum suum insperatum ab insperato timore futurorum. Hall. (27). — Antichrist shall fall by his own judgment, and Babylon shall hasten it’s ruin with the admiration of the people. Hallelujah! whom the emperors with powerful arms have not conquered, an unarmed youth shall subdue, fighting in the strength of the Lord Jesus. Hallelujah! the merchants of Antichrist stand at a distance, trembling with horror; they lament their unexpected destruction thro’ an unexpected fear of what is to come. Hallelujah!’ If I had not read this, I should hardly have believed, that the extravagance of Fanaticism could have gone so far.

(23) Epist.
Theosoph. pag. 4.

(24) Reclut.
194, Feb. 75
ann. 1664.

(25) Reclut.
6-8, May 24
1664.

(26) Epist.
Theosoph. pag. 4.

(27) This is what he wrote to John Rothe, the twenty fourth of April 1674, from Leyden. See the Epist. Theoph.

(21) Kuhlman
was then in the port of Smyrna, on board a French ship. He was still at Smyrna the twenty seventh of October 1678, as appears from the letter, which he wrote to James Van Dam,
the Dutch consul.

(22) *Diarium
Biographicum
Henningi Witte,
Part. II, pag.
168.*

KYRIANDE

KYRIANDER (WILLIAM) a German Civilian, after he had begun the study of the Civil-law in Germany, continued it in France and at Padua, and went afterwards to Venice, to add the practice to the theory, by frequenting the bar (a). He there undertook the translation of a book of Leander Albertus [A], which was printed at Cologne in 1567. You will find in Moreri, that he was syndic of Triers, and that he published the Annals of that town [B]: But you will not find there, that he changed his religion, and that his book was much disparaged by the Jesuits upon this account [C].

(a) Kyriander, Præfat. Descript. Italiae.

[A] He undertook the translation of a book of Leander Albertus. This work contains the description of Italy, and has not been despised by the learned. Read Vollius, chapter 12, book 3, De Historicis Latinis (1), and La Popeliniere, pag. 414 of the Histoire des Histoires. Kyriander made use of three Italian editions of this work, which he translated into Latin; but I wonder he says nothing of the edition, to which was added the Description of the Islands that are near Italy. That edition was printed at Venice, apresso Ludovico de gli Avanzzi, in the year 1561, in 4to. The translator is very much to be blamed for not having made use of it, and for not adding to his work the Description of the Islands.

(1) Pag. m. 680.

[B] He published the Annals of the town of Triers.

It is a Folio printed at Deuxponts in the year 1603. Michael Hertzius does not mention this edition. He only mentions that of 1625, and pretends, that those Annals begin with the year of the world 966 (2). Which carries them up to above seven hundred years before the deluge. Zeiller (3) might have taught him to say 1966, and not 966. In the second Holland edition of Moreri's Dictionary, there is 1066; which goes back to near 600 years before Noah.

(2) Hertzius, Bibliotheca Germanica, no 464.

(3) De Hist. Part. II, pag. 81.

[C] He changed his religion, and his book was much disparaged by the Jesuits upon that account. Masenius speaks of it thus: Kyriander res Trevirensium, ut fidem Deo Principique suo violarat, perversè persecutus est (4).

(4) Masenius, in Dedicat. Compend. Hist. Trevir. apud Magurum, Eponymol. pag. 498.

VOL. III.

8 N

L A B E

L.

(a) La Croix du
Maine, pag. 291.

LABE (LOYSA) a courtesan of Lyons, has been reckoned among the French authors, by la Croix du Maine, and du Verdier Vau-Privas. She flourished at Lyons, in the reign of Henry II, in 1555 (a). Her works were printed there the same year [A]. She did not resemble the courtesans in all things; for, if she was, on the one hand, of their humour, in that she would be well paid for her favours, she had, on the other hand, some regard for learned men, which others have not; for she bestowed her favours on them gratis. Her character will be better known by the passage I shall quote [B].

[A] Her works were printed at Lyons, in 1555. They contain a dialogue in French prose, intitled, Le debat de Folie & d'Honneur (A debate between Folly and Honour), and several poems of her own invention (1); besides the writings of several poets in her praise, in Greek, Latin, Italian, and French verse (2).

(1) La Croix du Maine, pag. 291.

(2) Du Verdier
Vau-Privas, Bibl. Française,
pag. 822.

(3) Id. ibid.

[B] Her character will be better known by the passage I shall quote. I make no alteration in du Verdier's words. 'Loyfa Labe, says he (3), a courtesan of Lyons, (otherwise called the handsome Ropemaker's wife, being married to an honest Ropemaker) managed a horse very well; for which reason, the gentlemen, who had access to her, called her captain Loys; she was a woman of a good and cheerful wit, and tolerably handsome. She obligingly entertained in her house lords, gentlemen, and other persons of merit, with discourse, music, both vocal and instrumental, in which she was admirably well skilled, reading of good Latin, Italian, and Spanish books, wherewith her closet was curiously furnished, and with exquisite sweet-meats. In fine, she communicated to them privately the most secret pieces she had: in a word, she was free of her body to such as paid for it: however not to all, not to mechanics, and men of mean condition, whatever money they might offer her. She loved learned men above all, who were so much in her favour, that those of her acquaintance were preferred before any great lord, to whom she would rather do a favour gratis, than to another for a great many crowns; which is contrary to the custom of those of her trade and condition.' This passage has been quoted in the continuation of the Critique Generale de l'Histoire du Calvinisme (4), with the addition of this (4) Letter xviii, reflexion (5): 'Demosthenes would have been glad, if the courtesan Lais had been like this; he would not have made a voyage to Corinth in vain, nor experienced,

Qu'à tels festins un auteur comme un sot,
A prix d'argent doit payer son écot.

That at such treats an author pays his scot,
And is no better dealt with than a sot.

This woman at the same time honoured and dishonoured learning: She dishonoured it, whilst, being an author, she led the life of a courtesan; and she honoured it, because the learned were better received by her gratis, than the ignorant at any price.

LABERIUS (DECIMUS) a Roman knight and a Poet, had an admirable faculty at playing the part of a Mime. He durst not refuse Julius Cæsar, who was desirous he should come upon the stage to act one of those pieces, tho' this was very unbecoming his condition, and his age. He excused himself the best he could in his prologue [A], and maliciously slipped in some strokes against Cæsar [B]; which determined that

[A] He excused himself the best he could in the prologue. Macrobius has preserved it to us, and very judiciously observes, that a master, even when he intreats, uses a sort of authority, which there is no resisting (1). 'Laberium asperæ libertatis equitem

(1) Asinius says more: Quod est potentissimum imperandi genus, rogabat qui jubere poterat. Which is the strongest kind of command, he entreated, who might have commanded. Præfat, Centon. Nopt.

Necessitas, cujus cursus transversus impetum Voluerunt multi effugere, pauci potuerunt, Quo me detrussit pæne extremis sensibus? Quem nulla ambitio, nulla umquam largitio, Nullus timor, vis nulla, nulla auctoritas Movere potuit in juvena de statu: Ecce in senecta ut facile labefecit loco Viri excellentis mente clemente edita Submissa placide blandiloquens oratio? Etenim ipsi Di negare cui nihil potuerunt, Hominem me denegare quis posset pati? &c (2).

(2) Macrobius, Saturnal. lib. ii, cap. vii, pag. 11, 342.

Cæsar prevailed upon Laberius, by a large gratuity to appear upon the stage, and act a part in his own farces. But power, not only when it invites but when it intreats, compels. And therefore Laberius excused himself in the prologue, as being compelled by Cæsar, in the following manner:

Necessity, which many would avoid, but few can, whether has it driven me, almost in the last stage of my life? whom neither ambition, nor bribes, nor fear; whom no power, no authority, could influence, in youth I behold how easily the courteous invitation of a great man unsettles! For can I, a man, deny him anything to whom the gods themselves can deny nothing?

[B] He slipped in some strokes against Cæsar. This we have from Macrobius (3). 'In ipsa quoque actione subinde se qua poterat ulcisceretur, induito habitu Syri, qui velut flagris Cæsar præripientique se similis exclamabat:

Porro Quirites! libertatem perdimus.

& paulo post adjecit:

Necesse est multos timent quem multi timent.

Qua dicto universitas populi ad solum Cæsarem oculos & ora convertit, notantes impotentiam ejus hac acacitate lapidatam. During the action itself, he revenged himself in some sort, in the character

(a) That is, on the day that he acted a play, out of complaisance to Julius Cæsar, that prince to mortify him a little, by preferring another poet before him [C]. Laberius was rallied by Cicero that day, (a) and he repaid him in his own coin [D]. He died ten months after Julius Cæsar (b). His verses have not been so much despised by Horace, as it is thought [E]. Moreri has committed some faults [F].

(b) Eusebius, in Chronico.

of Syrus, who, representing one beaten with rods, and flying from punishment, cried out:

Ye Romans! We lose our liberty,

and a little after, he added,

He must necessarily be affraid of many, whom many fear.

At which words, the whole audience turned their eyes upon Cæsar, observing that he was struck with this piece of satire. Father Briet hath not well observed this passage; for he supposes, that Laberius did not offend Cæsar till a long time after. Procedente tempore ipsum Cæsarem offendit, & maxime hoc versu.

Porro Quirites libertatem perdimus,

Item & isto

Necesse est multos timeat, quem multi timent (4).

Afterwards he offended Cæsar himself, especially by this verse,

Ye Romans! we lose our liberty.

And by this,

He must necessarily be affraid of many, whom many fear.

[C] Cæsar preferred another Poet before him.] Here is another passage of Macrobius: 'Ob hæc in Publium vertit favorem. Is . . . productus Romæ per Cæsaris ludos omnes qui tunc scripta & operas suas in scenam locaverant provocavit, ut singuli secum posita invicem materia pro tempore contenderent. Nec ullo recusante superavit omnes; in quibus & Laberium: unde Cæsar arridens hoc modo pronuntiavit:

Favente tibi me visus es Laberi à Syro:

Statimque Publio palmam & Laberio annulum aureum cum quingentis sesteritiis dedit: Tunc Publius ad Laberium recedentem ait: Qui cum contenti scriptor hunc spectator sublevis (5). For this reason he turned his favour on Publius. This man . . . during the celebration of Cæsar's games at Rome, appeared, and challenged all the dramatic Poets to contend with him, alternately giving each other a subject; and, no one refusing him, he vanquished them all; among the rest, Laberius; whence Cæsar, smiling, said:

Favour'd by me, Laberius, by Syrus you are vanquish'd:

And immediately he gave the palm to Publius, and a gold ring, with 500 sesterces, to Laberius. Then Publius said to Laberius, as he went away; defend him as a spectator, with whom as a writer you disputed. Laberius, some time after, composed a Mime, in which he declared, that the fate of arms is as uncertain upon the stage as any where else; and that, if he had lost the first rank, the same disgrace would happen to his successor. Sequenti statim commissione, Mimo novo interjecti hos versus:

Non possunt primi esse omnes omni in tempore. Summum ad gradum cum claritatis veneris, Confites ægre; & quam defendas, decides. Cecidi ego, cadet qui sequitur, laus est publica (6).

In his next new Mime he inserted these verses:

It is impossible always to excel: when you reach the summit of perfection, it is with difficulty you will keep your footing, and, when you descend, you will fall. I am falling, he who follows me, will fall; praise belongs to the public.

Here follows a passage out of Aulus Gellius (7). 'C. (8) Aul. Gellius, autem Cæsarem ita Laberii maledicentia & arrogantiâ offendebat, ut acceptiores & probatores sibi esse Publii quam Laberii Mimos prædicaret. — Cæsar was so offended at the insolent behaviour of Laberius, that he declared he preferred the Mimes, of Publius to those of Laberius.'

[D] He was rallied by Cicero that day, and he repaid him in his own coin.] After Laberius had acted his piece, Cæsar presented him with a ring, and gave him leave to retire. Laberius went to look for a place among the knights; but they ordered it so, that he could find none. Cicero, seeing him perplexed, said to him, 'Recepissem te, nisi anguste federem. I would make way for you, were I not crowded.' Mirum, answered the other, si anguste fedes, qui soles duobus sellis federe (8). — It is strange you should be crowded who generally sit upon two seats. Cicero killed two birds with one stone. He laughed at Laberius, and at the many senators of a new creation, simul & illum respuens, & in novum senatum jectus, cujus numerum Cæsar supra fas auxerat (9). But the answer that was made him, taxed him with trimming (10), that is with neither being a good friend to Pompey, nor Cæsar. Cicero male audiebat, tunc Pompeio certus amicus, nec Cæsari, sed utriusque adulator (11). I shall observe, by the by, that Macrobius has confounded the places of the knights with those of the senators: he thought, that the senators sat upon what was called the fourteen benches, which is a mistake. Quod Cicero dixit, nisi anguste federem, scomma fuit in C. Cæsarem, qui in senatum passim tam multos admittebat, ut eos quatuordecim gradus capere non possent (12). — Cicero, in saying, if I did not sit too close, reflected upon C. Cæsar, who admitted so many into the senate, that the fourteen benches could not contain them. This was the place of the knights since the law of Rœcius Otho.

Sic libitum vano qui nos distinxit Ottoni (13)

[E] His verses were not so much despised by Horace, as it is thought.] Here are the words of Horace:

Nec tamen hoc tribuens, dederim quoque cætera, nam sic

Et Laberi Mimos, ut pulchra poemata mirer (14).

Nor, granting this, the rest I shall allow;

So might Laberius' Mimes, obscenely gay,

For perfect pieces, in my judgment pass.

Mr Dacier's note runs thus: 'Horace does not here condemn Laberius absolutely, nor so much as censure his works; but only speaks by comparison. Laberius's Mimes were agreeable; but they were not fine and perfect poems. Nor were they made to that end; for the Mimes had only obscene jests in them. For which reason Ovid calls them Mimos obscæna jacentes, and they were only designed to make people laugh. If Julius Scaliger had well understood Horace's meaning, he would not have condemned the judgment, that Horace makes of Laberius's Mimes (15).'

[F] Moreri has committed some faults.] I. The Prænomen of Laberius is not Decius but Decimus. II. He survived Julius Cæsar so little a time, that there was no need of saying, he lived in the reign of Augustus. III. It is not true that he received presents from Augustus. IV. And that Macrobius says it. V. It is false, that Cæsar made him a Roman knight. See what Laberius says in the prologue of the farce acted by him in complaisance to that emperor.

Ergo bis tricenis annis actis sine nota,
Eques Romanus Lare egressus meo
Domum revertar mimus (16).

Twice thirty years pass'd without blemish,
I, who this morn came forth a Roman knight,
Shall home return degraded to a Player.

Which

Which is an undeniable proof, that he was a Roman knight independently of Cæsar. That which deceived Moreri, with many others (17), is, that Cæsar, at the end of the play, gave a ring to this farce-player, as we learn from Macrobius; but it is easy to find in that very place a proof of the justice of my censure. Here is the whole passage: 'Deinde cum Laberius in fine ludorum annulo honoratus à Cæsare è vestigio in quatuordecim ad spectandum transiit, violato ordine, & cum detrectatus est Eques Romanus, & cum minus remissus, ait Cicero prætereunti Laberio, & sedile querenti, recepissimè se nisi anguste federem' (18). — At the end of the games, Laberius, being honoured with a ring by Cæsar, would have taken his seat on the fourteen benches, among the Roman knights as a spectator; but, being refused admission, and looking about for a seat, Cicero said to him, as he passed by him; Laberius, I would make room for you, were I not crowded. It is evident, that Macrobius says, that the order of the knights was dishonoured two manner of ways. I. Because a place was refused to a Roman knight. II. Because a farce-player was sent from the stage to the place, where the Roman knights sat. From whence I necessarily conclude, that Laberius owed not his knighthood to the favour of Julius Cæsar. All that can be said, is, that he disgraced himself by his complaisance in acting on the stage; and that he was re-habilitated by Julius Cæsar. The ring, that he received, may be looked upon as a new patent of nobility: but this does not excuse Moreri. Seneca confirms what we have said (19).

(19) Dicitur Julii ludis suis munus protulit (Laberium) deinde equestri illi ordini redditum iussit ire scilicet in equestrio ordine ut se curaret ut venientem non reciperent. Seneca, Controu. XIII, sub fin.

(18) Macrob. lib. cap. iii, pag. 329.

(a) See the remark [A].

(b) Patria Lotharingus, virtutis sue suffragis ex gregario milite per omnes militarium honorum gradus ad Tribunatum euectus. Vallones aliquot annos magna cum laude gubernavit. Ang. Gallucci, de Bel. Gal. lib. xiii, pag. m. 35.

LABOURLOTTE (CLAUDIUS) one of the bravest captains of his age, owed his fortune to his courage; for his birth was so mean, that it is still a dispute, whether he was a native of Lorraine, or of Franche Comté (a). It is said, that he had been Barber to count Charles of Mansfeld [A]; and that he did him a signal piece of service [B]. He went thro' all the military degrees, till he was made commander of the Walloon troops in the service of the king of Spain (b). He was more fortunate than judicious [C]; for he never more willingly engaged in an enterprize, than when it was very dangerous (c). He was wounded on several occasions [D], and at last he was killed with a musket-shot, the 24 of July 1600, whilst he was making an intrenchment betwixt

(1) Bongars's Letters, pag. 493, of the Hague Edit. 1695.

(2) It was not true. See, below, the remark [E].

(3) It is thus we should translate the Rosini confilio of Bongars, and not de Rosini, as is done in the translation of his Letters.

(4) Hist. de l'Archiduc Albert, livr. iv, pag. 263.

(5) Hist. Universelle, Tom. III, lib. v, chap. xix, pag. 729.

(6) Hist. de l'Archiduc Albert, livr. iv, pag. 264.

(7) That is, to fort Isabella.

(8) Grotius, Histor. de Reb. Belg. lib. ix, ad ann. 1600, pag. m. 57.

[A] It is said, that he had been Barber to count Charles of Mansfeld.] This is said by Bongars, in a letter written to Camerarius, the sixth of August 1596, in which he sent him some news about the siege of Hulst. 'Some, says he (1), write, that Labourlotte has been killed in it (2); that man so famous for his bravery and courage. He was formerly Barber to count Charles of Mansfeld, who died in Hungary. The cardinal chiefly made use of Labourlotte's boldness, and Rone's counsel (3). He, who, in 1693, published the history of archduke Albert, does not say, that Labourlotte was a Barber; but he says nothing that can prove the contrary. 'His birth, says he (4), resembles that of great men, which is frequently disputed: Lorraine will have him to be her's; Burgundy claims him as her's. The name Claudius favours the Burgundians. Whatever country he be of, it is certain he is come of a good family. The many enemies he has had, are a demonstration of his extraordinary merit. Envy, like the thunder, passes over shrubs, and falls upon lofty trees. They say he was of mean extraction, and that he handled the razor and the lancet, before he handled the sword and the pike: but the unprejudiced speak otherwise. They say, that indeed he knew good remedies for wounds; but that he was led to his study by curiosity and charity, and not by necessity.' When d'Aubigné (5) relates, that Labourlotte was killed in a skirmish in the counterescarp of fort Isabella, which he had recruited and victualled, he adds, 'that he was lamented by the arch-duke, and his superiors, and not by his equals; who, enraged with envy, could not bear, that merit should make a colonel of a country Barber.'

[B] . . . and that he did him a signal piece of service.] He delivered him from the trouble of a most unlucky marriage. An author, whom I have cited, will not believe it. His words are: 'It is said, that he got into the favour of Mansfeld, by ridding him of his troublesome wife; but I believe nothing of it; he was too honest a man to be guilty of so base an action (6).' The action would certainly be very base, whatever pleasure it might have given the count. What makes me say, that the incredulity of this writer might be ill grounded, is, that Grotius has hinted at that action; an evident sign, that he did not think the story that was spread to be a vain report. His words are worth relating, as informing us of the merit of the deceased, with some circumstances well expressed. 'Huc (7) quoque se Claudius Burlota transfulerat, bonamque & extremam navavit operam; trajectus globo vir nobilis audacia, Lotharingus ortu, curandis olim vulneribus vitam toleraverat: mox per facinus haud honestum conciliatus Mansfeldio ferebatur, dictus uxorem ejus sustulisse: sed nactus honores, ita se gesserat, ut mereri majora semper judicaretur, quo mors ejus nec luctu apud ducem, nec apud ipsius novitatis invidentes gaudio caruit (8). — Hitherto likewise came Claudius Labourlotte, a man of remarkable boldness, and who had formerly lived by practising Chirurgery: afterwards he is said to have got into the favour of Mansfeld by a dishonourable action, I mean, by ridding him of his wife: but, being advanced to honours, he so behaved himself, that he was always thought to deserve more; for which reason the general lamented his death, but those, who envied his rising greatness, rejoiced at it.'

[C] He was more fortunate than judicious.] Here is what Father Gallucci says of him (9): 'Animosus, magis quam cautus, accerere sæpe non expectare mortem visus est. — He was more brave than prudent, and was often seen to seek death, rather than expect it.' 'He would undertake any thing, and was terrified with no danger. He began a fight as if he was sure of the victory. The bold attempts were committed to him. They, who did not care to be put upon such hazards, or saw themselves eclipsed by his success, called him a fortunate fool, hardly self low (10).'

[D] He was wounded on several occasions.] At the siege of Noion, in the year 1593; at that of Ardres, in 1596; at that of Hulst, the same year; and at the battle of Newport, in 1600. See Father Gallucci (11): I believe he is mistaken as to the last wound. I have met with no other historian, that mentions it: and besides, they all say, that Labourlotte, a few days after the battle, brought a considerable succour to Newport, which contributed very much to the raising of the siege, that prince Maurice had laid to that place. As to the wound at Hulst, it was not mortal, as Bongars will have it. What I have cited from him, in the first remark, was written the sixth of August 1596: he was not undecieved twenty days after; for he affirms, in a letter of the twenty seventh of August, in the same year, that Labourlotte was dead of his wounds (12). Thus you see how the very ministers of princes are subject to spread false news, and not quickly to know the falsity of them. They ought to be more circumspect in that point, than the person I am speaking of, whose ability otherwise deserves great encomiums. But when we follow him close, we cannot forbear saying, that he too lightly believed agreeable news, and was too hasty in imparting them to his friends. Here is another proof of it, taken from the same letter, in which he affirmed, that Labourlotte was dead: You will probably rejoice, when you hear, that the king of Spain is dead, and that the Spaniards will not receive his son for their king, as being born of an incestuous marriage, Rideas etiam cum intelliges Regem Hisp. mortuum, & filium repudiari ab Hispanis natum nuptiis incestis (13). This is what he wrote to his friend, the sixth of August 1596. At that time all the news disadvantageous to Spain was as easily believed, as now (14) those that are to the disadvantage of France.

[E] He was killed the twenty fourth of July 1600.] The author of the history of archduke Albert says the twentyfifth of July, at page 138; but, at page 264, he infers

(9) De Belli Belg. lib. xii, pag. m. 35.

(10) Hist. de l'Archiduc Albert, pag. 264.

(11) In Hist. Belli Belg.

(12) Bongars's little credulous.

(13) Burlotta post Rosinum ex voluerit ubi. Bongars's, Epist. pag. 500. Hague Edit. 1695.

(14) Id. Hist. pag. 497.

(15) I write this in the year 1695.

(d) Hist. de l' Archiduc
Albert, printed in
1693. pag. 264.

(15) Hist. de
l'Archiduc
Albert, pag. 264.

(16) In Topographia Gallo-Brabantiae, printed at Amsterdam, in 1693, in folio, pag 74.

(17) Pag. 718.

(18) See, above, citation (64) of the article GRE-GORY VII.

(19) Le Roi,
ubi supra, pag.
74.

(a) Diog. Laërt
lib. iv, n. 59.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) That garden was in the academy.

(d) Diog. Laërt.
ibid. n. 69.

(e) Id. ib. n. 61.

(f) Id. ib. n. 60.

(1) Diog. Laërt.
lib. iv, n. 28.
*See also the same author, in Proœm.
n. 14.*

(2) Id. ibid. n. 59. See also the same author, in Proem. n. 14.

(3) Cicero,
Academ. Quæst.
lib. iv, cap. vi.

(4) Diog. Laërt.
lib. iv, n. 60.

(5) Menage, in Diog. Laërt. lib.
iv, n. 60.

(6) Plut. in De-metrio.

(7) Justin. lib.
xxxvi.

(8) Plut. in Discrim. Adul & Amici, p.

(9) Plutarch been mentio a concealed action of A files.

[D] The love a goose had for him is very remarkable. She followed him every where, within doors and without, in the day time, and in the night time. Potesť et sapientie videri intellectu huius infansibilis esse. Ita comes perpetuo abascessit Lacydi Philopolo dicatur, nusquam ab eo, non in publico, non in balnei, non noctu, non interdiu digressus (10). When she died Lacycles made as noble a funeral for her, as if she had been his son or his brother (11).

(10) Plin. lib. x,
cap. xxii, pag. m.
48 See also Athenæus, lib.
xiii. pag. 606.

(11) Ælian. lib.
vii, Hist Anim.
cap. xli.

(12) Diog. Laërt
lib. iv. p. 61.

D. (13) Athen lib
xt x. cap. x, pag.
438.

ld

gh ed.

nes.

ther (14) Nomeni
what apud Euseb.

ants; lib. xiv, cap. t in, pag. 734, & caſion

t not μῆτις, gen.
be

VOL. III.

8 C

(g) Rapin, Reflex. sur la Philosophie, n. 8,
pag. m. 326.

gross mistakes [G.] The difference, that father Rapin finds betwixt Arcefilas and Lacydes, is a meer illusion. Philosophy, says he (g), was reflex under the former, and

(16) I do not keep to the Greek,
in which there is αἷς τῆ νοῦλον γραμμάστιον, cava quadam in arcula.

(17) Τὸ τὰ
μύσους πένη.

be troubled with the key, he put it in a hole (16), which he sealed up, and then he threw his seal into the pantry (17) through the hole of the lock. His servants, having discovered this, easily, and as much as they pleased, tricked him. It was no difficult thing for them to get the key, and to place it again where he had put it, and to seal up the hole. They eat, they drank, they robbed him as they thought fit, and laughed at him into the bargain. He on his part very easily perceived the diminution of his wine and provisions; and, not knowing where to lay the fault, he remembered the doctrine of Arcefilas, who taught, that our senses and our reason comprehend nothing, and he attributed the Vacuum of his bottles and baskets to that incomprehensibility. Thus he began to philosophize, in Arcefilas's school, against the certainty of human knowledge. Nay, he made use of that domestic experience, to prove, that he had reason to suspend his judgment in every thing. I will not alledge a hear-say, said he one day, gravely to one of his friends; I know by experience what I am going to tell you; I can speak of it without any doubt. Hereupon he told him from one end to the other the adventure of his buttry. What, continued he, could Zeno say against an argument of this force, which has so clearly demonstrated to me the Atalepsia? Have, not I reason to mistrust every thing, when, having shut, sealed, unsealed, and opened again my pantry with my own hands, I cannot find what I had left in it? I only find my seal there, which will not permit me to believe that I am robbed. When he came to that part, his friend could hold no longer; he broke out into such a fit of laughter, as made the Philosopher perceive his blunder, and resolve to look to his seal better. His servants did not trouble their heads about it; and whether they had learned from the Stoics, or elsewhere, to dispute with him, they unsealed his key, without troubling themselves to put the same seal on again. They put on another, and sometimes none at all. It vexed him, when he saw their roguery; but they maintained they had never meddled with the seal, and that he had forgotten to put it on. He made long discourses to let them see, that he well remembered he had sealed it, and went so far as to swear it. You have a mind, answered they, to divert yourself, and to laugh at our simplicity. A Philosopher, like you, has neither opinions nor memory; for you maintained the other day, that memory was an opinion. He confuted them with reasons different from those of the Academics; but they had recourse to a Stoic, who taught them how to reply to their master, and to elude all his arguments by the doctrine of Incomprehensibility, which they did with a great deal of pleasant humour. The worst of it was, that they continued to rob his provisions, and Lacydes perceived, that his goods vanished away every day. He found himself in great perplexity; his principles, instead of serving him, were against him, and he was forced to behave himself like the vulgar. All the neighbourhood was filled with his clamours and complaints. He protested by the gods and goddesses, that he was robbed (18); at last he took the resolution not to stir out, and to keep within sight of his buttry-door (19). What did he get by disputing with his servants? he made use of the method of the Stoics against them, and they answered him in the way of the Academics, and beat him with his own weapons. At last, resolving to free himself once for all, from the intolerable perplexity he was in, he ingenuously told his servants; children, we dispute one way in the schools, and we live another way in our houses. Οὐδὲν δὲ εἰς ἐδὲν, ἀπὲρ λῶν, ὑπειδόμενον οἱ τὸ σὸρον αὐτῶν ἐρχέσθαι, ἀπικαλύψασθαι. Ἄλλως, ἔφη, ταῦτα, ἢ παίδες, ἐν ταῖς διατριβαῖς λέγεται ἡμῖν, ἄλλως δὲ ζῶμεν. Verum ubi nihil agit, secum ipse cogitanti, quo sua sibi veritas recideret: tandem animi sensum palam ac sine furo aperiens, nimirum, inquit, famuli, aliter hæc in schola disputamus, aliter vivimus (20).

This is a pretty story, and Mr de la Fontaine might have made it very diverting; but it is plain, that it has been forged by a pious fraud of the Stoics. This has been a method used at all times, and in all places; people have always endeavoured, and do so still, to turn the doctrine and person of their adversaries into ridicule; and to that end a thousand fables are invented, if the least pretence can be found to strain maliciously the consequences of their opinions. This passion has been so blindly indulged against the Sceptics, that not only sincerity, but even probability has been laid aside; for they never denied, that, in the ordinary conduct of life, men ought to trust to the testimony of their senses. They only denied, that the absolute nature of objects is just the same as it appears to be. Note, that Diogenes Laërtius (21) is contented to observe, that our Lacydes, having sealed the door of his pantry, threw his seal into it, and that his servants made use of the seal, to steal his provisions, without being discovered by him.

[G.] Moreri has committed very gross mistakes.

I. Instead of saying, that Lacydes's father was a native of Cyrene, he should have said, that Lacydes was born there. II. He ought not to have adopted Laërtius's error, concerning the foundation of an academy by Lacydes. III. He ought not to have placed his death in the fourth year of the XXXVth Olympiad. This is no error of the press; for he adds, that it was the 1131b year of Rome. If the Printers had omitted something in the first calculation, they would not have erred so exactly in the second. It is therefore certain that they followed the copy. Now what can be more absurd, than to believe, that Arcefilas lived in the CXXth Olympiad, and that Lacydes, his disciple, died the last year of the XXXIVth Olympiad (22)? IV. Though his death had been placed in the fourth year of the CXXXIVth Olympiad, it would still be an error; for he died not till about the second year of the CXLth. Here is the proof of it. Diogenes Laërtius observes, that Lacydes, who began to be the head of the academy, the fourth year of the CXXXIVth Olympiad, died after he had taught Philosophy twenty six years. Ἐπελεύτῃσι δὲ σχολαρχεῖν ἀρχάμενοι τῷ τελεσθῇ ἐτι τῆς τελεότης καὶ τελευτῆς καὶ ἐκατοστῆς Ὀλυμπιάδος, τῆς σχολῆς ἀφίστασθαι ἐξ αὐτῶς τοῖς εἰκοσιν ἔτη. Obiit autem cum scholam administrare cepisset quarto anno centesima trigesima quarta Olympiadis, vixitque sex annis in schola consumptis (23). V. It is an absurdity to find in these words, that Lacydes began to be in reputation . . . after he had taught for the space of twenty six years (24). VI. This can hardly be said of any professor; for if he spends twenty five years in his profession, without esteem, he runs the hazard, generally speaking, of dying without any reputation.

Note, that Father Hardouin is mistaken, as to the time of our Philosopher's death. 'Obiisse dicitur,' says he (25), anno 4 Olymp. CXXX. — He is said to have died in the fourth year of the CXXXth Olympiad.' He cites the 120th page of Diogenes Laërtius, of the London edition, 1664, in Folio. But besides that, we find there (26) the CXXXIVth Olympiad, and not the CXXXth, it is certain, that it concerns Lacydes's entrance on his profession, and not his death. Father Labbé has committed but one of these two faults: he says (27), citing Diogenes, that the Philosopher Lacydes died the last year of the CXXXIV Olympiad. It will be asked, whether it can be proved, that he did not die at that time? I answer, that there are two proofs to be given for it. The first is, that he was not the head of the academic school till after Arcefilas's death (28), and we know, that Arcefilas was cotemporary with Eumenes, prince of Pergamus (29), who succeeded not Philaërus till the CXXIXth Olympiad. Father Labbé says so (30); the correspondence of this Philosopher with Eumenes, requires that he should have lived till the CXXXth Olympiad. Which being so, it cannot be said, that his successor died the fourth year of the CXXXIVth Olympiad; for he taught twenty six years. My second proof is drawn from this, that Attalus, king of Pergamus, caused the garden of the academy to be made, wherein Lacydes taught, and desired to have that Philosopher at his court. There is little probability, that these two things relate to the first year of his reign, that is, to the third year of

(21) Diog. Laërt.
lib. iv, n. 59.

(22) Moreri 69
60, in Arcefilas.

(23) Diog. Laërt.
ubi supra, n. 61.

(24) Moreri
quotes only Diogenes Laërtius.

(25) Hardouin,
in Pliniam, lib.
x, cap. xxii, p. 408.

(26) That is in the Greek; for the Printers have left out quite in the Latin translation.

(27) Father
Labbé, Chronol.
Franc. Tom. II,
pag. 301, ad ann.
Romæ, 115.

(28) Diogenes
Laërtius, lib. iv,
n. 60, says, that Lacydes is the only Philosopher who resigned his chair during his life.

(29) Diog. Laërt.
ibid. n. 38.

(30) Labbé, ubi
supra, pag. 285.

(18) Οἰκουρὸς
ἦν Φίλος τοῦ πατρὸς προκα-θήμενος Domi-deiinceps hære-bat perpetuo, ac pro cella sue foribus affidebat.
Id. ibid. This translation seems to me to be better than that of Kleinias, in his note upon Diog.
Laërt. pag. 523.
Semper amicium
cellæ penuriae custodem domi
reliquit.

(20) Id. ibid. C.

and contradicting under the latter. It is certain, that it was never more contradicting, than under Arcefilas.

(31) See Father Labbé, ibid. pag. 300.

of the CXXXIVth Olympiad (31). Let us say then, that Lacydes died not the following year; and let us remember, that, if he had taught but a few months in that garden, it would be an absurdity to give him no other school but that, and even to observe, that it had its name from him. He must therefore have taught there several years, and consequently he did not die a year after Attalus came to the throne. Seth Calvius (32) has been guilty of the same fault as Father Labbé.

(32) Sethus Calvius, ad ann. mundi, 3709, pag. m. 268.

(a) Melch. Adam. in Vita Petri Martyris, pag. 33.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Id. ibid. pag. 36.

LACISIUS (PAUL) a regular canon of the congregation of Lateran in the XVIth century, was of Verona (a). He taught the Latin tongue in the priory of St Fridian, at Lucca, whilst Peter Martyr was prior there (b); and having relished, with him, the doctrine of the Protestants, he followed him into Germany, where they openly professed it in 1542. After they had been some time at Zurich, and at Basil (c), they were invited to Straßburg by Martin Bucer, and by his means Peter Martyr was made professor of Divinity, and Paul Lacisius, professor of the Greek tongue (d). The latter died at Straßburg, I know not when (e). His Latin version of Tzetzes's Chiliads was printed, with the Greek, in 1546, at Basil, by John Oporinus (f).

(d) Id. ibid.

(e) Id. ibid. pag. 35.

(f) Epitome Biblioth. Gesner. pag. 657.

LÆVIUS, a Latin poet. It is not certainly known when he lived; but it is very probable, it was before Cicero's time. He wrote a poem, intituled, Erotopœgia, that is, Sports of Love. Aulus Gellius (a) cites two verses from it. Apuleius (b) gives us six from the same poet, but does not say what work of his he takes them from. Lævius wrote a poem called the Centauris. Festus cites it at the word Petrarum. I shall observe some mistakes [A].

(a) Noct. Attic. lib. ii, cap. xxiv.
(b) In Apologia.

(1) De Poët. Lat.

(2) Philippus Carolus, Animaverf. in Aul. Gellium, pag. 162.

(3) It was the sumptuary law of Licinius.

[A] I shall observe some mistakes. Since Vossius (1) was apprised of the two last citations, I mention, it is very strange, he should reckon Lævius among the Poets of whom we know no more, than that they lived before the days of Charlemagne. But this is a small slip in comparison of the blunder of an author (2), who has put in Aulus Gellius, Livius, for Lævius, and pretended that Aulus Gellius cited Livius Andronicus. How could he cite out of this Livius a passage, which concerns a law (3) made in the 656th year of Rome; how, I say, could he on this occasion cite Livius Andronicus, who was a grown man in the 514th year of Rome? for one of his comedies was acted that year (4). The author I confute, pretends, that Nævius and Pacuvius flourished after Livius Andronicus; but had he not seen a particular in Aulus Gellius, which manifestly proves, that this Livius could not be acquainted with the Licinian Law? Aulus Gellius tells us (5), that Nævius had some of his comedies acted in the five hundred and nineteenth year of Rome, and that he bore arms in the first Punic war.

(4) It was the first that was acted in Rome. See Cicero in Brutus.

(5) Lib. xvii, cap. xxi.

LAIS, a famous courtesan, was of Hyccara, a town of Sicily [A]. She was carried into Greece, when her country was plundered by Nicias the Athenian general. She settled at Corinth, which was the fittest town in the world for women of her profession [B]; and there she made so great a noise, that no courtesan had ever a greater resort

(1) Plutarch. in Nicia, pag. 531. See also Plutarch. in Alcibiades, sub finem.

(2) "Εὐκάρπια, Virginitium etiam in Alcibiades, sub finem. Idem, in Nicia, pag. 533, C.

(3) Thomasius, de Varia Hist. lib. i, cap. lxxxi. One of the commentators upon Alcibiades, pag. m. 330. Du Verdier, Van-Prives, Diverses Leçons, liv. iii, chap. vi, pag. m. 184.

(4) Παρθένων. Achuc puellam. Pausan. lib. ii, pag. 45.

(5) Solin. cap. v. "Ανδραπόδων, Hyccaricum mancipium. On the other hand, he cites (10) Neanthes, author of a book concerning illustrious men, who says, that she was born at Crastus, a town of Sicily. He also cites Timæus, as having said, that she was of Eucarpia in the same island: and yet we have seen, that Timæus, quoted by Athenæus, makes her a native of Hyccara; and since no body makes mention of a place in Sicily, called Eucarpia, I find Berkelius's conjecture (11) very probable, namely, that Stephanus Byzantinus made use of a copy of Timæus, where the transcribers had put Εὐκάρπια for Τυχαία. Cafaubon (12) observes, that the country of Lais, like that of Homer, and of some other illustrious men, has not been well known; and he cites Solinus, who says, Lais eligere patriam maluit quam fateri (13). — Lais would rather chuse than confess her country. Cafaubon adds, that some will have her to be born at Pancarpia in Phrygia; but probably his memory failed him (14): he remembered confusedly, that he had read, that in Stephanus Byzantinus mentions in the article of Eucarpia of Phrygia. This confounded his ideas; he fancied, that he had read, that Pancarpia, in Phrygia, was Lais's birth-place, according to some writers. Pinedo goes farther than Cafaubon, as to the parallel of Homer with this courtesan: he pretends, that several towns contended for the glory of having produced Lais (15). [B] Corinth was the fittest town in the world for women of her profession. However I do not believe all that is said of her by Lotichius. He affirms, that the Corinthians, in their solemn prayers, begged of the gods to increase the number of the courtesans (16). He cites Athenæus, who says no such thing. But this probably misled Lotichius; he honestly depended upon these words of Erasmus: 'tus Corinthi honos habebatur meretricibus, ut quomodo ex autoribus docet Athenæus, illic in templo Veneris prostarent, atque in solemnibus precibus illud addi soleat, ut Dii augerent meretricum numerum. Quin & illud refert meretrices sacro sacro Veneri, civitatem extremo periculo laborantem servasse placata Veneri (17). — Harlots were in such esteem at Corinth, that, as Athenæus informs us from authors, they prostituted themselves there in the temple of Venus, and in solemn prayers they usually added this petition, that the gods would increase the number of harlots. He likewise tells exercise it is us, that the harlots, by sacrificing to Venus, had saved the city in extreme danger.' Erasmus strains the matter. Athenæus says only, that there was an ancient law at Corinth, ordaining, that, when the town should make supplications to Venus in any important affair, they should summon as many courtesans as they could, that they might assist at the pomp of the procession, and pray to that goddess, and return the last in her temple (18). Erasmus is right in his

(14) See Pinedo, in Stephanum, voce Εὐκάρπια.
(15) Celebris meretricis urbes etiam à Diis placet illustriant de qua (Lais) decetbant quendam civitates haud fecit ac de Homero Pinedo, in voce Κρατία. See the same Pinedo on the word Τυχαία.
(16) Lotichius, in Petronium, pag. 232.
(17) Erasmus in Proverb. Κορυνθιαῖστας, id est, fornicationibus ac lustris intulere, they usually added this petition, that the gods would increase the number of harlots. He likewise tells exercise it is us, that the harlots, by sacrificing to Venus, had saved the city in extreme danger.' Erasmus strains the matter. Athenæus says only, that there was an ancient law at Corinth, ordaining, that, when the town should make supplications to Venus in any important affair, they should summon as many courtesans as they could, that they might assist at the pomp of the procession, and pray to that goddess, and return the last in her temple (18). Erasmus is right in his

